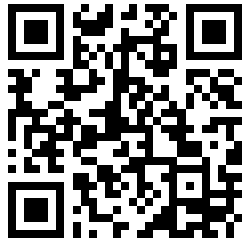
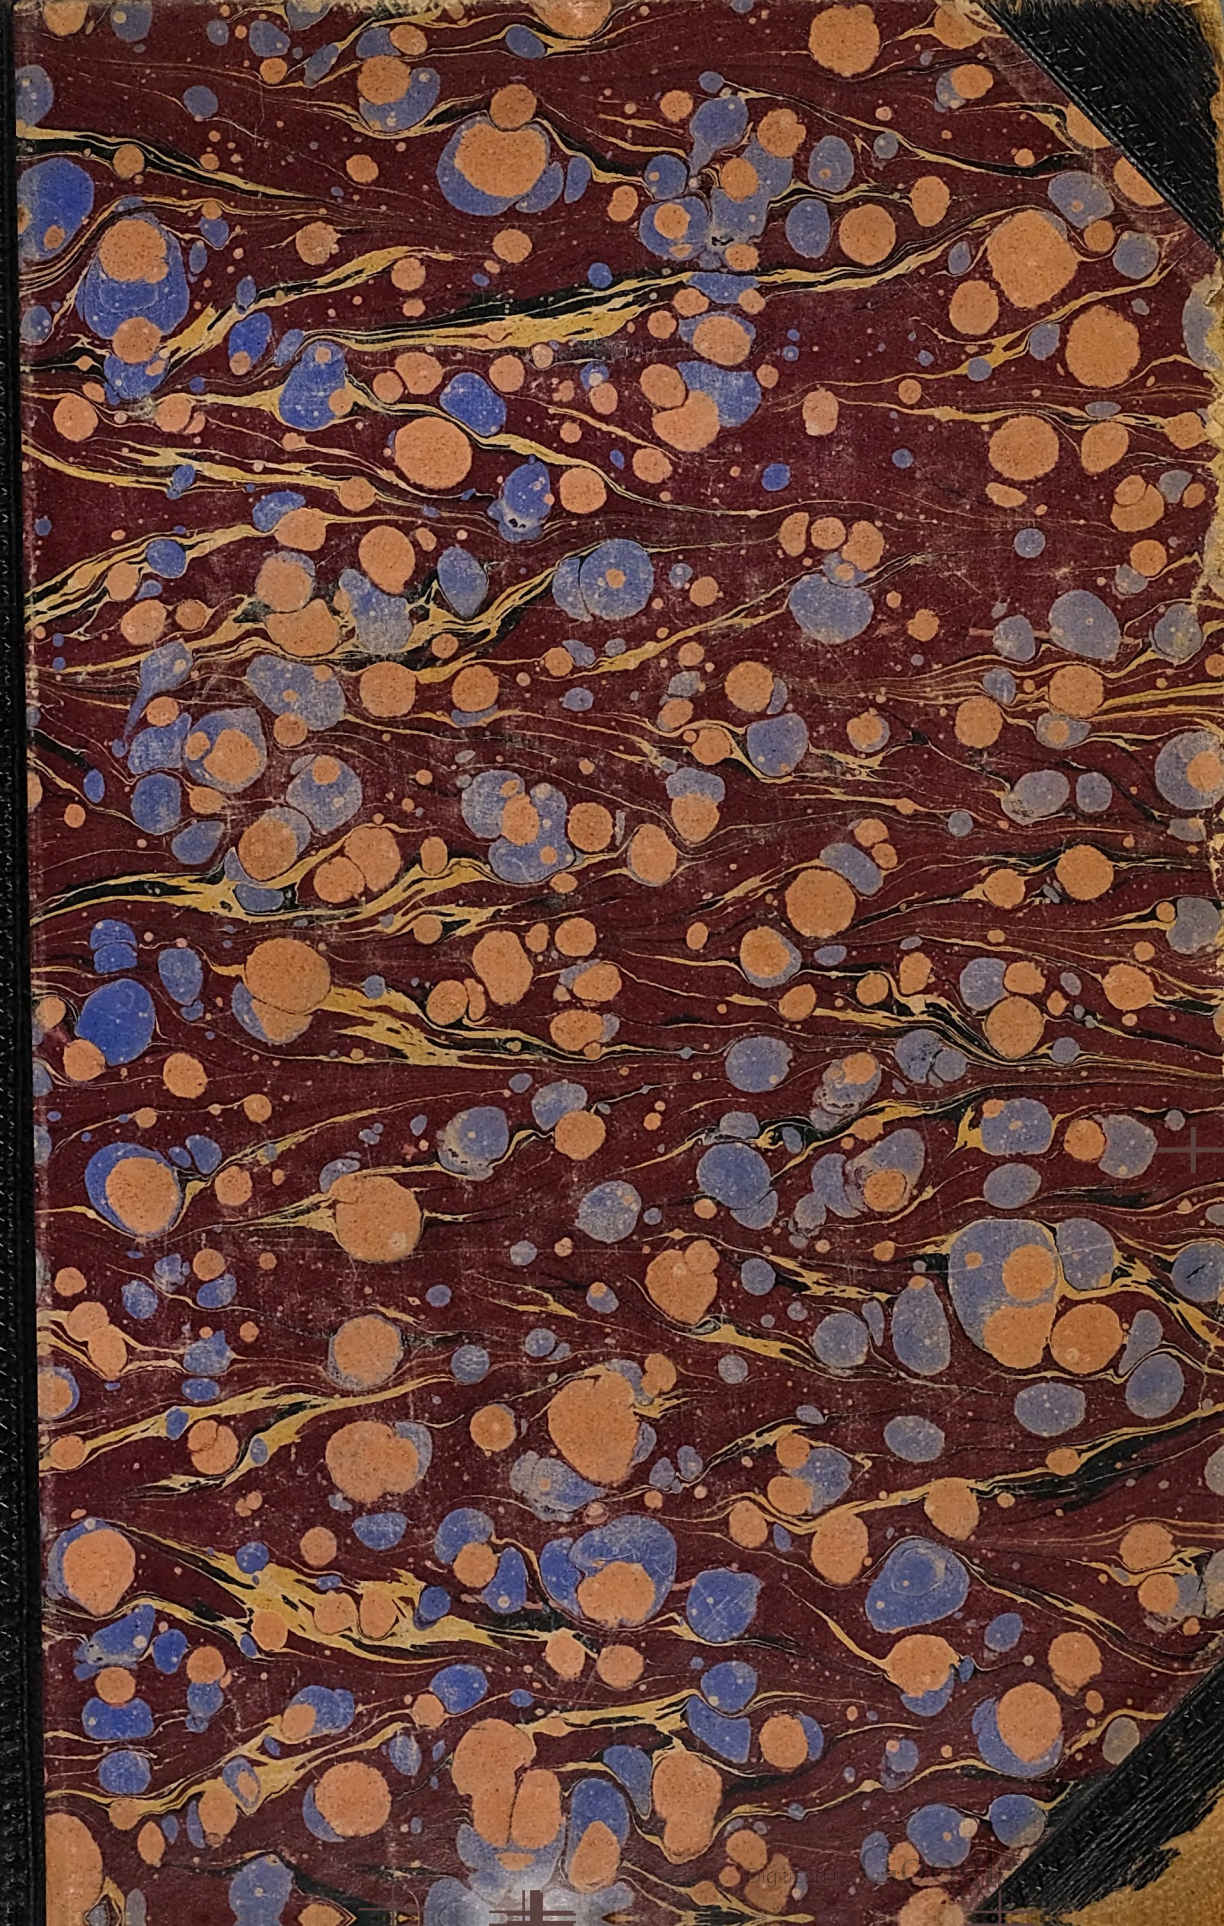
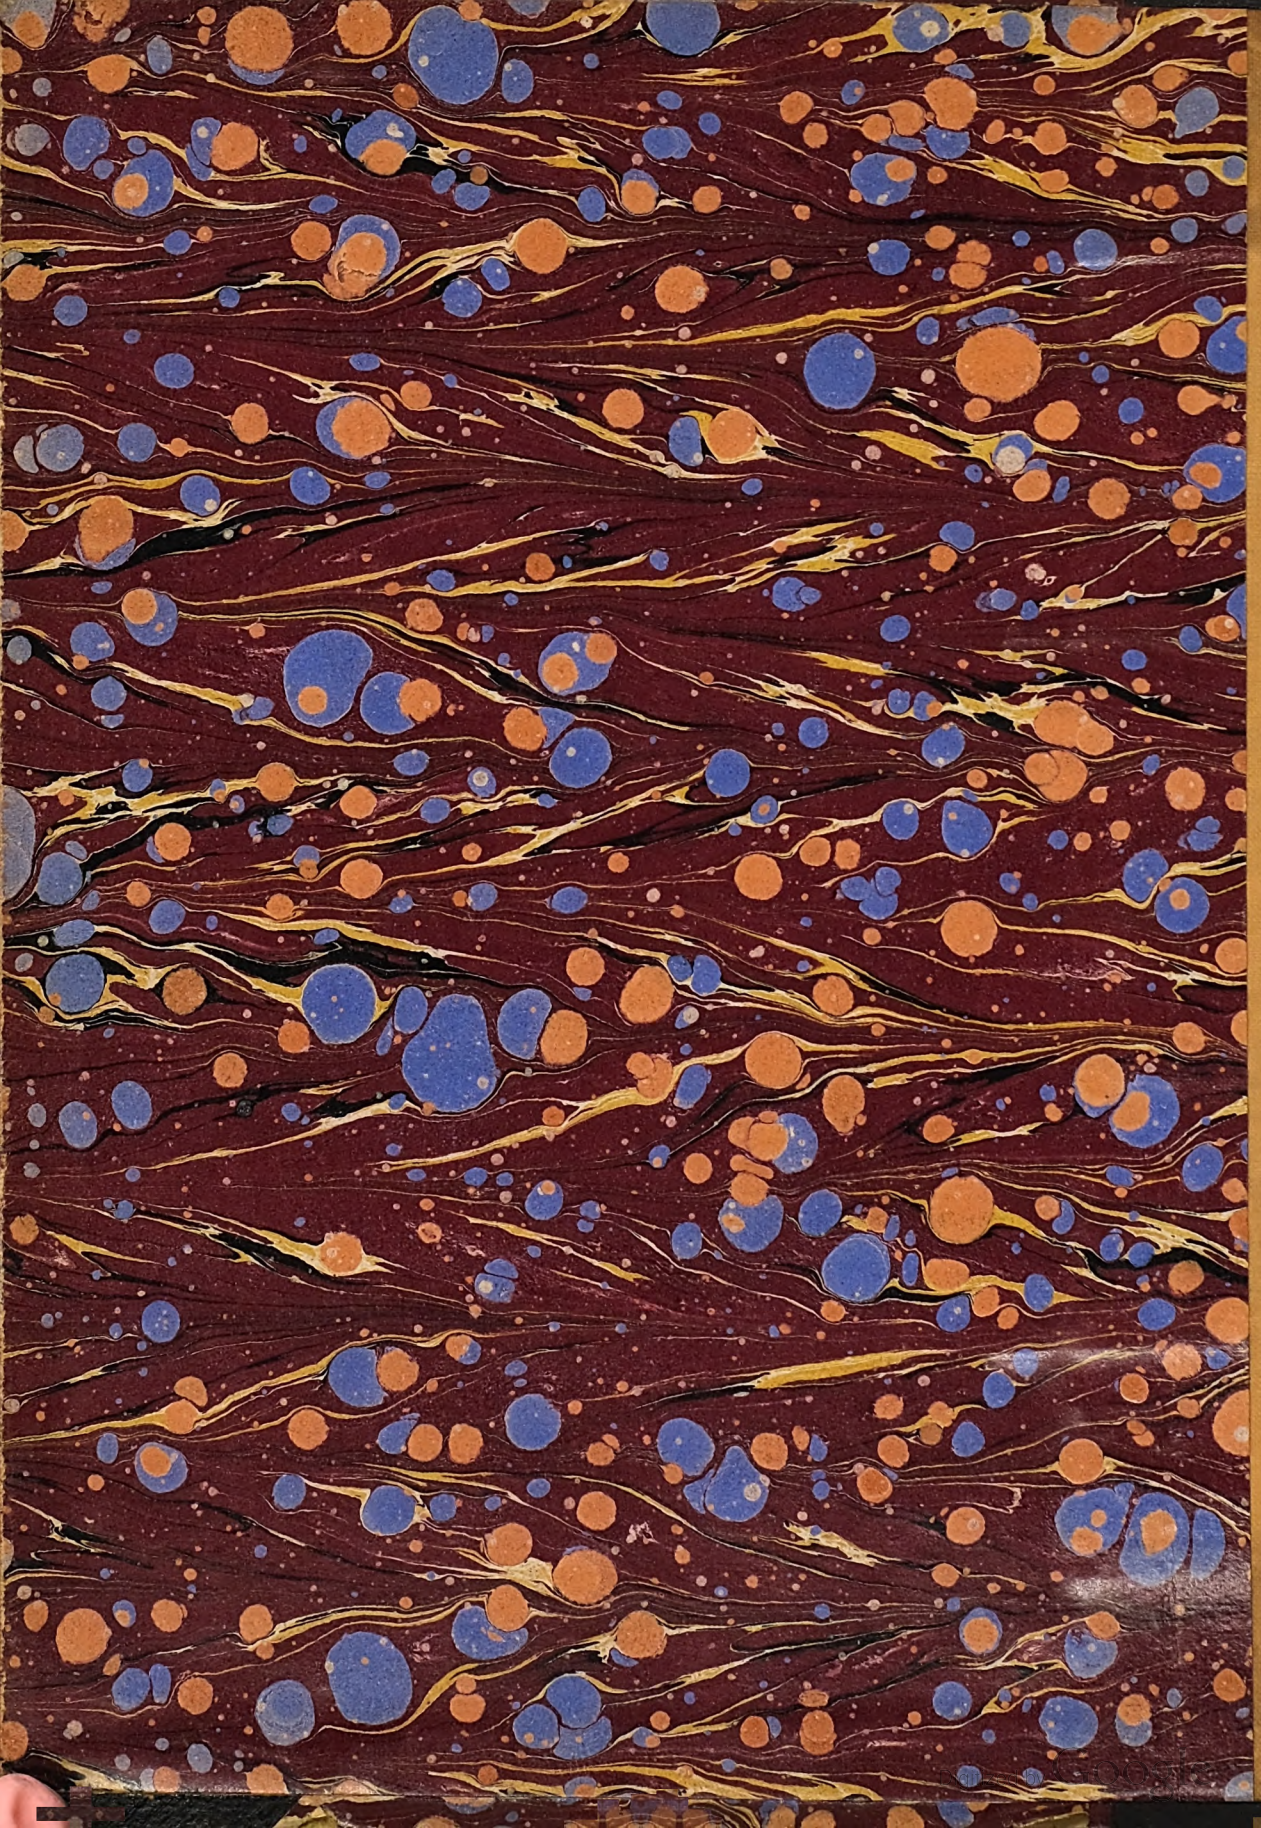
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

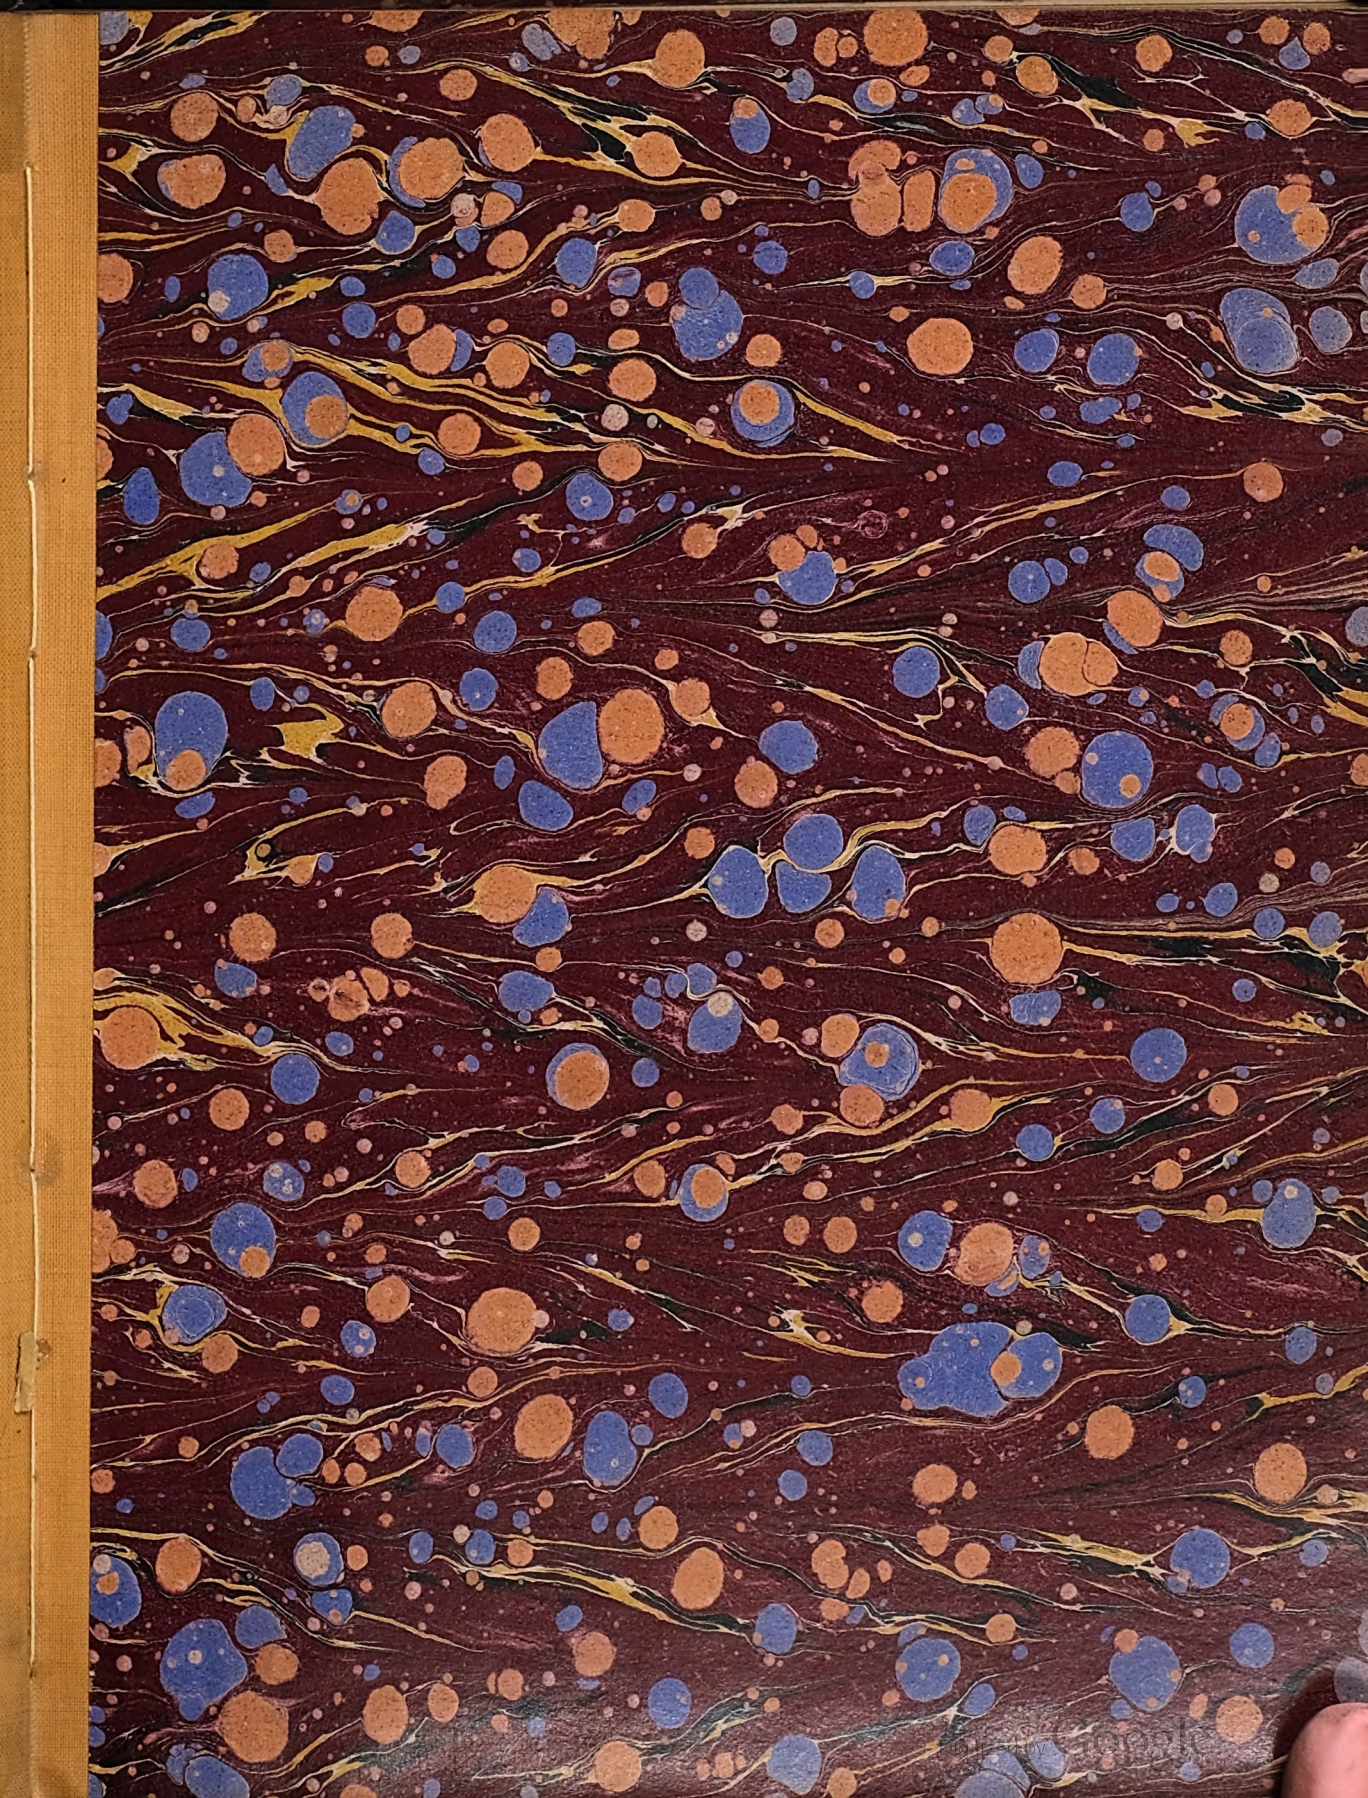
Google™ books

https://books.google.com









Per. 256 d. 768

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

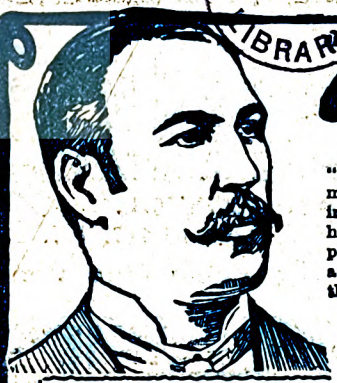
SHORT STORIES

THE DAINTY HOME STORY PAPER. TARTAN COVER. No. 10.—MACFIE.

No. 757.] Week ending July 4, 1903. [Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google

BODLEIAN LIBRARY
P
20 MAR 1901



"Ask for proof"

"My advice is, be sure that you are fully satisfied with the goods before you make up your mind to purchase. I receive and execute from ten to fifteen thousand orders every week, and in every case I send the goods entirely subject to customer's approval after full opportunity has been given for critical examination. If you are fully satisfied, you can complete the purchase by Easy Monthly Payments as per scale, or, if you prefer to pay the account in one amount, you are invited to select a Handsome Bonus Present from Illustrated List sent with the Goods."

"I PROVIDE EVERYTHING."

Each Departmental Catalogue is sent Post Free on application, together with Order Form and full particulars.

1. WATCHES. All my well-known Watch Specialities fully illustrated and described. My Watch Department is the Largest Watch-Sales concern in the World.
2. TOOLS AND MACHINERY. Thousands of illustrations. Every known Tool and Machine is supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
3. FURNITURE. Every Furnishing requirement is illustrated. My System of Furnishing by Easy Instalments is fully explained.
4. MANTLES AND COSTUMES. A beautiful Album of the Fashions of the Season.
5. GENT'S TAILORING. This Stylish Department is splendidly equipped, and is probably the Largest Clothing Business in Great Britain.
6. BOOTS AND SHOES. Beautifully illustrated. A Splendid choice of the Newest Ideas in Foot Wear. Contractor to His Majesty's Government.
7. BOOKSELLING DEPARTMENT. Catalogue describes a vast assortment of Standard and Current Literature.
8. SHEFFIELD CUTLERY & PLATE. The produce of my own Factories illustrated and fully described. Hotel and Shipping Orders a Specialty.
9. GLASS, CHINA, LAMPS, & STOVES. Dinner and Tea Services, Toilet and Bedroom Ware, Lamps, Stoves, &c.
10. CLOCKS. Every known style and make supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
11. GENERAL DRAPERIES, etc. Dress Goods, Blankets, Sheets, Furs, Ladies' Outfitting, Babies' and Children's Clothing, etc.
12. GOLD JEWELLERY & DIAMONDS. Engagement and Wedding Rings, Bracelets, Brooches, and all kinds of Gold Ornaments, fully illustrated & described.
13. GENERAL FANCY GOODS. Bags, Umbrellas, Albums, every kind of Leather Goods for Wedding Presents and Home Use.
14. CAMERAS AND OPTICAL GOODS. Hundreds of Designs by the most reliable makers.
15. BICYCLES. Exclusive Designs for the present season supplied on Easy Payment Terms.
16. MUSICAL DEPARTMENT. Pianos, Organs, and every known Musical Instrument supplied on Easy Payment Terms.
17. ARMY AND NAVY. A Catalogue representing all kinds of Goods required by all grades of both branches of the Service.
18. COLONIAL DEPARTMENT. A comprehensive illustrated Book which deals with the requirements of customers abroad, and quotes Special Cash Discount for Shipping Orders.

Mention Number of Catalogue required

J. G. Graves.

An AGENCY for my firm is a very remunerative way of using spare time to advantage. Write for Agency particulars.

69 DIVISION STREET, SHEFFIELD.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1¼ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

DAILY . . . EXPRESS.

ONE HALFPENNY.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Model A is fitted with Free Wheel, Bowden and Front Rim Brake or New Departure, Back Pedal Coaster Hub Brake and Front Rim Brake, all Fittings. Carriage paid to any railway station, and the price for Cash is £8 8 0, or 12 Monthly Payments of 15/10 each. Lady's Machine same price. All a Cyclist needs supplied at lowest prices. 25 patterns Juno Cycles.

Trailers from £5 5 0, or 10/6 monthly. Write for New Season List, 124 pages and 600 illustrations, sent post free. JUNO CYCLE CO. ("S/S." Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

Tins, 3d. 6d. 1/-

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 757.] [One Penny.

Week Ending July 4th, 1903.

That Sweet Little Fool.

THE ROMANCE OF A SECRET MARRIAGE.

The question which I found so difficult to answer was "What shall I do with Betty Dalrymple?"

Screen her I might, give her sanctuary in my home, but, there was no doubt about it, Betty was to blame—greatly to blame. The girl's action made me indignant—angry, rather than anything else. You see, I had idealised Betty. I thought that her pride alone would have forbidden her to take such a step. Well, I was mistaken. By this time her name was in everybody's mouth and neither she nor her family would be able to stir out of doors without meeting the curious gaze of every passer-by.

I, Elizabeth Dalrymple, am Betty's aunt. At the time of which I am writing I lived in the greatest retirement, in the suburbs of Darlington, at Briar-rose Cottage, a sweet, secluded spot, hedged about with an old-fashioned garden.

Now, it was natural enough that my niece and god-child should come to me in her hour of trouble, but that an old maid, like myself, should be called upon to play so important a part in the girl's love affairs was the marvel.

One day I was sitting in dreamy abstraction, in my sunny morning room busy with my fancy work.

A soft wind breathed rapturously in at the open window. The laburnums tossed their golden tassels and the lilacs blossomed everywhere. No sound was heard save the murmur of a brook, three fields away, the hum of the bee, the twitter of the birds, and the inarticulate voice of Polly in her gilded cage.

On this particular morning I was supremely happy. No restless feeling, no disturbing presentiment warned me of approaching trouble. With a sense of the keenest enjoyment I had settled myself at the table behind my embroidery frame, but scarcely had I worked in a dozen stitches when the sound of approaching wheels caused me to lift my head and listen.

"A cab at my front door! Who can it be?" I said to myself. A feeling of curiosity prompted me to push back my chair, go to the window and peep behind the curtain, for now the sound of an arrival permeated Briar-rose Cottage. Someone was certainly coming along the hall. A door slammed. A chair was thrown down. The dog barked and through all the commotion I heard an unmusical, rasping voice—a voice that brought a flush of annoyance to my cheeks—call out: "Here, Prudence, take my parcels! Bless me! where is the girl? Never at hand when wanted. Elizabeth, Elizabeth! Where are you? E-liz-a-beth! Here am I, come by the early train from Newcastle on purpose to see you."

All rights reserved.]

The door of my morning room was thrown open, and Mrs. Dalrymple, my brother Tom's widow, stood on the threshold.

I know I ought to have met her with outstretched hands and honied words of welcome. But I did not. I certainly was not pleased to see Maria and it was against my principles to appear so. You see, we have nothing in common. Maria has any amount of confidence. She is also frightfully extravagant, while I am retiring and careful—almost niggardly.

When, on rare occasions, I invited Maria to spend a day with me I always prayed an especial prayer for patience, but this time I was taken unawares. So instead of meeting her with Christian fortitude, I offered her a limp hand which she held for a moment and dropped. Then I waved her to a seat on the low settee and sitting upright in my high-backed chair I took off my spectacles and braced myself for battle.

"Well, Maria," I said tartly, "what is it you want?"

Maria drew a long breath of astonishment as she unfastened her feather boa.

"My dear creature, how uncomfortable of you! Want—the idea. Do you know it is eight months since you and I exchanged confidences, and that I have come on purpose to see you?"

I laughed shortly.

"Then I know you have come begging," I insisted. "You would never dream of coming to see me unless you wanted something."

"My dearest Elizabeth, you are so suspicious. Is there anything more terrible than to be misunderstood? The fact is, I am not well. I felt that a day's rest would be soothing to my nerves so I came to you. Besides, I have something to tell you—something about Betty. But won't you ask me to take off my bonnet? And mayn't I stay to dinner?"

By this time I had become a little ashamed of my ill-humour.

"I am sorry if I misjudged you, Maria. Stay by all means," I said with a slight degree of cordiality. "Ring the bell, please."

Her summons was answered by my one maid, Prudence Strong, who looked flustered and rather cross.

Now Prudence had lived in the service of the Dalrymples since she was a girl. She would have broken her heart if I had not taken her to live with me when my mother died. Prudence was a treasure. She managed everything. Sometimes I caught myself wondering if she or I were the mistress.

"Prudence," I faltered, "Mrs. Dalrymple will stay to dinner. Can you—that is—have you time to go into Blackwellgate to order a little fish?"

Digitized by Google

The woman's lips tightened.

"Indeed, I cannot, Miss Elizabeth, you know that. I wonder you ask me, mum, ironing day. There's plenty for dinner though—cold lamb, a salad, custard pudding and a fruit tart."

With that she shut the door and tramped back to the kitchen.

And Maria laughed and hoped I would not make the slightest difference on her account.

A simple meal was therefore provided and we sat down without ceremony.

Maria fidgeted about from room to room all the morning. Nothing escaped her inquisitive eyes. She knew everybody's business and talked incessantly, yet did not again refer to Betty.

The afternoon was one of golden sunshine and creeping shadows. We went into the garden—such an odd-looking couple.

Maria was well over forty, inclined to stoutness. She had on a trailing dress that rustled over and swept the greensward, and a wonderful hat. "Parisian" she called it. I, Elizabeth, am well over fifty, tall, angular, sharp-featured. I strutted by Maria's side in goloshes, a dress made short and scant, a garden hat of the mushroom order, and a faded velveteen cape.

We sat under the old apple tree and talked.

"Well, Maria, what about Betty?" I queried. Maria laughed.

We were sitting on a seat which I had had built round the trunk of the old apple tree.

"Ah, this is nice!" she said with a sigh of satisfaction, not heeding my question. "My dear Elizabeth, at this moment I positively envy you. While the mood lasts I too would follow your example, dress in a nun's garb and hide myself in some quiet elysium, for at times the hollowness of my Society friends palls upon me."

I sniffed witheringly.

Maria was a creature of moods, she was not easy to understand.

Presently she asked: "Guess what I have to tell you about Betty?"

"I am not good at guessing riddles," I said shortly.

"You must prepare yourself, Elizabeth, for a great surprise. Our—dear—Betty—is—engaged. Don't look at me like that! Engaged, I tell you, and to that dear, Cyril Dare. I always said that those two dear things should marry and I meant to manage it somehow. You don't care for him? You think his temper arbitrary and over-bearing? My dear Elizabeth! A landed proprietor, a man of good means, handsome, fascinating, clever. What more could any girl desire? True, there is a slight disparity as to age, and, yes, I grant you, Cyril Dare is somewhat masterful—but—why he has wanted to marry your god-child for the last four years. As for Betty—well—Betty is Betty—proud and wilful."

So Maria rattled on. To me the news was startling and so unexpected that it almost took my breath away.

"Stop," I cried, "Betty engaged! Betty about to be married! Does she—tell me, Maria—does she love this man—this Cyril Dare?"

I hurled the words at her quite fiercely.

"Love? Really I never inquired. You foolish, sentimental Elizabeth, what a question. It will be a practical, sensible marriage with good settlements, so I am satisfied."

"You are a horrid, heartless woman, Maria—you do not deserve to be a mother," I said hotly. "Stop chattering for a moment—do! I want to think!"

If the truth were told I wanted to cry. Betty had been away for four long years, she had only just returned to the home-nest and now again she was on the wing. And yet, I will not deny that for some reasons her engagement delighted me. Why should I not be pleased?

Four years ago I had strongly opposed this alliance for I knew that Betty's heart was given to Rex Davidson.

Rex was a mining engineer, and Betty would have married him, there is no doubt, but for a dreadful accident which befel him. One day, when in the coal-pit, fathoms below the beautiful earth, a deafening explosion shook the air. Huge pieces of coal were hurled from side to side of the narrow passages. Whether Rex was hit or not he did not know for the darkness of night overshadowed him and he sank down unconscious. He must have lain near to the borderland for weeks before he awoke to the fact that he was hopelessly disfigured, a heavy weight of coal having fallen upon his face. The marvel was that he was alive. Poor Betty! Of course she could not marry a man whose features were marred beyond all recognition—a man whom the children were terrified to meet. I must confess that I could not blame her, and yet—and yet——

When they told Rex that Betty no longer loved him, he was dreadfully cut up, poor fellow. But he was too brave a man to die for any woman's love. So he shouldered his burden, and left the country to fight under Kitchener in the Soudan, where he lost his life. Betty wrote to me that she was going abroad with some people of high rank as a sort of companion to an invalid girl; that she expected to spend some years upon the Continent, travelling about from place to place. "I long to get away from gossiping Newcastle," she wrote, "and by the time you see me again I shall be quite Bohemian in my tastes and ways. But you will love me still, auntie, whatever happens because you are a true woman. I cannot come to say 'Good-bye.' Why? The reason why you will some day know."

For answer I sent her a cheque for one hundred pounds.

Betty was eighteen when she left Newcastle for the Continent, she had been home four months and she was now two and twenty. Here I awoke from my reverie.

"Dear Betty," I said very quietly, "I hope she will be happy. Will the engagement be a long one, Maria?"

"Certainly not," she answered with some abruptness. "What on earth is there to wait for? 'Strike while the iron is hot,' say I. The wedding will take place at Westgate Road Chapel six weeks to-day."

Here she launched into a detailed description of the dresses to be worn at the wedding and the reception which was to be a brilliant affair. But all the time Maria was speaking I felt that she had an end in view, that she was holding herself in check.

"The expense will be simply awful," she continued. "Why, my dear, the bride's dress alone will be twenty guineas. No, you need not be alarmed, Elizabeth. I promised Betty that I would not appeal to you for help, and I won't. 'Mamma,' she said in her proud way, 'if you dare to sponge on aunt Elizabeth, I will not be married.' Tiresome Betty, her idea is a quiet wedding—a travelling dress and so forth. Think of our position. What would people say?"

"Maria," I said icily, "you see I was right; you have come begging. Do not try to disguise the fact; for in this case I am perfectly willing to—"

"Just my own words, my dear. 'Betty,' I said, 'you are unkind to your aunt.' Nothing, my love, would delight her more than to, as Lord Byron said, 'Clothe you like the sun for your bridal.'"

I shrugged my shoulders irritably and said: "It is certainly my pleasure that my god-child should be married as befits the eldest daughter of the house of Dalrymple."

Whereupon Maria leant forward, flung her arms round my neck and said I was a dear, sweet, generous darling.

"I cannot thank you enough," she repeated again and again. "And now there is another small matter." Maria coughed uneasily.

"About yourself, dearest. We shall be bitterly disappointed of course, but I know the excitement would be too great—that you would not be comfortable meeting the McLeans', and the Cowans, and that dear Lady Riddle. We must not forget your years. Your love of retirement must be humoured, but I shall see to it that you have wedding-cake, and——"

"I do not understand you, Maria." But I was wrong, I understood her too well. Strange as it may seem, Maria wanted only my money—of me she was ashamed. She thought I should disgrace her in some way—I should be shy, and awkward—perhaps odd. I shook from head to foot with indignation. No doubt Maria saw she had made a mistake for she hastened to say:

Digitized by Google

"Of course if you really wish to——"

"Certainly, I wish it."

"How good of you! So glad. Delighted! Now do let me order for you a perfectly appointed costume from Bond Street."

"No, I thank you. I have a dress quite suitable for the occasion."

"There, now I have offended you, haven't I? Well, dear, we won't quarrel, have everything your own way. Why, I declare, there's the cab. Goodness!" she cried, looking at her watch. "It is four o'clock and my train leaves at four thirty, good-bye," and with a parting nod she was gone.

During the next few weeks there was a rare amount of talk and surmise between Prudence and myself over the coming wedding, but upon the eve of that all-important day I felt nervous and fidgety.

Every preparation was made for the journey on the morrow.

My sister-in-law lived in Rye Hill, in a red-brick, five-storied house, just opposite to St. Mary's Church.

Had she forgotten that I was coming by the mid-day train? There was no one to meet me at the Central Station and there was no one to bid me welcome when I arrived at my destination. A smartly-dressed maid oponed the front door when my cab drew up and beckoned me to follow her. So I toiled wearily up the stairs to a small room at the very top of the house—an attic room—with a slanting ceiling. Here the girl put down my dress basket and said she would bring me a cup of tea when the kettle boiled and would I excuse her mistress; the house was full of company and she was very much engaged.

I frowned and a stinging retort rose to my lips, but it died away unspoken, for the girl had gone and in her stead stood Betty.

My beautiful Betty in her wedding-dress of shimmering white satin. We clung to each other, cried a little, and then smiled through our tears and admired the dress. Betty said it was a shame that I should be put in that poky little room, but that her mother had no management. Only wait until she had a home of her own. She would show them how to treat her most honoured guest—her dear aunt Elizabeth.

Before leaving my room I was completely metamorphosed in appearance. The short, scant skirt was discarded for a handsome flowered brocade. I wore a poke-bonnet, too, although it was not quite in the fashion—trimmed with broad white ribbon, and pink rose-buds, and a costly shawl of old Brussels lace pinned at my throat with a heavy cameo brooch. I had arranged for a private brougham that I might appear at the church in a fitting manner. Mr. Reginald Hoker had been appointed by Maria to share my carriage. I had pictured to myself a middle-aged gentleman of military bearing, it was somewhat disappointing to find him a school-boy in an Eton jacket.

We sat under the old apple tree and talked.

As we went up the aisle hand in hand quite a titter of amusement greeted us. Someone said in a stage whisper: "Old maid. Very eccentric."

I sat down and looked about me. It was a brilliant day. The sun shone brightly behind the stained glass window and the guests were pleasantly excited. The bridegroom's face I did not admire as he stood, waiting by the communion rails. Now and then he glanced down the aisle. He looked impatient, bad-tempered, anxious. Every time he turned his head half a churchful of people turned theirs too, in expectation. But the bride still tarried.

A pretty group of bridesmaids stood at the entrance waiting her arrival. They held baskets of choice flowers tied up with pale blue streamers and their pretty faces looked girlish and sweet under their broad-brimmed hats.

"She is coming," somebody whispered.

A false report, Betty still lingered.

Another half hour went by and still no Betty. The bridegroom was restless. The guests toyed with their flowers, fluttered their fans and looked at the clock. The clock chimed the quarter, in another fifteen minutes Betty would be too late. What could be detaining her?

Again the sound of approaching wheels. A carriage drew up. The bride had arrived. No, it was only Cuthbert Faber, the grey-headed gentleman who had promised to give her away. Evidently something was wrong. Mr. Faber walked hurriedly through the church to the vestry. Cyril Dare followed him and did not return. Maria had the sense to keep her seat but her face paled. She told me afterwards that she had a subtle intuition as to the real condition of things.

Digitized by Google

"They are saying," whispered the serene Miss Butler, who sat by my side, "that there will be no wedding to-day. Is it true, dear Miss Dalrymple?"

No wedding! I opened my mouth to deny such a statement but no words came. Presently I realised it was all too true, and found myself in a crush of tired, disappointed people, who were thronging the aisle. Maria put her hand on my arm as I was leaving the church. The smile upon her face—not a very pleasant one—met with no response from me, for a dreadful suspicion that Betty had eloped with some unknown lover haunted me. I shuddered at the thought.

The news of the postponed wedding had spread. At the door of the church and in the road a group of people had gathered, full of curiosity. A row of dirty, ragged children climbed up the railings.

"Miss Dalrymple's carriage!" thundered a burly constable and murmurs of excitement broke out at the sight of me.

Well, we went back again to Rye Hill, thankful to hide our disconcerted faces from the public gaze.

The house was in a terrible state of confusion and alarm. Betty had mysteriously disappeared. People were running up and down the stairs looking for her. Of course the reception was postponed, and Maria was in hysterics. Glad enough was I to find myself again in the attic-room with the slanting roof. With a sigh of relief I attempted to remove my finery. My hands were trembling, but they trembled still more as I picked up a letter addressed to me that had fallen from the table to the carpet. With a fast-beating heart I broke the seal, and, sure enough, the letter was signed "Betty."

"Tell mamma," she wrote, "that I shall never marry Cyril Dare, never, never! Tell her not to look for me, that I shall not come home again. No woman could act as I have done and continue to live in the same town. Forgive me, auntie, we shall meet again, but not on this side of Heaven will you know how dear you are to me."

Well, it was a weary time before I could get away from Rye Hill. First I must compose myself, then read the letter to Maria, and what with one thing, and what with another, it was getting dark before I left the house.

Not altogether, even then, could I get away from the vexatious subject. Along the platform ran an evening newsboy calling out at the top of his voice, "Fashionable wedding postponed. Mysterious disappearance of a bride!"

Everybody in the compartment seemed to stare at me as I hastily dropped my veil.

Rain, rain, rain! It beat upon the windows and came down in torrents when at length we reached Darlington. Oh, I was so glad to be at home again. It seemed to me that for years and years I had been away from Briar-rose Cottage. When I alighted from the cab at my own gateway I actually laughed with delight, as I ran under the dripping elm tree to the porch.

There was a bright light behind the red blind of the kitchen window, the rest of the house was shrouded in darkness. But it didn't matter, nothing mattered for I was at home again. Home, sweet home. With nervous fingers I pulled the old bell that dangled among the ivy and before it had ceased to ring, Prudence opened the door.

"It is no fault of yours, Miss Elizabeth," she said at once.

"Then you have heard, Prudence?"

"Heard? Why the whole town is blazing with the news—the evening papers is full of it. I was just saying to—there—I forgot." Here she whispered in my ear. "There's a person in the kitchen waiting to see you. She was just going, for I told her you would not be coming now it had gone nine o'clock."

"To see me?" I asked incredulously, "who is it, Prudence? Do you know her?"

"Bless you, no! I never set eyes on her before in my life. A middle-aged woman with a towsled, carroty head, and a green tartan shawl."

I opened the door of the old raftered kitchen and there, bent almost double, sat the woman with her face to the fire.

"What can I do for you, my good creature?" I asked.

At the sound of my voice she rose to her feet and turned to look at me. The faded shawl slipped from her shoulders, and, with the greatest composure she removed her bonnet—and—yes—actually a wig of red hair. She stood before me tall and stately, a young and beautiful girl in a tailor-made gown. Her face was pale and in her brilliant eyes there glowed the fire of a great resolve.

Prudence uttered a faint little scream.

"Lord-a-mussey!" she cried; "did ye ever see, why, if it ain't Miss Betty! Lor', how bad I do feel!"

"What fooling is this?" I said, staggering against the wall for support. "Betty Dalrymple, I—I am ashamed of you!"

Was I? The man was to be pitied indeed who had let such a girl slip through his fingers.

"I am sorry for that, aunt, in my extremity I came to you."

Every tone of her voice, every action of her small, white hands made you feel her pride, her independence.

"And pray, what excuse have you to make for your scandalous behaviour?"

"No excuse."

"I demand to know why you have caused all this trouble and confusion."

"It is quite impossible for me to explain at present. You see, auntie, it is not altogether my secret."

"Secret? Fiddlesticks! Am I to be made a laughing stock? Is it nothing to you—the dishonour—the scandal—the—the great expense?"

Betty flushed hotly. Her voice was clear and cold.

"I am not unmindful of all you have done for me, auntie. I came here to-night intending to tell you something—a secret of my past life. Oh, I have had trouble enough, God knows." she said with a sad little laugh. "Now, I cannot tell you my secret, you are not in the mood to understand. You will allow me the shelter of your roof for to-night? I am going to bed. Is my room ready for me, Prudence?"

Now had Betty been humble, if she had knelt at my feet and wept, if she had begged forgiveness things would have been different; but her coolness angered me.

"Listen to me, Betty," I said sternly; "you are not only wicked, but deceitful, and ungrateful. But duty is duty, I shall certainly send a wire to your mother to-morrow morning."

"Do so, aunt, by all means, your triumph over me will then be complete."

"You carry things with a high hand, young lady," I said, "but, mark you, it does not follow that because I have left you all my money that I cannot make a fresh will."

Betty made a gesture of the most scornful disdain.

You see, I was so angry that my fiery tongue ran away with me. Oh, had I but known the unutterable yearning of Betty's heart for one word of sympathy.

That stupid Prudence was shaking like a leaf.

She seated Betty in the old rocking chair and knelt down to unfasten her wet boots.

"There, mistress," she said, "do be quiet! You are only making a rod for your own back. Your niece is the very fiddle of your heart, as everybody knows. Come your ways, my honey, to your bed, and I'll bring your supper up. It's mightily tired ye all are."

Ere Betty left the kitchen she put her arms round my neck in the old impulsive way, but I repulsed her. I am not the woman to be bought over by any show of affection. Half an hour later I slipped quietly to the door and turned the key in the lock, thinking it were better to be on the safe side. In my dreams that night the teasing question wrote itself in blazing letters on my brain. "What shall I do with Betty Dalrymple?"

Digitized by Google

Prudence told me, in the morning, that she couldn't get a wink of sleep for listening to the restless girl who paced her room hour after hour like a lioness in a cage.

"Her room is now as silent as the grave itself, Miss Elizabeth," she continued. "Sleeping? May be she is. The cup of tea I took her up an hour ago still stands upon the door-mat."

"Hark!" I said with uplifted finger, "I hear her moving about. Yes, you can make the coffee, Prudence, I will go upstairs myself and bring her to reason," for strange to say I had forgotten the locked door.

The key was well oiled and turned easily. I tapped lightly on the panel and, receiving no answer, entered the room.

"Betty? Why—" I began and then came to a pause for the room was untenanted and the window wide open. I stood aghast, leaning against the door-jamb for support. fear took hold of me. I lost control over myself and with my hands to my ears I fled down the long landing.

"Help! Help! Thieves! Murder!" I cried in terror, my shrill quavering voice echoing through the old house.

Prudence came panting up the stairs and took me by the shoulders but it was quite a long time before I could make her understand what had happened. "Gone? Where? How?" she kept repeating. Then she said, grimly, that it was just what she had expected and that the girl would surely do herself a mischief. There was no doubt about it, Betty had escaped by the window. She was a daring athlete. To take a leap from the sill to the outstretched arms of an old apple tree hard by was nothing to her.

By-and-bye Prudence left me, and I sat alone in the white window seat of the empty room, but my eyes were so full of tears that I could not even see the roses that clung to the casement distinctly. I shut the window and jerked down the blind. What had I to do with the gladness of the summer morning. All the shine had faded from life—gone with Betty. How could I be so cruel to her? Oh, how could I be such a shrew? Ah! There lay the sting.

As one in physical pain I paced the room, then hid my quivering face in Betty's pillow, and then, with a half-smothered sob, I tried to pray.

In an hour's time I went into the garden, listless, crushed, and broken-hearted, there I sat, counting in a stupid way the tall white tiger lilies in the oval flower-bed.

I thought I had nothing left to live for; but life is full of sweet surprises. All at once I heard the sound of pattering feet, and a sunny child, with tangled curls and lovely questioning eyes of blue, toddled up to my chair. She carried a sleeping kitten in her pinafore, and, putting her hand in mine, she lisped in baby language:

"Are 'oo kying, poor lady? Shall me lend 'oo my Kitty?"

A strange yearning filled my heart as I lifted the little creature on my lap and covered her sweet face with kisses.

"What is your name, my little one?" I asked softly.

"Darling," she answered. "Darling stop with you, poor lady; come and see box?"

"Whose darling are you, little one?"

"Muvver's. Come and see box?"

I muttered something inarticulate and rose to my feet. My woman's curiosity was aroused, and the ache in my heart was growing less.

In an instant we were hurrying along a winding, overgrown path which led through the shrubbery to the garden gate. Suddenly I caught my breath.

"Box, box!" cried Darling, sitting upon a small portmanteau which someone had put inside the garden. It was directed to myself in Betty's handwriting. "Darling's box. Muvver coming soon." The baby's lips quivered.

"Oh, what does it all mean? Oh, Betty, this is terrible?" I faltered as my fingers caught at the label and tore it to atoms. This then was the wicked secret of her past life. Then there rose, in my heart a wonderful happiness that thrilled me through and through. God had sent this little child to me—to be my very own. This was His gracious answer to my prayer. And even as I stood there at the garden gate staring down with misty eyes at the darling, I wondered if it were wrong to deceive Prudence. After all, I argued, this was a family skeleton to be locked away in the cupboard of secrets.

"Oh, my little lamb, worse than motherless," I cried. "You are mine, mine! My very own!"

Presently, all unnoticed, we entered the morning room by the French window.

As one in a dream I turned over the frocks and dainty garments the portmanteau contained, while Darling stamped her tiny feet impatiently, in her eagerness to show me everything at once. Her shrill young voice awakened the echoes in the sleeping old house and brought Prudence in, wondering, from the kitchen.

"Prudence," said I, trying to speak firmly although my heart went pit-a-pat. "This little girl has come to stay with me for—a time. Her name is Lizzie, Lizzie Jones, but she calls herself 'Darling.' Her mother is my dearest friend, we were at school together. She is now very ill—travelling I mean. You will have heard me speak of Annie Clarke?"

This fairy tale must have been a suggestion of the Evil One, and it cost me many tears of repentance.

"I hope, mistress," said Prudence scornfully, "that you don't expect one of my years to believe that trumped-up story. Miss Elizabeth, you are hiding something. Haven't I served you faithful, that you should treat me so?" she said with a

With the greatest composure she removed her bonnet—and—yes—actually a wig of red hair!

Digitized by Google

sob. Already her rough hands were laid in a loving way on the child's curls.

Suddenly a triumphant little laugh escaped Darling.

"Muvver, Muvver!" she cried, clapping her hands and running to the hearthrug above which hung a life-size portrait of Betty.

Then I knew Prudence must be told everything. Wonderingly she listened to my story, my description of foreigners and their evil ways, and the many pit-falls of Continental life. When at length I said, "Keep the story to yourself, Prudence, what else could I do but trust you?" she laughed a little loud and scornful laugh.

"What!" cried she, "noise such a story abroad? Me? Why, mistress, I don't believe a word of it. I think 'ill of our Miss Betty? Never! I would die first! Mark my words," she continued, with a knowing wag of her head, "you will prove yourself in the wrong before many days come and go." Then she stopped and caught up Darling in her arms and carried her off to the kitchen to feed the kitty.

Prudence is a good woman, but dull and heavy. She has no fine feeling—no intuition.

Two whole days came and went and we were so occupied with our treasure that we gave no thought to the future or what it might bring for us.

An evening of surprises at length arrived.

At five minutes to nine we had retired for the night. At a quarter past nine the front bell door rang loudly. In the lightest of attire Prudence and I issued from our rooms and met on the landing. We listened attentively. Again and again clanged the bell, and at length Prudence, being the braver of the two, crept down the stairs, shading the candle with her hand.

"See that the chain is up before you open the door!" I called to her over the banister.

"Who's there?" cried Prudence.

But whoever it was they had gone away—not however, before waking Darling. With wide open eyes I found her standing up in the old wooden crib. Her golden curls were tossed and her pretty cheeks flushed with excitement.

"Muvver!" she cried—"Muvver's coming."

Scarcely had I soothed Darling to sleep again when the window rattled. A branch of an old apple tree had touched the glass as the wind swept by. Yet I listened with my heart in my mouth, then I heard someone crying.

"Let me in! Let me in!"

The voice was strikingly familiar and as I turned in terror I saw Betty's face, looking through the window.

I shook like an aspen leaf. How my palsied fingers managed to unhasp the casement to let her in is a marvel. She had again climbed the old apple tree, swung herself on to a projecting piece of masonry, and by the help of waterspouts and ivy, drawn herself up to her old room where a bright light was burning.

"Betty, you might have been killed!"

"Betty, you might have been killed. Oh, how could you? Oh, my darling—my darling!" For some minutes I was quite hysterical. She tried to dispel my fears by laughing gaily.

"There is no danger," she said. "Besides, auntie, you compelled me to do it. First you lock me in, and then you lock me out, I was really obliged to use the staircase provided by Nature."

She crossed the room to bend over the old crib.

"Mine," she whispered.

"Aye, my dear one, I know. But what brings you here, Betty? Never fear, I will take care of the child and no one shall guess at your secret."

"I couldn't rest, auntie, I couldn't; I felt lost without my baby."

"But you must not stay, my dear. Already there are some very queer tales afloat about you. Not that I take any notice. I am not the one to cast the first stone. No doubt, poor child, it was not altogether your fault. Have you any money, Betty? You shall want for nothing while I live. But you must go away, my dear, right away, for Darling's sake, her mother's fault must not be visited upon her."

"Go away, right away? What are you talking about? Oh, auntie, auntie, I wouldn't have believed you could have had such bad thoughts of me."

A great restlessness came over her.

She hugged and kissed me. She rang for Prudence and hugged and kissed her. She took Darling in her arms and, sitting on the edge of my bed, asked us, with a radiant face if we had never guessed that she was married—married four long years ago to Rex Davidson.

I stared but was speechless. Prudence stared but was speechless.

Digitized by Google

Apparently not noticing our helpless condition Betty told of her clandestine marriage with Rex some weeks before he left the country, and her suffering, when the news came to her of his death—of the birth of her child in a foreign land, and her unfortunate resolve to keep her marriage a secret from her mother—of the help my present of one hundred pounds had been to her, and of her many situations in France.

"I know I made you rather cross, dear auntie, and Prudence, when I ran away from my wedding day, a week ago, and I know that I deserved that you should be very angry. But you see I couldn't possibly marry Cyril Dare, now could I?"

"Why?" I asked, "was the child the hindrance?"

"The child? Why, auntie dear, what a stupid question. When I found that my dear husband was alive and on his way home I——"

"What!" I interrupted. "Alive! Rex Davidson alive!"

She got up, kissed us both again and slipped back to her seat on the edge of the bed.

"Didn't I say that his letter was put into my hand, when I was in my wedding dress waiting for my carriage. What could I do but run away? Poor Rex had written to me many a time—we rather suspect his letters were withheld."

A handful of gravel rattled on the window pane.

"That's my dear old hubbie," cried Betty, "tired of waiting at your hospitable door," and the girl rushed away with Darling in her arms to open it. We followed.

"God bless you, aunt Elizabeth," said Rex when I bade him welcome. He stooped and kissed my wrinkled cheek, then he shook hands with Prudence—who was wiping her eyes—and after that we were all at home and comfortable.

The lamps were relit and in less than a quarter of an hour a feast was prepared. The house was filled with gladness. Rex had still an ugly scam across his face but it was wonderful how much he had improved in appearance since last I saw him.

Dearie me, what the doctors are able to do in these days!

Rex himself was not altered a bit. He was thoroughly convinced that he was the husband of the dearest of girls and that the little daughter nestling in his arms was beyond compare.

They unfolded to me their plans.

Rex had obtained a good appointment as manager of some coalpits at Hebburn, and I was to let Briar-rose Cottage and make my home with Betty, taking Prudence with me.

The truth is my old heart clung so closely to them all that I could not again face a life of loneliness.

The next day I wrote to Maria and told her everything.

A few days afterwards her answer came, and with it a bundle of unopened letters addressed to Mrs. Rex Davidson.

"I wash my hands of Betty," she wrote, "the girl is a fool!"

"She is indeed," said Rex, proudly folding his wife in a close embrace. "A sweet little fool!"

B. Leicester.

An Ingenious Parent.

How a Father Saved the Expenses of a Wedding.

A young man who had long and dearly loved a beautiful girl, besought of her recently to name the happy day, which she did, with such shy, fond, reluctant delay that it would hardly have been thought she had made up her mind when the date was to be more than two months before.

They accordingly waited upon her immediate ancestor on the male side, and besought his blessing. He was a practical and economical old gentleman, with a mind fertile of resource, and when the young man had stammered that he loved her more dearly than his life, and had a salary of £350, and that he hoped—the old man caught up his trusty walking-stick and, calling his prospective son-in-law all sorts of names, drove him out of the house; then he bore his daughter off to the attic and locked her in there.

What is the consequence? The next morning the young man came with a rope-ladder, an ample cloak, and a marriage license, and stole his bride away, and they were made one at 8.30. Then the young wife said to her husband:

"Algernon, my father behaved very badly to you. Still, he was my mother's husband, and we ought to have some deference for him; so let us go to him and tell him we are wedded, and ask for that blessing. Besides, I want to get my brush and comb bag that I left on the dressing-table."

"Well, I'll go," said the young husband, "but, mind you, Matilda, if he lays a hand on me, save in the way of kindness, I'll knock his two eyes into one. I suffered his previous indignities because he was the hoary-headed author of your being, but now he is only my bald-headed father-in-law, and I won't stand it, if he is three times as old as I am."

Accordingly they went home, and when they got there and were excitedly feeling for the bell-pull, the old gentleman opened the door, and said:

"Come in, come in; how's the blushing bride, eh? Bless you, my children. Now, by the time you have partaken of a bottle of champagne the cab will be here to convey you to any railway station you may be pleased to indicate."

They followed the old gentleman into the parlour like people in a dream.

"I was afraid once," he said cheerfully, "when I saw Matilda coming down that ladder that the thing would break—for she's fully sixteen ounces to the pound, Matilda is—and drive all my new rose bushes and tulips into the ground. Why on earth didn't you, when you were compelled to flee from my wrath, elope out of the front door like Christians? I left Matilda's dungeon cell unlocked, and I left the front door ajar, and I went to the foot of the stairs and snored a the top of my voice so as to give you every facility."

"Do you mean to say, venerable and respected sir, that you have and have had no objections to my paying my addresses to your daughter?"

"Never in the least," replied the old man, beaming mildly on them; "you are the son-in-law I should have picked out of millions if I had been permitted to choose, and even if I had not been satisfied of your worth and sobriety, I could not have found it in my heart to refuse to do what Matilda desired me to do."

"Then, sir," exclaimed the young husband, thinking that he had married into a family having the hereditary taint of insanity in the blood, "why did you turn me out of the house in such an energetic and inconsistent manner?"

"Because, my dear boy," said the good old man, "I saw that you would instantaneously take out a license and elope with the girl and get married at an expense of two sovereigns, borne exclusively by you, whereas, if the marriage took place in the ordinary course of events, I would have been let in for a trousseau, and dresses, and flowers, and a wedding breakfast, and, on the top of all that, presents to the extent of about £30."

Percy Wixon.

Digitized by Google

ROGER AND I.

A Story of Jealousy and a Lucky Find in a Book.

It is a very simple story. My name is Marian Ray, and I was twenty years old when I first met Roger Dermott at Poole, in Dorsetshire, where I was passing the summer.

We—my mother and I, who composed our entire family circle—had strayed to this quiet place because we knew that her lease of life was not for very long, and I grasped at any suggestion of possible relief to her, even as the drowning catch at straws, forgetting how frail they are. And it was terrible to me to think that I must be left alone in the great, wide world—alone and poor.

We were always together—my mother and I—for she was more like an elder sister than a parent, and we clung the closer now, for we felt that the time was short.

Therefore, I made her life as pleasant and easy as possible, and her only anxiety was for my lonely, unprotected future, when we must leave her out under the flowers and the dew, and I would be friendless.

But I, feeling very brave and confident, as the young are prone to do, smiled back courageously into her face, and at last, when my future began to be discussed, changed the subject of conversation.

And so we lived on at the sea-side, and our two lives were very grey and uneventful, until the time came when a ray of sunshine slipped in; but, ah! when the sunshine goes again, I notice it is always darker than before it came.

We were strolling along the beach one divine June morning, my arm round my mother, in a tender, protecting way, when she suddenly started from my side, advanced a few steps, and with a flush upon her pale face, held out her hand in a cordial greeting.

Glancing up in surprise, I met the laughing brown eyes of Roger Dermott. He saluted me with a courteous bow, insisted upon taking my place beside mother, and together we resumed our morning walk.

That was the beginning of many pleasant days. Days no longer lonely, for he was ever with us; no longer now was my heart filled with gloomy forebodings for the future, for Roger and I were betrothed.

It is wonderful what great strides hearts will make towards each other when isolated from society and surrounded by the wealth which dear Mother Nature loves to lavish upon her children.

Looking back upon that past, after the laspe of years,

"I think my eyes grow wet, as somewhere within my breast
Stabbed a faint and slothful pang never wholly laid at rest."

Somehow, that secluded spot has ever been to me as the grave-yard in which all I ever loved lies sleeping; and yet, there is no dust there to which I have a claim. There are grave-yards in the memory sometimes, and there it seems to me we always lay our bravest and best.

Roger was a sailor, and it was strange how soon I learnt to take an interest in all that pertained to the ocean. We passed hours by the salt sea waves, while he unfolded to me the mysteries that lay hidden in its shining, deceitful depths.

I loved the sea then; oh, how I loved it! But now, when I walk along the beach, it talks to me of partings, and all dreary things, and the sound of its tumultuous roaring comes to my ears like the cries of a soul in despair.

One gloomy afternoon in September, with the sky threatening and dreary, and the sun red and sullen, sinking in a crimson ball behind the mass of clouds lowering in the west, I walked upon the rocks beside the sea. Roger was to meet me there—for he was to sail on the morrow for the Indies, leaving me, with a heart like a lump of lead, to await his return.

I could not endure the thought of this parting. But he would be captain of the vessel when he came back, he said, and he must not lose this chance in the world.

He would have taken me with him as his wife, but there was mother, too frail to undertake the journey, and so I would stay behind. But no matter how much is to be gained by the voyage, there never was a woman yet that could feel, at such a time, the value of any gain; and I suppose I was like the rest.

And so I paced up and down the rocks in the sunset, with my heart all choked-like, and my voice full of tears. But my eyes were dry—quite dry—for Roger must not see my weakness. When he was gone there would be days and nights to cry in, and then my tears need not be restrained.

So, waiting bravely for his coming, I watched the offing, where the ships rocked lazily, to and fro, with the rising wind. The surf lines came booming up at the foot of the rocks, frothing and foaming angrily; the gulls circled above my head, shrieking and dipping into the white-capped waves. And then, watching the sun go down, I began to wonder at Roger's delay.

We had walked upon the beach every pleasant evening, but never before had I waited his coming at this spot. And I thought how pleased he would be to find me so much nearer than he anticipated.

I smiled to myself as I marked at last his familiar form moving along the beach. But—where was he going? He directed his steps to a little nook or cove on the shore, which I had never visited, for he had warned me of its danger when the tide was in.

As he entered the sheltered nook, I perceived that the place was occupied, for there was the gleam of a gay dress, and then I saw a slender form.

It was Milly Dean, the daughter of a fisherman, living near, and my heart gave a great, angry bound, as I saw that Roger evidently expected her.

I saw her turn to meet him, and flinging back her long, dark hair from her pretty face, she seized his hands with a passionate gesture.

But I waited to see no more. Down from the rock I dashed, and turned towards home. Then, I composed myself, and walking quietly to the hotel, I sought my own apartments. My mother—gentle soul—attributing my agitation to Roger, tried to soothe me and I was too heart-sick to explain.

In a short time I heard his voice asking the servant if we were engaged, and regardless of consequences, I sent down word that I was too ill to see him, on that, the last evening we were to be together!

The next morning, before the ship sailed, I wrote a line to Mr. Roger Dermott, and returning a book which I had found awaiting me, I told him that he was free; our engagement was at an end. And, with quiet scorn, I warned him not to write to me, for if he did, I would burn his letters unopened. And Roger Dermott knew that I never broke my word. I slipped his ring into the envelope, and so, it was all over.

Digitized by Google

After that, we returned to our home in London; and there the fever seized me. I went down to the gates of death, but my feet were stayed at the portals; so I came back to life, with its duties and stern realities.

One blow followed another in quick succession. Hardly had I regained my strength, when my mother set forth upon that last lonely journey that we all must take alone. With her dear hand in mine, I watched her as she "fell in sleep." She died unconscious of what had come between Roger and me, and our two names were the last upon her lips. Died! And we, who had always been together, were parted forever now!

I stood alone in the world now. God help the poor woman who has that to say of herself, and with a woman's precarious chances of earning an honest livelihood.

I was fortunate in finding a friend, and just at the blackest hour of my night (the hour before the day-dawn), just when my heart had failed me, and desolate and alone I felt "hedged in" by all the pitiless world, a kind hand was stretched out to save me from despair.

An old-time friend of my father offered me the charge of a circulating library, and too thankful for words, I wrung his hand in gratitude, and turned my face in the direction of my work.

It was the beginning of winter, and glad was I of the employment which would secure me from want during that inclement season, and I was ready for the hardest and most irksome task.

Mr. Lee, my employer, was a genial old gentleman, a perfect "book-worm," and I soon found my labours engrossing. Among books I could not be very lonely; and so the days wore away, and at last I grew quietly happy.

Some three years had elapsed since my mother's death, when one day, going into an unused room, I stumbled over a small wooden box.

"Bless me!" exclaimed Mr. Lee, "if there isn't that box of second-hand books I purchased a fortnight ago! They comprise some valuable works, and are worth something!"

So saying, he removed the lid from the box. I assisted him in assorting the contents. Almost the first volume I touched was a copy of Longfellow's poems, with Roger Dermott's name on the fly-leaf. Well did I remember the book—which he had sent me the day before he had sailed for the Indies.

As I opened it, a folded paper fluttered from between the leaves to the floor. It was a letter addressed to me in Roger's well-remembered hand. Trembling like a leaf, I read these words:

"Darling Marian,—Forgive me if I do not come as early as usual to-night. Little Milly Dean has begged me to do her a favour. The poor girl has a lover, an honest, steady fellow, but her father, who is a hard-hearted old man, is opposed to the marriage; and, as I have some influence with him, I have consented to try to induce him to consent. I send this note, darling, with the copy of Longfellow that I promised you. Please await patiently the coming of your Roger."

The Spring sunlight stole into the little room where I sat, staring my own mad folly in the face. Bowing my head upon my clasped hands, I wept tears of bitter grief. So, we were separated for ever, and I, in my mad blindness, had done it all.

Two weeks later, I came back to the old home by the sea. Almost the first person I met was Roger Dermott, who had just returned from his voyage. I went swiftly up to him, and sturdily trampling my pride under foot, in a low, trembling voice, I told him the whole story, and begged him to forgive me.

Standing there in the sunset, with the waters of the old ocean at our feet, Roger took my hand in his.

"Darling," he said softly, "of course you are forgiven. Be my wife at once, and never doubt me again, Marian, never while you live!"

And standing there together, a happy faith and trust crept into our hearts—never to go away again—never any more.

E. B. Collins.

Your Editor Chats.

The Buried Stations Competition is now being checked and the result will be announced as soon as possible.

On page 15 you will find another list of letters in the Juggled Letters Competition. This competition will be complete in twelve lists.

The cover this week consists of a reproduction of the Clan Macfie Tartan, which will appeal especially to Scottish readers, though I am sure that readers of English and other nationalities will also appreciate it. Nine other Scottish tartans have appeared at various times previously; a list of them, together with the dates of their appearance, will be found on page 20.

I wonder whether any of my readers ever think of posting on to a friend their copy of Short Stories when they have finished with it? Such an action would be much appreciated by both the friend and myself. The friend would enjoy the perusal of the little paper, and very likely might wish to become a subscriber, which would be a benefit to me and also to yourself, as every fresh subscriber means that I can spend more on the production of the paper, and thus you will get a better paper for your penny than you do at present. I shall be glad to hear from readers what they do with their copies of Short Stories after they have no further use for them.

We are getting near the time of year now when the towns become oppressively hot. The sun seems to scorch up whatever little vegetation there is, and the narrow streets and alleys become almost unbearable. It is at such a time as this that those town-dwellers who are able arrange to go away to the seaside or country to escape from some of the heat.

Now there are many town-dwellers who cannot afford to go away even for a day. Adults, of course, can stand the summer heat very well, but the children are not yet acclimatised, and it is for them that the Fresh Air Fund appeals. Ninepence pays for a Whole Day's Outing for one child. That isn't a very big sum, is it? If you save threepence a week for three weeks you will have it; then what you should do is:—Procure ten stamps; put nine inside an envelope, together with your name and address; then address the envelope to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., affix the tenth stamp to it, and place in the nearest post-box.

Of course, if you can spare more than ninepence, so much the better; the larger the sum the more children will be able to go away. All amounts will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. The Hon. Sec. will send collecting forms on application.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

A DECEITFUL WOMAN.

The Story of how Love Made Amends.

The festivities were in full swing at the charming little villa of the Honourable Mrs. Norton, the rooms were crowded to excess, the floor perfect, and the champagne all that it should be, the girls charming—the pick of the season's beauties always found their way to little Mrs. Norton's informal dances; and last, but by no means least, the larger proportion of the men were first-rate waltzers.

Through the long French windows—which opened on to a lawn sloping to the river-side—one or two couples had found their way into the cool, sweet-scented garden, gay with Chinese lanterns, the lights on the river gleaming softly through the evening haze, while the low murmur of the water formed an accompaniment to sweet voices and more manly tones.

"They look like business, don't they?" said pretty little Lady Vi to her husband, glancing towards a pair of tall figures. "I wonder if he'll propose to-night—what do you say?"

"Given a sufficiently pretty woman, a more or less romantic spot, and there's no knowing how great a fool a man will make of himself, especially after supper, and when the champagne is as good as Pollie Norton's. The girl's not bad-looking, is she Vi?" he added, pointing to the tall, straight figure of a woman, evidently too engrossed with her companion—a dark, eager-looking man, with the unmistakable carriage of a soldier—to pay any attention to the notes and comments of the bystanders.

"For my taste I think Angela Carlisle too tall and big—altogether too much in evidence," said Lady Vi, who was a sparkling little brunette. "It is funny what so charming a man as Douglas Lyle can see in her. By-the-bye, I never rightly understood who or what Angela was. Did Mrs. Norton ever tell you where she picked up her protégée, Lionel?"

"Cousin, I believe," he returned laconically. "I heard something about her being an heiress; anyway, she's a beauty, and Pollie Norton is not the woman to 'take up' an angel without evidence of her occupying a decent position in celestial society. Come, Vi, it's too damp for anything out here; let's go indoors."

The two figures at the bottom of the garden, apparently impervious to damp, continued to gaze upon the river—the silvery Thames, that has seen innumerable lovers come and go.

"The water sounds dreary to-night," said Angela dreamily. "It always has a peculiar fascination for me; it seems so exactly to give voice to everything one feels."

"But you don't want to voice anything dreary, Angela? You are the very incarnation of life and laughter!"

"Not always," she answered, in a low voice.

He turned towards her quickly.

"Something is troubling you, Angela; you are not like yourself to-night. I have so counted on this evening, dear; so longed for the opportunity to tell you that which already you must have guessed, and now, when at last I have you to myself, I find you changed, cold, almost constrained."

"Not changed," she said, "but——"

He interrupted her.

"What is it, Angela, that has lately come between us? You know, you must know, how dearly, how fondly, I love you. I had thought you were not altogether indifferent to that love, though you have so often, so cruelly denied me the chance of telling it. Put an end to my suspense, Angela. Answer me one way or the other. Tell me here and now, will you accept my love, my name, become my wife?"

The mist was rising from the river, hovering about them like a soft white cloud and shutting out the lights, the sound of the music, the soft laughter, and gay voices; they two seemed in a world apart.

The girl stretched out her arms towards the river. Her face, raised to the cold white moon, looked pale and wan. She stood silent for a moment, and then, with a quiet gesture, she laid her hand in his.

"Yes," she said, "I will be your wife." But even as she answered him she felt a thrill akin to fear run through her; he was so strong, so determined, so masterful even in his love, that it seemed impossible that he could ever be tolerant of weakness, of indecision; and yet he loved her very much, and she saw his eyes light up with passion, while his strong arms trembled as he held her close, and his voice sounded strangely tender, gentle beyond belief.

"You shall never regret your choice, my darling!" he whispered. "You shall have all my thoughts, all my devotion, all my love!"

"But your people, Douglas?" she asked, after a while. "Will they be willing to receive me? You know, dear, I am not your equal in wealth, though I have a fair income—£2,000 a year at the least—and——"

"Do you suppose it matters to me whether or not you have a penny, Angela?" he interrupted hastily. Her words jarred upon him; it seemed so incongruous to mention her income in the middle of a conversation of such vital importance.

"I thought I should like you to know," she said almost humbly; "things get so exaggerated, and Pollie Norton is always fond of drawing the long bow; besides, I have heard so much about your people's particularity—how do you know your mother will like me, Douglas?"

"My darling, how could my mother help liking you? She is as ardent a worshipper of beauty as I am; the only stipulation she ever made with regard to my wife was when she laughingly told me to be sure to choose 'a beauty and a lady.' Imagine my being attracted by anyone else?"

"What do you call 'a lady,' Douglas?"

"My dearest Angela, I beg of you do not propound any more conundrums. Those pretty lips were never meant to tantalise your lover in so cruel a fashion. I will answer all your questions, sweetheart, with a kiss," and, stooping a little, he held up the winsome face and pressed her lips—not once, but twenty times.

"My own, tell me you love me?" he demanded, in his masterful sort of fashion; but she broke from him, and, with a little laugh, disappeared through the mist. He followed, somewhat perplexed.

Douglas Lyle, soldier as he was, strong-willed and stronger-hearted, was all too simple-minded to understand the manifold perversities with which a woman encompasses her love, and Angela's varying moods puzzled while they enchanted him. But as he stood in the porch, smoking a cigarette rather disconsolately, a pair of arms wound themselves round his neck, soft, clinging lips were laid on his, and a low voice whispered: "Douglas, I love you!" Then before he had time to seize and hold her, Angela had vanished.

The news of their engagement leaked out somehow, as engagements always do, and many were the covert allusions, sly smiles, and pretty speeches directed to the young couple for the rest of the evening. It seemed to Angela as if it would never come to an end, and when the last "good-bye" had been said, and the last carriage rolled away, she felt hardly able to keep up any longer.

Digitized by Google

Later the two—Pollie Norton, as her intimates called the widow, and Angela Carlisle—stood facing each other in the pretty little room, half library, half boudoir, which did duty for the latter's private sitting-room in the riverside cottage. Now they were left alone a strange sort of stiffness seemed to fall between them, quite different from the easy relationship of hostess and girl friend.

"Captain Lyle proposed to me to-night," said Angela coldly, staring straight before her into the glass above the mantelpiece.

"I suppose you accepted him?" queried the little widow.

"Yes," replied the girl.

"Well, you are to be congratulated. Douglas will come in for a title at his uncle's death and a rent-roll of about £10,000 a year, besides his own property, which brings him in quite another fifteen."

Angela nodded, but vouchsafed no further information. The elder woman looked at her somewhat curiously—a tall, straight figure with curling chestnut hair, clear, pale skin, and large, mournful-looking, velvety-brown eyes. Then, somewhat irritated at her silence, she spoke again.

"You're playing rather a dangerous game," she said. "Douglas is as proud as Lucifer, and his mother is a good deal worse. Once let him discover that he's been deceived, and all the marriage ceremonies in the world won't keep him by you. It's your own business, of course, but, as I say, it's very risky!"

"It is more than likely I shall tell him all the truth," replied Angela.

"You appear to have forgotten our arrangement," said Mrs. Norton spitefully; "I, on my side, undertook to do certain things for you, for a consideration; you, on your part, gave me an understanding to the effect that you would not reveal the terms of our engagement, at any rate while you remained with me, and I presume you wish the marriage to take place from here?"

"Yes, if you have no objection."

"None at all, provided you keep to the agreement until after the event."

"I will remember," said the girl, with a heavy sigh. "I think I'll go to bed now—if you don't mind," she added; and, with a ceremonious sort of greeting, the two parted, Angela to read a letter which, directed in a neat and clear handwriting to "Miss Angela Carlisle," contained another in an unbroken envelope, addressed, in coarsely-formed letters, to:

"MRS. CARLISLE SMITH,
Care of Messrs. Martin and Harvey, Furnival's Inn,"

a letter which caused her, judging by the tears in her eyes, much vexation of spirit; while Pollie Norton sat wrinkling her pretty brows far into the night over a collection of bills. Apparently, however, she came to a satisfactory conclusion concerning them.

"Thank goodness!" she ejaculated fervently, "the wedding will put me straight. I shall ask her for a cheque for £1,000—and cheap at the price, I call it. Anyway, Angela's not mean!" with which comforting reflection the little widow blew out the candle and fell asleep.

The London season was coming to a close. Most of the "smart set" had already left town; those who were still detained, feeling called upon to apologise for their presence, discussed the fashionable engagements which always form such an engrossing topic of conversation at the fag-end of the season's gaieties, none being more spoken of than Angela Carlisle's. She was alternately described as "simply lovely," "horribly made-up," and—the most delicate flattery of all, from a woman's lips—"rather nice-looking," for when was there ever yet a beauty who was not so designated by her "dearest friends"? Indeed, her approaching marriage with Douglas Lyle formed a nine days' wonder. "What can he see in her?" "Very designing girl, I fear," were among the least unfavourable of Society's comments; while the fact that the wedding was to be very quiet did much to increase its unpopularity.

It was Angela's special request that they should be married without any fuss, and the arrangement coincided exactly with Douglas' views on the matter. Mrs. Norton contented herself with a few sarcastic speeches relative to the habits of the ostrich; some people, as she averred, being like that remarkable bird, inasmuch as they imagined it possible to deceive Society as to their intentions by doing things "on the quiet." Having so far relieved her mind, she devoted her energies to Angela's trousseau, displaying, in fact, a great deal more interest in the matter than the girl herself.

The lovers had been one afternoon to visit Mrs. Lyle, a charming but somewhat formidable old lady, almost too devoted to her son, whom she was convinced no woman could fully appreciate, "her dear boy's" manifold perfections rendering it impossible.

The visit had not been an unqualified success. Angela felt she was being "appraised," and did not improve under the process, while Douglas, seeing that they did not "hit it off," made matters worse by well-meant but somewhat clumsy efforts at creating a diversion.

"I feel sure I have seen you before, Miss Carlisle," said Mrs. Lyle's companion, a person chiefly remarkable for an unpleasantly retentive memory, and an unfortunate knack of recounting her various recollections at singularly inopportune moments.

"Now I come to think of it, it was at the flower-show at Petersham; you looked so very sweet, I remember. Don't you recollect it?"

"Hardly," said Angela coolly, "considering I was never there."

Now, as a matter of fact, the companion was perfectly correct, but Angela's answer was accompanied by such a contemptuous, not to say scowling glance in her direction, that the poor little woman collapsed, and muttering something about "most marked resemblance," subsided for the remainder of the afternoon.

But the incident prevented any further friendly intercourse; and Angela rose at last to bring her unpleasant quarter of an hour to an end.

"Good-bye, my dear," said her hostess. "I shall hope to find in you a daughter, and you must look upon me in the place of your own mother; poor child, it is very sad for you to have lost her so young!"

The old lady's voice was kindly, and she looked at Angela with genuine affection in her keen grey eyes, but the girl did not respond as was her wont to the show of sympathy. Indeed, she was almost repellent in her manner, and effectually checked any further advances on the part of the elder woman.

She was singularly quiet, almost absent, all the way home, and when at last they reached the little villa Douglas ventured on a slight reproach.

"Angela," he said, "I wish you could make up your mind to like my mother. She is quite prepared to be proud and fond of you."

"I always told you that your people would prove the stumbling-block, Douglas," she answered, "but if I have behaved in any way contrary to your wish towards her, I am sorry."

Her voice sounded very tired, and her eyes were fixed and sad.

"Forgive me, darling. I was a brute to say anything to annoy you! Kiss me Angela, and say that you forgive me?"

"Do you really love me.

Digitized by Google

Douglas? I mean, is it for myself? Would you care for me if you were suddenly to learn that—that I was Jane Smith, for instance, of plebeian family instead of——"

"You are a goose, dear!" he laughed. "You don't suppose I love you because your name is Angela? I should be as capable of affection if you were Jane; but it's rather a useless sort of imagining, isn't it, dear? No one could picture you as a member of a plebeian family."

She murmured some unintelligible answer, and, pleading a headache, left her lover somewhat abruptly. Throwing herself upon her bed, she hid her face, and her form shook with convulsive sobs. Whatever it might be that Angela Carlisle was hiding from her lover, she was paying a high price for the deceit.

* * * * *

Early the next morning Douglas Lyle called to see his beloved. She was not at home, the housemaid informed him, considerably to his astonishment, and had not left word when she might be expected.

Douglas was troubled at the intelligence and not a little mystified. That Angela should break an appointment he had made was an unheard of thing, and he had arranged that morning to call for her a little after ten.

Twice in the course of the day he returned, each time to receive the same answer, "Not at home."

And all the time Angela was upstairs in her room, listening with aching heart to her lover's voice.

"I can't see him, I daren't see him!" she cried. "I am afraid—afraid——" She walked impatiently to and fro, her eyes feverishly bright, her small hands clenched convulsively. At last towards the evening she grew calmer, and, sitting down, wrote a note to Douglas, asking him to come round then and there and wait for her in the garden.

"I have much, so much, to tell you!" she wrote. "Come, for this last time, come to me!"

Considering that she had denied herself three times that day to Mr. Lyle, this proceeding seemed a strange one; indeed, the neat little parlourmaid whom Angela dispatched with the note thought the young lady must be a little mad.

Douglas arrived almost as soon as the maid. He made his way down the garden path, and there, overlooking the river, in the very spot where Angela had promised to become his wife, he found her, with eyes dull from weeping, her proud head drooping, her face pale and haggard. She looked strangely unlike his fair, proud Angela.

"Dearest," he said softly, laying his hand upon her shoulder, "what is troubling you?"

"Don't speak to me or touch me till I've told you all!" she said. "You cannot guess what it is I have to say to you."

"Wait a moment, Angela," he said quietly. "If there is anything that you would rather not tell me I am quite prepared to promise forgiveness without confession on your part. I trust you so implicitly, dear, that I leave you the choice absolutely."

"I must tell you, Douglas. I could not marry you unless you knew. And yet it is so hard—so hard—to tell!"

And then, with many a pause, in a voice broken with sobs, she told him all. How, as a young orphan, and a considerable heiress, she had been left to the care of an old friend of her father's of the name of Smith, a man of considerable scientific attainments, but in the ordinary affairs of life as simple as a child. His wife had died at the birth of his son, who had grown up a good-looking prodigal, a disappointment to his father, and all else beside.

Her guardian, dreading the responsibilities attaching to the care of a young girl, married his housekeeper—a kind-hearted, loving woman, who in spite of her want of education took the place of a mother to poor Angela.

"When I was but nineteen," said Angela, "my guardian died and left me to the care of his wife, the woman whom I call 'mother,' and who has been loving and tender as ever a mother could be. But she is not—not like the people you are used to, Douglas. She is unlettered, uneducated, but——" she paused. "I can't give her up," she said, "even for you!"

In the dim light she cast a glance at her lover. His face was turned from her. She seemed to read the stern, set look in his eyes, the contempt with which he heard the tale. A great fear clutched at her heart; for a minute she was tempted to end the story there.

There was another chapter, but he would never know, unless she told him. He might forgive her for loving this poor, ignorant woman who had so loved her. But the rest of the story.

Clenching her hands Angela forced herself to speak.

"Before my guardian died," she went on, "he warned me against his son Carlisle. He was not a good man. Guardian saw he was attracted to me, and feared I cared for him. His warning was all too late. I had married Carlisle secretly a year before."

She glanced piteously at Douglas as she spoke; but he made no sign.

"After my guardian's death I went with 'mother,' as I called her, to the village of Petersham, where I took my rightful name—Mrs. Carlisle Smith, though I had not seen nor heard of my husband—husband in name only—since the marriage. I sorrowed for him, Douglas. I was but a young girl, and he had seemed all that a girl could wish. But, as time went on, I thought less of him; I grew bitter towards him, and when at last the news reached me that he had been killed in a street fight out in San Francisco, I felt no grief. I welcomed my freedom. I could not bear to retain any trace of my foolish marriage, so I dropped the name of Smith and called myself Miss Carlisle. And then I determined to destroy all connection with my old life. I arranged with Mrs. Norton—a distant cousin of my mother—to launch me into Society—she knowing my story. I even kept my whereabouts from the woman whom I loved so dearly, for fear people should find out my past through her. Then I met you, Douglas, and at first I meant never to tell you; but I've learnt to love you so dearly that I could not bear to deceive you, and now—now you will cast me off."

With streaming eyes and outstretched hands she turned towards him to receive her sentence. She had deceived him. It was just she should be punished. Yet——

With a swift movement he put his arms about her.

"Angela, have you so little faith in me? Now that I have heard your story, I shall ask you once again to be my wife. Dearest, it isn't new to me. I knew it all along. My mother's companion wasn't the only person who saw you at Petersham. I was there, too, and straightway fell in love with you. I learnt your history from Mrs. Smith; had I not pledged her to secrecy she would have told you."

"Why did you want to keep it from me?"

"I hoped that you would tell me yourself, Angela. I waited sometimes impatiently for you to give me your confidence, but at last, at least, my patience is requited."

"And you can care for me, Douglas, in spite of my deceit?"

His answer was inaudible, but apparently satisfactory, for Angela straightway threw her arms round his neck, and in a voice thrilling with happiness, cried:

"I am a wretched and deceitful woman, Douglas. But I love you so—I love you so, perhaps 'twill make amends."

And apparently it did.

John K. Prothero.

"My face is my fortune, sir," she said. "That's plain enough," he replied abstractedly. Then it took him three hours to explain.

"There is one thing that I must say for Blowhard and that trombone of his." "What's that?" "He has driven all the cats into another neighbourhood to do their serenading."

Some time ago a worthy farmer and his wife had a visit from their minister, who was asked to stop to tea. Their servant, Mary, who is a Highland lass, had newly come from that locality, and her mistress put her in charge of getting the bread-and-butter ready for tea. Mary, thinking the minister's visit was of unusual importance, came and whispered in the guidwife's ear: "Will I butter the bread on baith sides?"

Digitized by Google

Supporting a Theory.

Telling of why a Girl was a Flirt.

THE house-party at Westwood were dawdling over their coffee on the moonlit verandah.

It was a merry crowd; everybody knew everybody else, and there was much laughter and talk, but suddenly a silence fell. Then it became patent to all that the couple seated on the steps leading to the lawn were engaged in a quiet but bitter altercation.

The girl's listless air was in striking contrast to the man's eagerness.

"Your idea is an absurd one," he exclaimed.

"Oh fie!" she said, "to speak so rudely to a woman."

"It is not rudeness, but truth."

"Then they are apparently synonymous."

"I can't help it; it exasperates me to hear an intelligent girl like you——"

"Now, where," she broke in, "did you pick that up? I am not the least bit intelligent! If I were I would know better than to argue with you; it is so perfectly hopeless"—sighing—"and you do get so excited."

"And who wouldn't? Listening to such impossible theories!"

"You don't have to! I never asked you to talk to me. I came out here to be by myself, and you deliberately followed me. Why didn't you stay with the others? They are all pleasanter than I am."

"Humility," he said, "is a cloak that fits badly on your shoulders."

"My sleeves are too large, perhaps! But really you misunderstand—I have an excellent opinion of myself. I can be quite agreeable, when I choose, but I am not in the mood to-night."

"Then according to your theory you ought to be most attractive."

"What is your theory, Kate?" called her cousin.

"One you have heard me express thousands of times before."

"Shall I tell him, Miss Danbury?"

"Certainly."

"She says that a man doesn't like to feel too confident of a woman's affection; that it is the element of uncertainty in love affairs that makes them interesting; that he enjoys being puzzled and played with, and that a clever woman has only to appear indifferent to first pique and then attract him."

"Heresy!" exclaimed a chorus of manly voices.

"Mr. Stewart has omitted an important clause," said Miss Danbury. "I add that to do this the woman must necessarily be good to look at and not lacking in this world's goods."

"Oh Kate, Kate" sighed her cousin, "would you insinuate that the masculine fancy is influenced by worldly advantages?"

She shrugged her shoulders.

"I have stated my case; you can make it what you choose."

The hostess, who had been listening idly, now put in a word.

"The trouble with you all is that you analyse too much," she said. "Why not take things as they come, without worrying over their possible causes? It is so much more simple and healthy."

Miss Danbury turned round.

"Isn't Madge charming?" she said amiably. "To hear her you would suppose that she had never seen the inside of a drawing-room. She always gets like that when she comes to the country; something in the air, probably."

"And you?" said Stewart, when the laughter following her speech had died away; "has it no effect on you?"

"The country? Oh, yes, it makes me—if that is possible—more indolent than usual," and she leant her head against the pillar and looked not at him, but past him to the stretch of rosy sky.

"What an actress you are!" he said; "you are not the least bit indifferent really, but it has amused you to pose as such so long that now it has almost become second nature."

"To pose as anything involves a certain amount of personal exertion."

"Well, doubtless you find it worth while if your audience is appreciative; and it usually is, I fancy."

"Have you noticed those two clouds?" she said. "It is curious to watch how they keep floating first towards and then away from each other, like people who are playing at cross purposes."

"You were evidently not listening to a word I was saying."

"Oh, yes, I was. You were scolding me, but you generally are, you know, and you said something about my posing. You have told me that often before, and so——"

"And so—apparently there was no need for listening to me. I had no idea I was such a bore."

She looked at him, saying:

"Now, you see, you are angry again! Don't you think," leaning towards him confidentially, "you ought to do something for your temper? It may get you into trouble some day. Not everybody is as amiable as I?"

"Still wrangling?" asked Carl Ainslie, lounging down the steps. "My dear young friends, it grieves me to the heart to see such a display of unchristian feeling. 'Let dogs delight to bark and bite.'"

"Blame Mr. Stewart and not me," said the girl; "you know, Carl, that I haven't the energy to quarrel with any one, especially in this weather."

"Of course not. Miss Danbury only says the things that make other people want to quarrel."

"A charming character you have given me; after that, I think I will abandon the field to you. Come, Carl," with a quick change of manner, "let's go down to the lake for a row."

Stewart watched them with wrath in his heart—the girl was talking gaily, her soft laugh floating back to him.

"There goes a living denial of her theory," he thought. "She is kindness itself to Ainslie and he is devoted to her. Indifference, indeed! I'd like to see the woman who could attract me by that. As for Miss Danbury, she is a heartless little flirt, and I don't intend to fret myself about her," and he climbed the steps and stalked gloomily off to the smoking-room.

"Kate," said young Ainslie, resting on his oars, "I'm your cousin and have a right to tell you when I think you are doing wrong; so I say—do leave poor old Stewart alone."

"Leave poor old Stewart alone!" indignantly. "I think you had better suggest his leaving me alone."

Digitized by Google

"Of course, now, you know very well what I mean. It's all right for you to trample on Herbert and Reade and myself, we're used to it—been broken in too long to protest—but Stewart's another sort; he cares awfully about things."

"Oh, indeed, so he 'cares awfully,' and the rest of you, I suppose, are only amusing yourselves."

"How you tease a fellow! No—what I mean is that he is so terribly 'all there,' don't you know, that if he lets himself be hard hit it would knock him out completely to have you throw him over."

"So terribly 'all there'—what a graphic expression. Yet undeniably true in this case; but why do you take it for granted that I will throw him over?"

Mr. Ainslie's face expressed the utmost consternation.

"Well, really, I don't know, but I thought, I somehow concluded——"

"What?"

"Why," a brilliant idea striking him, "that you didn't care for anybody, and wouldn't until you had seen more of the world, for you are very young, Kate, in spite of your many experiences."

"Carl," said Miss Danbury solemnly, "the Bar has lost a shining mark in you, but I am proud to claim you as a relative."

* * * * *

It was a fortnight later; the house party would disperse on the morrow, and Miss Danbury, to whom Westwood was dear, was taking a farewell stroll through the gardens. She was idling down a path, when, catching sight of Stewart over the tops of the rose bushes, she ostentatiously put up her parasol and turned in the other direction.

But he was not to be so easily thrown off; with a curl of the lip (for he had recognised the manœuvre) he hurried towards her.

"Miss Danbury!" he cried. "Will you spare me a few moments?"

She turned her head.

"I am not in a pleasant frame of mind. Uncle forwarded me my dressmaker's bill this morning, with certain pungent comments of his own appended, and my best manuscript has just been returned to me as 'unsuitable,' so the atmosphere is not rosy."

"Never mind about that. I will not detain you long," and he pulled up a chair.

For a few moments there was silence, for now that he had gained the coveted interview Stewart did not seem to know what to say, and Miss Danbury, with the point of her parasol, sketched triangles and circles and all sorts of impossible devices in the sandy path. While looking the picture of careless inattention, she was in reality curious to know how long her companion intended to continue staring in front of him. When he finally did speak his remark was so different from what she expected that she almost started.

"I suppose you know you are very beautiful," he said. "Doubtless your mirror has told you that already, so I need not weary you with repetitions, but I feel sure that you do not realise how absolutely charming you are."

She looked at him wonderingly; it was a favourite method of hers, and usually worked well, but now it failed to produce the effect she intended.

"Don't look like that," he said, "or I shall think you are not sincere, and I don't want to think that. I want to carry away the kindest thoughts of you."

"You have changed," she said. "Ten days ago you told Mary Fair I was thoroughly heartless."

"Did I? Well, that only shows I was a fool. I know you better now; and what is more, I understand you."

A slight pause.

"I heard up at the house that you were engaged to your cousin, and while the news could not but hurt me, it was in one sense a relief, for I knew at once why you had avoided and almost ignored me. You wanted to save me pain. Experience has taught me that if a man saw much of you he generally cared for you, and you tried to ward me off. But you cannot keep the moth from the candle, and I loved you in spite of your coldness. It almost looks as if there was something in your theory, doesn't it?"

Miss Danbury gathered herself together. Stewart did not know it, but she was summoning courage to tell him the truth about herself. She loved to be well thought of, and it was a genuine sacrifice to speak, but she could not, in common honesty, allow him to remain under his delusion.

"You must not think too well of me," she began.

"I could not," he cried. "One rarely sees so much youth and beauty and simple goodness united as I find in you."

Simple goodness! The words scorched her.

"You are all wrong," she cried, with burning cheeks. "I am not the least bit like that. Don't you see? Can't you understand? It vexed me to have you laugh at my theory, so I determined to make you an example of its truth. It was from no good motive—not to 'ward you off' or 'to save you pain,' but with the distinct intention of making you care for me, 'that I pretend to be indifferent.'"

Stewart got slowly to his feet.

"And so," he said, "in support of a theory, for the sake of proving yourself in the right, you could play havoc with a man's heart and make havoc of his life. Fool, fool that I was, not to understand!" and he struck one palm sharply against the other. "Well," with sarcastic courtesy, "the point is gained, the poor dupe at your feet. I hope you are content."

"Content!" she cried. "I was never so sorry in my life. It seems strange that I should care, doesn't it? And, as you say, I have gained my point—and yet——"

"Yes," he said, "and yet?"

Instead of replying she turned her head swiftly away, but not before he had seen that her eyes were full of tears. He stood irresolute, overcome by surprise; then he approached her.

"Don't cry like that," he said. "You never meant to hurt me; it was a pretty bit of acting to you, and if I was stupid and overdid my part you are not to blame. There, look up. What will your cousin say if he learns I distressed you?"

"What is it to me what my cousin thinks?"

Mr. Stewart stared.

"Pardon me, but I thought that being engaged to him—"

"I am not engaged to him. Nothing is further from my intention."

A silence followed. Then Miss Danbury rose to depart, but Stewart, whose mind had been adjusting itself to the changed situation, put out a detaining hand.

"Kate," he said, "if you are not going to marry your cousin, perhaps there might be a chance for someone else."

"Perhaps."

He drew nearer.

"I know I'm a perfect fool to rush on my fate, but what's worth having is certainly worth asking for. Kate, will you marry me?"

She smiled, but her eyes were very tender.

"I believe you do love me," she said.

"Well, a little."

"And if I marry you, I know I shall be happy. You are so strong and true, and have my confidence so utterly, but I have been horrid to you, so rude and disagreeable that I don't see how you can stand me."

"Why, you are going back on your theory."

"The girls will certainly laugh, and Carl will never leave me alone about it, but I don't care," lifting her face resolutely, "I love you, and there's no use pretending I don't."

A little while later she looked up.

"I always said I would never care for anybody," she remarked, "what will this prove?"

"That you are a woman," he said.

C. A. Ashborne.

Digitized by Google

Letter Juggling Competition.

CASH DOWN. FIRST PRIZE, £25.	CASH DOWN. SECOND PRIZE, £10.	CASH DOWN. THIRD PRIZE, £5.

TWO BILLIARD TABLES (measuring 4 ft. 10 inches by 2 ft. 8½ inches), together with cues, balls, marking board, and spirit level,

And TWENTY-FIVE GRAMOPHONES, each one fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, and accompanied by two records.

• • • • • • •

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES." Seven more lists will appear.

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

EXAMPLE:
ABGHIIMMNR... Birmingham.

FIFTH LIST.

49. AFHLMOTU .....
50. ABILRRTUY .....
51. AADGGNR .....
52. BEHRRSSUWY .....
53. AEILPSY .....
54. AADILMVY .....
55. ABDMORR .....
56. CEEEILRST .....
57. ACEEGHKNOR .....
58. ACHLLSSS .....
59. AABCNNRU .....
60. AEEKNOSSV .....

Name..... Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

The Saving of Felicia.

How a Man Worked Out his Redemption.

There was no brighter room in the house than that which Felicia Nelson called her den. It was really her bedroom, but everything about it was so bright and cheerful that she often preferred to sit there rather than in the more formally furnished drawing-room.

All things combined to make the apartment pleasant; it caught more of the sunbeams than any other chamber, Felicia had that happy faculty of making a place look pretty and restful by the style in which she distributed the trifling ornaments and knick-knacks, and Felicia herself was like a ray of light. If she were not reading or otherwise absorbed, she was singing, and everything about her seemed gay.

The contrast between the usual aspect of the apartment, and that which it presented one evening in early summer was very striking. It was as war and desolation compared with peace.

The sky was dark with the raging storm, except when it was rent from end to end by vivid flashes of lightning; the thunder pealed continuously, the rain descended as if another deluge were imminent.

The windows of Felicia's den rattled, shaken by violent gusts of wind, the air appeared to have been changed from sultriness to wintry coldness. The room itself was dull, chilly, desolate, for all the life had vanished from it, as if driven away by the shadow of a great trouble.

Felicia lay stretched on the floor by the side of her bed, motionless, except for an occasional convulsion of the body, such as may be observed in certain children and adults after a violent fit of weeping and sobbing.

A shudder passed through the girl's frame as a flash of lightning passed before the eyes which had opened spasmodically. She felt that the storm of the elements without was a counterpart of the storm of emotions that was going on within her.

"That storm will cease and probably leave no trace behind it, but it cannot be so with the tempest which is raging in my heart!" she moaned, shutting her eyes once again. "If I had any room for doubt, if he had been charged on circumstantial evidence I could smile at it; for, terrible as that would be, I should be assured of his innocence, and, when the trouble was over, we should be happy together, happy in the love we bear to each other, and in the consciousness of innocence. But it is too true! He has admitted his guilt!"

She made an effort and rose to her feet, slowly and painfully, as one who is recovering from a weakening illness. She tottered to a chair, and let herself fall into it.

"He has done this!" she cried, a little more animation coming into the tear-dimmed eyes. "He has done this! My love for him, his for me, his own sense of right and wrong, the thought that he would bring disgrace on all of us—all this is not sufficient to maintain his steps in the path of integrity, and he is admittedly guilty of theft. He has stolen money from his employer. He is a paltry thief!"

The fountain of tears was dry; the lovely blue eyes, generally so soft and liquid, were hot and hard. She had given her love to a man who had descended to theft in order to meet liabilities incurred through the vice of gambling.

Her lips curled slightly; her hand clenched, as if to crush out the tiny spark of love which persisted in keeping alight in her breast.

Why are we so perverse? Philip had done that which must kill the love of the woman to whom he was betrothed. Felicia Dixon tried to put out this flame, yet it remained just alive, just a spark, and would not die away!

When the engagement was announced, many people shook their heads. It was natural enough that Philip Harding should fall in love with such a winsome lassie as Felicia, seeing that everybody was in love with her.

It was natural, too, that Philip's manly figure and handsome face, aided by his ingratiating manner, should make him a favourite with the fair sex. Yet, on the closer acquaintance that must have preceded the actual engagement, Felicia should have been able to detect the weakness of the man's character, as shown by the want of solidity about the jaw, and the feebleness in the appearance of the mouth.

"I know all that you are going to say!" she declared haughtily to a lady who desired to put her on her guard. "You are insinuating that he may fall into error. Thank you! But, supposing that your estimate of my lover is correct, I am confident that my love for him will make him strong! Yes, I even feel a sense of pleasure in the thought that I have an opportunity of proving how much the love of a woman can do for the man of her choice!"

The lady, an elderly woman, and a friend of the family, desisted in her benevolent attempt to warn Felicia. This conversation came back to the girl's memory very distinctly, and she passed her hands over her face, pressing them against her cheeks, temples and forehead in the futile effort to drive it away.

"He will not be prosecuted, they tell me," she thought. "He must go away. Will he try to see me? Will he come to beg my pardon for the wrong he has done me? Or is he too weak, too bad, even for that?"

She could not analyse her own feelings; she could not decide whether she wished him to come, or to go away without seeing her. In a dulled state she prepared for bed, not noticing that the thunder and lightning had ceased, but that the rain was still descending in torrents.

Sheer exhaustion made her sleep soundly, and the heavy slumber was Nature's restorative.

She awoke later than usual on the following morning, and felt stronger to meet the sorrow of a love that was worse than lost, because it was disgraced—stronger by far than she had anticipated.

"He is going away; he will not be prosecuted," she repeated several times. It was something to be thankful for! "Will he—will he try to see me?"

She hardly knew whether she wished him to do so or not. At first she curled her lips in contempt at the thought that Philip would venture to stand before her; her tall, graceful figure drew itself up to its full height, her beautiful face lost its sweetness, and assumed a look of sternness, her head was thrown back, and she had the appearance of a veritable goddess inflamed with indignation and wounded feelings.

Then a strange alteration took place. The tiny spark of love flared up for the moment, and she imagined Philip Harding in front of her, penitent, beseeching her to have mercy.

She fancied that she could hear the speech from Shakspeare's great play—"The quality of mercy is not strained." She remembered the beautiful prayer which her dead mother had taught her as a little child, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that——"

Digitized by Google

She could not finish it, even in thought; a softened look came into the lovely eyes, and slowly the attitude and look changed till Felicia resembled a pitying angel of surpassing beauty. If Philip Harding had come at that moment!

"He is gone!" she murmured in the afternoon. "It is a wild day, the rain and the wind have it all their own way, and it a fitting environment for an exit in disgrace and misery! Truly, our sins find us out!"

"Felicia!"

The name was uttered in a hesitating, pleading voice. She had sunk into a reverie, but the sound electrified her into life.

"Philip!" she cried, springing to her feet. "You here? Have you—have you dared to come here, to face me?"

Her voice had grown in fulness as she spoke; the volume of sound had increased as her indignation grew. He quailed before her glance, and his eyes dropped.

"Yes, I have dared!" he replied sadly. He no longer ventured to use her Christian name. "I have come to tell you how much I sorrow over my own downfall and over the effect upon you. Oh!"—he cut himself short as he was about to add "my darling!"—"Oh, you cannot realise how deep is my sorrow, how I loathe myself for this weakness!"

He lifted his eyes to meet hers, hoping to see in them some sign of forgiveness and compassion, but it was the figure of the indignant goddess that met his gaze.

"How entrancingly beautiful she is!" he breathed. He could not fail to observe it, although his own death sentence, the words that would rob him of the last grain of hope, was upon her lips.

"You have robbed me of my happiness in life!" she told him, her body quivering with the scorn of wounded love. "You have deprived me of that which a woman prizes above all things, the love of a worthy man! I gave you my love, the affection which should have caused you to do your utmost to be worthy of it!

"A man should be strengthened in the path of integrity by the thought that a woman has intrusted to him something which is beyond price to her, something which should be held as a sacred charge—her love!

"You have forgotten to guard the treasure; you have brought upon yourself the punishment of the common criminal! Your punishment and debasement recoil upon me! And that is the return which you make to me for the love which my heart poured out to you! Go from me! I wish to be alone!"

"So be it!" he said gravely and firmly.

As the words of his sentence fell on his ears, they had brought out all the strength that lay within him. He recognised the justice of the condemnation, but he waited in vain for a trace of mercy.

The severity of her manner stiffened the weak lines of the mouth; his figure straightened itself, and, although his appearance still indicated penitence, there was more manliness and determination in it than Felicia had ever seen.

The fact struck her and kept her silent.

"I accept your decision. I admit that you are right in all you say, yet——"

He stopped, as if waiting for her to encourage him to go on, but she remained mute. He continued, quietly at first, but with a passionate ring showing itself in his voice as he proceeded.

"I had hoped for some mercy. I have been weak! I have been a fool and a coward to bring this upon you, but it will be a terrible lesson to me! It will be a beneficial lesson, for it shows me my inner self and teaches me how to act and guard myself in the future. "Is there no chance of redemption for a sinner? Am I to have no opportunity of atoning for this miserable slip, and holding my head aloft again, even in this town? Surely, a first fault, a false step in a weak moment, is not to blast my whole life and crush me! If man is so hard, then a Higher Power is more merciful. Tell me, Felicia, is there no hope of redemption?"

His very passion dragged the name from his lips; he held out his hands appealingly. His heart was reflected in his eyes, and she could see the depths of this man's agony. Had she the right to be so hard? Could she be so obdurate when that tiny spark of love was threatening to burst into a flame? Could she drive this man from her, telling him that redemption was impossible? Again there came the transition from the indignant goddess to the compassionate angel. He observed the beginning of this change.

"Felicia," he pleaded, "give me a little hope that I may redeem myself in the future! If it is impossible to regain your love, let me at least take with me the consolation that you do not think me utterly bad!"

He knelt before her, taking her hand and gazing with intense earnestness upwards at her exquisite features. How much he had lost!

"Give me a little hope! I have wronged you, but I will do all that is humanly possible to make amends. Do not drive me from you with the thought that nothing remains for me except death or a long life of misery!"

At the window appeared the face of a little child.

Digitized by Google

He kissed her hand passionately. She tried to speak, but she had momentarily lost the power of articulation. How strangely Philip had altered! This man breathed a spirit of latent strength which she had never suspected! Was it just that he should be sent away hopeless? Is there no redemption? Oh, yes, yes!

"Shall mortals deny that which their Maker grants?" she said gently. The voice was so tender that it startled Felicia herself; it was not like her own voice, it seemed to be that of someone speaking for her. "Do not kneel before me! I am not worthy of homage, for I, too, have a lesson to learn—the lesson of forgiveness when real repentance is shown.

"Philip, there will be opportunities of redeeming yourself, either by some noble deed or by years of steady work! Go away with that hope! I do not know whether we can ever again be to each other what we were a few hours ago, but we can be true friends, and in the distant land to which you will make your way, you will be gladdened by the thought that at least one person is watching the working out of that redemption!"

He kissed her hand reverently. He still held it as he rose to his feet; he gazed at her earnestly, longingly, for a brief space, then he gently relinquished her hand and passed from the room, turning at the door to take a last farewell look.

The sun shone through the clouds and shed a bright ray across the figure of the girl, and Philip Harding went forth with renewed hope. His last look was indeed upon a pitying angel.

To the other inhabitants of the place the appearance of the sun had a more prosaic meaning, for it betokened the cessation of the rain and relieved many well-founded fears concerning the capability of the river bank to withstand the force of the swollen torrent.

If the rain stopped the threatened danger might be averted, although many people had their doubts. The wind did not drop, that was the disquieting factor, and it might agitate the water to an extent that would encompass the mischief.

It was an hour later when a frightened maid ran to Felicia and gasped out the news.

"Oh, miss, the river bank has given way and the water is flooding the Malling Dale!"

"Is it serious?" demanded Felicia, forgetting her own trouble and thinking only of the danger to other people. "Is the break a wide one? What is being done?"

"The water is flowing along about a foot deep, miss; I haven't heard if the gap is a big one, but the water is rising, and it will knock the wooden houses over and sweep them away if it goes on!" responded the servant.

Felicia required something to take her out of herself, so she hurried to put on her hat and light cloak. It had left off raining, but the wind was so high that it was difficult to keep one's feet at times. Another thought had come to her. Felicia's father was a doctor, and he had intended to call on one of his poor patients in Malling Dale; her child was ill. Had he been caught in the flooding of this sparsely inhabited valley?

Felicia hastened onwards. She lived near the end of the town—it was an old family residence, and the doctor had stayed there—which was not a great way from the Dale; she was therefore one of the first to reach the spot.

Malling Dale extended for about half a mile, from the river bank to a point beyond the town, where it widened into a common. The point at which Felicia reached it was about the centre of its length.

Felicia found the Dale flooded, as the girl had said, to the depth of twelve or eighteen inches. The people were scurrying from their houses or taking to the upper storey; the latter was hardly a safe proceeding, as the rickety places were likely to be washed from their foundations by a strong flow of water. They were mere huts of wood, most of them, and quite a number of them had only one storey.

The unfortunates and their rescuers were wading through the water with some of their belongings. One house stood alone, not a soul being visible, and Felicia recognised that it was the abode of Mrs. Dawson, whom her father intended to visit.

"I am glad that he is not there, and that the poor woman has got away with her child!" thought Felicia thankfully. "The water has burst open the door, so the furniture must be floating about downstairs. Heavens! What is that?"

She might well ask. At the window there appeared the face of a child, and it was easy to see that the little one was crying and in great fear. What could have happened? Perhaps the poor woman had left the child while she went into the town for something she wanted, and the bairn was left to the mercy of the waters!

There was no one near her, but Felicia did not hesitate; drawing her skirts together so that they should not impede her movements, she waded to the hovel and entered. Her anxiety for the child made her deaf to the dull roar that had arisen in the distance.

"Poor little thing!" she said soothingly, as she picked up the little girl of five. "Has mother gone out? Don't be afraid, I will not let the water come to you!"

She pacified the child, keeping her high in her own arms so that her wet clothes should not touch the little thing, and turned to leave the wooden structure dignified by the name of a house. But she started in dismay as she reached the door. The water was rushing along at a great rate; she knew that a larger gap had been made in the river bank and the Dale would soon be a mighty torrent!

Felicia's heart seemed to stand still. She was forced to retreat into the room or the rush of water would have swept her away on its bosom; but the protection of the hovel could be only temporary.

The water was rising, rising, and she had to get on to the bed in order to keep well above the surface. The wooden structure rocked under the force of the water dashing against it.

Felicia's face grew white; she was no poltroon, but this meant death unless a speedy rescue were effected, and who knew that she was in the house?

"I must get to the window and shout!" she said aloud in her anxiety.

She got off the bed and pulled it with all her might near to the window. She mounted it again, threw up the sash, and cried aloud for help. Her face at the window, with the child's face near it, at once became the object of amazed and pitying eyes directed to the house.

Swish! A great force of water rushed against the structure; it rocked and swayed. A loud cry of fear came from the onlookers, and Felicia felt herself thrown against the wall. The wooden home of the Dawsons had been torn from its base, turned on its side, and was being carried down the roaring stream to the common! It would be dashed to pieces against some stronger erection before it had gone far!

Felicia scrambled to her feet to find that she could sit on the edge of the overturned bed and hold to the window frame, the side of which was now the bottom. The overturned house was floating on its side, the roof acting as the stem of this strange craft. The interior was comparatively free from water, as the house was now on the surface of the racing torrent.

Who would save them? Would they be saved? They were drifted from those who might have aided, and their case seemed hopeless.

She leant as far as she could out of the window; she saw the tops of some small trees as they went past; she looked in the direction from which she had come on the surface of the water, and she saw a man in a boat, coming also with the flow of the stream and rowing at the same time in an effort to go faster. Her eyes dimmed as the well known form met her eyes; it was Philip Harding, and he was risking his life to save hers!

Yes, he was making a heroic effort, the noble deed that would work his redemption! She remembered her words to him only a short time previously.

Would he succeed? He was gaining, gaining, but every now and then a concussion of the overturned house against some weaker object reminded her of what might happen. The house swayed and rocked fearfully, even as it floated along.

Digitized by Google

Bump! Felicia was nearly dragged from her hold on the window by the shock, but she felt thankful when she recovered. Her craft was stopped by a brick built house, and its progress arrested without danger!

She looked towards Philip; he was coming now at a great rate, but her gladness changed to horror as she looked. Close upon him was a huge mass of floating trees, parts of wooden houses, and other débris, the whole forming a formidable mass that would crush anything so frail as a boat or the overturned wooden structure which sheltered her—crush it to matchwood! And this mass was coming direct towards her!

The position of Philip's boat was such that by a few powerful strokes he could have sent it beyond the width of this mass and saved himself; but he saw that Felicia was doomed unless her strange vessel could be got away from the empty brick house that detained it. The mass would then dash against the brick and would probably be arrested. Otherwise, the overturned house would be simply smashed between the brick house and the mass of floating débris!

Felicia understood it all, and she watched Philip pulling hard to get to her before the floating débris could crush her and the child. It was a race for life! Philip must increase the space between himself and the mass in order to gain time enough to cause the overturned house to swing clear of its barrier.

Nearer and nearer he came in his cockleshell of a boat, the mass coming swiftly after him. Would he reach her in time? It was doubtful! And what of Philip himself? He was courting death! Would he reach her before that all-crushing mass ground the life out of her and the child?

Nearer and nearer! Oh, at last he reaches the window! There is time to drag them out! He gave a mighty push with his right-hand oar against the overturned hovel, while his left-hand oar was placed against the brick wall at his back, to act as a supporting base. Hurrah! It moved! He pushed harder; the mass was upon them. A mighty effort and he saw the overturned structure clear of its obstruction and disappearing behind the brick house as the rushing water carried it along once more.

And Philip? Felicia, with glassy eyes and a feeling that she had been turned to stone, saw the mass crash against the frail boat as she passed at the back of the house, and then her view was mercifully obstructed!

Felicia was saved; and Philip, by an act of heroism and self-sacrifice which has scarcely been equalled, had worked out his redemption!

F. Brewster.

SISTER ANNE.

The Tale of a Sacrifice.

"If my thoughts are true," said Wistful Doubt, "he will ask me very soon, perhaps this evening, and I can't say 'No' to him, for I love him above all the world. I couldn't live without him."

"It would not make any difference to Nell," said Sisterly Love, "she could live with us."

"He won't mind that when I tell him of my promise to mother," said Tender Heart.

"But I may be mistaken," cried Wistful Doubt; "why should he love me?"

"I am old, nearly thirty years old," said Despair, "and I am neither beautiful nor rich. And I am not clever."

"They say every woman is beautiful to the man who loves her," suggested Wistful Hope, "and he is as old as I am. And Cupid does not consult the birthday book."

She was so much absorbed in her thoughts that she did not hear the door being opened. Nell entered the room and looked quickly round until she saw the figure of her sister who sat by the window.

The firelight danced fitfully across the floor and seemed to throw out welcome and encouragement to Nell, but it could not reach to the other corner. Anne sat amid the twilight and wove the shadows and the fireshine into her dreams.

It was apparent that Nell had come on a difficult errand. She stood by the door for several minutes, still holding the handle, hesitating whether to enter the room. Then she seemed to muster up courage and walked forward on tip-toe. And at last she stood behind the arm-chair, and, stooping swiftly, kissed her sister upon the cheek.

Anne turned in an instant and looked up with her eyes still warm and tender. And Nell took encouragement from that look and opened out her heart.

"Sister Anne," she murmured, using the old title of nursery days, "I want to ask you something. No, don't turn round, stay just as you are, or I shall never be able to tell you."

"What is the matter?" cried the elder sister in some alarm.

"I want to ask your advice," said Nell doubtfully.

"Yes, but tell me, what is it about?"

Even with the shadows, and the fact that Anne was looking the other way, Nell could scarcely explain herself.

"It's about me," she said, and then added with a sudden glow of courage, "and—and somebody else."

"Yes?"

"Supposing I had fallen in love with that somebody else?"

"Is that what you meant, Nell? Is it really?"

"Yes," said Nell, and was too much occupied to notice the delight with which Anne had received the news.

"Who is it, tell me at once?"

"It's Jack Hamilton."

The hand that Anne had raised to place round her sister's neck fell back upon her lap. She turned and stared stonily through the window, seeing nothing, only conscious of a numb sensation as though her heart were freezing. And Nell, gaining courage now she had made the great avowal, continued her story of happiness.

"He hasn't asked me yet, but I think he will. I've liked him ever so much for a long time, but I thought, somehow, that it was you he came to see."

There was no reply from her sister. Only her hand crept forward again in the darkness and drew Nell down, until their faces lay together.

"I did not know I loved him until yesterday," she continued, "when we met in Barker's Lane. He said he was coming to see us to-night and had something very important to ask me.

"I guessed what he meant, because he's been here so often lately, and he's been so kind to me, and seemed pleased to be with me. But I'm only twenty years old," she added wistfully, "and I may be mistaken. Do you think it is so, Anne, and do you think I ought to say 'Yes' to him?"

Digitized by Google

Then for an instant a picture flashed before Anne's eyes. The picture of a woman who lay dying, and who, with her last breath, confided her younger daughter to the care of the elder one.

"Since you love him," she said quietly, "there is no reason why you should not say 'Yes' to him. And you must try to make him very happy, Nell, for I think he deserves it."

And in this way, quietly and unostentatiously, Anne made the great renunciation of her life.

During the evening the front door bell rang. Nell's arm tightened suddenly round her sister, she quivered for an instant, and then was still. They heard the housemaid passing along the hall.

"Come," said Sister Anne, "let us go to the drawing-room."

Ten minutes later she was back in her former place by the window. She had made some trifling excuse and left them to their happiness.

In that ten minutes the firelight had sunk into a smouldering lethargy with only an occasional leap and sparkle.

As Anne crossed the room and entered the grim shadows that surrounded her chair, she felt as though she, too, had sunk into lethargy, into a life that for the moment was all darkness. And if the Recording Angel noted the tear that presently rolled down her cheek and splashed upon her hand, it was only that it might be made another jewel for her crown of self-sacrifice.

Meanwhile Jack Hamilton closed the door of the drawing-room, and then hurriedly returned to his seat.

"Nell," he said, leaning forward, "will you do something that will help to make me very, very happy?"

"I don't know, it depends."

"It's just this. I've fallen in love with the best and the dearest girl in all England; but I'm afraid to ask her, I'm diffident all at once, and I want you to help me."

"How can I help you? What can I do?" murmured Nell.

"You can tell me if you think I have any chance. Not that I shall cease to love her whatever you say, but if you tell me your sister does not dislike me, or perhaps even likes me a little——"

"My sister—Anne?"

"Yes, do you think——" and then he stopped, for Nell turned suddenly and faced him with a look in her eyes he had never seen there before.

Anne's fondness for dreaming in the twilight, her sudden silence when she heard the name of the man whom Nell loved, her great self-sacrifice for the girl to whom she had been both mother and sister for so many years.

"Oh!" muttered Nell, with a sob in her voice, "I was blind—I should have known! Anne is in the morning-room," she cried, turning to Jack with all her soul shining in tenderness from her eyes. "Go to her now. Ask her. I think she loves you."

Jack was halfway across the room in an instant. Then he turned suddenly and came back and kissed Nell:

"You will live with us after we are married?" he whispered.

"Yes; but go now—she is alone."

Jack made his way to the morning-room. It was almost dark, even the fire had smouldered away. Anne sat alone by the window, and the moonlight creeping in, illuminated her with its own glory. Jack advanced upon tiptoe without knowing why he did so.

Nell was aroused from her reflections five minutes later by hearing the front door closed. She sprang to her feet, ran to the window, pulled aside a corner of the blind. The sudden suspicion that had come into her mind was verified. Jack Hamilton was walking slowly down the steps, with his head bent and his arms swinging listlessly.

She was out of the room and after him in a moment. He turned hurriedly at the sound of her footsteps.

"You were mistaken, Nell," he said gently.

"No, come back with me." She almost dragged him into the drawing-room. "Wait, I will fetch Anne; you must not let her say 'No'—make her say she does not love you."

"She has already said that," said Jack.

But Nell did not hear him. She ran into the other room. It was empty. Anne had disappeared, and the chair by the window looked like something incomplete.

She hurried upstairs to her sister's bedroom, and there she found Anne, and assumed a masterful tone at once.

"You've sent Jack Hamilton away," she protested, "and nearly broke his heart and your own. He loves you, and nobody else, so the sooner you say 'Yes' the better."

"But you?"

"Pooh! Rubbish!" said Nell sturdily; and then she broke down for an instant and flung her arms round her sister's neck and cried, and laughed, and cried again. "You dear old Sister Anne, did you think I would accept such a sacrifice after I knew?

"Won't you let me have my turn now and you say 'Yes'? and, oh! you will make a lovely bride, Anne, with your beautiful brown eyes and your straight nose and the curve of your chin.

"If I were a man, I'd fall in love with you myself. As for my features, they're all right in their way, but they're 'hodd-uns,' as old Thompson told me yesterday. So come downstairs with me at once"—she was coaxing Anne out on to the corridor by this time—"and sit down by the drawing-room fire and we can talk matters over;" they were halfway down the stairs now. "But, of course, it's understood that I won't accept Jack at any price!" and, with this remark, Nell opened the door and ushered her sister into the drawing-room.

She heard two cries of astonishment as she closed the door, and then she ran up to her own room, and was seen no more for half an hour. At the end of that time she descended the stairs, armed with all her native cheerfulness, and solemnly informed Jack that she thought of buying a black tabby to console her for the loss of Sister Anne. Wal Frank.

SHE: "Do you believe that too many cooks spoil the broth?" He: "Yes; far too many."

BERTHA: "And so Edith has made up with Fred? How did it happen?" Albert: "Oh, you see, it was the only way she could have another quarrel with him."

SHE: "But he has such a delightful way of saying things—quite a poetic temperament." He (a rival): "Yes, he has soarings after the infinite, and divings after the unfathomable, but he never pays cash!"

"THERE is only one reason," he said, "why I have never asked you to be my wife." "What is that?" she asked. "I have always been half afraid you might refuse." "Well," she whispered, after a long silence, "I should think you'd have curiosity enough to want to find out whether your suspicion was well-founded or not."

A GENTLEMAN admires a charming widow over whose head seventeen summers have passed at least thrice. "Oh, yes," said one of his friends, "she's very charming, I know; still, you must admit that she is wrinkled." "Wrinkled!" echoes the chivalrous lover. "No, sir. There may be the indelible impression of a smile upon her face here and there, but that is all."

The following Tartans have already appeared on the covers of "Short Stories":

No. 1.—MENZIES ...	Issue dated August 2nd, 1902.
No. 2.—MACPHERSON ...	" " August 16th, 1902.
No. 3.—MACLEOD ...	" " September 13th, 1902.
No. 4.—ROB ROY ...	" " October 4th, 1902.
No. 5.—MACMILLAN ...	" " October 25th, 1902.
No. 6.—MACDONALD of SLEAT	" " November 29th, 1902.
No. 7.—ERSKINE	" " January 3rd, 1903.
No. 8.—CLERGY ...	" " February 7th, 1903.
No. 9.—BRUCE ...	" " April 25th, 1903.

Digitized by Google

Below is Our Great New Serial.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

NAMES TO REMEMBER.

SIR TREVOR MAITLAND, of Maitland Manor, Melton.
LADY MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's second wife. Before her marriage with him she passed as a widow named Mrs. Vernon.
JACK MAITLAND, Sir Trevor s son by his first wife.
AGNES MAITLAND } Jack's sisters.
MURIEL MAITLAND }
WOOLF MAITLAND, the present Lady Maitland's only child.
IVY STRANGE, a foundling with whom Jack is in love.
HERIOT NORTH, a friend of Sir Trevor.
MIKE HOLLAND, an ex-convict and burglar who blackmails Lady Maitland, he having been in prison with her first husband.
MARY MASON, Lady Maitland's maid.
DIGBY SCARLETT, an explorer and acquaintance of Jack. It was through him that Lady Maitland's first husband was imprisoned.
GILBERT CHASE, a detective employed by Jack to discover the mystery of Ivy's birth.
VERNON GRANT, Lady Maitland's first husband.

EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER.

"Good-bye, Sweetheart! Good-bye!"

It was the day of the bal masqué at the Manor, and just two days after Lady Maitland had spoken to the foundling, Ivy Strange, about the honour done her by the new master of the "Rest," in wishing to make her his wife.

Since the occasion when the girl had taken the two letters into the spinny to the waiting man, she had not been up to the Manor, and Muriel and Jack who had called at the lodge had been informed that she had caught a chill. But the second time Jack was not to be sent away when Mrs. Parkins met him with the same excuse.

"Is Ivy in bed, Mrs. Parkins?" he said quietly.

The woman hesitated.

"No, sir; she is sitting in the parlour by the fire. But she seems queer-like—the ghost of her bright self—for all the world as though she 'ad something on 'er mind."

"Then I must see her." Jack spoke firmly; a sense of foreboding stealing over him. It was so uncommon for his bright, winsome little sweetheart to be laid up, that he felt there was something behind it all.

"If she is well enough to sit by the fire, Mrs. Parkins, she is well enough to see me, her future husband."

He strode past her, into the tiny sitting-room that Mrs. Parkins always called the "parlour," and flushed with pained surprise as he saw the face of the silent, listless girl sitting in the one armchair. It had been the face of a happy, joyous child before, now it was the face of a saddened woman; and in the large, violet eyes there lurked a frightened, furtive, look that changed to one of startled love, as they fell upon the figure in the doorway.

"Jack!" she murmured, rising from the chair, and putting out one tremulous hand to steady herself; "you should not have come here!"

He came forward quickly and took her in his arms. "Indeed! That is a very tall order to issue from the lips of my 'princess' to her 'Prince Charming.' I shall begin to think that you don't consider me worthy your heart and hand now, beloved, and have bestowed them on another."

He was not prepared for the result of his tenderly-playful reproach upon the silent girl in his arms.

With a slight cry, she broke away from him, and faced him with quivering lips. "You are right," she said, speaking quickly and in a low, distinct voice; "I have changed my mind. You must not think of me as your—'princess' any longer—only—only—as the girl at the lodge!"

"Ivy! Ivy!" he exclaimed, in bewilderment. "Do you know what you are saying? That you don't love me—your lover! Oh, my darling! You must be playing some cruel joke on me! Testing my love for you!"

She shook her head, dully. "No, I am not joking," she said steadily, speaking with averted eyes. "I am in earnest; I can never—never—marry you. You must not ask me for any reason," she went on hurriedly, "only go—Jack! Leave me, and—forget me!"

He laughed shortly.

"It's not so easy for me to forget as it is for you to cast me off. I have a right to know why I am being treated like this," he said passionately. "I can't believe that two days have changed your love into hate, unless there have been some strange things happening to turn it into another channel!"

"Ah, no!—don't say that!" she cried. "Nothing could ever make me cease to love you; but you must be to me like a beautiful dream I once fancied real."

He went up to her swiftly, and put his hands on her shoulders, looking down into her face with tender eyes.

"Ah, sweetheart! You admit that you love me! What then can come between us? What can ever prevent our love from continuing in the same sweet way as formerly? You are ill and unstrung, my dearest," he went on soothingly; "but you will cheer up when I tell you that you may soon expect some news about the quest you intrusted to me."

She shuddered and drew away from him with frightened eyes. "Don't! Oh, if you have any love for me at all," she cried, clasping her hands together feverishly, "you will do as I ask you in this as in the other thing. In future you can be nothing to me, and I have decided not to—to—trouble about the past. I am content to let things remain in—in oblivion."

She turned away and looked out of the window with misty eyes. She could not trust herself to gaze upon the misery a cruel Fate had demanded that she should bring into the life of the man she loved. It was enough if he let her pass out of his thoughts without the agony of listening to his reproaches.

His voice disturbed her. It sounded harsh, and the ringing note of yesterday had gone from it.

"Then I am to understand that, in spite of your having professed to love me, that it was all pretence—a fraud—of which you are now tired; and that even the parents you longed to meet have lost their value in your eyes, and you have ceased to wish that the secret should be solved?"

She bowed her head, dumb with pain. She dared not let herself speak, unless the agony in her heart betrayed itself in her voice.

"At least," he went on, white with pain, "at least, you will give me some reason for this cruel conduct? Is—is there another man?" And his jealous young eyes were keen to note the wave of colour that scorched her face.

She turned proudly. "Why do you make it harder for me? Can't you see that it hurts me—as much as it does you! There is no other man that I shall ever love—I swear that!"

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

she cried passionately; "but I mean it when I repeat that in future our ways in life lie far apart, and—and there is no mystery to be solved now!"

"No mystery!" he exclaimed. "What do you mean, Ivy? Have you heard——"

"I have heard enough to convince me that I need seek no further!" she said wearily. "Oh, why don't you leave me? I—I can't stand much more!"

"What have you heard?" he said doggedly. "I will not annoy you any further, as soon I know. But all the same I will do what I vowed I would—seek out this mystery for myself!"

"No, no!" she cried piteously. "For my sake, Jack, don't! I know that—that—my father——"

"Ah, Jack! Is that you?" said a clear, musical voice behind them, and, turning quickly, the eyes of the girl and her lover fell upon the radiant figure of Lady Maitland.

"I am surprised to find you here," she said graciously. "I imagined that Ivy was too ill to see anyone. I called to say that I think it will do you good to appear to-night at the fancy dress ball." And her eyes rested on the white, mute face of the girl near the window.

"I came to see Ivy, thinking I had a right to do so!" Jack replied impatiently.

"Ah?" And Lady Maitland raised her brows.

"I have told—Jack——" the girl said slowly, "that our engagement does not exist any longer. I think it wiser for us both to break it off."

A gentle sigh fluttered to the lips of Sir Trevor Maitland's wife.

"But," said Jack, his voice ringing once more with determination, "I will not recognise that decision, Ivy. There is someone behind you, urging you on. I mean to find out who it is! You love me; you have just confessed that you can never love another man; and with that knowledge I mean to fight out this mystery by myself. Good-bye, little sweetheart!" he said tenderly; "although your lips deny me—your heart does not!"

With one lingering look he turned on his heel and left the lodge, his love wounded more than he cared to own before the cold, proud wife of his father.

"Come," said her ladyship sharply, after a long pause; "don't mope in that way, girl! I wish you to come up to the Manor to-night and enjoy yourself. It will do you good!" She hesitated, then said slowly, "I hope you have told nothing of the confidence I have reposed in you, to—Jack?"

The girl flushed. "No," she replied, in a low voice, "I have told him nothing, Lady Maitland. Of course, knowing what I do, I would never marry him to bring disgrace upon him."

"But," said her ladyship slowly, "I would strongly advise you to marry Digby Scarlett, because he not only happens to know of your parentage—but he loves you, in spite of it."

"Oh, please, Lady Maitland!" cried the girl, "don't talk to me about anyone else—just yet. You don't think what this has cost me. I—I—can't stand any more now!"

"Very well!" said Lady Maitland gently; "I will leave you to think over what I have said, and I expect you to be at the Manor this evening. Remember, Ivy, I will have no nonsense; shake off this foolish infatuation, and be thankful that you have the chance of marrying well, in spite of your—unfortunate birth!"

She sailed out of the room, said a few smiling words to the curtsying Mrs. Parkins, and, stepping into the carriage that had waited for her, drove away.

As she leant back against the padded sides of the luxurious brougham, Lady Maitland smiled grimly.

"I am glad this has happened, after all," she murmured. "My star is in the ascendant once more. I had begun to fancy otherwise! The girl will be like wax in my hands, and he will win the rustic bride he covets!"

The drive was thickly studded by huge trees on either side, and the late December afternoon was dark and gloomy, causing her ladyship to draw her fur closer round her with a slight shiver.

Suddenly, from out of the darkness, a shadow seemed to spring. It paused a moment by the side of the carriage that had come to an abrupt standstill, owing to the shying of the horses, and a long, lean hand flung a piece of paper into one of the half-open windows, where it fluttered on to the knee of the woman seated among her furs.

"What is the matter, Denton?" said Lady Maitland sharply to the coachman. "Has anything happened?"

"No, my lady," replied the man; "only a tramp frightened the 'orses."

She sank back with a sigh, then her hand came in contact with the scrap of paper on her knee.

"What is this?" she thought idly; and under the light of the carriage-lamp she opened it slowly with dainty fingers.

A few moments later, when the brougham stopped in front of the entrance hall of the Manor, the woman who stepped out of it looked strangely pale and worn, while in her eyes there shone a haggard, desperate gleam.

NINETEENTH CHAPTER.
Lady Maitland's Double.

The bal masqué was nearing its height at eleven, and every beautiful room in the Manor was flooded with brilliant electric light, and the notes of the Blue Hungarian Band floated through the windows out into the grounds. A temporary marquee had been erected outside the porch of the Manor, in order to shelter the guests from the gale as they left their carriages.

Sir Trevor Maitland's lovely wife was, as usual, the belle of the ball. Never before had her eyes shone so softly, or her low laugh been so infectious. Over her pale green tulle gown she had a domino of turquoise blue brocade, the daring combination of colour setting off her imperious style of beauty, and drawing all eyes upon her.

Heriot North came up to her as, for a brief moment, she stood alone, gazing upon the moving mass of faces with an absent smile.

"You seem to have gathered together a bevy of fair women and brave men," he said, lightly, his eyes lingering on the curves of mouth and throat of the woman he had met too late in life.

"Fair women are easy to find," she laughed. "but brave men are becoming more rare each day!"

"Don't say that!" he broke in eagerly. "I am ready to prove myself brave, if you wish it!"

"Perhaps I may test you—soon," she answered lightly, an undercurrent of earnestness making her voice slightly uneven.

As he moved away unwillingly, to claim a partner, Lady Maitland sent a strange look after him.

"Perhaps—to-night, even," she murmured under her breath. "But how to make him understand, without betraying—all! I must think of a way out! Fool that I was to have sent that letter to the wretched convict! Now he is doubly blackmailing me! But to-night will see the end of his triumph!"

"May I speak to you, alone, for a few seconds?" said someone behind her, and although in the costume of a gentleman of Louis XVI.'s reign, and masked, she recognised the voice of Digby Scarlett.

"Is it important?" she answered shortly.

He smiled: "Does Lady Maitland imagine that I would seek a private audience with her for a frivolous reason?"

"Follow me," she said coldly, replacing her mask; and, preceding him, she slowly moved among her guests, exchanging compliments and graceful speeches with one and the other, until she reached her boudoir.

Digby Scarlett closed the door softly.

"Tell me," he said abruptly, "have you persuaded that girl to give up her boy lover?"

She bowed her head: "Yes; I put it to her that with her ignominious birth it would be wrong to let him marry her. She apparently has fallen in with my suggestion!"

Digitized by Google

A peculiar smile lit up the evil eyes of her guest as he said, slowly:

"So you impressed her with her obscure parentage, did you? That—that was clever of you! Did you also say that it would be advisable for her to look upon me as her future husband?"

"Yes," she replied coldly; "but I think—if I may suggest it," she added maliciously, "that you would stand a better chance of winning the girl were you to wait until she has got over the—the break with her lover! She is young, and her first love affair is sure to harden her heart against the second—at first!"

"Ah!" he sneered, his white teeth showing in a sarcastic grin, "I presume you speak from the wine-press of your own experience, Lady Maitland! But I don't choose to bide my time. I have spent my life in too much dallying. Now the last leaf in the laurel of my patience is nearly mine!" he cried exultantly. "I have done with waiting!"

She looked at him curiously.

"Why have you set your heart on that foundling? I should have thought a man of your nature would have wished to make a good marriage. There is Muriel, for instance."

He laughed harshly: "Don't be afraid, Lady Maitland, I am more than satisfied with my choice—more than proud of the lovely foundling. But," he went on, in a lower tone, "don't you dare to play me false; stick to your part of the bargain, my lady, and I will stick to mine. Is the girl here? I want to see her!"

Lady Maitland opened her mouth to answer him, when suddenly, through her mask, her eyes grew fixed with horror, and the words on her lips died away in an incoherent gurgle.

"What's the matter?" said Scarlett quickly; "can I do anything for you?"

"No—no!" she murmured, waving him off. "I am subject to these attacks; they seize me suddenly. You asked me if the girl was in the Manor," she went on hastily; "yes, she is. I told my maid to give her a domino and mask. She is probably with Muriel in the ball-room."

When he left the room Lady Maitland went up to the window and stared through with anxious eyes. The blinds had not been drawn, and only a moment ago she fancied that a sallow face with cruel, mocking eyes, had been watching her. It had vanished as soon as she had turned her head, but the memory of it made her shiver.

"Suppose he had seen it!" she muttered. "He would have recognised it as the face of the beggar he had seen that same day he met Ivy in the wood! So my blackmailer is growing bolder!" She shut her teeth with a sharp click. "To-night, at half-past eleven! I can easily slip away; we do not unmask till twelve! I shall be back by that time!"

She mingled among her guests for a brief period, then glided to her room. On the threshold she met Ivy, looking white and sad-eyed.

"You here still, child!" she said in surprise, noting with vexation the girl's listless manner.

"Yes, Lady Maitland," the girl murmured, flushing. "My head was aching and I stayed here to be quiet, and finished mending the lace you gave me to do."

Lady Maitland looked at her suspiciously.

"Have you been talking to Jack?" she said coldly.

"I have not seen him," Ivy replied, lifting her head and flashing a proud look into her ladyship's face.

"That is well," she said slowly. "I am glad you have shown some commonsense, because Mr. Scarlett informs me that he desires to marry you as soon as possible!"

"No! no!" the girl gasped hoarsely. "I cannot marry him! I cannot!"

"Hush, you little fool!" said her ladyship, in a low voice. "If you do not choose to marry him, then resign yourself to ruining the life of the man you profess to love!"

Ivy raised her head, fear shining out of her pain-stricken eyes.

"What do you mean?" she whispered. "He, my—the man in the wood—has been nearly paid—now!"

Lady Maitland made a gesture of contempt. "The man in the wood is not the man to fear—for Jack. But," she lowered her voice cautiously, "Digby Scarlett holds a certain paper of Jack's that, if he produced it, would bring sorrow and shame on Sir Trevor. Now you know why he has been silent about it, because he fell in love with you!"

"Surely Jack would do nothing wrong?" the girl panted; "he is the soul of honour!"

A sneer played round the mouth of her ladyship. "Most men are till they are found out! But you—the foundling, brought up by charity instead of being sent to the workhouse—ought at least to sacrifice yourself for the sake of the man who has given you the education and surroundings of refinement."

"How cruel you are!" the girl moaned; "cannot you pity me also? Am I not suffering as well?"

"You are young," replied the older woman coldly, whose beauty was just a trifle more mature than that of the girl before her "and youth can survive a great deal! But come," she continued in a kinder tone "you must remember that I have made you my confidant and that I look to you to help me to keep Sir Trevor in ignorance of what might be a fatal shock did he get to know! Now you must go downstairs and mix with the guests; but first have you a domino to wear?"

Ivy shook her head. The grim irony of decking herself up for a fancy dress ball while her heart was aching and burning with the intensity of suppressed emotion, struck her with a sense of unreality.

Lady Maitland rang her bell: "Félice, bring out a domino for Miss Strange, and a mask."

The maid looked puzzled: "Dere is none dat I can find, milady" she said "only ze one like dat your ladyship 'as on!"

Her mistress' eyes dilated with a sudden thought.

"Ah! Then bring it here for Miss Strange. It is lucky that I thought about having two!"

When the woman had helped the silent girl into the fellow to the domino that her mistress was wearing, Lady Maitland laughed softly.

"Now you really look something like me, Ivy!" she exclaimed. "Here is your mask and here is a string of pearls to wear! Go down," she continued. "and I will follow you shortly. And," she touched the girl's arm warningly, "remember I trust you to try and listen to Mr. Scarlett, should you see him—for Jack's sake—and his father's!"

When Ivy had left the room, Lady Maitland laughed again.

"That girl is a most useful 'dummy'! In that cloak and mask she will effectually pass for my double, and I fancy I have frightened her into submission this time!"

She turned the key in the lock, then hastily took off her blue domino and exchanged it for a black ulster; then from a drawer she drew a dark wig, with which she covered her own bright hair; afterwards winding round her head a black woollen hood that partially concealed her face.

She went to the door, then turned back.

"They say it is unlucky to turn back!" she thought; "but not in my case. I shall take my luck with me!"

She opened another drawer—this time in her escritoire—and took out the small, shining thing she had kept so long in her possession.

"You will help me—perhaps—who knows!" she murmured. Then, with whitening lips, she switched off the electric light, opened her door, stole swiftly along the corridor, and down the kitchen stairs that led out by a side door into the garden.

* * *

"Ivy, darling, I have waited to speak to you—hung round here in this miserably gay house just for the chance of meeting you, my cruel little love, and to implore you to tell me that you were joking with me this morning when you said that all was over between us!" And Jack Maitland, cloaked and masked, as the occasion demanded, drew the shrinking figure of his sweetheart into the conservatory.

Digitized by Google

"Don't, Jack!" said the girl, in a low, frightened voice, nervously playing with the mask in her hand. "I told you this afternoon that it could never be the same between us—never; and—and—I do not wish it to be!" she added slowly. "I made a mistake in thinking that it could."

"Then you care for someone else?" and his cold, even tones struck a chill to the heart of the girl.

"No!" she murmured, "but—but—oh, Jack, can't you see that I have a strong reason to make me break my word? Don't torture me, dear. I have enough to bear without that."

He released her slowly. "And you won't tell me your reason for refusing to let me go on with the inquiry about your parentage?"

"I cannot," she said faintly. "It will be useless; don't ask me any more. I—I——"

She paused, a sudden movement among the palms stopping the words on her lips.

TWENTIETH CHAPTER.

The Shot in the Night.

"MISS STRANGE is engaged to me—now, Maitland," said a voice behind them, and Digby Scarlett, mask in hand, stepped forward into the light.

"You?" said Jack, speaking thickly. "You lying scoundrel! How dare you, after the lesson I gave you some time ago, trespass upon this lady and myself? If you don't instantly apologise I shall kick you out!"

"Then I appeal to Miss Strange," the other man laughed sneeringly. "She will inform you that I am no lying scoundrel in saying she is to be my wife!"

Jack seized the girl with trembling hands. The veins on his brow were standing out like cords, swollen and discoloured.

"Deny this man's presumptuous lie, darling," he gasped. "Prove that he is wilfully insulting you!"

"I cannot!" she moaned. "It is not a lie!"

Digby Scarlett laughed exultantly. "There you are, Maitland! Ivy has told you that I am perfectly right in claiming her as my future wife. You had better apologise for your rudeness!"

"Does this mean that you love—that creature?" Jack said in a low voice, to the girl leaning heavily against him, and whose cold hands clung wildly to him.

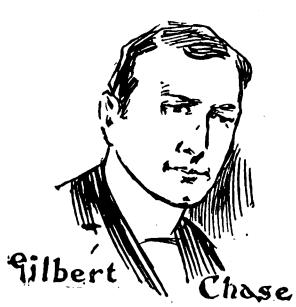
"No!" she gasped. "I don't love him—but—I am going to marry him. I love you, Jack—now and always!"

Her hands fell from his, and she would have fallen had he not caught her to him and held her tightly.

"Come," said Digby Scarlett roughly, "she has owned to being my promised wife, it is my place to take her from you if she has fainted!"

He took a step forward, but the light in the boy's eyes made him hesitate.

"I am taking her back to the house," said Jack, in a strained, peculiar voice, "but I shall have much pleasure in meeting you in the wood afterwards, and giving you any satisfaction you may desire. I am more than willing to risk my future chances of salvation, to save the woman I love from a living death with a man she hates!"



Across the body of the unconscious girl he shot a defiant look at the man who had stepped between them, and the meaning of that glance sent a cold shiver through the man who had betrayed his friend a second time.

"As you will!" he said, with a sneer. "It matters not who takes her now. She belongs to me, and will do so to the end! I will meet you in the wood later, and we will there finish our discussion satisfactorily!"

He left the conservatory by the door leading into the grounds, and disappeared in the shadows that led up to the Manor. As he entered the hall a quiet-looking man gazed after him.

"So that is Mr. Digby Scarlett, is it?" he muttered. "I don't remember his face, but the moment the woman 'Mason' mentioned his name the other day, I knew where I had heard it before. It's strange his coming down here after all this time! I wonder if he ever thinks of the occasion when his evidence sent his friend to 'chokey!'"

Some moments later, Gilbert Chase met Jack Maitland clad in ordinary garb walking down the drive.

The ball was at its height, and the dominos and masks lent an aid to wearied souls in escaping from the gaiety that cloyed.

"Ah, I just wanted a few words with you, Chase!" he said. "I don't think there is any necessity for you to stay longer in Melton now. I am more than half inclined to give up the inquiry on which I started you!"

"How's that?" ejaculated the detective shortly. "Do you mean, sir, that I am to throw it up?"

"Yes," said the young fellow impatiently. "I—I—am no longer engaged to Miss Strange, and she has requested me to cease seeking out the past."

Gilbert Chase was silent. He was thinking of a few nights ago, when he had overheard a conversation between a man and a girl. Then, when they had gone, he had searched about with the aid of matches, and picked up one or two pieces of paper now in his pocket.

"Let me see, sir?" he said slowly. "What is the name of the young lady?"

"Ivy Strange," Jack replied curtly.

"Ah! So she does not wish you to look any more for her parents?" the man went on slowly. "It sounds almost as though she may have heard something—or just knew something—not quite nice about them! On the other hand, sir, she may have someone behind her, making her break off with you, to serve some purpose of their own!"

Jack clutched the detective's arm tightly.

"By Jove! that's it, Chase, and I believe it's that brute Scarlett who is at the bottom of it all!"

"Humph!" murmured Gilbert Chase. "Then you think that Mr. Scarlett is after her, and frightening her?"

"I do," replied the boy firmly. "And I have changed my mind now, Chase. We—you and I—will fight this out for ourselves, and find out whether there is any false play going on. For marry Scarlett she shall not! I would kill him first!"

"I don't think we need go so far as that, sir," smiled the detective, "but I certainly agree with you in satisfying ourselves."

Jack laughed recklessly. "Leave no stone unturned, Chase. Digby Scarlett can know nothing about Ivy Strange. He only came here a little over a month ago, through my wretched instrumentality," he said bitterly. "Fool that I was to bring him! But to-night I have something to say to Mr. Scarlett—alone!"

As he strode away the detective sent an anxious glance after him. "Hot-headed and impulsive! I hope the boy will do nothing rash! It's just as well that I did not tell him all I heard in the spinny! As to my old friend Mike Holland being a loving father, well, I must find out a little more before I express my opinion!"

He stood for a moment looking through the window into the ball-room, where all was brilliancy and laughter. "It's well to be Lady Maitland," he said. "All this wealth and her own beauty should make any woman happy!"

As he walked thoughtfully away he murmured, "Yes, she is a very fortunate lady! It's strange I haven't seen her since that day outside the post office!"

Suddenly he stopped.

What was that loud, sharp report that sent an unexpected thrill through the lean body of the detective? Surely there were poachers in the spinny, or—and a damp moisture burst out on his brow.

Digitized by Google

"He could not have been so mad—so reckless!" he muttered. "There was nothing to gain by it, yet I saw him go off in the direction of the wood!"

He hurried his steps into a quick run—the old instinct of the hound and fox gaining the ascendency. As he neared the spinny, some ten minutes later, a second shot rang out clearly, then a third, and an instant later a shape, blurred and shadowy, collided with that of the detective.

It was pitch dark, and he could only distinguish a mass of hair under a shawl, and hear the panting breath of the frantic creature as she tried to drag her arm out of his grasp.

"Who are you?" he said loudly. "What are you doing here, and why are you running away?"

The woman did not speak, and the man's hand still held her wrist firmly, while he attempted to strike a light with the other. Suddenly the woman bent her head, and before Gilbert Chase knew what had happened, her teeth had met in his flesh, sending a sharp, stinging pain up his arm, and he involuntarily let her go, with an exclamation. As he did so she swiftly ran into the darkness and disappeared, leaving the baffled detective ruefully binding up his hand with his handkerchief.

"All right!" he muttered grimly. "I'll have you yet, my black-haired vixen! I managed to leave a mark on your soft arm that I shall recognise anywhere!"

TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

"I Claim your Promise."

THE hour of midnight had struck, and instantaneously the word went forth, "Unmask!" In the centre of the ballroom Sir Trevor Maitland's lovely wife stood, receiving the congratulations of her guests, and listening to their flatteries and platitudes. Only a very close observer would have noticed the slight quiver of her short upper lip, and that the blue domino rose and fell with her quickened breathing almost as though the mistress of Maitland Manor had been hurrying.

"I'm sorry you felt faint a short time ago, dear!" said Sir Trevor, coming up to his wife solicitously.

"How did you know that, Trevor?" she replied, smiling on him archly. "I thought I had kept it a secret!"

"So you had," he answered, "but I saw Jack coming out of your dressing-room and closing the door, as I was passing along the corridor. I stopped and asked him what was the matter, and he told me he had taken you to your dressing-room, as you felt suddenly faint, and did not wish to be disturbed for a short time, so I went downstairs to entertain our guests."

Lady Maitland could have laughed aloud as she listened to her husband's words. Her trick had succeeded even better than she had anticipated, for in the fellow domino to her own, and masked, she guessed that Jack had had a scene with Ivy, who had fainted, and in desperation the boy had carried his sweetheart into her dressing-room, the blue domino, like her own, aiding him in shielding the girl from his father's questions! So he had innocently proved an alibi—should she require one!

She looked round keenly, but among the unmasked faces of her guests she failed to see either Digby Scarlett or Jack.

Where were they? she wondered, with a quickening of her breath. Had the faint of that girl been brought about by a quarrel with the two men, or were they in the supper-room?

She moved slowly towards the door, attracted by a small crowd that seemed to have collected, and as she drew nearer she heard such expressions as "Give him air!" "Send for the doctor quickly!" and calls for some ice.

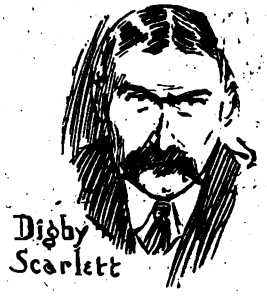
"What is it?" she said hurriedly, parting the crowd with hasty hands, and leaning forward, she saw, lying still and white, with an ugly wound on his temple from which the blood was trickling down his face and matting his hair, the elder son and heir of her husband!

"Jack!" she exclaimed; "oh, my poor boy! How did this happen?"

She knelt down and took his head on her knee, looking a lovely picture of the "ministering angel," as she bent over the prostrate form.

"Where did this awful thing happen?" she said again, raising her voice. "Surely poachers would not dare!"

"No, my lady," said a respectful voice behind her; "it was no poachers that did this to Mr. Maitland. I heard the shot myself, and found him unconscious in the spinny."



Lady Maitland slowly turned her head; her eyes were partially veiled by the fringe of dark lashes, and the sudden contraction of her pupils at the sound of the voice that had come from the group of sympathisers, was unnoticed. She saw a slim, insignificant-looking man, with gentle blue eyes and a deprecating manner, yet in the firmly closed mouth there lay a suspicion of dormant strength of purpose.

Sir Trevor Maitland's wife shivered—then smiled. She recognised the man as the stranger whom she had seen some time ago entering Jack's den.

"Ah," she murmured quietly. "Then you have an idea regarding the personality of the creature who did this?"

The man smiled strangely. "Yes, your ladyship," he replied, "I have an idea that it was no man who shot Mr. Maitland."

"No man?" she exclaimed bewildered. "Then whom do you suspect?"

"A woman, your ladyship," replied the man calmly, reaching out his hand, round which was a dirty handkerchief, and speaking in a clear, ringing voice; "the same she-fiend that did this to me, struck at Mr. Maitland!"

Beneath the burnished curls on Lady Maitland's white brow a few drops of moisture trickled, cementing the tiny chestnut rings of hair on to her forehead.

"I am distressed to hear this!" she murmured regretfully; "I can hardly imagine that my step-son would have an enemy. But if you have a clue to this woman's identity, I hope you will do your utmost to track her to her punishment!"

The group of frightened guests had gradually melted away, and carriages soon bore them down the drive from the scene of the tragedy; and only a few servants lingered in the vicinity of the stricken family, awaiting the arrival of the doctor.

Suddenly, above the sound of voices, there rang out a cry that startled and thrilled the hearers with different emotions; and before the amazed listeners could intervene, a slim, girlish figure in black, with a strained, white face, and fear-laden eyes, had flung herself down beside the prostrate body of Jack Maitland.

"Oh, my dearest!" she cried wildly; "they tell me you are dead—dead! And I was not by your side to receive one look of pardon, one glance of love! They have killed your body, as they killed our happiness! Now I shall have two horrors to haunt me—a murdered heart, and a murdered love! Oh, my dear! my dear!"

Her words trailed off into a moan, and her hands sought the still face of the boy who had been her lover. Suddenly she spoke again, and this time her words arrested the attention of the man who had brought Jack Maitland to the house.

"Forgive me, dear! I know who killed you! I know who has taken you from me! Now I will tell——"

"Child!" And a firm white hand on the girl's shoulder made her glance up fearfully into Lady Maitland's face. "Come, dear," her ladyship continued gently; "you are unstrung and shocked by what has happened; but your fears are exaggerated. Poor Jack is not dead, only very dangerously wounded; and you will make yourself ill if you do not control your grief."

Under Lady Maitland's even tone of reason the girl was silent, but the mild blue eyes of Gilbert Chase saw a strange light flash into her fevered eyes as she shrank beneath the gentle touch of the low-voiced woman who sought to comfort her.

Digitized by Google

"Not dead?" she murmured. "Jack not dead! Tell me, are you playing with me, or did——"

She stopped suddenly, as on her delicate shoulder she felt the slight fingers of her ladyship's hand.

"I will see that you are told everything that is wise and right for you to know, dear," said Lady Maitland slowly; "only you must obey me, now, and go to bed. Muriel will let you share her room, and I will have a message sent down to the lodge that you are staying with us. Come!"

She half led, half carried the resistless girl from the room, followed by the puzzled glance of Gilbert Chase.

When she returned from handing Ivy over to Muriel, she found the doctor had been and pronounced the wound to Jack's head serious, with possible complications, but luckily, though there was danger of brain fever ensuing, everything depended upon quiet and good nursing.

Lady Maitland gave all the necessary orders with a promptitude and conciseness that filled everyone with admiration. As she returned to the now deserted ball room, she came face to face with Gilbert Chase.

"The doctor is here," she said graciously; "would you not like to have your hand attended to? It may be a bad cut!"

He smiled, flattered by the interest of the great lady.

"Thank you, your ladyship; I don't fancy I shall feel it after a time. It is not a cut, but—a bite; which I shall not forget!"

Before she could make any remark, he said. "Could your ladyship tell me if there was a woman that bore Mr. Maitland a grudge?"

She shook her head. "I cannot. He was a most lovable boy! I can imagine no one wishing him harm. But are you certain that you passed no one else in the spinny besides that woman you saw? The neighbourhood has been troubled with burglars lately."

"I shall visit the spinny to-night, my lady," he said gravely. "I am Detective-Sergeant Chase of Scotland Yard," he introduced himself formally, making the announcement of his calling with a quiet dignity; "and no stone shall be left unturned to clear this up!"

"The spinny to-night!" she murmured; "but in that case, Mr. Chase, I insist upon your having some sandwiches and something to drink first. You may have a long ordeal awaiting you, and your strength needs keeping up to the mark."

She touched a bell, and gave instructions for the detective's refreshment, which he had not the courage to refuse, but as her ladyship was preparing to leave the room, the voice of Gilbert Chase recalled her:

"Forgive me, your ladyship; but may I ask if that—that young lady was anything particular to Mr. Maitland? She struck me as being unusually upset."

Lady Maitland smiled slightly. "Oh, that is the child of the lodgekeeper. She has been brought up a great deal with my step-children, and feels their troubles as her own. I do not fancy there is anything between them. She is apt to get hysterical at times and exaggerate matters."

Once outside the door, Sir Trevor Maitland's wife raised her right arm for an instant, moved a piece of black velvet that was fastened just above her wrist, and smiled slightly, before once again dropping it behind the folds of her domino, which she was still wearing instead of putting it on one side with her mask, as her guests had done.

"Please, your ladyship, Mr. Scarlett would like to speak to you," said a voice suddenly, and Mason, who seemed to have sprung from the earth, stood in front of her mistress, with a demure expression on her hard face.

"Where is Mr. Scarlett, Mason?" she said. "In one of the supper-rooms?"

"Yes, your ladyship," the woman replied; "I left him in the blue supper-room."

"Where is Sir Trevor?"

"With the doctor and Miss Muriel, your ladyship."

As Lady Maitland moved away, the woman looked after her with a vindictive gleam in her black eyes. "You're a sharp one!" she muttered, "those who wanted to catch you napping would have to sit up all night! But I'll get even with you one day, my lady!"

"Ah!" said Digby Scarlett, coming forward quickly, as Lady Maitland entered the room that had so recently been the scene of so much life and gaiety. "I am glad you have been able to spare me a few moments. I have come to ask you to convey to Sir Trevor my deep sympathy with him in the sudden bereavement that has fallen upon him!"

He spoke loudly, and Heriot North, who had hurried into the room excitedly, was struck by the apparent feeling in the voice of the man for whom he had entertained so little liking.

Lady Maitland turned quickly. "Ah, Mr. North," she said prettily, "will you go and see whether the man who brought poor Jack in wishes to make any more inquiries in the house before going back to the spinny?"

He assented readily to do her bidding, and she followed him to the door, leaving Digby Scarlett in the centre of the room, glaring after them with a sinister expression in his eyes.

"Keep that man in the Manor on any pretext!" she whispered; "until I have seen you in my boudoir. I will not be long!"

With a glance of tender chivalry into her face, he bowed his head, and Lady Maitland smilingly turned again to Digby Scarlett.

"I think there is a slight error, Mr. Scarlett," she said slowly. "Jack was carried in with a fearful wound in his head, and——"

"Is dead?" he interrupted quickly, his eyes glittering with a strange light.

She shook her head, and approaching him swiftly, said in a low tone: "No, he still lives, and good nursing will pull him through—perhaps! Someone bungled to-night, Mr. Scarlett!"

He started, and his dark face grew livid with a momentary fear and rage as he read her meaning.

"Not dead!" he muttered; then burst into a bitter laugh.

"I see, my condolences came too soon! But what makes your ladyship so anxious for him to live? Out of the way, my path—and yours—would be clearer; and the heir would be—your son, Woolf!"

For an instant their eyes met, hers with a fearful understanding in them—those of the man with the smile of the tempter lurking in their depths.

Suddenly she flung out her hand, as though to beat off the presence of evil.

"No, no!" she gasped, with trembling lips. "Not that—not that! I——"

She stopped, and her eyes gazed fascinated upon the lace ruffle of his fancy coat that he was still wearing, that of a gentleman of France.

"What is that?" she said hoarsely; "that stain!"

With an oath he tore off the ruffle and flung it into the fire; then turned to her savagely.

"I upset some claret a short time ago!" he snarled. "Your ladyship seems haunted by the colour!"

She shuddered and drew back.

"What do you mean! What—colour?"

He laughed, and leaning forward, whispered. "We are both in the same boat, my Lady of Maitland Manor! If you betray me, I can betray you—doubly! You hear! Doubly! So I warn you to remember that you and I run side by side; neither can get ahead of the other; we are comrades in——"

Digitized by Google

The last word was barely breathed, but the face of Sir Trevor Maitland's wife grew strangely haggard and pale as she listened.

"I am going now," Digby Scarlett said abruptly; and without waiting for a response he left the room.

Outside the window a pair of gentle blue eyes looked curiously at the woman standing under the electric light.

"Her ladyship seems to feel it very much," the owner of the eyes muttered, walking away. "She's got a tender heart for others. But I wonder where I could have seen a face like hers before? I shall remember soon—that girl——"

He stopped, and drawing under a light that fell from one of the windows of the still brilliantly lit Manor, he opened a small notebook and read something that appeared to puzzle him.

"Now that young lady who said such wild words is what I should have imagined his sweetheart to be like! But this description of the girl I have sent up to town is that of the one I saw standing in the window! Quite pretty, but ordinary looking! And it will be some time before I can talk to him about the affair, poor chap—if I do then!"

* * * * *

"You see, I have waited as you commanded!" And Heriot North advanced towards Lady Maitland with an eager smile, that faded as he saw the white, pallid face of the woman who gazed up at him with burning eyes.

"Ah!" he said quickly, "you are ill; this untimely accident to poor Jack has been too much for you."

She made a gesture of impatience. "I am not ill," she replied slowly, "and it is not of—Jack—that I am thinking; but of something far more important, something that means life or death—honour or dishonour—and I look to you—the one man I can trust—to turn the tide of my misfortunes into the waters of peace and honour again. Do not refuse me!" she cried passionately. "You have given me your word—your sacred promise—you cannot withdraw it. I claim it now, and for all time!"

Madly, and with all the fascination of which she was so completely the mistress, she flung her appeal at his feet, and, dazzled, bewildered, wholly carried away by the force of her speech and the beauty of her face, he yielded, and listened to her words of wild intreaty.

"Why am I to do this in the dark?" he said. "Won't you give me your confidence—fully?"

She smiled wearily. "One day—you shall know—perhaps. I can say no more now!"

Just when the dawn was breaking in a dull, cloudy sky, two men were stooping in horror over two different things that struck a chill to their hearts, and sent a clammy moisture to their brows.

One was Heriot North. He was burning some things in a paper, and as the heat of the fire opened the parcel, he saw a handkerchief, dirty with dark stains, and a pair of pale green evening slippers, caked with mud, that he remembered having seen in their pristine daintiness.

"Great Heavens!" he exclaimed. "I am mad! This cannot be—it's monstrous!"

Then, with a sudden fear, he dug the poker into the flames, and stood over them till nothing remained in the grate but ashes; and with them was a man's honour, lying charred with the blackness of a harrowing doubt.

The other man was Gilbert Chase; and in the sullen grey of the early morning he recoiled from some inert bundle he had come across in his wanderings in the spinny. He stirred it with his foot; it was strangely unresponsive; and, with a tightening of his breath, he turned it over, where the light could fall full on it.

Then, with a stifled cry, he started back. For the face of the "thing" he had found so strangely was the face of the ex-convict, Mike Holland—hideous and awful in death, as in life; and by his side, the brown earth was stained a dark, ominous red!

(Another long instalment next week.)

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS

THE FAMOUS HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

THE PILLS

have gained their wonderful reputation by sheer force of merit, because every person who uses them recommends them to others. They have positively no equal for thoroughly cleansing the system and putting the liver and kidneys in functional order, without pain or griping. They are the best known remedy for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, and the common condition of ill-health, known as "run-down" or "out of sorts." Females of every age find Holloway's Pills an invaluable remedy and aid.

THE OINTMENT

is known throughout the world as positively the best and quickest remedy for Bad Legs, Old Wounds and Sores, and Skin Eruptions of every kind, and should be used in conjunction with the Pills. It is also the speediest remedy for Rheumatism, Lumbago, Pains and Stiffness in the Limbs and Joints, Backache, &c. For pains and Soreness at the Chest, and for Throat and Lung Complaints arising from Cold or Weakness, Holloway's Ointment affords most welcome relief in a very short time.

A COMPLETE DISPENSARY IN THEMSELVES.

AND OINTMENT

Digitized by Google

The Real Ending.

The Story of a Shattered Romance.

"So this winds the thing up, does it, Miss Angus?"

"It does, Mr. Penton."

"And you haven't any explanation to give?"

"What explanation do you want? I have told you I wished to break off the engagement because it has become irksome to me. Isn't that enough?"

Algernon Penton, with a low bow, turned upon his heel and walked out. When the door had closed upon his retreating form the young woman sank nervelessly into a chair.

"The stupid wretch!" she exclaimed. "He ought to have had more sense than to take me at my word!"

Suddenly she stooped to the floor, picked up a small ivory tablet that had dropped from Algernon's pocket, pressed it passionately to her lips, bowed her head upon her hands, and sobbed aloud.

* * * * *

Years had passed. The afternoon sun was gilding the pretentious spires and cupolas of a small town when a middle-aged man with a bag in his hand opened the gate in front of a modest, but neat and well-built house, walked briskly up the steps and knocked at the door.

A lady answered the knock—a lady well-preserved but no longer young.

The stranger bared his head. His hair was beginning to turn grey, but time had evidently dealt with him leniently, and care had left no deep traces on his brow. He spoke:

"Is the gentleman of the house—am I dreaming? Isn't this Elsie Angus? Or, rather"—and he smiled, "isn't this the lady that was once Miss Elsie Angus?"

"I am Miss Angus," she answered, "and you are Algernon Penton. I recognised you as soon as I saw you. Won't you come in?"

"Well, well!" said the middle-aged traveller, as he sat in an easy chair in the front parlour a few minutes later, and looked with interest at the face of the lady, "who would have thought of meeting you here? And you tell me you are still Miss Angus? Is this your home?"

"It is my brother's. He is a widower. I keep house for him."

"And you have never married?"

"No."

"How have you prospered?"

"I—I have no reason for complaint. And you?"

"I have had a great many hard knocks, Elsie—Miss Angus—since we last met. By the way, we parted rather unceremoniously, didn't we?"

The lady sighed.

"And I have always felt that I owed you an apology," he continued, "for not sending your photograph back after you had returned mine, but the fact is," he went on awkwardly, "I—er—couldn't find it. It had got lost somehow."

Miss Angus sighed again.

"That reminds me," pursued Mr. Penton, "that I lost a little book-slate the last evening I was at your house. I must have dropped it out of my pocket in some way. It wasn't of any particular value, and I don't know when I have thought of it before, but the recollection of it happened to occur to me just now. It was a little black book-slate, with——"

"I think it was an ivory tablet."

"No, I am quite positive it was a little black book-slate."

"I am sure it was a white tablet."

Going to the mantel she opened a plush-lined jewel-case and took out a little ivory tablet.

"Here it is," she said.

"And you have kept it all these years?" exclaimed Mr. Penton.

"Yes."

"I see I was mistaken. But to change the subject. Do you consider yourself—aw—settled in life? Have you no—no plans for the—for the future?"

"Why, I——"

She paused, and her visitor proceeded:

"In a sense, I suppose you are a fixture here? Your brother's children are to some extent dependent upon you?"

"Of course, but——"

"Then permit me, Miss Angus, for the sake of old times," said Mr. Penton rapidly, as he opened his bag and took out a number of documents, "to call your attention to the fact that life is uncertain, disease and death stalk abroad in the land, fatal accidents may happen at any time, and it is the part of wisdom to provide against contingencies by securing those who are or may be dependent upon us against want. In the policies of the Limpinlazarus Life Insurance Company, which I represent, and for which I have travelled for the last seven years, you will find the most perfect system, the surest guarantee, the most absolute security offered by any company in the world, and either on the ten-year, the endowment, or the life plan, as you may prefer, you will find the premiums smaller in proportion to the gilt-edged character of the insurance afforded than in any that has ever come under your notice, while the non-forfeitable features of the policies, peculiar to our company alone, together with the dividends that accrue after the third year, thus steadily decreasing the annual premiums, while at the same time——"

"Was this your object in calling, Mr. Penton?"

"It was, Miss Angus. I've just begun to work this town."

Opening the little ivory tablet he began jotting figures down in it with great rapidity.

"Now here, you will see," he said, "that on the ten-year plan—let me see, what is your age, please?"

"You will please excuse me, sir. I have some bread in the oven that I must go and look at, and I don't need any life insurance. Neither does my brother. I wish you success, Mr. Penton. Good afternoon."

Miss Elsie Angus sat in pensive silence a minute or two after her caller had departed, then picked up the little ivory tablet, put it back into the plush-covered jewel-case, took them both out to the kitchen, tossed them into the fire, and went about her work with a firm and decided expression on her face.

Three weeks afterwards she married a bald-headed dentist, fifty-seven years old, who had been making love to her unsuccessfully for about ten years.

Arthur Charles.

ROSES: and How to Grow Them.

By VIOLET BIDDLE.

Author of "Small Gardens and How to Make the Most of Them."

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s.

Some of the Twenty-One Chapters are:—

Chap. IV.—On Planting Out. Chap. VI.—On Pruning. Chap. VII.—On Budding. Chap. XIX.—Some Useful Hints. Etc., etc.

Of all Booksellers, or from The Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Published in the Interests of the Deaf.

Realising that there is a great public need for better knowledge of the causes, prevention, and cure of deafness, a London Popular Medical Journal devotes the whole of its last issue to a treatise on defective hearing and ear, nose, and throat ailments. Anatomy, physiology, hygiene, and treatment, are described in language suitable for popular reading, the work forming, in fact, a pamphlet which everyone should possess. Ten thousand copies of this work are ready for free distribution, and to obtain one the reader has only to send name and address, with the following coupon to the Editor, 10, Marble Arch, London, W.

FREE COUPON,
Entitling the sender to a Copy of
THE REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE, AND THROAT DISEASES.
In sending Coupon please give name and address plainly.
Send all Communications to
THE EDITOR, 10 MARBLE ARCH, LONDON, W.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(CLOTTED)
absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free, supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by
MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

USE BORAX FOR WASHING CLOTHES FOR CLEANSING EVERYTHING
DRY SOAP
Better than the best ordinary washing powder made. The Borax in it makes it so.
It not only helps the washer to wash clothes, and the housewife or servant to clean house easier and better than any other cleansing agent, but imparts a healthy sweetness to everything it cleanses.
Try it in your next wash, and you will join the great host of pleased women who will have none other.
Costs no more than the common kinds.
Your Grocer or Oilman sells it in ½lb. packets.
FREE SAMPLE PACKET AND SOME NOVELTIES
if you name this paper and your grocer.
BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.
The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.
BORAX STARCH GLAZE
IMPROVES ALL STARCH

Icilma
THE ONLY GUARANTEED AID TO BEAUTY. Nature's remedy for Complexion and Skin Troubles, whether caused by heat, cold, age, irritations or accident. Send 1d. stamp for postage of Free Sample & Booklet with Guarantee.—ICILMA, (Dept. 127) 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London
2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,
For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.

"NO BETTER FOOD."
Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.
Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa
300 Gold Medals, &c.
Half a tea-spoonful is sufficient to make a cup of most delicious Cocoa.

Digitized by Google

Johnny Couldn't Have Seen.

"Mary, Johnny tells me that when he went into the dining-room last night he saw Mr. Bliff with his arms round your waist." "What a story, mamma! Why, the gas was out."

No Need to Worry.

Mr. Nuwed (gloomily): "My salary has been cut down ten per cent." Mrs. Nuwed (cheerily): "Oh! don't worry about that, dear! Silk, Ribbons and Co. are advertising perfectly lovely things at a reduction of twenty per cent."

Pity to Spoil the Look.

Mrs. Luneleigh (shopping with her husband): "Oh, George, look here! Doesn't this showcase of diamonds look perfectly beautiful?" Mr. Luneleigh: "Yes, love. It would be a shame to take anything away from it, wouldn't it?"

Plenty of Time Yet.

"Better not wait for Charley any longer. You know what it is when a fellow is calling on his girl." "Ah, there they are now! He is just bidding her good-night." "All right; let us go and have a game of billiards. We'll just have time."

Thinking of the Lost.

Maggie: "Marie's engagement has been broken off." Minnie: "Is that a fact? Poor girl! I saw her sitting at the window as I came by." "Yes; she likes to sit at the window and admire the hieroglyphics she cut on the glass with the ring she had to send back."

An Unpleasant Reminder.

Mr. Spooner (on being introduced to Adored One's Mother): "Pardon me, madam, but have we not met before? Your face seems strangely familiar." Adored One's Mother: "Yes; I am the woman who stood up before you for three miles in a tramcar the other day while you sat reading the paper."

Is a Nobleman a Man?

Mr. Graves (Chicago soap merchant): "I say, Elfrida, you've got to break off with that Baron Sourcrout." Miss Graves: "Why, p-p-papa?" Mr. Graves: "Well, a fellow this morning told me that I won't be any more of a baron than I am now after your marriage, and if I ain't a-going ter be a noble ye'll 'av' ter marry a man."

A Bit too Nervous.

A youthful typine had just been engaged by a prominent lawyer. She had never done regular work before, and was somewhat nervous. The lawyer settled himself back in his chair and began dictating a brief. He talked for about five minutes, when the girl stopped with a horrified look on her face. "What's the matter?" asked the lawyer. "Would you mind saying that all over again?" the girl asked, her eyes full of tears. "Why?" "I forgot to put paper in the machine."

Knew the Symptoms.

Young Man: "Doctor, I have no appetite." Doctor (diagnosing case at a glance): "Then why don't you marry the girl?"

The Price of Memory.

"I'm afraid that if you marry my daughter she'll learn to forget me." "If you feel that way, you might let her see your name on a cheque about once a month."

He Wasn't Acting.

She: "Take your arm from about my waist at once, sir! I never saw a man act so in all my whole life!" He: "You mistake me, dear. I'm not acting, I'm in earnest."

She had Dared Him.

Mother: "I saw him kiss you; I am terribly shocked! I did not for a moment imagine he would dare take such a liberty!" Herself: "Nor did I, mamma—in fact, I bet him he daren't!"

Not in the Cold Storage Trade.

"Could you not, if you tried, grant me a place in that icy heart of yours?" "My heart may be of ice, as you say, Mr. Sopleigh, but all the same I am not in the cold storage business."

Earned, Not Won.

She: "He was desperately in love with her. Why, he sent her costly flowers and presents nearly every day for two years." He: "Did he finally win her?" She: "No, he earned her."

His Sight was Bad.

He: "Do you know that for the last hour I have been watching for a good chance to steal a kiss from you?" She: "Indeed! Don't you think it might be well for you to consult an oculist?"

Danger Ahead!

"Do you know," said an extremely vivacious young lady to her excessively bashful suitor, "do you know, George, that young ladies like to be told they are pretty and attractive, whether they are or not?" "I would not think of telling you any such thing," said George gallantly, "for your looking-glass tells you better than I could that you are as handsome as a picture." "Oh, George!" "You have the prettiest face and the smallest waist I ever saw." "The smallest waist? If my waist is small, it is certainly not because of having been squeezed, George." George fainted.

The Vow not Broken.

He: "I hear Maud Watkins is going to be married." She: "Yes, and not a great while ago she told me she had decided never to marry." He: "Oh, that goes for nothing. You women can't keep a vow any better than you can keep a secret. And you, my dear, you have no cause to talk about Maud. I remember you said to me once you would not marry the best man living." She: "Did I say so?" He: "Of course you did, and in less than six months you had married me—ha, ha, ha! There is something amusing about the make-up of a woman." She: "I don't see where the laugh comes in. I can't see that I broke my vow."

Forgiven.

"Clara," said William Wharton, as he placed his arms round his wife and looked down into her eyes, "I have a confession to make to you, and I want you to promise, before I begin it, that you will forgive me." A wild fear took possession of her. She placed a little white hand upon her heart, and would have fallen if her husband had not held her up. Her face became livid, and she could only gasp: "Tell me—tell me what it is!" "I cheated a man out of £50 to-day," he said. "Can you, darling—can you forgive me?" The colour came back into her cheeks, her lips parted in a glad, sweet smile, she rested her head against his breast, and, looking fondly up to his eyes, said: "Oh, Will, dear, how you frightened me! I thought you were going to tell me that you had kissed your typine!"

Digitized by Google

PUNCTURE

PUNCTURE

PUNCTURE

PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PALPITATION

makes many a man fancy he has Heart Disease. More likely he is plagued with Indigestion; the heart trouble would disappear by taking

Page Woodcock's Pills

For Wind on the Stomach, Biliousness, Indigestion and all Stomach and Liver Troubles, there is no remedy so safe and sure as these famous Pills. Sold by all MEDICINE VENDORS at 1/1½ and 2/9, or post free for price from PAGE WOODCOCK, Limited, 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, LONDON, N.W. (late of LINCOLN.)

SMITHS

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

One Hundred Million Pounds

of "elbow grease" have already been saved by Sapon, the Ideal Cleanser. Buy some—and use your spare "elbow grease" for shaking hands with yourself.

Free packet on receipt of post card with grocer's name, to Sapon, Ltd., Dept. 68, 33, St. Swithin's Lane, London.

SAPON THE IDEAL CLEANSER

"For WOOLLENS" and all home Laundry Work.

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine THE SAFE REMEDY

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says: There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

Neuralgia

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Does She Know Her Own Mind?

"I AM very much in love with a girl of seventeen," writes "EDWARD." "She owns that she returns the feeling. Do you think at her age, she knows her own mind, or is it merely a passing fancy?"

* * * * *

It depends so much on the girl. If she is a flighty girl, then it is very likely as she grows older that she will develop other fancies. If she is quiet and domesticated, and not too fond of the men generally, you might depend on it that she is true in her professions towards you.

Should a Girl Pay Expenses?

"SHOULD a girl pay her own expenses when out with her sweetheart?" asks "S. P.," who often takes out a certain young lady, and always insists on paying everything himself. The girl, however, protests, as she says she can afford to share expenses, being herself in a good position, earning a good salary. They have known each other for three or four years now.

* * * * *

I certainly think this is a case in which the girl might well pay her own expenses. She says she can afford it, and therefore ought not to depend for everything on you, who no doubt have many expenses of your own to deal with. Certainly in the matter of fares, and meals, if you have them together, it seems fair that you should allow her to share. You know each other well enough, I suppose, to be able to make such an arrangement without misunderstanding each other's motives.

Shabby Sweethearting.

"DOT" and "MAUDE" got acquainted with two young men from a neighbouring town, and in time grew affectionate with them, giving them their photos. After having won their regard, the two men wrote and said they had finished with the girls, but refused to return the photos or letters when asked. The two girls are being ridiculed over the affair, and wish to know how they can get back their photos and letters.

* * * * *

The men acted in a very shabby way towards you, and deserve very severe reproof. In this case a girl is better off if she has a brother, or a male relative she can trust, who would not mind taking up the matter for her. If the two young men were all along trifling with you, and secured your photos under false pretences, you have a right to demand them back—not legally, of course, for they were gifts—but you could request the photos to be returned by a certain date, and unless this were done, your brother or father would take the matter up. Men who deceive girls, and allow them to write intimate letters in good faith, and who finally act as these two have done, lay themselves open to severe handling.

Etiquette Questions.

"ETIQUETTE."—Yes, you should always escort a lady walking yourself on the side nearest the road. The reason is obvious. In the event of any accident, or splashes of mud from passing vehicles, the man is supposed to bear the first instalment of trouble. Another problem from "B. F." asks: "When entering a railway carriage with a lady, who should enter first, and supposing there to be a vacant corner seat, who should take it? In the same way, who should leave the carriage first?"

* * * * *

The girl should, of course, enter the carriage first, the man holding open the door, and shutting it after her. As to the corner seat, if it is next the door by which people enter and leave, the man ought to take the corner. He is then there to open or shut the door or perform any other courtesy that may be necessary, such as opening or closing a window. On leaving the carriage, the man steps out first, and helps the lady to descend—at some railway stations a very practical service, where the carriage step is very high above the platform.

How Can a Girl Help with Moneymaking?

"WILLING" is a nurse who is engaged, but to a man who has only a very small, unprogressive salary. She asks me how she can help towards preparing their home by work on her own account until her sweetheart has improved his position.

* * * * *

I am afraid the only ways open to a girl nowadays for earning money to save require a certain amount of education. For instance, a girl who can undertake typewriting in her spare time can often make a good deal, or if she is musical and able to play any instrument or sing fairly well, a little money can be made in that way. But without some kind of accomplishment there are very few chances to add to one's income.

* * * * *

All I can recommend to "WILLING" is that she should try to get a better situation than she has at present by making herself a really competent nurse, and to apply for situations in better families. There is always room for a good upper-servant in good families, and if "WILLING" got some such place she ought to be able to save the necessary money.

Church Choir Overtures.

"O. B." attends a church regularly, and while there has taken a great fancy to one of the choir girls. He, however, has had no introduction to her, or any mutual friends. She always stares very hard at him, both in church and out of it. Is "O. B." to take this as a sign that she wishes to know him?

* * * * *

I am afraid it is a habit with many girls—especially in choirs—to stare at young men worshippers, often meaningly, and often otherwise. Under the circumstances you must use your own judgment. As you belong to the same congregation, and presumably are neighbours, it should not be very difficult to get to know her family.

* * * * *

Perhaps you know the vicar, curate, or some of the churchwardens, who would be able to introduce you to the girl's family. That would be better both for her and you than to start a casual acquaintance. As another resort, why not join the choir yourself—provided that you can sing, and they have men's voices. I have known lasting attachments spring up through people being associated with each other in choirs and other church matters.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, London, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE OTHER PERSON
in this punt is reading
The Lady's Magazine.

ARE YOU A READER, TOO?
If not, now is an excellent time to become a regular subscriber to this
FEAST OF FICTION & FASHION.
ALL THE LATEST FASHIONS.
TWO NEW SERIALS just starting.

JULY NUMBER NOW ON SALE.
Price SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

SPEAKING FIGURES.

☛ 56 PILLS in a Box for 1/1½

☛ A Sale of Over 6,000,000 Boxes per Annum.

☛ 56 YEARS of EVER-GROWING demands.

Figures, like actions, often speak louder than words. The figures here given refer to

BEECHAM'S PILLS

and without any further elaboration they should convince every thinking man and woman of the fact that this remedy must be of EXTRAORDINARY MERIT.

FIRSTLY: 56 Pills in a Box for 1/1½ must signify a large quantity of a good thing at a low price.

SECONDLY: A sale of over 6,000,000 boxes per annum must mean that the "good thing" is thoroughly appreciated by the world at large.

THIRDLY: 56 years of ever-growing popularity must indicate an expression of public confidence and approval, such as can never be excelled.

That BEECHAM'S PILLS are considered the most efficacious medicine for Liver and Bilious Disorders, Constipation, Sick Headache, Impaired Digestion, Loss of Nervous Energy, and threatened failure of the general health, the figures above quoted are unerring and unquestionable testimony.

PREPARED ONLY BY THOMAS BEECHAM, ST. HELENS, LANCASHIRE,

AND SOLD EVERYWHERE IN BOXES, PRICE 1/1½ (56 PILLS), AND 2/9 (168 PILLS).

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 758.] Week ending July 11th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

THE FUGITIVE CROUCHED DOWN BEHIND THE CANVAS WHILE SADIE DENIED HIS PRESENCE TO THE WARDER.

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story "Won Without Wooing." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ Inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2½ Inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES'

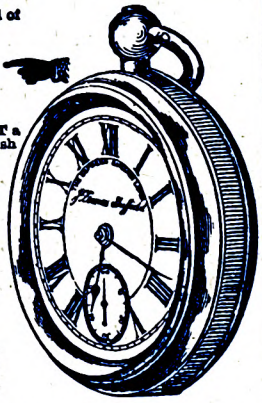
Shakespeare.

"EXPRESS" (Regd.) English Lever.

£2 10s.

That word "Express" on the dial of a watch is a guarantee that it is

BRITISH



Manufacture throughout, and NOT a foreign-made movement in English Cases.

TERMS.

Send 5/- and the watch will be forwarded to you. If satisfied, complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of the same amount. If not satisfied, return the watch, and your deposit will be refunded in full.

The Largest Watch-sales Firm in the World.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue. Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in every town and village. Good Commission. Apply for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Coniston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

Tins, 3d. 6d. 1/-

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE

SHORT STORIES

No. 758.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending July 11th, 1903.

WON WITHOUT WOOING.

A Summer Afternoon Episode in which a Houseboat, a Pretty Australian Girl, the Law, and Two Young Englishmen, Play Parts.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

"Now, see here, Sadie, you know me. When I say a thing's got to be, it's got to be. Your old dad don't want to be angry with you, but he's fixed up his plans and they can't be interfered with. So you get that little word said this afternoon to the Honourable Mark, and then I can arrange the financial side of the business and make a move for Melbourne, where I ought to have been a week ago."

"And suppose the Honourable Mark doesn't ask me?"

Sadie Leland sat back among the cushions of her wicker lounge-chair, put her hands behind her proud young head, and looked at her father. One of her small feet, dainty in their low white shoes, tapped the snowy deck of the smart modern houseboat.

There was an English viscount's coronet over the crest on the stern of the flat, broad vessel, and on that of the trim steam-launch in waiting, but the flag of an Australian colony flew from the flag-staffs of both, in compliment to the country whence Mr. Peter Leland, of Melbourne and Sydney, had brought the wherewithal to rent the two craft from their noble owner.

Peter Leland coughed. He was a short, bluff, clean-shaven Colonial. His deep jaw and the habitual twinkle in his grey eye spoke of mingled good humour and obstinacy.

"Well," his daughter was told bluntly, "I fancy Lady Jane has attended to that. At all events, she helped me pack everybody else off fishing or punting, or doing something equally unnecessary, and she herself is coming with me in the launch to—to—ahem!—to see a little riverside place I am thinking of taking. You have a slight headache and prefer to read, Abington is writing letters, I believe. Once we clear off, he'll probably pop out and improve the shining hour."

Sadie rose and began to put her father's tie straight with caressing fingers.

"Dad," she said, "where's the hurry? Let me come with you and Lady Jane, I don't want to tie myself up yet. Why should you go home just now? Can't Mr. Merivale go?—it wouldn't be the first time he'd settled things 'down under' as well as you could yourself."

Peter Leland had suddenly become very interested in the set of his trouser-legs over his boot-tops.

"There are some things," he answered evasively, "a man can't trust the best secretary on earth to do for him. And, besides, Merivale isn't my secretary any longer."

His daughter stared. "Mr. Merivale not your secretary any longer?" she repeated slowly. "Oh, dad, what has happened?"

The Australian flushed. "Oh, well," he said, "it's a roundabout story, Sadie, and it wouldn't interest you. Leastways, it oughtn't to. Richard Merivale was only a promising young chap I gave a chance to, and—and, well, I'm disappointed in him. Don't you waste another thought on him."

He put his daughter gently into the chair from which she had risen and stood looking at her.

"Sadie," he added, "you understand me, there is to be no fooling about this business of Abington's. I've given you every help to get fond of him on your own. After all, you're your mother's child and she was as sentimental as a yellow-back novel, bless her. But sense or sentiment, it's got to be. Abington is young, smart, well-bred, and the next heir to a title. He's a cheap lot, from my point of view, and he's dead nuts on you."

Sadie Leland frowned. "Yes," she retorted, "he'd rather have me with three hundred thousand than anyone else with four. But won't you please tell me about Mr. Merivale. I thought he was only detained in town on business."

She met keenly her father's shifting glance. "Dad," she said, "you spoke of being disappointed in Mr. Merivale. What did you mean? You must be mistaken; I don't believe Mr. Merivale——"

Peter Leland interrupted her. "Another time, Sadie," he replied, hastily; "here is Lady Jane, come, I'll be bound, from a quiet palaver with her Honourable nephew. Ta-ta, Sadie."

He nodded significantly to his daughter and hurried off along the deck, to hand down into the waiting launch a tall and somewhat angular person in a spotted foulard gown and severely plain hat.

Lady Jane Abington—as her "style" and bearing showed—belonged to an old school of English gentlewomen, and it was well understood in Society that she only consented to introduce the Lelands into that magic circle for the sake of her nephew's interest in the pretty Sadie.

The Abingtons, however, if an ancient and exclusive family, were an increasingly impecunious one, and though Mark

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Abington was separated merely by a single ailing life from a historic title, he had not been snapped at in the marriage market. Possibly he had not wished to settle down; in his time he had been reputed more than a trifle "wild," and it was whispered that his mother's small fortune had been swallowed up at his majority by gambling debts and other dubious claims.

But years and necessity had moderated his extravagances, and Lady Jane herself, the impecunious widow of a needy peer, had hailed with genuine pleasure the chance of assisting him in a good match—good for the Honourable Mark Abington, good for the family whose wealth and influence had been on the wane for so many generations.

Sadie glanced after the launch as it sped away down the river in the yellow haze of the summer afternoon, her chaperon's white tulle parasol conspicuous in the stern-sheets beside the Colonial's Panama. Sadie heaved an abstracted sigh, for she did not dislike the stiff, lonely Englishwoman.

"Poor Lady Jane," she observed aloud, "I wonder if she was ever really happy, if she ever knew what it was to have a heart. And yet she was an earl's daughter. Heigho!"

"A very poverty-stricken earldom, I assure you," said a slow, amused, slightly harsh voice. Sadie started. A typical man-about-town—heavily built, heavily moustached, scrupulously groomed, a little lethargic in his movements, Mark Abington had come out unperceived upon the deck, to overhear and answer her self-communing. She blushed.

"I—I ought to beg your pardon, Mr. Abington," she began. But Mark Abington checked her with a gesture.

"Not at all," he said, sitting down near her; "like yourself, I have the habit of dissecting people, my own relations not excepted. As for Lady Jane, I doubt if she knows what happiness, in your sense of the word, means. She is a wheel in the English social system, that is enough for her."

Sadie smiled gravely. Mark Abington was not without a kind of cleverness; his talk, cynical, crisp, and often daring, seldom failed to interest her quick wits.

"May I smoke?" he asked. Sadie nodded. As he took out his cigar-case and lit a fragrant Muria, she studied him with a certain keen, almost painful attention. He was polished, tactful, experienced, well-bred, still young, and the bluest of blue blood ran in his veins. What girl would not be responsive in some degree to the presence of such a suitor? Even Sadie could not deny him distinction and good looks.

Mark Abington blew out his vesta and threw it over one of the canvas rail-screens that inclosed the deck into the river. He himself was studying Sadie.

Shrewd, gay, red-lipped, dark-haired and dark-skinned, yet with the clear, fine complexion of a true brunette beauty, and a slender elasticity all her own. Sadie Leland, her father's fortune apart, was just the woman to fascinate the selfish, sensuous, world-weary man at her side.

His glance dwelt upon her with cold, yet profound passion, and she felt it, as women do feel such things, without analysing it. Perhaps it is better so.

"Yes," went on Mark Abington, withdrawing his cigar from his lips; "Lady Jane is rather terrible, isn't she? But she doesn't suffer from having no heart; what troubles her is having too many nerves. I am afraid I helped to shatter a fairly large selection of them in my time. My mater died when I was at Harrow and she's been a sort of step-mamma to me for years."

"A pretty trying post, I fancy, where you were concerned," said Sadie Leland, drily.

"I daresay it was," admitted her companion, "for, to tell you a secret, Miss Leland, though I am as easily to be led as the proverbial lamb, nothing on earth can drive me. Small wonder that my aunt failed where—where another woman might have succeeded."

Sadie's pulses beat a stroke or two quicker. The tone in which the last words had been spoken was noticeably serious. With great deftness Mark Abington had turned the conversation into a tell-tale channel.

"I suppose," he continued, "that I have been rather a rolling-stone. But, do you know, Miss Leland, it's been as much bad luck as anything else. If I had only happened to meet some clever, charming woman—like—like you, I believe I should have settled down with the best will in the world."

He had leant forward, and though he was talking with more tact than fervour, his voice had gained a note which could not be mistaken. It was not only fortune that made her a desirable possession; she had beauty and youth and their flower had captivated his sensuous, selfish spirit.

"It isn't very fashionable to fall in love nowadays," he added; "but the most hardened bachelor may meet his fate at last and I have met mine."

His fingers sought her own. "Sadie," he said, "can't you see, don't you understand? I love you!"

Sadie Leland did not answer. Her eyes were fixed apparently upon vacancy, and she swayed slightly as she sat in the wicker-lounge-chair. Suddenly she drew a long breath and put her hand to her side.

Mark Abington's brows contracted. Her set, white face was more of a rebuff than any words could have been. Yet the abruptness of the change in her demeanour vaguely alarmed him.

"Sadie," he exclaimed; "Miss Leland, you are not well—you——"

"No—," was the faltered answer; "I—I feel very faint. I shall be better in a moment."

The colour was coming back to her cheeks, but their pallor was still almost ghastly. Mark Abington started up.

"I will get you a little brandy-and-water," he said, "it is the heat. And I—I surprised you, confound my clumsiness." And he hurried down the covered staircase that led to the saloon below.

As he disappeared, Sadie Leland rose, tottered to the rail near where she had been sitting, and bent her gaze upon the species of lush green hedgerow that fringed the bank by which the houseboat was moored. She passed a hand across her eyes.

"Was it," she murmured aloud, "was it a kind of dream? It couldn't really have been—been he!"

Even while she spoke there was a crackling of the underwood by the deserted pathway and a head was thrust out from among the foliage. A stalwart frame followed it.

The new-comer was young and personable, yet hatless, haggard and dishevelled. His wrists were fettered by a pair of bright steel handcuffs. Sadie Leland uttered a low, almost inaudible cry and recoiled into the shelter of the staircase down which Mark Abington had just vanished.

An instant the fettered figure stood surveying the scene, crouched into a low recess beneath a flight of open wooden steps that connected the upper deck with the stern of the vessel. From this haven he peered out cautiously, and finally as though dissatisfied with the concealment it afforded, stole swiftly up the steps themselves to hide in an angle of the canvas-covered railing that fenced the deck above.

Scarcely had his head dropped below the line of sight than the foliage on the bank was parted and a couple of men in a blue, semi-military uniform stepped out.

As the fugitive had done, they looked up and down the bank, one of them moving along it towards a point from which he might have gained, through the gateway at the head of the steps, a view of the hidden man. Instinctively Sadie Leland sprang forward, and gliding before the crouching figure.

Digitized by Google

stood looking at the blue-coated functionaries. The leader saluted her respectfully.

"Excuse me, miss," he said, "but do you happen to have seen anyone run along the bank? We're warders from Brixtow Prison and we were taking a remand prisoner over there for the assizes, when he gave us the slip at the station up yonder. We chased him this far and lost him."

The girl on the deck of the house-boat shook her head. "N—no," she replied, clearly answering the question with literal accuracy—"no one."

The warder saluted again, thanked her, and plunged back into the thicket with his companion. Sadie turned and glanced down at the crouching man.

"Mr.—Mr. Merivale," she faltered; "you—like this!"

The other straightened himself up unsteadily; he had pleasant blue eyes—eyes in which there was no shame, only acute sadness.

"I am innocent," he said, "but what is that to you?" He hesitated, and his sensitive, clean-shaven lips trembled. "Thank you for that kind lie," he added, "I am sorry I put you to it—I did not dream of finding you here."

Sadie did not reply. Instead she sprang in front of him, pushing him back into the covered stairway of the saloon. "Go down," she bade him imperiously.

He obeyed. A glance had shown him that the leader of the warders was emerging again from the thicket. Sadie went to the side and stood unconcernedly.

The man paused awhile with a puzzled air, then came to look over the river-bank and to scan its margin critically. After a few seconds of futile reflection he roused himself and departed, shrugging his shoulders. Sadie heaved a sigh of relief and turned to descend the saloon stairs. Half-way down she was arrested by a singular sight.

In the entrance of the saloon, and just visible from the curve in the narrow stairs that Sadie had reached, was Mark Abington. At his feet lay a broken glass, from which the brandy-and-water he had been to fetch had spattered the floor of the short corridor. His eyes were starting, and his mouth was agape as he confronted the dishevelled and hand-cuffed new-comer. Some words burst from his lips and reached the ears of Sadie Leland, words spoken in a husky, shaking whisper.

"Merivale! What—what do you want with me?"

There was a ring of superstitious dread in the broken syllables. They were answered by a low, fierce laugh from the fettered man.

"I'm no ghost," he said, "though your conscience makes you think me one. I have escaped from the gaol—or, rather, from the gaolers to whom your dupe, Mr. Leland, consigned me. Liar and coward! Oh, if I were not chained!"

Sadie heard him grind his teeth in a passion of impotent indignation; she had drawn back up the staircase and stood listening, a hard, shrewd light in her girlish face.

Mark Abington pulled himself together, glancing at the broken glass by his feet.

"Escaped!" he repeated. "Escaped! And you come here to threaten me with the badge of your imprisonment upon you. A discreet proceeding, truly! I have but to give the alarm and you will be seized and detained till the police can be sent for to re-arrest you—under her eyes, for she herself is here."

Richard Merivale took him suddenly by the throat with his chained hands.

"You hound!" he said; "now I am sure that you put the notes in my pocket yourself. You read my secret, you were jealous of my nearness to her, of her simple kindness to me. You laid a fiendish trap and you triumphed. But you shall not taunt me and go unmarked."

He grasped his struggling prey and shook him like a rat.

Mark Abington closed with his antagonist and tried to throw him, calling in a hoarse whisper for assistance. But he was no match for Richard Merivale—indolence and good living had overweighted and handicapped his once athletic frame.

There was hot coloured blood in Sadie Leland's veins—it had stolen into her cheeks, and was glittering in her eyes. She crept down the staircase a pace or two more, and stood peering round the sheltering curve.

"Let me go," gasped the half-strangled man in the thin, breathless syllables that were all he could compass. "I'll give you money, money, to get away with—it's your only chance. You—you can't hope to prove your innocence. And, after all, you could never have married her."

His voice grew fainter. "Great Heavens," he whispered, "you won't kill me; you—you——" Speech failed him; he could say no more.

"Why not?" demanded Merivale, for a cold ferocity had taken possession of him; "you did worse than kill me. Why not, I say?"

Sadie Leland roused from her quiescence to glide down the stair and lay a soft hand on the shoulder of Richard Merivale.

"You need not kill him," she said. "I have heard everything. I am your witness before the law and the world."

* * * * *

And that is why Peter Leland did not come back to find his daughter betrothed to the husband of his choice. Instead, to his profound bewilderment, he discovered his late secretary seated composedly in the dining-saloon over a dainty high tea, in which cold chicken figured conspicuously.

Naturally, being still hand-cuffed—for the official form of fetter is not a thing to be easily tampered with—Richard Merivale could not feed himself with overmuch grace, but Sadie, busily making the delicate white meat into sandwiches, did not seem to mind.

The Colonial gazed incredulously at this amazing picture, and blinked deliberately several times. Sadie went to him.

"Dad," she said, "it is Mr. Merivale himself. He has escaped, as you see, and is very hungry."

Peter Leland choked down his astonishment. He was too disconcerted to inquire by what means Richard Merivale had installed himself upon the house-boat.

"Sadie," he stammered, "I—I—we kept it from you, Abington and I, thinking it best. But that fellow there is a thief. He robbed your—your future husband of three or four hundred pounds in notes, about a fortnight ago, before we left town to come here. Mark was for letting him go, but I swore, after all I'd done for him, he should be gaoled for it. Don't you contaminate yourself by going near him."

Sadie's answer was to refill the fettered man's cup and deliver it to him with a bewitching bow.

"Go slow, dad," she retorted. "I overheard the dishonourable Mark talking to Mr. Merivale when he thought they were quite alone; they had tumbled across one another down here when I was up on deck, throwing dust in the eyes of the gentlemen from the gaol. I suppose you'll take my word for what I gathered?"

"Why—why, certainly," said the Colonial; "you can't do one thing, Sadie, and that's lie. But——"

His daughter came to him, flushing slightly. "Mr. Abington put the notes in Mr. Merivale's pocket," she explained.

"Great Scott!" cried Peter Leland. "But what on earth did he want to do that trick for?"

"That's what you won't have to ask too many questions about just now, papa," said Sadie sweetly. "I—I could make you understand it all much better alone. What you've got to do at present is to get these horrid hand-cuffs off Mr. Merivale and arrange things so he won't be carried off to prison any more."

Digitized by Google

The Australian looked at his ex-secretary. "So, Merivale," he observed drily, "it seems I've been spoofed. But why didn't you speak out man? It was your silence that made things so black."

Richard Merivale's fettered hands trifled nervously with each other.

"Mr. Abington had guessed a secret of mine," he said; "a—a secret that wasn't quite unconnected with Sadie—with Miss Leland. That was why he tried to ruin me. It was a clever plan, that of putting his notes into my coat-pocket and leaving his pocket-book on my desk. He knew that I should see it and return it to him. To 'miss' the notes, accuse me of abstracting them, and have me searched, was simplicity itself."

"The mean hound!" ejaculated Leland warmly.

Richard Merivale continued with a certain embarrassment: "I could prove nothing," he added; "as Mr. Abington told me in Miss Leland's hearing, and, besides, I thought that she cared for him. So I held my tongue. Had she not been a witness to his taunts and attempted bribery this afternoon, I should never have hoped for vindication. But liberty was sweet, and I made a dash for it, my second since my arrest—hence these hand-cuffs."

The Colonial frowned. "Why should Abington be jealous of you," he queried; "I could have told him that any time in the last two years you would have given your eyes out of your head for a smile from Sadie here. But I knew you didn't flatter yourself it could come to more than respectful admiration. Abington's got a lot of dirty work to do if he means to ruin every man who's sweet on Sadie."

Sadie put her head on one side and peeped saucily at her father.

"Perhaps Mr. Abington guessed more than a single secret, dad," she said softly; "perhaps he guessed a secret of mine—a secret that I had scarcely dared to guess myself."

Peter Leland started. "Sadie!" he exclaimed. "Richard!"

Sadie put her hand over the Australian's mouth.

"Papa," she said, "they used to call you Peter the Just at home. Mr. Merivale is an honest man, yet he is still hand-cuffed, and the police are looking for him. Don't you think that is the first thing to attend to?"

Her father took up his hat. "You're right, Sadie," he admitted reluctantly. "I'll go to the police-station at once."

His daughter turned to touch Richard Merivale's fettered fingers with a shy, maidenly tenderness.

"Will anything ever console you for the shame of it all?" she murmured. Merivale managed to clasp her hand.

"I shouldn't be surprised if it proved to have been worth it," he replied sententiously. And it did.

But Lady Jane will never quite understand what happened during that momentous afternoon, an afternoon which, for Mark Abington, included also a trying interview with Peter Leland and a hurried trip to town in the Colonial's charge.

More than one high police authority within the next two hours listened with polite contempt to his confused explanation and withdrawal of the accusation against Richard Merivale.

It had been too hastily made, he faltered, with the Australian's stern eye upon him, probably the notes were loose in the pocket-book instead, as he had thought at first, in an inner compartment. That being so, they might easily have slipped out into the secretary's pocket when he placed the book there for delivery to its owner. On reflection he regretted the precipitation with which he had come to a conclusion detrimental to Mr. Merivale's honour.

When Sadie Leland was married to her father's penniless secretary, Mark Abington was lost in amazement.

"And that is the little fool who rejected you, Mark!" Lady Jane exclaimed to her nephew. But Mark Abington only growled.

R. Norman Silver.

A STORY IN LETTERS.

Telling of the Decline of a Love Affair.

New Eden, Feb. 10, 1903.

My Angel,—I am in Paradise! The thought of you is a constant source of delight. I never knew what it was to be happy before; but now the whole world is running over with joy. Everything speaks to me of you! Since we parted I have seen your face everywhere—in dreams, in the sky, in the trees, in the flowers. The birds sing your name, and the wind whispers it in the grass. Oh, my darling, I have found Heaven at last, and you have led me into it. How I long to hear your voice again, to look into your eyes, to clasp your hand. Believe me, there is not a moment of the day when your image is not in my thoughts. How shall I manage to exist until we meet again? Do you think of me always, love, as I think of you? I know you do. And now farewell for a few hours. A thousand kisses, sweet! Do not fail to answer all my letters promptly.—Your devoted, faithful lover,

Clarence.

New Eden, Feb. 12, 1903.

Sweetest,—I have just received your letter—the very breath of your presence in it, the delicate perfume of violets! How good of you to write so soon. I dreamt of you all last night, and I am dreaming of you now. The fellows laugh at me for my absentmindedness. What do I care? I have something better to think of than logarithms and Greek roots. But I must study a bit, I suppose, or our secret will be suspected. So, good-bye, for now. I enclosie a leaf from the inmost heart of a rose. Kiss it for me, as I have kissed it for you.—For ever, your

Clarence.

New Eden, Feb. 15, 1903.

Darling,—You are too unkind. I know that I have missed a day; but examinations are close at hand, and those two weeks, while we were finding our Heaven, have made such a gap in my work. You say that I love you less than "my nasty old books." That is just like a girl. Why can't your sex have a little common-sense? But there goes the bell.—Hastily,

Clarence.

New Eden, Feb. 20, 1903.

My Dear Jessie,—Why can't you keep your temper? I have not been lecturing you, and I have not neglected you. One charge refutes the other. I simply asked you to have a little charitable common-sense, in view of the hard work that is crowding on me just now. Of course, I am just as fond of you as ever I was; but I can't write love-letters and grind mathematics at the same time, and no reasonable girl would expect it. You know that I love you. Why should you insist upon my repeating it every single day?—Lovingly,

Clarence.

New Eden, Feb. 25, 1903.

My Dear Miss Northcote,—I am sorry you feel as you do. I thought you truly loved me. Love is always willing to make sacrifices. Besides, a man cannot give up his whole time to sentiment. It is different with women. This is a fact which you do not seem to have taken into consideration at all. I shall have more time after the present week, and will write you at length my views upon this subject. Then, perhaps, you can consistently claim that I am lecturing you!—Ever sincerely,

Clarence.

New Eden, Feb. 27, 1903.

Miss Northcote, Dear Madam,—I beg to acknowledge receipt by Parcel Post of the package containing ring, letters, photograph, etc. I return, also by same means, like articles of yours in my possession. Kindly acknowledge upon delivery, and oblige, yours respectfully, Clarence Murchison.

Gerald Harward.

Digitized by Google

TOBY'S RIVAL.

Telling of a Union Between Youth and Antiquity.

The girl felt a drop of rain on her nose. She looked down hastily at her frock, and saw three audacious rain-drops settle on it. Her thoughts flew to her big picture-hat. Overhead huge black clouds gathered threateningly.

She was wearing her smartest and prettiest summer costume, and her umbrella was neatly folded up in the hall-stand at home.

When one finds oneself in such a position, the hospitality of a near neighbour becomes the most valuable thing in the world. So the girl caught up her light skirt with both hands, and ran down the road until she came to the gate of the Crib, where she turned in.

Flushed and breathless, she shot past the drawing-room windows. A man sat in the shadow of the curtains with his arm over the back of a chair. She saw the colour of his sleeve, and on this slight evidence, turned her smiling face towards him and nodded as to an old friend.

"Toby Atkinson," she thought in the porch. "how often have I advised him to give up wearing those horrid checks."

As she followed the housemaid across the hall she carefully flecked the rain-drops off her sleeve, and tilted her hat to the proper angle.

Delighted greetings met her in the doorway, for the girl was a cheerful creature, and much beloved by her friends. Toby stood by the window immovable, and quite unusually silent, and she half turned to greet him.

"Ah!" she said over her shoulder, "there you are again in that fright of a coat!"

There was no response. Thinking he had feigned offence, she turned an amused smile on him and met the astonished gaze of the gravest and most melancholy grey eyes she had ever seen in her life.

The girl gave a little start of horror. The coat might certainly have been Toby's, but the wearer of it was very different. In height he was well over six feet, and his iron-grey hair, and pale, handsome, almost severe face, were in lively contrast to Toby's youthfulness and exuberance. An introduction quickly followed, and she sat down on a low chair in the window.

The rain was falling heavily now, and although the girl was by no means an easily discomfited person, she was glad to follow the frolics of the weather with her eyes for a few moments. So this was how she and the man of learning met.

They did not seem destined to give each other much pleasure for some time. The girl rapidly recovered her equilibrium, and sat on the edge of her chair looking quite ready to enjoy herself if only she might.

The man of learning, as grim and grey as his college walls, gazed straight before him, and maintained a heavy silence. He was not used to the society of such careless, happy-looking beings, and was, in truth, somewhat alarmed.

The girl shot quizzical little glances at him once or twice from under the curves of her hat.

"Rather handsome," she decided quickly. "Not really stern, I should think. Good mouth and chin, and I like the cut of his boots."

This was as far as her conjectures led her at present, and she wished he would speak. She could not bring herself to begin a conversation with him, while he looked as if nothing short of an earthquake would make him open his mouth, or turn his gaze from the opposite wall to her.

The ripple of laughter and chat that ran through the room only reached her in fascinating snatches. She was too far off to join in it. A white-haired lady crocheting on a not very distant sofa, sometimes made purring remarks to the cat curled up on the cushion beside her, but took no notice of anyone else.

At last the girl essayed a couple of gentle remarks across to her, and tried to include the man of learning in them. But her soft appeals were all in vain. He never moved a muscle. He didn't in the least know what to say to her.

"Oh, dear!" she thought, with a little sigh. "I think I know now what Robinson Crusoe felt like before Friday came. Toby, dear, I'm very sorry I ever took such a creature for you!"

"One, two, three," murmured the white-haired old lady over her needles.

"One—two—three. Now, ought I to slip one, or lift one?"

The man of learning crossed his legs.

"I declare, he's alive after all!" thought the girl.

"I have observed," he said, turning slightly to her, "that your neighbourhood is exceeding rich in archæological remains."

"Yes, indeed," was all she could find to say, but she thought, "If he looks like that at me much longer I shall bolt."

"No doubt you make a deep study of them?"

"Well, no, I'm afraid I don't. You see"—his grave eyes demanded an answer—"I—I—haven't time," with sudden relief.

"Yet you live on classic ground," he said severely.

The girl laughed outright, and was so pleased with herself for laughing under those tragic eyes that she laughed again. He wondered vaguely when he had heard a sound like that before.

"I've a great mind not to talk to him at all," she thought. "What does he go on like this for?" But it had never been her habit to remain silent for long at a time, and presently she spoke.

"I don't think it matters what kind of ground one lives on," she said serenely, "so long as one has a good time. I couldn't endure messing about among those horrid old things. I imagine people who do, just get as musty and fusty themselves. But I don't know any of them, and I don't think I want to."

She leant back in her chair without the slightest suspicion that she was talking to one of the foremost antiquarians of the day. Of one of his peculiarities she was equally ignorant.

Digitized by Google

Although an abnormally shy and silent man, and the despair of his hostess on any rare occasion that he ventured into society, he had been known when touched on his own particular subject to begin at ten o'clock, and continue talking till midnight.

He turned to her now, and, without in the least knowing that he was doing anything unusual, poured out a volley of antiquarian lore in his low, monotonous voice. He gave her a learned disquisition on the Græco-Roman style, and warming up to his subject, turned to the history of Anglo-Norman fortifications, and flooded her with terms she had never heard before.

She tried to scramble after him when he talked of barbican and portcullis, drawbridge, donjon and moat, but she felt as much out of it as if she had been drowned in the lowest depths of the one, or securely locked up in the other.

"Is he paid for this kind of thing?" she thought irritably. 'Does he get his living by befogging people like this? I do wish it would stop raining."

Silence fell at last. The man of learning gazed dreamily out of the window, lost in thought.

"I won't speak a single word to him," she said to herself eagerly. "The probabilities are he would start again."

Five minutes passed. It got monotonous to watch the rain clearing off, and she stole a cautious glance at him. He sat in exactly the same position, his thoughts absorbed and far away.

"I believe he has forgotten my very existence!" she thought indignantly. It was too much. She coughed slightly. No use. Then she began in a small voice:

"The picnic is to be in the Abbey ruins, I believe?" This was a safe remark. It bore clearly on the subject, and lay well within her own range of knowledge. He caught the word "Abbey," and burst forth afresh.

Again the girl was assailed with a torrent of technicalities. Her brain reeled in a maze of lights and traceries, cross-vaults and flying buttresses, arches and pinnacles, and all the paraphernalia of Gothic architecture.

His life had been that of the solitary student and scholar, and his vocabulary was as unintelligible to her as her dress-maker's would have been to him.

At the end of fifteen minutes the girl rose and shook out her flounces.

"Do you see that cat?" she said, pointing to the innocent pussy asleep on the sofa. "It knows just as much about what you're talking of as I do!"

If the man of learning had been surprised at her greeting when she came in, he was still more amazed at the nature of her farewell.

They met almost daily during the next fortnight, for the weather was glorious, and the countryside gay.

The girl had discovered her bearings meanwhile, and was somewhat scandalised with herself for her unmerciful handling of the scholar. Perhaps that was why she met him so kindly now, with a little shade of contrition and sweetness in her manner, which was an intense surprise to him.

She talked to him when others were afraid to, looked after him in the social gatherings where he felt so ill at ease, and, just at first, refrained from uttering half sallies that were on the tip of her tongue.

They became excellent friends. In his reserved and lonely life he had never met anyone so fresh, so unexpected, so interesting. Her first awe of him rapidly wore off, and she took to teasing and tormenting him, a process he seemed to enjoy immensely.

He never attempted to continue the lecture that had ended so abruptly on that first evening, indeed, the girl utterly refused to listen to him on any subject further back than the day before. The man of learning's education had begun in real earnest.

It was the evening of the picnic. They had been much together all day, and were standing by the stepping-stones on their way home.

"I believe," said the girl, trying to look severe, "that you aren't a bit interested in anything that is less than a thousand years old. I'm sure you're wishing at this very moment that I was an old yellow Egyptian mummy. Oh, I'm quite different!" in an exulting tone. "I love everything full up of life—brimming over," and she spread out her arms the better to express her ideas.

"You are very young, you know," he said, considering her gravely.

"You are very stupid, you know," she retorted. "You live in this delicious world, and never see anything a bit nearer than the Flood! But we really must go on, the others will be home before us."

He crossed the stepping-stones first, and helped her over. Between the last stone and the bank the gap was wider, and he held out both hands to assist her.

At another time she would have jumped easily across, but for the life of her she couldn't help keeping him standing in that unusual position a little longer than was necessary.

"It looks very deep," she said. "Should I be drowned if I fell in?"

"I'd fish you out."

She laughed delightedly. The man of learning had never been heard to use such language before. She looked down at the running water at her feet, then up at him, and back at the water in doubt again.

"You won't let go my hands in the middle, will you?"

"No, no!"

"And you'll think of me when I'm in my watery grave?"

"Certainly!"

"Well, I'm really going now," she said, "and I'm certain I shall be drowned."

"Come!" he whispered, holding her hands closer.

Something in his grey eyes, in the smile that wrought such changes in his face, compelled her to drop her bantering words and obey him. She sprang lightly across.

"Well," he said, still holding her hands and smiling. "Now that you are safe will you trust me next time?"

"How can I tell?"

"Say you will! Promise!"

"There's a stone in my shoe," said the girl, struggling to free her hands. "I'm going to sit down here and get it out."

* * * * *

The man of learning lingered in the neighbourhood all through the wheat harvest, and for no avowed reason. He had exhausted the antiquities for miles round, and should have been back in town by now, at work on his book. But instead he grew daily more fastidious in his dress, and went everywhere he thought the girl was likely to be.

Meanwhile, Toby Atkinson wore a dejected air, and a more-in-sorrow-than-in-anger expression that ill-befitted his tender years. One evening he went up the road past the girl's house.

"I suppose I needn't go in," he thought, "I should only find that ass jawing away as usual."

He came to a break in the line of heavy laurels that skirted the lawn, and paused a moment. Curiosity ran high, and the fence was low.

"I may as well turn in and see what's going on," he thought, and threw a leg over.

At that moment he caught sight of figures moving on the lawn, and stood transfixed.

The girl had stooped to pick a carnation from the border beside her, and turned with a laughing remark to fix it in her companion's coat. The man of learning laid his hands for an instant on her shoulders, and stooped down to kiss her forehead. Toby pulled his leg back hastily and fled.

The third friend to whom he related the story in strictest confidence that evening, remarked:

"And you actually saw him—er—kiss her?"

"Well, yes," snarled Toby, "if you can call a kiss, a kiss—coming from him."

Day Temple.

Digitized by Google

THE WRONG MISS SMITH.

A Tale of a Mistaken Identity.

"WHAT'S in a name?" asks Shakespeare. If he had borne mine I think he would have found a great deal. My name has been a nuisance to me ever since I was a boy at school, and that other John Smith used to squabble over my hampers from home, pretending they were addressed to him. I don't believe he ever had a hamper sent in his life, but he always claimed mine, and (being a big boy) occasionally got them.

I do not so much complain of my surname; that, I suppose, was an inevitable misfortune. Being, unluckily, born a Smith, I suppose my father, with his large family and small means, could hardly be expected to incur the expense of changing his patronymic, especially as he might have offended aunt Anne (from whom we had expectations) by doing so. But my parents need not have christened me John. John Smith!

One might as well be described as "man" at once. I believe the world swarms with John Smiths. If I travel abroad I am always opening the letters of my namesakes at the postes restantes, and, what is worse, they are always opening mine.

I hurried back from a pleasant tour in Scotland on receipt of a telegram that my baby was dangerously ill, and after all it turned out that the message was not intended for me, but for another John Smith, who was coming to my hotel the next day.

I was pleased to see a letter from a fellow-sufferer (who signs himself "J.B."—I suppose for John Brown) in the papers this year. He complains that he got so confused by receiving letters intended for other J.B.'s during his travels that he felt puzzled about his own identity.

I can quite sympathise with him. It is terrible to be always haunted by those "doppelgangers"—to find yourself multiplied, as it were.

I repeat, I consider my parents acted cruelly in not giving me a distinctive Christian name at least. My father had one; he was called Erasmus. Why was I not named after him?

I have been more considerate of my children; if they have a common surname, I flatter myself their Christian names are peculiar enough. At present, I must confess, they hardly appear to appreciate my kindness.

Thucydides, my eldest boy, complains that his name exposes him to ridicule at school. Huz, the next brother, has actually dropped his real title, and calls himself Harry.

Keren-happuch, my eldest daughter, is very bitter about her nomenclature, arguing that if she marries she will change her surname, but that her "hideous Christian name" will stick to her for life.

I suppose when my youngest hopes, Arethusa and Polyphemus, grow up, they will grumble at me too. But had they only experienced the annoyance of being called by a name common to so many other people, they would know how to thank me.

When Thucydides travels abroad he will have no difficulty about identifying his letters, and Huz is not likely to be dunned for debts of a namesake, as I have often been. If my dear wife had been named Keren-happuch, instead of Mary, I should not have mistaken that telegram about the baby.

It would be tedious to relate all the adventures and annoyances to which my unlucky name has exposed me at various times in my life; how I have been deluded by false hopes of legacies bequeathed to luckier John Smiths; dunned for debts I never incurred; abused for things I had never written; claimed as a relative by people I never saw. But one adventure was a rather remarkable one, and I am tempted to record it.

I have mentioned that I am one of a rather numerous family. I don't mean that the Smiths are, for they seem to me to make up half the population of the earth; but I allude to my own personal branch of that extensive clan. I have a great many relatives, and, being fairly well-to-do, all my relations are friendly with me.

One morning a few years ago, as we were sitting at breakfast, I received a letter from my cousin Caroline, who is married and lives in the country. We do not often hear from her, and, in fact, it was a long time since I had seen any of her branch of the family.

"'My dear John,'" I read aloud, "'I am going to ask you to do me a great kindness——'"

"She wants to come and stay here," interrupted my wife, with fine feminine perception.

"Not exactly," I answered, running my eye over the rest of the epistle, "but she does want us to give a bed for the night to a young protégée of hers, a relation in fact—Caroline says a 'mutual cousin.' She is an orphan, poor girl, and passing through London to take a situation as governess in a family in Devonshire. She has been staying with Caroline, and must come to London to get on the South-Western line.

"As she has never been in town in her life, Caroline thought I would take her in just for the night, to save her going to a hotel. The trains don't suit each other, and she must stay a night in London. That's the gist of the letter, without all the apologies and thanks."

"I call it a reasonably cool request," said my wife, proceeding to make sundry severe remarks on the "unconscionableness" of country cousins, as town cousins are wont to do when their spare rooms are thus invaded.

"Poor girl! Caroline says she is an orphan and our cousin," I remarked.

"If you are going to take in all the orphan Smiths who say they are your cousins, you had better buy up the Wanstead Asylum to accommodate them," retorted Mrs. Smith as she left the room to give orders for the reception of our guest, while I turned to a postscript I had hitherto overlooked, and which, as is usual with ladies' postscripts, contained the most important part of the letter.

"You are always so good and kind that I venture to ask you to complete your good action by meeting our poor little cousin at King's Cross to-day at 4.30. She is so terrified at the idea of arriving in London alone. Her name is Smith—Jane Smith—and you will easily recognise her by her deep mourning. I have told her to look out for you."

There was no time to reply. I did not tell my wife of this last request, which certainly was a "leetle" cool. But, after all, it was an undertaking for a young girl, new to London, to arrive alone at a crowded terminus, and as we were going to act the good Samaritans, we might as well do the work thoroughly.

I therefore set out for King's Cross at the appointed hour, but, owing to my watch being slow, I arrived rather late in the station.

Digitized by Google

The 4.30 train had come in, and the passengers had nearly all dispersed, but lingering on the deserted platform was a tall, graceful girl in deep mourning—evidently my unknown cousin. I hurried up to her.

"I believe I have the pleasure of speaking to Miss Smith?" She bowed, and I went on:

"I must introduce myself as Mr. Smith—John Smith—whom you expected to meet you. I am so ashamed of being late."

"Pray do not apologise," said the young lady, "it is very good of you to take so much trouble for a stranger, and I thank you very much for it."

Her voice was soft, rich and musical—just the voice I should have expected from her appearance, but not exactly the voice of cousin Caroline's family.

Caroline was a good soul, but—well, she was not remarkably aristocratic in appearance or manner.

Now this girl looked unmistakably high-bred. She was beautiful, decidedly so; but it was quite a different class of beauty from the rustic prettiness I had expected.

Her dress, too, though scrupulously plain, did not look like the handiwork of a rural dressmaker (as a family man, I know something of such matters); and the perfect fit and graceful cut of her crape-covered garments were certainly in the style of my wife's best modiste. Altogether my newly-found cousin looked rather more like a young lady whose footman and carriage were in attendance than a poor orphan governess going to her situation.

"You came from Yorkshire by this train?" I asked, as the possibility of a mistake crossed my mind.

"Yes, Mrs. Smith said she had written to ask you to be good enough to take me in for a night."

"Ah, I received her letter, and we shall be very glad to receive you. I believe you are a cousin of ours."

"Very probably," she answered, smiling, "ours must be a numerous family," and my mind set at rest regarding the identity of my fair relative, I called a cab, collected her luggage, and we drove away together.

My companion sat silent for a while; the cheerful tone in which she had greeted me had evidently been called up by an effort, for, as she now thought herself unobserved, I could see tears gathering in her eyes. Poor girl, she was very young to have to fight the battle of life alone!

"You are going into Devonshire to-morrow?" I said.

"Yes, of course, you know all about it. Oh, Mr. Smith, it sounds cowardly to say so, but I do dread it!"

"I don't wonder; going among strangers is, of course, a trial. But you must keep up a good heart, and you may find the ordeal far less terrible than you expect."

"Thank you for encouraging me," she said gratefully. "I am so glad you know all the circumstances. Of course, I feel it is my duty to go; and if I fail, I can but return to Yorkshire, though, of course, I shouldn't like to do that."

"Don't think about failing," I answered cheerfully, feeling that it must be very hard-hearted employers who would be unkind to such a gentle young creature.

"You must tell me all the Yorkshire news," I said, trying to give a different turn to the conversation; but my observation was an unfortunate one, for my fair companion's eyes overflowed as she said hurriedly:

"Don't ask me to talk about my old home just now; it is silly, I know; but I was never all alone in the world before; it is only three weeks since—since—my dear mother died."

I felt dreadfully ashamed of myself, and attempted to explain and apologise; but she stopped me with:

"You only meant to be kind; but, if you please, I can't talk about Yorkshire just yet."

As I was entirely ignorant of my new cousin's history, I thought it safest to forbear all farther allusions to her past or future, lest I should stumble on more unfortunate topics; but I did think Caroline might have let the girl stay a little longer with her after her bereavement, before sending her out into a situation.

My companion's sweet, pale face overcame my wife's preconceived prejudices at once, and she received as warm a welcome as though she had been an invited guest. I cautioned Mary to avoid alluding to Yorkshire subjects; and as the evening went on, the girl recovered her spirits, and looked brighter and happier.

"Must you really go on to Devonshire to-morrow, my dear?" asked my wife, as we were separating for the night.

"Oh, yes, now everything is arranged, I had better go. The longer I put it off the less I should be able to muster courage. And if I fail, Mrs. Smith has promised to allow me to stay with her until I can find something to do."

"If you fail, as you call it," said my wife, kissing the stranger as if she had been our own Keren-happuch, "you will come to us, and we will see about finding you a situation. Remember, my dear, there is a room ready for you here, if you need it."

"How good you are!" said the girl gratefully.

When alone together, my wife began to exclaim at the unkindness of Caroline in not allowing the girl a little time to recover from her trouble.

"Poor young thing! It goes to my heart to see her. Fancy the poor child starting off for a situation! I wish we could have kept her here for a week or two first."

"It seems to me, my dear," I remarked mildly, "that you, not I, are the person most desirous to open an orphan asylum for our poor cousins."

"Nonsense!" was Mrs. Smith's conclusive reply.

As I was dressing next morning, I was startled to receive a telegram. I detest those brick-red envelopes, but the contents of this one were of a surprising character. It was from Caroline, and ran as follows:

"Jane Smith much surprised not to see you yesterday. Waited two hours, then went to Railway Hotel. Please go to her there; she telegraphs in great distress."

"What on earth does this mean?" I exclaimed, tossing the note over to my wife. "Why, Miss Jane Smith is in our house at the present moment!"

"John," cried my wife, with a sudden enlightenment, "you have met a wrong Miss Smith, depend upon it!"

"Impossible!" I answered, all the more positively, perhaps, because a horrible suspicion that such a mistake was possible occurred to me. "She told me her name was Smith, and that she came from Yorkshire."

"Yorkshire is a large place, and you ought to know how many Smiths there are," said my wife, hurrying downstairs.

Our guest was awaiting us in the dining-room.

"I have had such an extraordinary telegram just now," I said, with an air of affected jauntiness, although I was sure that some dreadful mistake had happened. "Mrs. Caroline Smith telegraphs to say that I never met you at the station, and that you are waiting at the Railway Hotel."

"Mrs. Caroline Smith? But I don't know her."

"Didn't you come from her at Helstone? Are you not Miss Jane Smith?" I gasped.

"Jane? My name is Blanche; and as for my surname——ah, Mr. Smith, you know all the circumstances; but as you wrote to me as Miss Smith, I thought you imagined it was better to keep to that name till I knew how matters would go in Devonshire."

"Keep to that name!" Had we then been admitting some deceitful character, disguised under an alias, to our family circle? But one glance at that fair face reassured me. That countenance never belonged to a doubtful character.

Digitized by Google

"There has been some dreadful mistake!" said the girl eagerly. "Are you not Mr. John Smith, a solicitor, of Lincoln's Inn?"

"I am Mr. John Smith, a tea merchant, of No. 32 Mincing Lane," I answered solemnly. Of all the disagreeable predicaments my name had brought me into, this was one of the worst; nor were matters improved by the young lady bursting into a flood of tears.

"Oh, what shall I do? What will you think of me?" she sobbed.

"My dear," said my wife kindly, putting her arm round her, "what does the mistake signify? It was foolish of John to make it," with a severe glance at me; "but after all, you have only spent the night here instead of with your own friends, and you will go on to Devonshire to-day just the same.

"John, you had better go and see about your real cousin, instead of standing staring," added Mrs. Smith rather sharply; and I was only too glad to escape.

I found the real Jane Smith at the hotel: such a contrast to our fair guest! She was a short, red-haired, snub-nosed damsel, with, so far as I could judge on this short acquaintance, a rather crusty temper.

She was anything but gracious in the manner of receiving my apologies, although I paid her hotel-bill, and also for her ticket to Devonshire, as peace-offerings. It seemed she had gone to the waiting-room, "as any lady would," after the train arrived, and so missed me.

After waiting two hours she telegraphed to Caroline, and (not knowing my address) went to the nearest hotel. I was sorry for her; but after all, the mistake had been an innocent one on my part.

"You had better make haste home, Mr. Smith," was Jane's valediction to me, as she took her seat in the train for Exeter; "for I feel sure that the person you mistook for me is no better than a swindler. Depend upon it, she only wanted to get into your house for the sake of robbing it!" And with this pleasant adieu she departed.

But I could not believe this. It was certainly an odd thing for a young girl of twenty to be travelling about alone under a feigned name; but if that guest of ours proved an impostor, I would never trust human countenance again. I hurried home, all anxiety to hear her explanation; but my curiosity was not to be thus gratified. My wife met me at the door.

"That poor girl is gone."

"Not with any of our plate, I hope?"

"How absurd you are!"

"Well, tell me all about it—who she is, I mean."

"Oh," said my wife, "will you believe it, John, I know absolutely nothing still, except that her real name is not Smith!"

"Good gracious!" I exclaimed, rather uneasily.

"You need not be so suspicious," said my wife warmly. "Whatever that poor child's story is, I am sure there is nothing discreditable to her about it. After you left I began asking her about herself and her plans; but she stopped me so gently that I could say no more.

"'You have all been so good and kind to me,' she said, 'and I do not know what you must think of a stranger whose name you do not know. But mine is a long, sad story, and I hardly think I ought to tell it—at least just now. There is nothing discreditable about it—indeed there is not; but if you will not think me very ungrateful, I would rather keep my secret a little longer. All depends on the success of my Devonshire journey.

"'I came to London, expecting to be met by a relative of the friend—a Mrs. Charles Smith of York—with whom I have been staying, and through his name being the same as your husband's all this mistake occurred. I am so sorry, so ashamed;' and that was all she told me."

"And she is gone?"

"Yes; she was so anxious not to miss the train for Taunton, so I sent her with one of the servants; and, poor child, as she said 'Good-bye,' she whispered, 'Please don't think badly of me because I cannot tell you all about myself now.' John, I am sure that girl is no impostor."

It was all very mysterious; but we expected to receive some enlightenment by-and-bye. Surely our unknown guest would write or take some notice, if only in requital of our hospitality.

But weeks and months rolled away, and we heard no more of our stranger, till by degrees we ceased to talk of her—doubtless to the relief of our friends, whom I fear we bored not a little at one time when our wonder was fresh.

A year passed, the "season" came round again. My wife and I are both fond of music, so now and then I launch into the extravagance of a couple of stalls at the opera when there is anything specially worth hearing.

We were sitting listening to the prima donna's solo, when I happened to glance at the boxes; and there, just above us, in a box on the grand tier, I beheld our fair incognita.

She was just as beautiful, but looked far happier than when I had seen her a year ago. Jewels sparkled on her neck and hair; her dress was costly although simple. She was certainly not gaining a livelihood as a governess. Beside her nodded an elderly lady, who seemed rather tired of the performance.

I was obliged to wait the conclusion of the song before calling my wife's attention to my discovery; and as the curtain fell amid rapturous applause, I caught a fragment of conversation behind me.

"That pretty girl in white with the grey eyes and fair hair—do you mean the one in the box with the old lady who has been asleep half the evening? Oh, that's Lady Blanche Lestrange, one of the beauties of the year. Quite a romance her story is.

"Father quarrelled with his family, and ran away under feigned name; he died; his elder brother died; this girl, the only relative left to the old Earl, her grandfather; grand reconciliation took place some while ago; old grandfather takes her into favour.

"She's staying with Lady Crayland now (that's the sleepy old lady by her), and being introduced to London life. She was presented this month; awfully pretty girl, and will have money too."

This was a revelation! But at this moment the young lady herself, leaning forward in the box, caught sight of us. She recognised us in an instant, a bright flush rose to her cheek, and she bowed and smiled, then, turning to her chaperon, spoke a few words which seemed rather to surprise that worthy lady.

A few minutes later a boxkeeper came with a request that I would come up to Lady Crayland's box. He produced one of her ladyship's cards, below whose name was inscribed in pencil, "Miss Smith."

Of course I went gladly, for I had felt such an interest in our pretty young visitor; and then, and at a subsequent visit Lady Blanche paid at our house, our curiosity was at last satisfied.

The gossip I had heard at the opera was true. Lady Blanche's father was the younger son of the Earl of Shires. By one of those freaks of Nature, difficult to explain, he had been from infancy the exact antipodes of his father.

The Earl was grave, reserved, and proud; his younger son was giddy, eccentric, full of crochets and visions for the rehabilitation of the human race—projects which necessitated a total destruction of all existing institutions as their first step.

Digitized by Google

Probably there were faults on both sides, but the father and son never could agree on any subject; and when the young man crowned his enormities by marrying the daughter of his former tutor—a young lady of great beauty and merit, but hardly the bride his father would have selected for him—the family quarrel grew to such a height, that after a stormy scene the youth quitted the paternal mansion, vowing that he would never again hold communication with his family, or even call himself by their name.

Need I say what alias he assumed in compliance with this threat? Of course he shrouded himself under the title of Smith.

He had inherited a small property from his mother, and on this income, Mr and Mrs. Smith, as they chose to call themselves, lived abroad, for many years devoting themselves to the care and education of their only child, my visitor.

Lady Blanche grew up in perfect ignorance of her family history; but her father, although he had abjured his rank and family, was careful to educate her as though she were destined to move in the society he had voluntarily quitted.

Perhaps the knowledge that his elder brother was unmarried and an invalid, and that the succession to the earldom might one day devolve on himself, influenced him.

About a year before I met Lady Blanche this actually occurred. Lord Herbert, the elder brother, died, and "Mr. Smith" was now his father's heir.

He was too proud to attempt to open any communications directly with the Earl, but made his wife's health, which had long been failing, a pretext for returning to England, probably with some idea of making himself known. But an accident happened to the train on their journey, and "Mr. Smith" was among the victims killed on the spot.

His widow was utterly crushed by the shock. A sister of hers had married a veritable Mr. Smith, and was now residing in Yorkshire; and in her home Lady Lestrange took refuge, still calling herself by her assumed name.

A weak, gentle woman, she possessed all the obstinacy of a feeble nature; and no arguments on the part of her sister could induce her to call herself by her rightful title or communicate with her husband's family. He had wished to hide himself from them, and nothing should induce her to act contrary to his wishes.

But when her death, six months after that of her husband, left Blanche alone in the world, and examination of her affairs showed that the husband had embarked in unfortunate speculations, which left their daughter practically a beggar, Mrs. Smith, the aunt, again urged that Blanche should make her existence known to her grandfather.

It was decided that Blanche should visit him in person, her aunt rightly judging that her fair face would be her best advocate. On this errand she had come to London when I met her at the station.

Her aunt had written to her brother-in-law, a solicitor residing in London, asking him to meet Lady Blanche at the station, and receive her at his house for a night; and Mr. John Smith had duly kept his appointment. But Mrs. Smith, writing in a hurry, had mistaken the date, and requested him to meet her niece on the 26th, instead of the 25th, of the month, so that he arrived at the station exactly a day too late.

This curious chain of coincidences brought about my mistake. I need not say what was the result of Lady Blanche's Devonshire journey.

The lonely old Earl was only too delighted to own and receive her; and she was now the idol of his age, residing with him at his Devonshire estate, which she had just quitted for a short visit to London.

"But now I want most of all to explain why I appeared so ungrateful," concluded Lady Blanche. "You must have thought it strange that you never heard from me again; but it was not quite my fault. I was actually so foolish as to forget your address.

"Driving up in the cab, I never observed the name of your street; but I remember you did tell me your address in the City. In the worry and fright (for I was really afraid you would take me for an impostor) it went out of my head.

"Grandpapa had a London Directory, and we found the addresses of several Mr. John Smiths." ("I can believe that," I remarked aside.) "But when we wrote to them they were not the right ones. So, as I was to come to London in the Spring, I thought I would wait and try to find you out then; for I did so wish to thank you for all your kindness, and explain why I could not tell you this long story before."

It was a satisfactory termination to my adventure, and I am proud of my skill in physiognomy.

Lady Blanche returned to Devonshire, and I have never seen her since. The old Earl spends a great part of the year abroad; and even if they lived in London, we do not visit in the same circles, and would hardly be likely to meet frequently. But each recurring 25th of May brings a souvenir of my adventure, in the shape of a kind little note to my wife, and some pretty gift, "in remembrance of the kind reception given on this day to 'Miss Smith.'"

Lacy Hardy.

VIOLET CARYLL'S QUEST.

Telling of the Finding of an Ideal Man.

"Violet, what in the world have you been reading all the afternoon?"

The dark beauty in the hammock looked up with a little yawn, and, brushing away a fly that had made a post of observation of her piquant nose, replied:

"I've been reading a very stupid story entitled 'A Mad Marriage.'"

"Stupid!" exclaimed the blonde, opening her blue eyes to the fullest extent. "I don't think it so."

"Minnie Duncan," said Violet, "you are just the simplest-minded girl in the world."

"Violet Caryll," retorted Minnie, "I should like to know why."

"Why, my dear, you read this book, and thought it beautiful. I thought it stupid because the hero doesn't exist except in the imagination of novelists, who write for men as they ought to be, but not as they are."

"Oh, nonsense, there are good men in the world. You haven't happened to see any of them."

"Well, you must acknowledge, dear, that I've had plenty of chance to find them. I looked in vain for one in London, I saw none in Paris, I saw none in Italy, I saw none anywhere. I found the same old worn-out types, the man of fashion and the man of reason; but the man of noble soul I never met."

"I think I have met one," said Minnie softly, with a tender light in her eyes.

"Oh, yes, you are in love, and you think your lover a hero! Go on, marry him, then you'll find out your deity is only a little clay idol after all. Bah, I hate men!"

There was a step on the gravel walk, and, turning round, Minnie saw a bronzed and bearded fellow, her fair-haired cousin.

"Oh, Tom," she cried, "how glad I am to see you!"

"My sweet little cousin," he said, stroking her golden hair. "So you missed me, eh? But you took good care to console yourself by finding a resting place for this bright head. God bless you, Minnie, I hope you'll be very happy."

And he stooped and kissed her gently on the forehead.

"But, oh, Tom!" she said, "I am forgetting," and turning to where Violet Caryll lay half concealed by the corner of the house, she said:

"Let me present you to my dearest friend, Violet Caryll. Violet, my cousin, Mr. Neville."

Violet bowed without rising from her recumbent posture, and Neville smiled slightly as he thought: "Independent and saucy as she can be!"

Digitized by Google

Tom Neville was a magnificent man, six feet one inch high, straight as an arrow, powerful in every sinew, with flaxen hair and beard, and a bright grey eye, but, nevertheless, the calm of this girl annoyed him.

"Tom," said Minnie, "I hear mamma going upstairs, and I want to speak to her. Excuse me, please!"

And Minnie ran into the house, leaving her cousin and her friend together.

"Miss Caryll," Tom said after a moment's silence, "what are you reading?"

"Dear me, Mr. Neville," replied Violet, "what a stupid question! Whenever I read, everyone who cannot find something else to say asks me what I am reading. I might answer you, like Hamlet, 'Words, words, words,' but I'll have compassion on your ignorance and tell you. I am, or was till you came in, reading 'A Mad Marriage.'"

"Do you like novels?"

"Yes, or I shouldn't read them. Nevertheless, I find many of them very provoking, especially those written by women."

"Why?"

"Because they create ideal men, such as we look for in vain in real life. But there are no such men."

"There have been men," said Tom, "who gave up all for love. Antony found it——"

"That will do!" cried Violet. "Poor Marc Antony has been dead and buried nineteen hundred years. Don't, for goodness' sake, don't drag him out and make him the scapegoat of your sex any more."

"Miss Caryll, I am sorry you are so bitter on my sex."

"What are you two discussing?" said Minnie, running out on the verandah. "It's growing dark, too. I hope you haven't been quarrelling."

"Oh, no," said Violet with a sneer, "it takes two people to quarrel, and they must both have some decided characteristics!"

* * * * *

Violet was sitting by the river one afternoon reading. Tom came in from rowing and went and sat down by her.

"What are you reading?" he asked.

"The same old question," she replied. "I am reading the same impossible things about the grand love of man for woman."

"And you don't believe it?"

"No."

Tom sprang to his feet.

"Miss Caryll—Violet," he said, "this is too much. You know that I have not watched your every movement for the past six months for amusement. You know that I love you, that I worship you. Tell me I am not mad."

He stretched out both hands to her and stood still. But she rose with a laugh.

"Good-bye, Mr. Neville," she said and, turning she went up the path, leaving him alone.

Tom flung himself upon the greensward and stared blankly out upon the river.

A week passed, Minnie was standing on the verandah, and Violet was mounting her horse for a ride.

"Tom goes away to-morrow, Violet," said Minnie.

"Does he?" said Violet, with a half-suppressed sigh.

"Yes, poor fellow, your refusal has broken his heart."

"His is a—go on, King!" exclaimed Violet, suddenly striking her horse with her little riding whip.

She rode out into the woods among the hills. There was at her heart a dull pain she could not understand. She knew that since she had laughed Tom Neville's love to scorn something of the world's brightness had faded, and yet she told herself every hour, every minute, that she did not care for him, nor for any man. She rode on and on, heedless of the coming night.

Over in the silent west big, black clouds were gathering, and lightning danced across the sky.

But Violet was too deep in her thoughts to notice these things. And presently the storm burst upon her with all its fury.

At the first drop of rain she turned to go home, but the terrific flash of lightning, accompanied by a deafening burst of thunder, broke down from the inky heavens, and a towering tree fell, splintered and blasted, immediately behind her horse. The terrified beast, mad with fright, dashed down the road at a wild gallop. Violet tugged at the reins till her little hands were purple and swollen, but to no purpose. On went the horse, faster and faster.

Turning another short curve in the road she saw another large tree lying directly across her path. Then she knew her fate. She had often heard of frightened horses running headlong into stone walls, and she knew her horse would not stop till he had hurled himself against the fallen monarch of the hills.

She closed her eyes in terror. Then she felt a sudden slackening of her horse's speed; and she opened her eyes to find Tom Neville holding the bit in an iron grasp, while the horse, still struggling forward, trampled under foot the manly limbs. But Tom never let go his hold till the brute stopped and Violet dismounted.

"Thank God, you are safe!"

"But you are hurt!" she cried, wringing her hands. "Oh, what shall I do?"

"I am—sorry," he said, with an effort, his face becoming pale, "to trouble you, Miss Caryll, but I fear—you—will have to go home—alone—and send someone—after me."

For a moment Violet hesitated, and then, remounting her still trembling horse, she rode away.

As soon as her back was turned, Tom Neville sank back senseless, for both his legs were broken.

When Tom returned to consciousness he found himself in his own room, in bed, with both his legs confined in a casing of plaster of Paris.

Violet came in after a while.

"Mr. Neville," said Violet, in a low, tremulous voice. "I have come to thank you for my life, and to ask you to forgive me."

"To forgive you?"

"Yes, for hurting you, first in your heart, and then in your limbs. If I could only give my life to atone for the wrong I have done you!"

And tears rolled down her cheeks while she buried her face in her hands.

For a few minutes both were silent. Then she looked up and their eyes met.

"Violet," he asked softly, "will you give your life to atone for my pain? Will you give it—to me?"

"Tom!" she cried, throwing herself on her knees beside the bed; "take me! I love you!"

A. R. Manice.

Digitized by Google

THE END OF A FEUD.

In which Love Set All Things Right.

"But isn't she pretty, though?" murmured Mrs. Lambert.

Mr. Lambert responded by a look too full of gratification for words.

They were not quite in their dotage, these two old people, but they were very old, and the appearance of their long expected niece at their home had produced upon them an overwhelming sensation.

Not only was it a novelty to have a young person in the house, but such a perfectly radiant creature was rare in any house.

Such a face of roses and lilies, with burnished curls of gold drooping on the low brow—sweet eyes of dark violet and Heaven's own smile.

Nothing like Juliet Faye's beauty was ever seen at Arcott, and the old people were sure, with her gentle manners, that she was as good as she was pretty.

She was the youngest child of Mrs. Lambert's youngest sister, lately deceased, and she had come to the Lilies to reside permanently.

"Sixteen! Old enough to come out," murmured Mrs. Lambert. "And such a little lady! Lydia Bellingham has no such girl among hers!"

Now it had secretly vexed dear Mrs. Lambert that Mrs. Bellingham, her social rival, had always a crowd of pretty granddaughters and nieces at her house, making the place, since young ladies are irresistibly attractive, very popular. But not one was to compare with the lovely Juliet.

Juliet, escaping after two hours' examination, from her relatives' presence, was allured down the main walk of the old garden.

It was indeed a garden of lilies. Yellow day-lilies drooped in beds, white ones gleamed, and clumps of spotted tigers glowed in the sun, while the red velvety amaryllis burnt like fire among the green.

Coming at length to the water, the girl uttered a cry of delight; for, dappled with sunshine, shimmered hosts of lovely white water-lilies. She clasped her hands in ecstasy.

She was certainly charming in her azure dress and with pretty uncovered head, at the edge of the water; and perhaps the occupant of a little canopied boat up the river thought so, for silently the boat glided away from its moorings among the willows and came slipping along the dark waters of the pool.

"Would you like some lilies?" asked a baritone voice.

And, turning, startled, Juliet saw the handsomest young man she had ever seen in her life sitting in the stern of the pretty boat, his hat in his hand. The voice, the attitude, the courteous question, disarmed apprehension.

"Yes, I should," she replied, with only a natural constraint.

In an instant the young gentleman had changed his seat and shot among them. In a moment he had a great, fragrant, dripping handful, and the young girl's eagerness and delight brought a smile to his rather gloomy countenance.

"Oh, I never saw anything so beautiful!" she cried.

"I suppose they are pretty," replied the young man; "but I've seen them every June for five years, and they haven't the charm of novelty for me. Indeed, nothing here has. You are a stranger, are you not?"

He had pushed his boat among the rushes to hand her the flowers, and sat looking over his shoulder at the roseate face she turned to him.

"Yes, I have come to the Lilies to live. Mrs. Lambert is my aunt."

The young man gave vent to a soft, low whistle.

"Sorry," he said.

Then laughing, and with his usually wearied expression displaced by one of mirth, he was such a very handsome fellow that Juliet was lost in admiration; but in an instant the girl's expression changed.

"Why?" she asked.

"Well, you know," replied her companion frankly, "I haven't seen such a pretty girl as you are since I have lived here, and I would like to have an introduction and call at your home, if it was any other place. But at the Lilies—out of the question," he concluded.

Then, as she regarded him in perplexity, he lifted his straw hat, and with a pleasant parting glance, pulled away out of the pool and round a sudden bend of the river out of sight.

Juliet breathed in the delicious odour of her lilies pensively, and turned homewards. Her adventure had been a pleasure, but it left a regret.

"I never met anybody so nice," she said. "But he will forget me."

That evening her Aunt Lambert said:

"My dear, I hope you will be discreet as you are pretty—about making acquaintances, for one thing."

"Yes, aunt," murmured Juliet, with a little blush.

"Be choice—be select. Above all, don't admit the Brennans to your acquaintance."

"Who are they, auntie?"

"The Brennans are uncle and nephew, who live on the next estate, separated by the river. Colonel Brennan is very wealthy, and Roland, his nephew, is his heir. The former is a bachelor."

"Why mustn't I know them?" asked Juliet.

Digitized by Google

"On account of a family feud which has existed for twenty years," replied the old lady solemnly. "Twenty years ago, my dear, you must know that my daughter, your cousin Emily, was a very pretty girl. She was engaged to Colonel Brennan—then only Lieutenant Brennan. He seemed fond of her; she adored him. Suddenly, without cause or explanation, he jilted Emily—dropped the engagement in silence, and she making her wedding clothes! It nearly killed my poor girl.

"Her father threatened to shoot him, but I said, 'No violence!' I preferred the dignified course. I nursed my poor child, dragged her about in travel—kept her from mourning herself to death—until I met Admiral Phillips, and I persuaded Emily to marry him. He was older than she, but he was rich and an upright man, and I knew would make her a good husband, and I knew she would learn to love him. She did; but we have never forgiven Colonel Brennan—your uncle and I—and we never shall!"

"Has he married?" asked Juliet, her blue eyes wide with this disastrous love tale.

"No. I never knew why," replied Mrs. Lambert.

Another afternoon found Juliet again in the garden.

Her footsteps strayed again to the lily pool.

Looking across the river, and seeing the walls of a grand, grey mansion rising among the green, a suspicion that she had already admitted one of the forbidden Brennans to her acquaintance crept into her heart.

Yet a blush and a smile illuminated her lovely countenance as she saw the pretty canopied boat float out from among the willows.

"Good afternoon," called out the young man across the lily pads, and indeed he looked quite vivacious; "I was in hopes you would come down here. Isn't it a lovely day?"

He pulled up among the bobbing pads.

"Would you like some more lilies?"

"Yes," returned Juliet, "but—but," she faltered, "I am afraid you are one of the Brennans, and I am forbidden to know them."

He looked up with an understanding glance and a smile.

"If I am, you will have to excuse me for it. We will have the lilies in any event," pulling at the long, glistening, pink-green stems; "now these are regular beauties—the finest of the season. Glad I can do something for you. It's very jolly to have a young lady down here. I was lonely. Do you want any more?" loading her hands. "Won't you come into the boat?" he added earnestly, seeming to apprehend that the meeting would now end; "it's nice here on the water, and very comfortable, and if I am a Brennan, I am respectable," he added.

He met her wistful eyes with sympathy.

"You want to come—I see you do. And, you see, you don't know that I am a Brennan," he laughed.

"No," faltered Juliet.

And the sunshine was so bright on the crystal stream, the shadows so golden-green under the willows, the distance so alluring, she set a little foot in the boat and in a moment was far down the river, winding between the rushes.

A heaven on earth followed, "for gay youth loves gay youth," and green and blue were glad together that afternoon. But when Juliet sprang upon the grass again the smile faded from her face.

"I know well enough that you are Roland Brennan," she said. "Thank you for a nice time, but please don't ask me to go boating again. My aunt is very kind to me, and I don't wish to disobey her."

"But what am I to do?" asked the young man quickly. "I never had such a happy afternoon in my life. Why, I'm terribly lonely. My uncle won't let me associate with Tom, Dick, and Harry, even if I wanted to, because we are rich and must keep up the dignity of the family. And he won't let me take up a profession or learn a business because he wants to keep me with him. He's a grand old fellow; but, oh, it's dreadful here for me. I suppose you think it cruelty, but I've come to almost hate the place, and now I like you so well you—you are going to throw me over."

"Oh, no," said Juliet, blushing. "I couldn't do anything so rude," innocently. "I—I presume we shall meet sometimes?"

"Where?"

"In society. I am to be at the picnic to-morrow; and my aunt is to take me next week to spend a few days with Mrs. Bellingham."

"Good! Then I see my way clear," exclaimed the young man, throwing up his hat enthusiastically.

At the picnic at Mrs. Bellingham's hospitable house, at parties and balls, this Romeo and Juliet met; and, though the girl's heart quaked sometimes under her aunt's proud old eyes, and a sorrowful shame filled her breast, Roland Brennan's tact staved off discovery until late in the autumn.

Juliet knew that by a word, a smile, she made this handsome lover very happy, and if a proud and resentful relative was to be made miserable by the fact that she loved this forbidden young man as dearly as he loved her, she could not feel quite altogether to blame.

If Aunt Lambert had been stern she would not have cared at all, but she was the most indulgent of guardians, and Juliet could not be altogether happy, though she lay among the roses and fed on the lilies of life.

Then Mrs. Emily Phillips came from abroad.

She was a pretty, blooming woman of forty, evidently with a perfectly sound heart. She had been a widow a year. She had a sunny smile, and Juliet liked her.

Juliet had committed herself to a secret skating expedition with Roland Brennan. The river was frozen for the first time, and both were passionately fond of the amusement.

She had run lightly down the snowy garden, and had caught Roland's arm with a merry salutation, when two figures, warmly wrapped in furs, stepped from under the pine trees.

Roland started violently; the little skates dropped with a clang from Juliet's nerveless hand.

"Juliet!" cried Aunt Lambert reproachfully.

"Mr. Roland Brennan!" pronounced Uncle Lambert stiffly.

The four eyed each other solemnly in the moonlight. Roland was the first to recover himself.

"Mr. Lambert," he said, "give me an opportunity to talk this over with you."

"No time like the present. Come to the house," said Uncle Lambert.

So the four marched into the dimly-lit drawing-room.

"I can never, never forgive Juliet!" sobbed Aunt Lambert, breaking down and throwing herself into an easy chair.

"But I fail to see," commenced Roland, manfully addressing both the old people, "where we have done any harm. How could I help loving Juliet, having first seen her by accident? I would die to save her a sorrow! Have a care, Mr. Lambert, how you slight so honest a love as mine for your niece, who, excepting you, has no other friend in the world, I believe. Am I so bad a match for her?"

"Your uncle, young man, treated my daughter very badly!" exclaimed Mrs. Lambert. "The family feud——"

"Here let it end," pronounced a pleasant voice from behind, and Mrs. Phillips and an elderly gentleman advanced into the apartment. "I have forgiven Colonel Brennan."

"I was lied to by a rival," interrupted Colonel Brennan. "I was induced to believe that Emily was to jilt me at the last minute. I denied myself ever seeing her again, but I have been a very unhappy man, my friends. When I had reason to believe I had been deceived, the woman I loved was far away. Before I could reach her she was married. After all these years she has forgiven me."

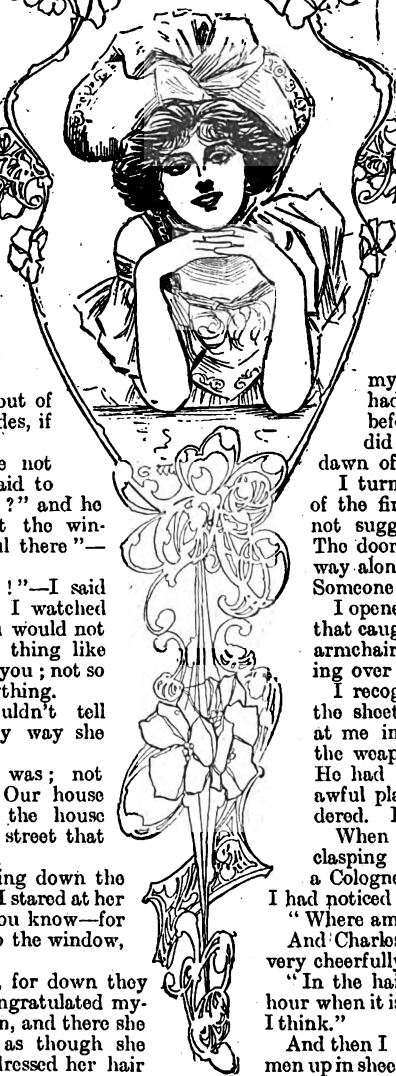
"We are to be married at Christmas, so let resentment against these young folks end. Let us all be happy together," said Emily with her sunny smile, which was so contagious that Aunt Lambert snatched weeping Juliet to her breast and kissed her.

Then all the women kissed each other and the three men shook hands. And there has never been a shadow of trouble in the family since.

Clara Aspen.

Digitized by Google

ONLY A MODEL.



The Story of a Jealous Wife.

SHE sat at the window constantly. I'm not a jealous woman but I must say I could not help noticing that from the first.

The window was opposite the dining-room window, and the dining-room was also our sitting-room. And there she was all the time Charles Augustus was at home. I did not see him look at her, but of course he did. Men are all alike. Besides, if I saw her, why shouldn't he?

If he had frankly owned it, I'd have not thought of the matter; but when I said to him, "That's rather a pretty girl, isn't it?" and he said, "What girl?" And I said, "At the window." And he said, "Haven't seen a soul there"—why I began to be suspicious.

So, when I'd said, "Ah!"—just "ah!"—I said no more, but I watched; and the more I watched the more unpleasant matters grew. You would not have liked it either, to see a bold-faced thing like that staring at your husband, I can tell you; not so much as pretending to read or sew, or anything.

I am a little near-sighted, and I couldn't tell what her expression was; but the very way she carried her head was enough for me.

I'll tell you just where the window was; not opposite, but at the side, as it were. Our house was the first house in the street, and the house with the window was the first in the street that crossed it.

At first I contented myself with pulling down the blinds, but she never minded that. Then I stared at her—after Charles Augustus had gone out, you know—for she kept there still. But a man came to the window, and of course I had to go away.

I suppose he pulled their blinds down, for down they were at all events, pretty soon, and I congratulated myself; but next morning they were up again, and there she was, with her hair in puffs and curls, as though she were going to a ball. No woman ever dressed her hair in that way before breakfast without having some reason for it.

Now, Charles Augustus and I had only been married a year, and I had no fault to find with him; but still, men are so much alike all the world over, and it was odd he never spoke of her. If he had said, "What a very forward young person," or, "It must annoy you, my dear, to have anyone staring like that, into your room," or something of that sort, it would have seemed so much better.

I felt sure he noticed her, and at last I knew it. He had bidden me good-bye just as fondly as possible, and pretending that he had something to do which obliged him to go out earlier than usual; and, ten minutes after, happening to go to my window, I saw him in that room. Yes, at the very window, with that impudent creature. I felt my head swim, and I couldn't see or hear anything for a moment. Then I summoned all my courage.

"Edith Robins," I said to myself, "you must do something. You must not sit down tamely and let this go on. Put on your hat, go round the corner, enter the door, and face that creature; put an end to this abominable flirtation at once, before worse comes of it."

At once I grew strong. I rose and put on my hat and jacket. I took my parasol in my hand, and, choking down my tears, walked slowly out of the door I had entered a happy bride twelve months before. Should I ever be happy again? I did not know; perhaps this was but the dawn of some great misery.

I turned the corner and entered the hallway of the first house. It was dingy and dark. It did not suggest the neighbourhood of refined people. The doors were all closely shut, but I made my way along the hall and knocked at the first one. Someone called "Come in."

I opened the door and entered. The first thing that caught my eyes was a tall figure, sitting in an armchair, wrapped in a sheet. A man was bending over him. Something glittered in the air.

I recognised the face of Charles Augustus in the sheeted form, and the ruffian who had stared at me in the dreadful creature who brandished the weapon over his head. It was all plain to me. He had by some means been beguiled into this awful place that he might be robbed and murdered. I gave a shriek and fainted away.

When I came to myself Charles Augustus was clasping me in his arms, and a strange man held a Cologne bottle to my nose, while the bold creature I had noticed stared down at me. I gasped:

"Where am I?"

And Charles Augustus answered very kindly, but not very cheerfully,

"In the hairdresser's, my dear, and as it is just the hour when it is busiest, the sooner we get home the better, I think."

And then I began to understand. They wrap gentlemen up in sheets before they cut their hair and shave them, you know, and the deadly weapon was a razor. And the bold creature—well, there she stood, and she certainly had her hair curled and puffed—but as below her shoulders she was only a wooden block, it did not matter. I had been jealous of a hairdresser's sign!

A. B. Charter.

"You are a queer girl. I never know how to take you." "Pshaw! Why, the trams go right by the door." "What door?" "The Metropole Theatre."

"SHE is so aristocratic; says she never will marry a man who is in business for himself." "How particular! I dare says she prefers someone more like herself—in everybody else's business."

HE (tremblingly): "I have one last wi-wish to ask you be-before we part in an-anger for ever." She (sobbingly): "Wha-what is it, Geo-George?" He: "Wi-will you me-meet me next Th-Thursday, as us-usual?" She: "I wi-will, George"

Digitized by Google

Letter Juggling Competition.

CASH DOWN. FIRST PRIZE, £25.	CASH DOWN. SECOND PRIZE, £10.	CASH DOWN. THIRD PRIZE, £5.

TWO BILLIARD TABLES (measuring 4 ft. 10 inches by 2 ft. 8½ inches), together with cues, balls, marking board, and spirit level,
And TWENTY-FIVE GRAMOPHONES, each one fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, and accompanied by two records.

• • • • • • •

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct. Only one name must be written on each line.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES." Six more lists will appear.

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

EXAMPLE:
ABGHIIMMNR... Birmingham.

SIXTH LIST.

61. AEGNRT	67. CHHIINT .....
62. CENOPRSTW	68. ENNORTV .....
63. AEHLLOOPRT	69. ABEEENORSTU .....
64. BENORRTU	70. ABEELNSWYY .....
65. ADFLORS	71. ADLLOR .....
66. ABELNORTY	72. ADEEGRRT .....

Name..... Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

The Course of True Love.

The Story of a Proposal that was Badly Worded.

It was a warm, cloudless Saturday afternoon in July. The sun beat down with such fierceness on the river that the boats had nearly all sought shelter. Many of them were moored at Eccleston Ferry whilst the owners consumed strawberries and cream in the pleasant tea-rooms there.

At various places along the stream where the trees grew over the river banks, solitary boats were lying hidden beneath the overhanging foliage.

Occasionally a light skiff shot swiftly past, leaving a silver trail along the stream. The occupant heard the clatter of tea cups, the tinkling of spoons, a sudden peal of laughter, and, if he were a stranger, he glanced in amazement along the apparently deserted river, drowsing faintly in the heat. Then he bent to the oars and sent the skiff forward with a leap. It was not his turn to-day.

One poor solitary being, however, had better luck than the others. Just before he reached the outskirts of the city he was recognised by a girl who leant over a garden wall.

He pulled in towards the bank, whilst she ran to a gate and re-appeared in a twinkling at the top of the private landing stairs. And in another minute she was seated at the bow with the rudder lines in her hands, and the boat swept into the stream again.

"We could not have had more beautiful weather," she said presently. "It's almost perfect, especially for the one who steers."

"I'm quite satisfied with my share of the work," he answered.

"But you must be very fond of rowing."

"No, it isn't that, I'm afraid you don't understand," he said slowly.

"No?"

"I wouldn't change places with anyone else because——"

"Did you hear that teaspoon?" she interrupted, tragically. "I wonder what they're having. Do you know, Jack, it's abominally greedy of me, but I'd change places with anyone who would offer me a cup of tea and a slice of cake."

"I have the materials here in the boat, and as soon as we find a quiet corner, we'll make tea if you wish."

"And the Genoa cake?"

"Yes, that was the sort you told me to get."

"I thought perhaps you might have forgotten it," she said, and smiled in relief.

"I never forget," he answered.

It was one of Jack Shrewsbury's limitations that he could not make love gracefully. The art of paying compliments was one he rather despised, and perhaps the girls thought no less of him on that account.

As a matter of fact, there are two classes that find favour, the men who pay compliments and the men who don't. But apart from this, there was something about the dogged strength of Jack's character that most people liked.

This was to be their last afternoon together on the river, for he had been transferred to a branch office of his firm at Leicester and was due there on Monday morning.

Most of his belongings had already gone, and this being a Saturday afternoon, he had arranged to meet Grace Churchill that they might have a final picnic on the river together. For they were already good friends these two, and drifting into a still closer friendship.

They soon found a quiet corner where the overhanging trees afforded shelter, and here he ran the skiff in close to the bank and tied the rope to some branches. And then he opened a mysterious black bag and produced a bewildering array of good things.

Tea, sugar, tinned milk, bread, butter, Genoa cake, a little camp stove, a bottle of methylated spirit, a tin kettle, and everything else necessary for a successful picnic. But he produced them all in such a serious kind of way, as though the whole affair were a matter of business, that poor Grace had to look at the Genoa cake several times to keep up her cheerfulness. And as for any thoughts she may have had on a subject even more important than Genoa cake it was not her fault if these thoughts grew less friendly as the afternoon wore on.

"I've something very special to say," he remarked after tea. "It's the last chance I shall have for some time, Grace, so I thought I'd better ask you now."

"Yes?"

"It will be very lonely in lodgings away in Leicester," he said thoughtfully.

"Yes, I suppose so."

She was pulling idly, and yet with a certain impatience at an overhanging branch, as she spoke. It slipped from her fingers suddenly and the sudden recoil caused the boat to rock a little.

"All due to nervousness," he said calmly, and smiled. "It's evidently time that somebody began to look after you, Grace. That's the matter about which I want to speak to you. And first about my position at the office, it has a rather important bearing on the subject."

"Are you certain of that?" she said, colouring a little, "because if your position has very little to do with—with what you were going to speak about, would it not be better not to mention it?"

"It is the most important part of the subject," he interrupted, and she shrugged her shoulders a little scornfully and said no more. But her eyes were troubled as she sat and watched the water lapping quietly against the side of the boat.

Girls are apt to think so much of the details of a proposal, and yet, had she but known, it was only the rugged honesty of his nature which caused him to place the money aspect first.

Digitized by Google

"I have £175 a year now, and they have promised me an advance at Christmas," he said presently; "and it would take us until next Spring to find a suitable house and to arrange about this and that and the other. But I thought I'd better mention it to you this afternoon as we may not meet again for some time."

She made no comment, so he continued:

"Of course it is not so much my present salary as the prospect this Leicester appointment offers. It will very likely lead to a district managership at £300 to £500 a year. What do you think, Grace?"

"About what?"

"About what I asked you."

"You haven't asked me anything," she answered, and gave him a glance that should have fired any heart less than fifty years of age. It was only her womanly pride which refused to yield to him, all else was won. But although he really did love her with all his heart, he took no account of womanly pride.

"I have asked you to marry me," he answered with just the faintest excitement in his voice.

"And I—oh, let us drop the subject," she said miserably.

"I should like to have an answer."

"Then it must be 'No.'"

"No!"

"It is such a beautiful afternoon," she said hastily, trying to hide her distress. "See how the sunlight comes glinting through these leaves and branches. And I think the air is cooler now, the boats are creeping out into the river again. Won't you take me home?"

"As you wish," he said slowly, and with something suspiciously like a groan. "I should not have spoken as I did, I am sorry to have troubled you, but I have lived in a fool's paradise all the summer. Well, it can't be helped.

"Is there no chance that you will change your mind, Grace?" he said wistfully. "I don't mind waiting. I don't mind what hard conditions you make if only I may hope to win you at the end. Don't you think you might become fonder of me in time? You do like me a little, don't you, Grace?"

"I don't know," she murmured, and felt her resistance weakening. If only he had spoken like this at first!

"But you must tell me. Do you like me at all, just as a friend?"

"Yes."

"Do you care for me a little more than for your other friends?"

"I don't know. How can I tell?"

"But you must tell," he said, and leaning forward he clasped her hands. "Don't you care for me a little more than for the others?"

He removed his hat and stood before her bareheaded, but she took no notice.

The sunbeams peeped curiously between the leaves and danced upon the water as it washed idly against the sides of the boat. Everything seemed to be waiting for her reply to this question. And she raised her eyes suddenly and looked at him as surely no one had looked before.

"Yes, I do," she said, and then, afraid lest she had said too much. "I don't know anyone else," she added naively.

"Then will you promise me," he cried triumphantly. "that you will marry me when I have £300 a year?"

"That has nothing to do with it," she said, and drew her hands away.

"I don't understand."

"Let us go home," she said hurriedly. "I am tired of the subject, you must not mention it again."

"But I thought——"

"I don't want to hear another word."

He protested and begged and demanded in turn, but all in vain, for her womanly pride was thoroughly roused by this time. They backed the boat into the open stream and he bent to his work with a will.

The heat of the early afternoon had gone, but the river lay like a sheet of silver, rippling softly beneath the breeze. The boat swept forward at a great rate, for Jack was pulling a long, concentrated stroke that held more than an echo of his disappointed hopes.

When they reached the private landing stairs, he held the boat steady whilst she alighted. They looked at each other for a moment in silence.

"Is there no hope?" he said presently.

"No hope."

"Don't you care sufficiently to wait for me? But there," he added bitterly, "a poor beggar like me has no chance. I can see your face harden each time I mention my position at the office."

"You are unkind now."

"Perhaps I am, though Heaven knows I don't wish to be so. Good bye, Grace."

They shook hands in silence and then she turned suddenly and fled through the doorway.

"If only he had said he loved me, I would have married him to-morrow," she thought, and then, sinking on to a garden seat, she covered her face with her hands and cried as though her heart were breaking.

And Jack turned away, and pulled moodily down the stream, lost in amazement that Grace, of all girls, should be so mercenary.

The consolation that Jack applied to his wounded heart was not creditable either to himself or to Grace. As a matter-of-fact, although he tried to make up his mind that Grace had refused him because she did not expect he would ever attain to a managership, he was not such a curmudgeon as to believe it.

But he tried hard to believe that this was the reason, and when he went off to Leicester on Monday morning it was with a firm determination to prove his boast, or perish in the attempt.

Digitized by Google

The dogged, unyielding nature of the man came to his aid. He flung himself into the struggle with irresistible energy, working early and late.

As time went on the spirit of the fight gripped him body and soul, it fascinated him. Here was life worth living, the life of the commercial arena, where pluck and firmness were bound to win.

He became a manager, and that in less than four years. And having thus attained one object of his ambition he resolved to journey to Chester to try if he could not compass the other.

But apparently the Fates willed otherwise, for just at this high tide of his fortunes, some American financiers, who had presumably outworn their commercial reputations at home, came to England and cast covetous eyes upon the trade wherein Jack was engaged. The British manufacturers, scenting danger, joined their forces to meet the invader and the result was a huge combine of some twenty businesses.

The next step was the reduction of the staff, particularly those in the higher ranks, by something like fifty per cent. Here Jack's cleverness and previous success did him the unkindest turn of all.

His rapid progress had aroused the envy of those below him, as much as the jealous alarm of his immediate superiors and when the time came for the final selection, he found himself ignominiously in the cold.

He soon obtained another situation, but the salary was only £130 a year as against his former £300. Well, it was not his fault, he had done his best, and besides the fight was not over yet. He was still in the same business, and might yet work his way higher than he had gone before.

And then in the midst of his meditations, he suddenly thrust away all thought of the struggle, and there came into his mind a vision of a broad, smooth, flowing river, with banks all overhung with trees, and light skiffs that darted here and there amid the sunshine.

He was not due at his new situation for three days. He had not been to Chester since—then he shrugged his shoulders despairingly at the thought that that dream was all over now. But all the time he was throwing his things into his bag with a reckless haste that grew upon him with every minute.

He knew, or thought he knew, that his affair with Grace was quite impossible now, but still that wild longing tore at his heart and drove him half-unwillingly to the other side of England.

The bitterness of temporary failure, so galling to a determined nature, was upon him, and he longed to escape if only for a few days, from the scene of his disaster. And so he took his ticket and set out for Chester—perhaps the quaintest, most mediæval city in England. Here, he thought would be peace, with a rest from all ambitious dreams. But here, had he only known it, he was to experience the bitterest shock of all.

By a curious coincidence one of the first people he saw on leaving the station at Chester was Grace's brother. He was running to catch a train, so there was only time to shake hands hurriedly and make an appointment for that evening.

Jack felt quite pleased by this little meeting, for no doubt Grace would hear of it, and—and would laugh, he told himself bitterly, to think how his boast had come true one minute, to be falsified the next.

Nevertheless he hired a skiff that afternoon and rowed quietly down the stream. As he drew nearer to the well-remembered garden his heart began to beat faster.

He had no desire to force his company, but if he could see her only for a minute as he rowed past—and at that very moment he did see her coming quietly down the garden path. He stopped rowing and the boat began to drift quietly with the stream.

Presently she came to the end of the garden, and stood with her elbows leaning upon the low wall, looking thoughtfully down the river.

Jack's pride, his resolution, were all swept away in an instant, before an irresistible surge of passion. He rose to his feet, although the narrow skiff rocked dangerously as he did so.

He took off his hat and stood before her bare-headed, with his eyes shining, seeing only her. And she turned scornfully away, with an unmistakable curl of the lips, and deliberately walked back into the house.

Two hours later Jack sat in his lodgings almost broken-hearted, with his tea standing untasted before him. There was no possibility of mistake for she had deliberately cut him dead, and no doubt had done so to let him know her opinion of his failure at Leicester.

Well, each to his taste, but it was not what he expected from Grace, of all people. But even yet he refused to admit that she had been to blame. There was some misunderstanding somewhere, she must have heard some distorted tales of his misfortunes.

"A letter for you, sir," said the landlady, "just come by the afternoon post."

He took it from her mechanically, and she left the room again. Then he glanced at the writing and his indifference vanished in an instant. He ripped the envelope from end to end, and drew out a correspondence card, from which he read as follows:

"Dear Jack,—George tells us you are back in Chester for a few days' holiday, and that he arranged to meet you to-night. Unfortunately he has had to go to Manchester on business so cannot keep his appointment, but if you will call round here this evening, mother and I will be pleased to see you.

"We were very sorry indeed to hear of your ill-luck just when you were on the high road to success, but hope the reverse will be only temporary.

"Yours sincerely,

"Grace Churchill."

Jack leant back in his chair and stared amazedly at the letter. How could he reconcile these words with the events of the afternoon? Twist and turn his theories as he would he arrived continually at the same result.

The argument that explained the scornful turning aside in the afternoon could not interpret the friendly tone of the letter he had just received, although it was evident that the same argument would have to suit both.

Anyhow the letter was there, and it cheered him wonderfully, so much so that he promptly attacked his tea and punished the marmalade and the lettuces tremendously. And then, like a sensible fellow, he decided to go round and answer the letter in person.

As he walked through the quiet, old-fashioned streets, the twilight was already beginning to fall upon the city, although it was only about seven o'clock.

Somehow the letter was gaining the ascendency in his mind. Not that he doubted the events of the afternoon, they were too recent and too undeniable for that, but he became more convinced every moment that there was some mistake, which a few words with Grace would soon put right.

He did not feel quite so hopeless about other matters now. Of course he told himself once for all about every alternate minute that his chance with Grace was nil, and that, in fact, he could not even ask her again as matters were at present, but in spite of all this there was a distinct feeling of hope in his heart as he opened the garden gate and strode briskly along the path.

It was almost dark now, and as he neared the house he distinguished two figures standing in the porch and whispering earnestly together. Evidently it was a farewell of some kind, for they presently shook hands, and the tall figure stooped and kissed his companion several times.

Jack drew back, not wishing to spy upon them, and the next moment the man had torn himself away and run lightly past him down the path.

Digitized by Google

The girl remained at the door until Jack came forward into the open space in front of the steps. Then she looked at him hurriedly, as though startled, and suddenly ran into the house without a word. But before this, even though she stood in the shadow, he had recognised Grace.

He turned away with a heavy sigh. After this, it was out of the question for him to pay his visit as he had intended.

If she had become engaged to somebody else, it would have been kinder to have told him, he thought. And so he neared the gate, and seeing a garden seat, he flung himself upon it with a groan and stared moodily at the ground.

Someone opened the gate lightly and entering the garden, stared curiously at him for a moment, then, apparently satisfied as to his identity. "George," she said anxiously. "Whatever are you doing there?"

Jack sprang to his feet and strode towards her. "You are mistaken," he said bitterly. "My name is Shrewsbury."

"Jack! Is that you?" Her voice had lost its anxious tone and was full of delighted surprise. "What are you doing by yourself there?" she added, "come into the house at once."

"Had we not better say good-bye, here and now? I didn't know you were engaged, Grace, until——"

"Until when?"

"I saw you just now at your front door bidding good night to—to George, I suppose."

"You recognised me?"

"Yes."

"You are quite sure? Come closer, Jack, and say if it was I you saw."

He came closer and stared eagerly at her with a new hope springing in his heart.

"Are you still certain?" she asked presently.

"I am certain of your voice, Grace, but you seem older than before. And your dress is different."

Then she broke into a sudden peal of laughter. "The one you saw at the front door was Doris, my younger sister. They say she is exactly like I was four years ago. She was away at a boarding school and spent the first half of the holidays with friends, that summer when——" She stopped, colouring slightly.

"When you gave such a shock to my self-esteem."

"Only to your self-esteem?"

"To far more than that," he answered, "and experiences in business have made me think your opinion of me was right, Grace."

"I did not express any opinion."

"You said you did not care for me."

"No, no," she murmured. "I didn't say that."

"Then what did your refusal mean?"

"It meant that I wouldn't marry you for your money, or position, or prospects," she said, "that was all."

"Well?"

"You didn't ask me if I would marry you for any other reason," she continued quietly.

"I have no right to ask you now," he said sadly.

Then she stepped forward and looked him bravely in the face.

"That is not for you to say," she said, with that affectionate wilfulness which had always charmed him. "You must ask me at once, and leave it to me to decide."

Wal Frank.

Mrs. Sniffles: "Henry, I think I hear mice gnawing at the dining-room door." Sniffles: "Don't be alarmed, dear; it's only the cook writing a letter to her lover."

"Bunkins, I believe, is about the smartest man of his years in this city of ours," said the man who observes. "Knows a great deal does he?" "Knows a great deal? I should say so. Why, sir, that man knows almost as much as his nineteen-year-old daughter, who is at college."

Your Editor Chats.

The Juggled Letters Competition will be completed in twelve lists; the sixth list appears on page 47. I would again draw my readers' special attention to the Billiard Tables which are being offered among the other prizes. They will form a most desirable addition to any house. The size has been chosen with a special view to their being easily removable, and to allow of their being put up in any ordinary sized room. Cues, balls, and other necessary accessories are given away with each of the tables.

Several competitors have asked whether they may put down more than one name if they are able to make more out of any separate set of letters. It is distinctly stated in the conditions of the competition that the name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct, but only one must be put down.

It is not to be expected that everyone's idea of what is a good story will coincide, and so that I may thoroughly understand what kind of stories my readers prefer, I have decided to offer a pencil-case each week to the reader who gets the stories in each week's number in the order nearest to that approved of by the majority. Write on the back of a postcard the names of the stories in this issue in the order in which you prefer them, and then send the postcard to Preference No. 1, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., to arrive not later than by first post on Tuesday, July 14th. The decision of the Editor as to the awarding of the prize in case of a tie must be regarded as final.

At the time of writing, the sunshine, after the recent terrific rainstorms, is making the country look more beautiful than ever; the trees and hedges and crops are that lovely green which is one of the beauties of Britain. Visitors to our country always admire the verdure of the British Isles, which, they say, cannot be excelled anywhere. It is often those who live farthest away who see the most of other countries. The inhabitants themselves are unable, either because they have no spare time, or because they cannot afford to leave their own homes.

Where there are children in these poor homes, more particularly homes in the large towns, it is necessary that strangers should make the effort to raise money in order to give them a breath of fresh country air on one day of the year at least. Several Funds have been started for that purpose, but none is so far-reaching in its effects as the Fresh Air Fund, which, during the eleven years it has been in existence, has sent nearly a million children into the country for a day.

Ninepence is all it costs to give one child a whole day's happiness, and I am sure it is not because you grudge giving that sum, but only because you cannot be bothered to get the necessary stamps and send them along that your contribution has not come to hand yet. Go now to the nearest post-office and buy as many stamps, or as large a postal order as you can afford, and send them to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. All amounts will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. Collecting forms can be had on application.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Which Shall It Be?

The Romance of a Singer and a Song.

"THIS is what I call a pretty state of things!" cried the little manager, dancing excitedly about the floor in order to give vent to his feeling of vexation. "Here have I been preparing Margaret for the grand occasion that will lift her from the ranks of the amateurs to the position of a coming prima donna, I have billed the town for the performance on Thursday—the day after to-morrow!—and now all my plans are to be upset, the public to be fooled, and Margaret's future to be spoilt, simply because some countryman comes along and asks her to marry him! Why on earth didn't he stop on his farm and grow cabbages?"

He stopped in the midst of a whirl near the piano and glared fiercely at the elderly man seated on the music-stool.

"And I suppose you encourage it, eh? You want him to marry her, rob her of her career, and take her away to hoe potatoes on an isolated farm many miles from everywhere?" he asked furiously. "You would like this fellow to take her away at once, and disappoint the public and injure my reputation? I can see you would like it! Oh, it's enough to make a man tear his hair!"

He passed his hands through his bushy hair as if he intended to illustrate his words in a very realistic manner. The elderly man's face was grave; he hesitated before answering, but finally said:

"I do not desire to disappoint the public or to damage your reputation, old friend, but I do hope that Margaret will accept him and that he will decline to allow her to appear on Thursday! I——"

"Listen to that!" cried the manager dramatically, apostrophising nothing in particular. "Did you ever hear anything so insane, so selfish? You old growler," he continued, turning to the other, "you are doing it for your own sake, without thinking of her!"

The elderly man's countenance became a trifle more earnest in expression.

"You are mistaken, Bain," he responded calmly, "mistaken and unjust to me! I am doing this for my granddaughter's sake and without any thought except for her happiness. You know my opinion of a professional career!"

"You failed yourself, Herbert," declared Mr. Bain, a little more kindly, "but that should not blind you to the chances of your granddaughter!"

"The career is full of bitterness and disappointment except for the favoured few who chance to tickle the public fancy or have been gifted with exceptional talent!" said John Herbert bitterly.

"I have experienced all that, and I would spare Margaret! I had her trained for the operatic stage because, after the death of her parents, it was the only thing which circumstances permitted me to do for her!

"I harboured the thought that she would become one of the favoured few—I hugged that notion in order to justify my action in bringing her up to that life which I detested, I suppose! Well, disillusionment has come.

"I recognise that she is little likely to please by her looks and manners only, and I also have sense enough to see that she does not possess great talent! Therefore I would sooner see her married to Mr. Sandeman, and living quietly and happily in a rural district, than undergoing the painful experience which is sure to be hers if she adopts the operatic stage as a method of gaining a livelihood!"

"It's sheer folly!" groaned Mr. Bain, sinking into a chair for a moment and then springing to his feet again. "Sheer folly! Who says she has no talent? Why, she sings divinely."

"She sings the notes very accurately," assented John Herbert, in his usual grave tones, "and she has a good voice, but——" He stopped, as though unwilling to give utterance to the opinion; with an effort he continued: "She sings mechanically. There is no soul in it! And that spells failure, Bain!

"In the true singer the words of the song are sung with a something that is not in the written score—a something that can never be put down in black and white and which can never be learnt! It comes of itself. I call it soul!"

"Don't agree with a word of what you're saying!" said the excitable Mr. Bain irritably. "I won't believe it! It will come all right. Let her go through Thursday's performance and then see!"

"That is what I am now anxious to avoid!" observed Herbert quietly. "She has a chance of marriage with a man of fair means; he can keep her in comfort, free from the worries of life! If she tastes the strange enchantment of the stage, she may not accept! That is why I hope that she will accept him and that he will persuade her to give up the idea of appearing on Thursday!"

"Listen to me!" cried Bain, placing his hand on his friend's shoulder. "You are a disappointed man; you failed in your musical compositions, failed to attract the public, so you think that everyone else will fail! I say it in all kindness, Herbert, you failed because you did not persevere! You should have stuck doggedly to ballad composition! You would have succeeded in that, but you were not persistent and you aimed at high-class composition for which you were unfitted! I implore you not to spoil Margaret's chance!"

"I have encouraged the visits of this young fellow, whose acquaintance we made accidentally some months ago. Yesterday I received a manly letter from him, saying that he wished to propose marriage to Margaret, and would come to-day for that purpose if I had no objection. I replied that I would welcome him, that I naturally could not answer for Margaret, but that he had my best wishes!"

"H'm!" grunted Bain. "I suppose that means that he knows that Margaret is likely to say 'Yes' to his proposal! I feel as mad as——"

He stopped abruptly as the door opened and the two young people came into the room. They looked radiant, but they showed nothing of the bashfulness which usually distinguishes the newly-engaged couple. Bain formed his own conclusions from this; Sandeman had not been refused, at least, but he had not received a decided affirmative.

There was yet hope that Thursday's performance would not be a fiasco. "I don't believe that Margaret would consent to play me such a shabby trick!" he decided as he gazed at the girl.

Digitized by Google

The young couple formed a striking contrast. Sandeman was tall, strong-looking, sunburnt and healthy; his appearance, although not imposing, made an agreeable impression on strangers. Margaret Bayliss was of medium height, fair of complexion, and with a wealth of golden-tinted hair, a pretty and attractive face and graceful carriage.

Bain's remarks concerning the kind of duty which would fall to her lot if she married Sandeman were, of course, exaggerated as the result of his annoyance, and it was not at all difficult to imagine Margaret as the centre of a happy home circle, with this strong man for a husband.

Both Margaret and Sandeman were somewhat taken aback to find Bain in the room, but they quickly recovered their self-possession. After two or three minutes' conversation, Sandeman took his leave and was accompanied to the door by Herbert.

"You will excuse an old man for being anxious concerning a step which so vitally affects the only relative left to him," said the old man earnestly, as they reached the front door. "I hope that your mission has proved successful!"

"Well Mr. Herbert," replied the other, rather diffidently, "it has not been unsuccessful! Margaret has not given me a decided answer yet; she wishes to think it over, so I have arranged to come again on Friday. I shall come in the evening, so as to give her time to recover from the fatigue of Thursday's ordeal! I am confident of success, though! So, good-bye for the present!"

They parted, and Herbert went slowly back to the room in which he had left his friend and his granddaughter. He was sad at heart; he dreaded the effect of the glamour of the stage on Margaret. If Sandeman had only made up his mind a little sooner!

"Sandeman himself wishes her to go through the performance!" mused Herbert with a touch of bitterness. "It tickles his vanity, the idea that she will be a success, and that he will feel that they are applauding his future wife! Ah, me!"

"I thought you wouldn't fail me!" Bain was saying, as Herbert reappeared. There was a ring of triumph in his voice. "After all my tuition, all my attention and work. Bah! I was foolish to take any notice of your nervous old grandfather!" he added, still speaking to Margaret but turning to John Herbert.

"He isn't old, Mr. Bain!" said the girl, sidling up to Herbert. "His hair is grey, but he is strong and upright, and he can't be so old in years!"

Herbert smiled as he kissed her.

"Oh, well, we won't quarrel over that!" cried the little man, preparing to go. "I can't stop any longer this morning. Don't forget! Dress rehearsal to-morrow! Good-bye! No, I can find my way out alone!"

In less than a minute he was tearing along the street, humming a quick march, oblivious of all about him and walking as if his life depended upon the rapidity with which he could cover the ground.

"So you have not given him a decided answer, Margaret? And you will perform on Thursday evening?" asked Herbert as he seated himself on the music-stool and took up a score. "Oh, there is no need for those pretty blushes! It does not take a man of my years long to learn how the wind blows. And do you think that you will be able to give him an affirmative reply, Margaret?"

He had great difficulty in controlling his eagerness to learn the exact state of her feelings. A troubled look crept into her eyes, but they were lowered, so he did not see it. She went to him and knelt by him, placing her head against his left side so that it was near his heart.

"Would it please you, grandfather?"

"Yes, my child! It would place you beyond all the worries and sorrows of the career which, otherwise, you will follow!"

"But I should not escape trouble by marriage, grandfather. Everyone has to worry and sorrow over something, whatever their walk of life! That is true, is it not? If I escape it in one direction, shall I not meet it in the other?"

Herbert was nonplussed; he could but acknowledge the truth of the simple statement, although he tried to make her understand, in a few words, that she would have less to vex her as the wife of Sandeman than as the struggling artiste. Then he turned the conversation.

"I fear that I shall not be at the dress rehearsal to-morrow, Margaret, so I should like to try that song which you will sing at the beginning of the second act. Ah, here it is! Not much in it, but the composer is a favourite, so it will go well enough on Thursday! Bain was right to make this selection; it gives you a better chance. Let us try it!"

He began and she took it up. At the end of the second verse he discontinued playing.

"You are all right at that; no fear of a breakdown!" he said confidently. Under his breath he concluded: "No soul required for that, which is fortunate!"

The dress rehearsal was a success, and Bain looked forward with well-nigh uncontrollable eagerness to Thursday evening. The hours seemed to be weeks, but they dragged their weary length along, and at last the time arrived.

The house, a small one, was packed. It was a novelty; the people knew that Margaret Bayliss had sung at unimportant concerts and had taken part in amateur theatricals, and the fact that the well-known Mr. Bain was to try the experiment of bringing her out in the chief part of an opera excited their curiosity. They assembled in force and waited in expectation; it would be interesting to see how Miss Bayliss would go through it. No one anticipated anything out-of-the-way.

John Herbert and Sandeman occupied a box. Herbert had wished to have a seat in front rather than be at the wings; his crossed hands were twitching nervously as they lay on his knee.

The first act was short, and gave but a poor opportunity for the display of talent; nevertheless, the audience gave Margaret a sympathetic reception and encouraged her by occasional good-natured applause.

Then came the second act. Margaret was discovered alone on the stage when the curtain rose, and, after a short soliloquy, she came to the front for her song. She shot a quick, significant glance at the conductor, who played the opening bars, and——

Herbert looked wonderingly at the figure of his granddaughter. That was not the song which she had practised with him! The music was familiar to him; he slipped into a day-dream, and, leaning forward, remained with closed eyes as Margaret sang.

The song was one that told of the chilliness of autumn and the dreariness of winter, of decay and death; then there followed the awakening of new life in the springtime, and the joy and glory of summer.

The theme was an old one, but the musical setting was such that it afforded splendid scope for what Herbert called "soul." The mournful note of the first two verses, and the glad, triumphant ring of the last two—ah, how magically Margaret rendered them! No expression? Why, her very being seemed to be poured into the song!

It thrilled the audience, imparting to every individual man and woman present a reciprocal feeling. It was like a flood of magnetism; it came from the singer and filled their own being! Spell-bound, the audience waited till the last triumphant note had died away; then the pent-up feelings were expressed in a deafening round of applause.

Digitized by Google

"She has scored this time!" cried Sandeman exultantly, looking at the audience as though he would say: "That prize belongs to me!"

He received no reply from Herbert; he saw that his companion was still leaning forward with closed eyes.

"Thank you, I am quite well!" responded Herbert, rousing himself to reply to Sandeman's anxious inquiry. "I was thinking. Encore? No, Margaret cannot give an encore! She would not reach that high level again within two or three minutes, so to give an encore would be to spoil the effect of that song. She is right in not responding!"

The remainder of the opera was an absolute success for Margaret, and when the curtain descended on the last act, Bain was beside himself. He danced about, began to speak but without being able to complete the sentences, and generally behaved more like a candidate for a lunatic asylum than as a sober-minded theatrical manager.

Sandeman was also full of extravagant delight at the success of the girl whom he now confidently expected to possess; it did not occur to him that his chances of winning her might be decreased by her triumph; on the contrary, the desire to have her for his wife, increasing with her success, made him more and more confident of winning her.

John Herbert had remained very silent and meditative during the rest of the performance; he scarcely appeared to follow the course of the opera, but kept his eyes half-closed, and his face preserved its impassive expression all through the final scenes. It was only when the opera was actually over that he aroused himself and prepared to leave the box. On reaching the door he suddenly remembered Sandeman.

"I must go round to Margaret," said Herbert simply, "She will be too excited to see you to-night, and you have promised not to touch upon the other matter till to-morrow. So I will take leave of you here. We shall have the pleasure of a visit from you to-morrow, as arranged?"

"Certainly!" replied Sandeman, looking rather disappointed. "Do not fail to convey to her my sincere congratulations!"

It is doubtful whether John Herbert heard the last words. He hurried from the box to the back of the stage, where he found his granddaughter and Bain awaiting him. He folded Margaret tightly in his arms and kissed her.

"It was a grand triumph!" he said earnestly. "But why did you risk all by singing that song? Why did you not tell me? Where did you practise it? Why——"

"Oh, one question at a time, you misanthrope!" laughed Bain, doing a kind of war dance in the centre of the limited space. "What have you to say about soul now?"

"If I had told you, grandfather, you would never have permitted me to sing it," said Margaret, looking at him with eyes half-filled with tears of happiness.

"When I first found it among your papers, I wanted to try it, but you would not let me, although you declared it to be the best thing you had done. Still, I did try it, and I was so pleased with it that I asked Mr. Bain to put it into the opera. We had to keep it a secret, or you would have prevented it. I think it is splendid, and I cannot understand why you hide it!"

"When I composed that music," said Herbert gravely, "I knew that it was the best thing I had done, and I expected the public to go wild about it. But it was received in absolute silence; it was a failure! I put it aside and determined that it should never be sung again. It was that failure which proved the last straw to me. My ambition was crushed.

"I tried in other ways, but only in a half-hearted style. I have had many disappointments since, but the memory of that has remained while the recollection of others has become dim. Bain, why did you let her risk her success by singing a failure?"

"Nonsense! That song would have been a great one years ago if you had had more go in you and had got it sung once or twice more! You are one of those men who make a hash of their lives by being too thin-skinned, too sensitive. A rebuff practically kills you!

"Look here! I have already had a score of inquiries for the name of the composer and the address of the publisher! You will be famous in your old days! Have I told them your name? Of course! And I'll have it put on the bills for Saturday's performance! You'll be called before the curtain with Margaret, hand-in-hand, you know, and bow——" Here he went through the action of bowing to his own reflection in the mirror, while Margaret laughed joyously.

"Another performance on Saturday?" queried Herbert, drawing a deep breath. "But—but what about marrying Sandeman and giving up the professional career?"

"Stuff and nonsense!" interposed Bain. He was about to continue, but he observed the look on Margaret's countenance and held his peace.

"Oh, grandfather, I can't marry him!" exclaimed Margaret appealingly. "I respect him, but I do not love him! I felt that I did not, could not, love him, and that was why I asked for time to consider. I wanted to make sure that I should not do him and myself a great injustice by marrying him. Now, after this, I know that it would be a cruel wrong!

"Do not urge me to do it, grandfather! I love you, and I owe so much to you that I would do almost anything to please you. I know that you have thought that it would be for the best! But I cannot do it! My whole being throbs with the love of music, and I should be no fitting wife for him!

"I feel now that we are not matched—that we should not make each other happy, and I am sure that you would not wish me to contract a marriage of that kind. And, grandfather, do you really think, after this evening's experience, that I shall be entering upon a life of disappointment if I choose music as a profession?"

There was a moment's pause.

"No, my child!" cried John Herbert at length. "You have conquered and have falsified all my predictions! Go on as you have begun, and I will write to Sandeman. You must marry only when love dictates!"

"What about me?" asked the manager, with a look of injured innocence. "Oh, I don't mean about marrying! I want to know if I am not entitled to some little gratitude for showing you that you still have an opportunity of becoming famous, Herbert? Why, your songs will go like wildfire, and you can go on writing as fast as you like!"

Herbert clasped his old friend's hand in silence; his heart was too full for words.

Sandeman was the only one of the four principal persons in this story who had cause to be sad, but he was of a robust constitution, and he soon recognised the position:

"I wish her all good things!" he muttered. "Perhaps I shall have better luck next time!"

F. Brewster.

Digitized by Google

Splendid Serial Story.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

NAMES TO REMEMBER.

SIR TREVOR MAITLAND, of Maitland Manor, Melton.
LADY MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's second wife. Before her marriage with him she passed as a widow named Mrs. Vernon.
JACK MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's son by his first wife.
AGNES MAITLAND } Jack's sisters.
MURIEL MAITLAND }
WOOLF MAITLAND, the present Lady Maitland's only child.
IVY STRANGE, a foundling with whom Jack is in love.
HERIOT NORTH, a friend of Sir Trevor.
MIKE HOLLAND, an ex-convict and burglar who blackmails Lady Maitland, he having been in prison with her first husband.
MARY MASON, Lady Maitland's maid.
DIGBY SCARLETT, an explorer and acquaintance of Jack. It was through him that Lady Maitland's first husband was imprisoned.
GILBERT CHASE, a detective employed by Jack to discover the mystery of Ivy's birth.
VERNON GRANT, Lady Maitland's first husband.

TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

Gilbert Chase Receives a Shock.

BREAKFAST at the Manor was a "come as you please" function at any time, and the morning following the bal masqué it was even more casually attended than usual. The servants moved about softly, and with awed faces that took their reflection from those of the few people seated at the table, for "Mr. Jack," the future lord of the Manor, lay near unto death; and the doctor's verdict, as he drove away from his morning visit, had been sufficiently grave and evasive to create alarm in the hearts of master and servants alike.

Sir Trevor Maitland drank a cup of coffee, and toyed with some fish on his plate. His genial blue eyes looked worn and hollow, while his face had aged suddenly since the night before.

"Dear Trevor!" said Lady Maitland gently, "try to eat something for my sake. You must not break down, too, dear, because I need you as well, you know!"

"You sat up with Jack all night, did you not, Mother-o'-Pearl?" Muriel interrupted swiftly. "You look ill, too. Let me help you in some way."

Lady Maitland smiled sadly. "It is nothing to me, Muriel, to sit up all night. Besides, I would not care to let anyone else take my place by the dear boy's side. The nurse we have wired for from London will relieve me occasionally."

"But won't you let Ivy help you also?" said the girl quickly; and immediately the words had passed her lips she knew her stepmother was annoyed.

"I do not think it advisable, dear," her ladyship said, quietly. "I think that the boy and girl flirtation that existed between them is at an end," she went on calmly. "Ivy told me as much yesterday; and announced her engagement to Mr. Scarlett."

"Digby Scarlett!" exclaimed Sir Trevor, roused from his apathy. "Well, I cannot say I am sorry; he is a sterling good chap; and I hope little Ivy will find happiness; and—and—my boy"—his voice broke—"will—please God—pull through, and marry happily!"

"Yes," said his wife gently; "I hope so too, Trevor!"

"I have telegraphed for Agnes to return to-night, my dear," continued her husband; "she would not like to be away from us in our trouble."

Lady Maitland was silent. She had been congratulating herself upon her freedom from the vigilant eyes of her husband's elder daughter, who had gone away to spend a few weeks with friends, and now her presence would be doubly distasteful! But aloud she said quietly:

"Naturally, Trevor, she will want to be near her brother. Now I will go back to my post," she went on. "Mason took it for me while I came down."

"Do not wear yourself out, my darling," said Sir Trevor hastily, as his daughter slipped out of the room. "Muriel and Mason had better stay in turns with the lad, till the nurse arrives. You are looking pale and unlike your bonny self!"

He turned to open the door, but his wife came up to him suddenly.

"Trevor," she said earnestly, "you have always found me a good and true wife since we were married, fifteen years ago, haven't you?"

He touched her hair with tender fingers: "Yes, my wife. Since the day I met you in Nice, a sad-eyed girl of twenty, in your widow's weeds, you have been to me the dearest and truest of helpmeets in the world. Dear mother of our child, Woolf! I have been twice blessed in my old age, by such a wife and child; and in my troubles you have drawn nearer to me in spite of the great disparity between our ages, and the girlishness of your beauty."

Lady Maitland sighed softly. "I am glad you have told me that, dear. I have wondered lately whether I might not have failed in some of my duties towards you! Now I must go to Jack," she said; "I do not like to keep away along."

"I will stay here, then," said her husband. "I am expecting a visitor."

Her eyes contracted suddenly, and her lips twitched as she repeated:

"A visitor—who is it?"

Before he could reply, a servant flung open the door, and said:

"If you please, sir, Mr. Chase would like to speak to you urgently!"

"Ah!" breathed his wife, "that is the—the man who found Jack in the spinny last night. I will stay and hear what he has to say," then, turning to the servant, she said: "Show Mr. Chase into the library, Lawson, and also ask Miss Muriel to stay with Mr. Jack until I come."

"But, my dear Pearl," Sir Trevor protested, "this person very probably has something to tell me that you should not hear. It will be painful if he has to inform us that he has caught this woman who shot our poor boy!"

His wife smiled, and placed her hand on his arm. "Very probably he has done so, dear! I should like to learn how he has accomplished it! I will follow you in a few minutes."

When her husband had left the room, she went to the sideboard and poured something into a glass, then drained it quickly.

"Now I shall feel braced up!" she murmured; "my nerves are just a little unstrung. That man can have found nothing—new. Heriot North by this time has burnt what I gave him last night; and the—thing is back in Trevor's drawer in the same condition as I took it. No; there is nothing I need fear; and yet——" She bit her lip, and touched a piece of black velvet on her wrist with a thoughtful frown; then, with one brief glance at her reflection in the glass, she turned and left the room.

Digitized by Google

Outside the library door she paused a moment. The sound of voices reached her—that of her husband, and, in a louder, coarser key, that of the detective.

"Yes, Sir Trevor," he was saying, "I thought it my duty to come to you at once, being the Chief Constable of Melton, and it being found on your grounds; though your family trouble about Mr. Maitland made me hesitate at first to intrude. But I think that the same person who shot your son is concerned in the other."

Lady Maitland turned the handle and walked into the room. Her face was very white, and under her large, languid eyes were faint purple rings. Gilbert Chase looked at her with admiration, as she stood behind Sir Trevor's chair, and bowed to him graciously.

"What is this I hear?" she said in her low voice. "No fresh trouble I sincerely hope, Mr. Chase? Or is it that you have discovered something that will throw light upon the cowardly attack on my step-son?"

"No, your ladyship," he replied gravely; "although I have made a discovery that appears to have some link with the attempt upon Mr. Maitland's life."

She opened her eyes widely: "A link! A discovery! What do you mean, Mr. Chase?"

Sir Trevor raised his hand: "No, my dear. I think it will be better for you to be kept in ignorance of this fresh sensation. You should not be frightened unnecessarily."

Lady Maitland smiled, and placed her white hand on his shoulder caressingly. "I have strong nerves, Trevor, and you must not wrap me in cotton wool always. Besides, I think Mr. Chase had better tell me now; I shall imagine all sorts of things unless I know."

The detective stole a look at Sir Trevor, but he made no sign in response, so he said slowly: "Early this morning, my lady, while searching the spinny round the spot where Mr. Maitland was shot, I stumbled across something that gave me a sudden shock, lying not two hundred yards from where I found Mr. Maitland!"

Sir Trevor's wife pulled a chair forward, the back to the light, and slowly sank into it.

"Yes, Mr. Chase, what was it you found?"

"A man I know well—from a criminal point of view," the detective answered. "I have noticed him hanging round the village inn lately, and intended keeping my eye on him. But now"—and the man shrugged his shoulder—"he is beyond my supervision!"

Lady Maitland leant forward eagerly with parted lips. "Not hurt also, Mr. Chase?" she breathed.

"Hurt? Not quite, your ladyship!" he answered laconically, "but dead as a rat in a trap, that's all! Mike Holland, the old 'lag' is murdered!"

"Murdered!" exclaimed Sir Trevor and his wife in one gasp; and from the half-open door there came a stifled cry that chimed with their own, and turned three pairs of startled eyes upon the figure that swayed towards them.

"Murdered! Did you say that—that Mike Holland was murdered last night?" and the girl, standing straight and willowy, with her face drained of all colour, and in her eyes the light of fever raging, sent a strange thrill through Gilbert Chase, the phlegmatic man of law, as he returned her glance with one of interest and curiosity.

"Yes, miss," he said gravely, "I did say that. The man, Mike Holland, has rendered his account in a Higher Court this time."

In the girl's eyes a peculiar gleam shone, and the ashen hue of her face grew even more grey and drawn as she slowly turned her gaze upon the beautiful woman in the chair.

"Do you hear what that man says?" she whispered hoarsely. "He is murdered! murdered! No secret is better kept than that the dead possess! He can't speak now! He—he——" Then her voice suddenly changed to a note of terror, as she continued: "Jack and the other—one—they met, and——" Her speech faltered, and with a low, muffled sound she fell, a huddled-up heap, at the feet of Lady Maitland.

The detective rose as Sir Trevor and his wife bent over the prostrate girl. He was thinking, deeply and swiftly.

"Mr. Chase, may I trouble you to ring the bell? This poor child will be very ill, I fear, under the shock of last night and to-day! Trevor," she turned to her husband who stood by her side, a helpless expression on his pale, worried face, "go, dear, and find Woolf; keep him with you. I dread the boy being similarly frightened in this house of sorrow!"

He obeyed her silently; and, after loosening the unconscious girl's neck-gear and holding some brandy to her lips, Lady Maitland addressed the detective:

"I am sorry this interruption has occurred, Mr. Chase. You must tell Sir Trevor and myself the other particulars of this unfortunate affair later."

The detective bowed.

"If I may say so, your ladyship, I should like a few words with this young lady when she recovers."

"Ah!" And her lips parted in a scarlet line, revealing the tiny white teeth under them. "I am afraid you will be disappointed if you expect any valuable information from this hysterical child. But, of course, that is as you think best; when she is better, which I fear will not be for a day or two, I will send for you." Then she said, a sweet smile curving her mouth, "I do not think you could have rung the right bell, Mr. Chase. One of them is out of order; but if you will be good enough to go to the morning-room and ask my step-daughter, Miss Muriel, to come to me, it may be better than an inquisitive servant in the room!"

When the man had closed the door behind him, Lady Maitland, quickly seizing the right wrist of the unconscious girl on the couch, gave one or two hard pinches on the soft flesh, that, after several repetitions, made an ugly mark, dark and red, then taking from her pocket a blue indelible pencil, she deftly touched the bruise with it.

"That man already has his suspicions roused by this little fool," she thought, "and she must bear the brunt of her own folly! If he wishes to fasten his chain of evidence round any neck, it will be hers!"

In the meantime Gilbert Chase knocked at the door of the morning-room, pointed out by an opportune servant, and, receiving no answer, walked in.

A girl turned quickly and faced him. It was the same brown-eyed and tawny-haired beauty whose description he carried in his pocket. A wave of curiosity swept over the detective. This was, he thought, the sweetheart of Jack Maitland.

"Excuse me, Miss——" he began, "but I am looking for a young lady."

"Yes?" she queried. "Who is it?"

"Lady Maitland asked me to send Miss Muriel to her in the library, as there is a young lady there in a bad faint."

The girl started. "You are quite right," she said quickly. "I am Muriel Maitland!"

"You!" exclaimed the detective, in genuine surprise; "but I thought you were——" He stopped, and covered his confusion by adding, "a visitor at the Manor!"

To himself he was saying, "How did I come to make such a mistake, now? It's thrown me right off my perch! I am certain she was in the window, yet she says quite plainly that she is Miss Maitland. Then who is Ivy Strange?" He caught his breath with a gasp of excitement, as the memory of a willowy figure, with heavy-lidded violet eyes, a mass of sun-kissed hair, and a sweet, tremulous mouth, rose before him.

"By Jupiter!" he murmured, with a thrill, "that is the girl! I see now—clearly, too clearly for my sense of justice. I've made a fool of myself—once, but now will make up for it by being doubly wide-awake!"

Digitized by Google

Yet while these thoughts were passing through his mind there was another person more than ever determined to be wide-awake also, and whose cunning and quick wit made her more than a match for the worthy but stolid Gilbert Chase!

When Muriel and her escort entered the library, Lady Maitland gave a sigh of relief. "Ah! I am glad you are here, dear. She is on the point of coming round at last. I will leave you with her now, while I go back to my sick-room. The nurse will not have arrived yet." Then, turning to the detective, she said, in a low aside:

"Wait until she is better before questioning her, although I am convinced the poor child speaks in delirium. I will send for you when I consider her well enough."

He bowed his head gravely. As he left the Manor, and strolled through the grounds to the spinny, he was thinking not about the beauty and youth of Jack Maitland's sweetheart, but of an ugly bruise, faint and blue, on the white flesh of the unconscious girl's right wrist, that had caught his gaze when Lady Maitland had moved from the couch.

He put his hand to his brow, and wiped it; it was damp with a sudden moisture caused by some emotion other than surprise. "If I hadn't the evidence of my own eyes," he muttered, "I should think I was going stark, staring mad!"

TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

Gilbert Chase Reads a Telegram.

DIGBY SCARLETT glanced round his bachelor room with a quiet smile. His critical sense of the fitness of things was more than satisfied by the tone of deep red of paper and curtains that contrasted vividly against the dark background of the oak sideboard and chairs.

His solitary breakfast-table was dainty with silver and flowers, and as he stirred his coffee, a deep sigh of content rose to his lips, and his eyes lingered thoughtfully on the bright log-fire in the old-fashioned grate.

Presently he rose, and going to an inlaid cabinet in the window, took something out of a drawer, and examined it curiously with a furtive haste, as though he dreaded being seen with it in his hand.

It was an oval-shaped locket of hammered gold, and on one side there was a dirty mark, as though a dark liquid had slowly oozed into the tracery of the gold, leaving an indelible stain.

But it was not the exterior of the locket to which Digby Scarlett's eyes were glued in puzzled thought. It was open, and in one of the two spaces for photographs, was the picture of a young girl; the other space was empty, and the glass was broken, as though the fellow likeness had been roughly taken out.

"It's funny!" he muttered, "that I should have noticed this in time to take it! But what I can't make out is her photo in it. I wonder whose was on the other side!" He smiled, and as he replaced it in its hiding-place, murmured: "The boy won't be out of the sick-room—if he ever leaves it—for at least six weeks, and by that time this girl will be mine!"

As he turned away from the cabinet and was slowly choosing a cigar, the door opened, and a trim-looking maid said:

"If you please, sir, a gentleman would like to see you on important business."

Digby Scarlett started slightly, and his upper lip quivered under the long moustache, but he said promptly:

"Show him in here, Wallis; and lower the blind a little; the sun is just a trifle too strong this morning for my eyes."

The maid obeyed, wondering slightly at the weakness of her master's sight that could not stand the strength of a winter sun.

As the visitor entered the room, Digby Scarlett flashed a quick glance at him, and a faint sigh of relief escaped his lips as he noted the quiet-looking man with rather vacant blue eyes, who saluted him respectfully.

"Well," he said shortly, "to whom am I indebted for the honour of this visit? You must be brief, for I am a busy man."

The man flushed slightly, but said civilly: "I am Detective-Sergeant Chase, of Scotland Yard, sir, and my visit to you is to ask you if you can oblige me by telling me the exact time it was that you parted with Mr. Maitland of the Manor, who was shot last night?"

A cynical smile parted the lips of the master of the "Rest."

"That sounds almost as though you were charging me with murder, Mr. Chase," he laughed; "but I can tell you that I did not meet the gentleman after all; we must have missed in the dark. I am not quite accustomed to these woods at night, only having taken up my residence here a short time ago."

"Ah!" said the detective slowly. "Thank you, sir, for explaining the matter. I understood from Mr. Maitland that you and he had an appointment last night, and I thought you might be able to throw some light on the matter."

Digby Scarlett raised his eyes with a sudden surprise. "So this fellow knew of the existence of an appointment," he thought. He must be wary in his replies. Aloud, he said pleasantly:

"After rambling about for a time I turned back, hoping to see Mr. Maitland at the Manor, and was shocked when I heard of his accident. Have you any clue as to the would-be murderer?"

Gilbert Chase twirled his hat with thoughtful fingers. before he replied. He was not wholly satisfied that the master of the "Rest" was dealing straightforwardly with him, but until he had some chance of speaking to the boy whose commission he had taken up, there was nothing else to do but take notes of the stray evidence he could collect. And there was one person from whom he trusted to learn much!

He looked up, to meet the inquiring gaze of the master of the "Rest."

"I beg your pardon, sir," he said; "but this is not the time to talk of suspicions. Perhaps you have heard that another discovery was made this morning, not far from the place where Mr. Maitland lay; and I have a fancy that the one is connected with the other in some way."

Digby Scarlett looked interested. "I fancy I did hear something about a body being found," he said carelessly, "but thought my servant was referring to Mr. Maitland. Is there another, then? There seems to be an epidemic!"

"A tramp was murdered last night!" said the detective shortly. "I came across his body in the early hours, while I was searching the spinny for traces of the—the person who shot Mr. Maitland."

"Ah! And you imagine that both the successful and the unsuccessful attempts were made by one and the same person?" queried Digby Scarlett, pushing a box of cigars towards the man and turning to throw some more coal on the fire.

"Well, sir," replied Gilbert Chase, slowly, fingering a choice havana, "I can't say yet. My suspicions were inclined that way half an hour ago, but now I must wait for the inquest that will definitely prove whether the three shots I heard were fired from the same weapon or not!"

"You said 'half an hour ago,'" repeated Digby Scarlett curiously. "Am I to understand that something has occurred to alter your opinion since then?"

Gilbert Chase hesitated. "That is so," he said, after a while. "It is quite within the bounds of possibility for anyone—a woman, for instance—to wish an awkward enemy out of her way; but there is no reason I can conceive that she should want to kill the man whom she knew loved, and was loved by, her."

He bent his eyes upon the cigar he was lighting, but was quick to note the irrepressible start of the man who had resumed his seat in the chair with its back to the light.

Digitized by Google

"Good Heavens, man!" Digby Scarlett exclaimed, "you must be mad! Why should she wish that tramp out of the way? She is the——" he stopped suddenly, aware of the mild, blue eyes of the detective searching his face with an innocent expression in their depths.

He fell back with a forced laugh, feeling that he had made an exhibition of himself.

"I don't fancy that I mentioned any particular lady, sir," remarked the man drily.

"You did not," Digby Scarlett admitted, now laughing boisterously; "but with one woman constantly in my mind, I imagine that other people only think of her also."

"Hardly flattering to the lady, in the present case, if I may say so, sir," Gilbert Chase murmured, rising to his feet and taking up his hat. Then he paused and looked again at the man in the chair, and noticed that the slim, well-bred hand holding a cigar, trembled ever so slightly.

"I suppose you hardly remember after all these years, sir," he began tentatively, "the forgery case in which you were the prosecutor?"

For a moment Digby Scarlett's head swam with a sudden, awful thought, that struck a cold chill to the very root of his being. Had his enemy sent this man to track him to his lair? Then the recollection of the broken down derelict of an ex-convict as he had seen him in London, rose before his eyes, and he smiled grimly.

"I remember perfectly," he said quietly. "What of it?"

"Only that I was one of the detectives that arrested the prisoner," said Gilbert Chase. "I knew your name, sir, immediately, because of that old case. Well, I won't detain you any longer, sir," he went on. "Thank you for telling me about your failure to meet Mr. Maitland. It simplifies matters, and brings my inquiry into a closer circle. Good day, sir."

As he left the room Digby Scarlett gazed after him with an ugly scowl. "So you came here to spy round, did you, Mr. Chase? And you imagine it would be a feather in your cap to have the master of the 'Rest' drawn into your net of inquiry. But in spite of my momentary incaution you will fail in bringing anything home to me. And before the boy is able to help you, I will be on my honeymoon with beautiful 'Ivy Strange.' 'Ivy Strange!'" he laughed softly. "Strange—yet not Strange!" Then going to the sideboard he poured himself out a glass of neat brandy, which he drank eagerly.

"I have something in that cabinet," he muttered after a while, "that my friend Chase would pay dearly to possess!"

* * * * * *

As he walked in the direction of the "New Age," Gilbert Chase chuckled audibly once or twice. "I fancy you just overdid a little of your unconcern, Mr. Scarlett!" he thought. "You nearly let the cat out of the bag when I laid that little trap for you. I don't think I am far wrong in assuming that you know a great deal more than you pretend, about Mr. Maitland's accident; but I have you under my eye, and there's time enough to let matters develop gradually.

"At present it is Miss Strange to whom I intend to devote my energies. She——" he stopped, and put his hand to his pocket for a match. As he did so, he touched something that arrested the words on his lips and sent a sparkle to his eyes. He drew it out slowly. It was the half-used stump of a cigar that he had picked up when searching round the spot where the fallen man, Mike Holland, had lain.

He examined it afresh, his interest excited by a fresh idea

"Mr. Maitland smoked nothing else but cigarettes," he muttered, "and that poor chap could not run to more than an ounce of 'snout' at the most. No. It's the smoke of a gentleman who can afford to pay a good price for his fancy."

Then, acting upon an incontrollable impulse, Gilbert Chase did a strange thing. He took the cigar from his mouth, and placed instead the half-used stump between his lips, which he lit and puffed silently for a few seconds. Then he took it out, carefully extinguished the light, and returned it to his pocket with a thoughtful smile, as he put the cigar Digby Scarlett had given him back into his mouth.

"As I guessed," he mused, "that stump was the remains of a havana!"

When he reached the "New Age" he went to his room, and opening a small letter-case, took out some pieces of paper that appeared to be the fragments of a letter. He bent over them carefully. The texture of the paper was common, and the few words he could decipher were obviously disguised.

"These don't help much!" he muttered. "Since I picked them up in the spinny that night I have puzzled over them. 'Money,' 'father,' and 'silence,' that's all! But if the girl took the money, what need was there for her to go down as well? There is a lot behind all this, but my only chance is in the girl. Poor Mr Maitland! if he only knew that while he is lying unconscious his sweetheart is being drawn into a net of circumstance, which will take a lot of cleverness to get out of!"

He put the scraps of paper back into his letter-case and locked it up, together with the cigar end. Then closing the door, he turned the key and softly slipped down the narrow stairs into the street, where he nearly collided with a tall, dark man, hurrying in the direction of the village. Gilbert Chase looked after him with a puzzled frown.

"Why, that is the owner of the 'Hollies'!" he muttered; "he looks as though he had seen a ghost! I thought he was such a strong-looking man, too! Probably he is also upset by the sudden collapse of the son and heir of Sir Trevor. He was at the ball, too. In fact, that black-eyed 'Mason' told me he was the most constant visitor at the Manor!"

Spurred by a sudden thought, he followed behind the man who, with downcast face and gaunt eyes, entered the post office, and, going up to the telegraph ledge, wrote and crushed several of the forms before satisfied with his message.

When he had gone, Gilbert Chase went swiftly to the place where the haggard master of the "Hollies" had been standing, and while affecting to write a telegram, he quickly detached the clean half of the sheet of blotting-paper with which the stranger had dried his message.

People who sent telegraphic communications in Melton were few and far between, and the blotting-paper was clear. Gilbert Chase walked some little distance away from the post office; then holding up the page to the light on the reverse side, he read:

"Anxious to leave England. Is post at Bombay still vacant? Will accept if so!"

TWENTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.

"Do you Remember?"

The windows were darkened, and the shadows fell slantingly on the still face of the boy in the bed. The gentle, low-voiced woman who moved with silent steps towards the fireplace, sent a glance of approval round the room where she was to combat the waters of Death, the waves of which were ebbing near the boy who lay on the edge of the shores of Life.

She had done all there was to be done until the next visit of the doctor, and had seated herself in an armchair by the bed. She was a dark woman, with brown hair streaked plentifully with grey; and harassed lines round eyes and mouth told a story of want and past privations.

A gentle tap at the door disturbed her, and rising quickly, she opened it the breadth of an inch.

"Well," she said, in a whisper, "what's wanted?"

"Lady Maitland told me to tell you that you had better have your lunch," said the voice at the door. "I am to sit with my brother till you return."

Digitized by Google

The woman looked at her visitor with a quick scrutiny that gradually changed to a slight smile as the earnest brown eyes of the girl met her own.

"Very well, miss," she murmured; "if you will sit quiet by the bed and call me if he makes any movement, I will leave you for a moment. My journey yesterday has made me just a little tired by now."

The girl entered the room softly, while the nurse went downstairs into the breakfast-room, where a dainty lunch had been laid for her.

Suddenly, when she was preparing to enjoy her well-earned meal, a voice outside the door made her drop the knife and fork in her hand with a noisy clatter, and clutch the table-cloth with a gesture of fear.

"Nurse Beaumont is having her lunch in here," said the voice; "I will go in and speak to her. Muriel is sitting with Jack now."

"Did you see her arrive yesterday?" asked another voice; this time the gruff one of a man.

"No," continued the first. "I was with Ivy in the library; then I had other things to do, so thought it better to let her get accustomed to her surroundings as there was much to be done. But, come, we will see her together."

The door opened, and the fascinated eyes of the nurse in the chair looked almost fearfully into the face of the tall, beautiful woman who came into the room with slow, graceful steps, followed by an elderly, stout-looking man with white hair.

"Ah! nurse," said her ladyship condescendingly, "how is the patient to-day?"

The dark, nervous eyes of the nurse at the table rested anywhere but on the face of the woman in the doorway. Instead, she glanced over her head at the silent, subdued man standing behind her.

"I—I am not sure until the doctor comes," she said, in a voice scarcely audible; "he had a bad night last night."

With a faint sigh Sir Trevor turned and left the room, and his wife would have followed him, had not the nurse suddenly stretched out her hand, and whispered hoarsely:

"Madam, I must speak to you alone!"

Lady Maitland paused, and threw a glance of haughty surprise at the trembling woman.

"Well," she said, in a low tone, "what is it, nurse?"

For answer, the woman raised her head and gazed eagerly into the calm, disdainful face of the mistress of Maitland Manor.

"Madam," she said, in a strangled tone, "don't you know me? It's seventeen years since we parted, when I took—the baby with me—and—you went on your journey as—Mrs. Vernon."

The woman at the door grasped the back of a chair, and leant forward with an intent expression on her face that gradually changed to one of unwilling conviction.

"You are Alice Mayne, then," she said coldly. "What are you doing under your present name?"

"I married," the woman replied; "then my husband died the following year; and I had a little money, so trained for a nurse. I had no idea when I was coming here that I should meet you—again!"

Lady Maitland's face hardened: "Then forget me, Nurse Beaumont," she said icily. "Mrs. Vernon is dead—only Lady Maitland lives!"

Still the woman prevented her leaving the room by saying, with a furtive glance at the door: "Your ladyship, your ladyship! one word more. I have a confession to make to you about—the baby!"

(Continued overleaf.)

TO AVOID INDIGESTION.

That distressed feeling is simply a poorly-working stomach—it needs a little help—but no matter how bad it may be, a dose of will speedily give relief. Take Beecham's Pills for a few days, and the trouble will disappear.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says: There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

Neuralgia

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A frown puckered the even brows of Sir Trevor's wife, and she caught her breath with a sudden catch.

"Well," she said shortly. "What can you tell me that I do not know? It died a year after you took it!"

Nurse Beaumont shook her head. "Ah! your ladyship, you were told that; but it was not my fault you were deceived. My husband would not let me keep it, but sent it out to nurse with his sister. She took it to a baby farm, and a year later called for it, and gave it in charge of another woman—cheaper than the farm people. When I wrote and asked her for news of it, she told me it was dead!"

A sigh fluttered to the lips of the beautiful woman who listened to her story with compressed lips. "As it is dead, why worry me with the story now?"

"But I don't know that it is dead!" the nurse whispered; "although I told you what my sister-in-law wrote, believing her; and I sent you, if you remember, the jacket and socks she sent me!"

"What happened to it?" asked Lady Maitland, with quivering lips and steely eyes; "tell me at once!"

"Until just a year or two ago," the woman said, "I believed what my sister-in-law had told me. But when I went to see her on her death-bed, she confessed that she had something on her mind—about—that baby!"

The eyes of the woman compelled her to finish what she had to tell.

"It did not die when she said!" she whispered; "it was stolen, and she was afraid to let me know!"

"That was nearly fifteen years ago," Lady Maitland murmured, with a slight smile. "Probably by this time it really is dead!" Then, turning sharply to the woman, she went on in a low, soft tone: "From henceforth, while you are in this house, you are a stranger to me, and I to you. Never dare to refer to the past again! That is dead to me; quite dead!"

With a cold, stately grace she left the room and made her way slowly to her boudoir.

Some time later, when the nurse was having her tea, Lady Maitland took her place by the sick bed of her step-son. The doctor had been, and said that on no account were the windows to be opened, for the temperature of the room was to be maintained at the same degree until the crisis had been reached. Until then the life of the boy on the bed hung in the balance.

Sir Trevor Maitland's wife stood alone in the room. She had sent Muriel downstairs, and only the unconscious boy and herself were in possession.

As she looked thoughtfully down upon the still figure of her husband's son and heir, a sudden thought flashed into her mind, and she bit her lip in a spasm of fear.

The memory of a soft, sneering voice of two nights before, and two cruel, glittering eyes mocking her with the half-breathed suggestion that the boy—dead, would clear their paths, occurred to her in all its ugly significance, and she shuddered.

She glanced at the window; then back at the bed.

Only the opening of a window! nothing rough or revolting, would be sufficient to make her son Woolf the heir, and pave the way for the enemy to marry that white-faced fool of a girl.

With a swift gesture, and a tightening of the muscles round her mouth, she went to the window and flung it wide open; ignorant of the fact that from behind the heavy curtain of the bed, a young, careworn face, with an irrepressible look of horror in the depths of the wide, burning eyes, was watching her action.

"There!" she murmured, as the cold, damp air of the January afternoon filtered into the room and touched with chilly fingers the loose hair on the fevered brow of the unconscious boy. "No one will know that it was I who opened it!"

When her soft footsteps had died away, a slim figure shot from behind the curtains, and closed the window; then turned to the bed, and bent down over the boy lying there.

"Darling!" she murmured, "I have saved you this time! God grant no fresh attempt may be made! I am going away, my dearest! I cannot stay here; I am afraid! afraid! afraid!"

Her head sank down into the softness of the eiderdown, and the heavy lids closed over the weary eyes that sleep had not visited for many nights.

Time slipped by, and Nurse Beaumont, coming back to her charge, started when she saw a figure, shadowy in the twilight, kneeling by the side of the bed. She bent over it and touched the tangle of bright hair with gentle fingers.

She had already learnt that the girl at the lodge was a foundling.

"Miss!" she said. "Miss!"

Receiving no reply, she lifted the girl, and half-carried her to a couch. With a sympathetic gesture she brushed the curls back from the low brow of the sleeping girl; then a stifled cry rose to her lips, as she bent forward eagerly—yet fearfully—to gaze still closer at a small red mark on the white forehead.

"What is the matter, nurse?" said a soft voice behind her; and turning, she saw Lady Maitland, in a loose, clinging tea-gown, standing at the door.

The woman beckoned to her, silently.

"Your ladyship! Come! Look!" she whispered, pointing to the girl's brow.

"Do you remember that!—that mark?"

(Another long instalment next week.)

JUST PUBLISHED.

The Mother's Guide to the Care of Children in Sickness and Health.

By LYDIA LENEY, M.D.,

Clinical Assistant to the New Hospital for Women and Children, and Oculist to the London School Board.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 3s. 6d.

This thoroughly up-to-date work gives clear and concise medical (together with prescriptions) and hygienic information, and avoids scientific and technical language which would deprive it of some of its usefulness. Every mother who has the physical well-being of her children at heart should procure this book, which contains many valuable hints for use on all sorts of occasions.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

Order Form. S.S.

To Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "The Mother's Guide to the Care of Children in Sickness and Health," for which I inclose 3s. 6d.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REGD

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write

ALFOSCO REGD

BUY DIRECT AT FIRST COST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

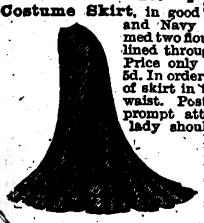
Design No. 898 10/6

Skirt. 5/6

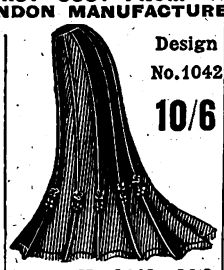
Design No 898. 10/6.

Eton Coat and Skirt Costume, made in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s Specialite Serge, Venetian Cloth, or new Zibeline Cloth. Colours: Grey, Black, Blue, Green, Navy, Oxford, Fawn, Brown, Purple, &c. Stylish Coat, fashionable sleeve, lined throughout. Trimmed tailor stitching and metal buttons. Fashionable cut skirt. Price complete only 10/6, carriage 6d. Skirt alone 5/6, carriage 5d. extra. Send for one. Lace collar shown on this Costume 1/6½ extra.

Design No. 1019. 4/11.



Costume Skirt, in good wearing Black and Navy Serge, trimmed two flounces and braid, lined throughout Imenette. Price only 4/11; carriage 5d. In ordering, give length of skirt in front and size of waist. Post orders receive prompt attention. Every lady should see ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s New Illustrated Catalogue of Skirts, Blouses, Corsets, Underskirts, &c., sent post free.



Design No. 1042 10/6

Design No. 1042. 10/6.

Latest Fashion in Costume Skirts. The new kilted Skirt with pleated seams, the top of each kilt being finished off with drop ornament. Made in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s new Zibeline Cloth or in Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth, all colours. This fashionable Skirt is lined throughout and well made. Price only 10/6, carriage 5d.

Design No. 434. 14/9.

Stylish and handsomely trimmed Costume in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s Serge and Venetian Cloth, all colours. The bodice is cut in the Russian style, lined throughout, and stylishly trimmed rows of cording and bands of stitched silk. Full flounced Skirt, trimmed silk and cording. Extraordinary value for 14/9. Carriage 6d. extra. When ordering Costumes please give bust measurement (under arms), size of waist, and length of skirt in front.

SEND POSTCARD FOR PATTERNS AND NEW SKETCH BOOK OF LATEST FASHIONS in Ladies' Costumes, Jackets, Skirts, &c. Free on application. CALL OR WRITE.

Design No. 434 14/9

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

PUREST & NICEST.

PINK'S JAMS

A good housekeeper thinks The "pink" of Jams is PINK'S.

DAILY EXPRESS.

ONE HALFPENNY.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

Fitted with Free Wheel, Bowden Brake or New Departure, Back Pedal Hub Brake; all Fittings.

For Cash or 12 monthly payments of

Carr. Paid. £8 8s. 15/10 | £9 16/8 | £9 10s. 17/6 | £10 5s. 19/3

All a Cyclist needs at lowest prices. Trailers from £5 5 0, or 10/6 monthly. Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 600 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO. LTD. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19

or by Deferred Payment System.

"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."

CATALOGUES GRATIS.

TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

30 Deansgate Arcade Manchester; 4 King Edward St. Leeds

ETIQUETTE FOR MEN.

A Book of Modern Manners and Customs.

Send 1s. 2d. to the Editor of "The Big Budget" for a copy of this indispensable guide to Correct Conduct.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

Digitized by Google

How the Chain was Forged.

Cumso: "What a sweet wife young Fosdick has. Where did he meet her?" Cawker: "Their chain of matrimony was forged on the golf links."

He's Left in Peace Now.

"My wife never gets me up to cut the grass before breakfast." "Is that so?" "Yes; she tried it once, and I was so sleepy I ran the lawnmower all over her flower-beds."

Nothing New.

He kissed her! She neither drew back nor turned red, And she did not deliver a slap on his ear; he kissed her! No word by the lady was said—She had ceased to be thrilled—they'd been married a year.

It Couldn't Have Been.

"Wretch! There's a letter in your coat pocket I gave you to post three months ago." "It can't be possible, my dear." "Why do you say that?" "Because I'm pretty sure I haven't had that coat more than ten weeks."

The Money was Spent.

Smith (who had forgetfully left his purse on the piano last night): "Have you found anything this morning, Angelina?" Angelina: "Oh, yes, dear! Thanks! I have ordered a new piano stool, some lace curtains, and such a love of a hat!"

Auntie Might Have Guessed.

"But why on earth did you introduce me to your aunt as Mr. Darling? Did you forget that my name was Scroggs?" "Certainly not, you old goose. But I know she overheard me call you 'darling,' and I wouldn't have her think I was spooning for all the world."

Clever Child!

"My youngest child is only eighteen months old," remarked Mr. Snaggs, "yet he can play on the piano." "Oh, what are you giving us?" replied two or three in the crowd. "It's a fact. Just put him on top of the piano, with a few playthings, and he'll play as contentedly as you please for an hour at a time."

His Consolation.

"Why did you invite Bragdon to spend Sunday with you? It nearly broke his heart when Jennie Harkins married you." "I know it. I thought if Bragdon came up and saw how Jennie and her mother rule things in the house over which I am supposed to preside, he'd be rather glad for himself after all."

Such a Thoughtful Wife!

"Mrs. Beasley is always thinking of her husband. She never does anything without considering him." "Well, that's nice of her." "Yes, but it seems to me she overdoes it sometimes. When the men came to paint their house yesterday, she wouldn't let them start until she had selected colours that would harmonise with her husband's new striped shirts."

Married v. Single.

"How many persons can you crowd into a tram?" I asked the conductor. "That depends on whether they are married folk or couples thinking about it," he replied.

Waste Not, Want Not.

"Where's your bottle of cough medicine, Josiah?" "What do you want with it?" "Well, you won't take it, and as it cost ninepence it shan't be wasted. I'm going to polish the piano with it."

No More Ambition.

Opulent Father-in-Law: "What ails you, George? Since you have married you seem to have lost all your ambition." George: "Well, you see, sir, I reached the height of my ambition when I became your son-in-law."

Insomnia an Advantage.

"My husband has a great advantage over most men." "Indeed?" "Yes. He walks in his sleep." "I don't see what advantage that can be to a person." "Why, he can carry the baby all night long and still get his natural rest."

They'd Got Dusty.

"I saw you talking with my cousin just now," she said. "Don't you think he has a wonderful fund of dry humour?" "Yes," he replied, with some misgivings as to whether the fellow really was her cousin, "he has indeed a fund of dry humour; in fact, it's so dry that it's dusty."

A Clever Woman.

"I tell you my wife knows a thing or two. The people who inhabit the neighbourhood into which we have just moved look at us with awe." "How did she manage it?" "Engaged two of the biggest vans in town to move us, when all our goods might have been transported in a greengrocer's cart without overloading it."

Experience is a Hard Mistress.

He quoted the old chestnut. "In the Spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love," he said. She sighed and shook her head. "That's the trouble," she replied; "they turn lightly instead of seriously." For she was a girl who had been through several Spring engagements.

A Lesson She Hadn't Learnt.

Dire poverty confronted them. "And there is nothing in the house for dinner?" he whimpered. The young wife burst into tears. "No, and I don't know how to get breakfast and lunch except with what is left over from dinner!" she sobbed. In this terrible moment her cooking class certificate, looking down at them from its gilded frame, seemed almost to mock them.

She Won the Bet.

Fred Flasher and Miss Florentia Flounce were discussing the mental power of controlling thought. Said Flasher: "I will give you a pair of gloves if you can think of positively nothing for five minutes, and still be awake." "Done," she responded. Five minutes passed. "I've won the gloves," she exclaimed. "How did you manage to think of nothing for the whole five minutes?" he asked eagerly. "I fastened my mind on your moustache, and kept it there," she replied triumphantly. The referee awarded her the gloves.

Almost Unnerved Her.

Marie: "Maud and I were in town yesterday, and as we were walking along one of the streets we looked up and saw some men on a ladder, painting a building. They must have been at least fifty feet above the ground, and all of a sudden one of them slipped and almost fell. I was terribly shocked." Harry: "I'm not surprised at that. I suppose in your mind's eye you could see the poor fellow shooting down through the air, even though he succeeded in saving himself?" Marie: "Oh, it wasn't that. In his awkward clutch at something he upset his paint, and a big splotch of it came right down on my new Spring hat. Did you ever hear of anyone who had such luck as I have?"

Digitized by Google

Early Morning Catarrh.

In an editorial on Catarrh in the last number of the Review of Nose and Throat Diseases, there is mentioned the tendency of catarrhal diseases to become especially troublesome in the morning. The explanation of this is to be found in the fact that during the night when the body is recumbent, the catarrhal accumulations pass backward from the nasal cavities into the throat. In the morning, on waking, these accumulations cause hacking, coughing, or scraping to free the throat from the phlegm. Nearly all those who suffer from nasal complaints have this symptom, and in some cases it becomes so prominent as to be called "Early morning catarrh." This number of the Review also contains a "Supplement" giving the details of a large number of cases of catarrh cured by a new method, which has been successful where operative procedures and cauterisations have failed. There is, likewise, a Report Form, by means of which patients suffering with deafness, or ear, nose, or throat ailments can obtain free advice by post. Those who are interested can secure a copy of the Review (with supplement and report form), free by post, by addressing the Editor, Drouet Institute, 10, Marble Arch, London, W. When possible, however, the editor advises patients to have a consultation with the medical staff at the Drouet Institute. Consulting hours are—in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultations.

Plain Women Become Beautiful.

Beautiful Women Intensify Their Beauty.

A Wonderful Book Free.

The Peralia Perfumery Co., of 73 Camden Street, North Shields, will send to every reader of SHORT STORIES mentioning this paper, and enclosing a penny stamp with their application, a wonderful booklet, entitled "Beauty's Boudoir." This book, which reveals many astounding secrets of immense importance to every woman, will be sent strictly under cover. Amongst the many items of information it tells how to remove in one night all Wrinkles, Crow's-feet, Blackheads, Facial Defects, &c. How to make the pimply, freckled face as fair as the lily. If the bust is undeveloped, you can learn how to develop it. If you are too short, how to increase your height. This marvellous book also deals with the hair and informs you how you can curl the hair and permanently keep it in curl without the use of curling irons; in fact, if you are interested in your personal appearance at all, we advise you to send 1d. stamp and your address in full, at once and the Peralia Perfumery Co. will forward you per return this charming book, which deals in a clear and explicit manner with many matters in which women of all ages are interested. There are some wonderful proposals in this book, and no lady reader of this paper can afford to miss this chance of gaining the valuable information contained therein. Address:—The Peralia Perfumery Co., Dept. 14, 73 Camden Street, North Shields.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(CLOTTED.)

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids.

½lb. 1s. 4d., 1lb. 2s. 4d., 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free.

Supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, &c., by

MRS. CONYERS,
Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

One Hundred Million Pounds

of "elbow grease" have already been saved by Sapon, the Ideal Cleanser. Buy some—and use your spare "elbow grease" for shaking hands with yourself.

Free packet on receipt of post card with grocer's name, to Sapon, Ltd., Dept. 68, 33, St. Swithin's Lane, London.

SAPON THE IDEAL CLEANSER
"For WOOLLENS" and all home Laundry Work.

"NO BETTER FOOD."
Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's
Pure Concentrated
Cocoa,
300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Husbands and Holidays.

THE holiday season always brings with it a group of problems for lovers. "J. H. J." writes as follows:—"A young couple have not long been married. The husband proposes he shall spend his holiday by himself. Should this be so?"

* * * * *

This question was discussed in Pearson's Weekly last year, and good reasons were given on both sides as to whether or not a husband should spend his holiday alone. It is, of course, a matter of opinion. For my part, I think certainly a man and his wife should go away together, especially if newly married. It would be a sorry state of affairs if a man only expects his wife to be his helpmeet in working days, and in the drudgery of a household, and not to share with him the pleasures of the seaside or country.

* * * * *

On the other hand, I believe many married men do gain advantage from a trip with a few other men friends. It must depend on circumstances. If the wife has somewhere to go where she herself will have a good time—say to her own home—it might be a good plan for her husband to go somewhere on his own. But on no account should a wife be left at home to mind a house if her husband is able to give her the change which she needs as much as he does.

Marriage on a Small Income.

"DIFFICULTY" (aged twenty) is attached to a lady five years older than himself. He earns 25s. a week, with the prospect of double in three or four years' time. She earns £2 a week, but supports her widowed mother and family from it. Should he start courting her now, and if so, how?

* * * * *

You will not be in a position to marry for three or four years. That would not be so unfortunate under other circumstances, but seeing that your friend is in business, and that several lives are dependent on her efforts, I fear you would be doing ill in entertaining any ideas of marriage. In the first instance, your wife would have to throw up her business engagement, or neglect your household. If she did the former, the responsibility of her helpless relations must fall on you, which you could ill afford.

* * * * *

There is no harm, however, in telling the girl the facts of the case; if she is willing to have a long courtship, well and good, though, at the same time, I should not advise it. And if she continued in business, you would have rather a rough time of it at home. A woman cannot work all day, and then turn to household duties without serious danger to her health, to say nothing of her happiness. Unless your business prospects look up very considerably within the next few years, I fear you would be encountering great trouble for both yourself and the girl by marriage under present circumstances.

A Change of Lovers.

"MAY" used to "keep company" with a young man, who, after ten months' friendship, went to live in another county. During his absence "MAY" got to know another man, whom she saw every day, and grew fond of. She is now engaged to him, but her parents much prefer the original man. What is she to do to make peace at home?

* * * * *

If you sincerely love the second man, you must not think of any but him. Your parents may be right in liking the first one best, but after all, it is not for them to say which of them you should love. No doubt when your parents know your present sweetheart better, they will like him as well.

Putting on "Sea-Side."

WHILE at the seaside "G. H." met a young lady. In conversation he gave her to understand that he was in a very much better position than he really is. He grew fond of her, and now loves her. How can he break the truth to her as to his position?

* * * * *

A very pertinent question. Young men are rather too fond of "putting on sea-side," not realising that it will sooner or later find them out. You must, of course, either tell the girl straight out what is your position before carrying matters further, or set to work to place yourself in a better one, hoping that time will convert your untruth into a truth.

Too Forward at Seventeen.

"AMETHYST."—I am glad you like Short Stories, and have got your friends to take it in. As to the young lady typing next door to whom you would like an introduction, it would certainly be better to try to get to know her privately than in her business capacity. No doubt both her employers and yours would not much care for any intimacy between you during business hours, especially as you are only seventeen.

* * * * *

You say you have only left school two months. Well, is it not rather early for you to start courtship with a girl unknown to your friends? I have every sympathy with genuine love affairs between boys and girls, but I cannot encourage you in what seems nothing more than curiosity. I should recommend you to spend your time trying to improve your business position, and by taking exercise in your spare hours. You have plenty of time in the future for love-making, which is, after all, not the only thing in life—certainly not at seventeen.

In Love with Another's Girl.

"LANCELOT" is sorely troubled. He has never been in love until now, and this time it is with a girl who can never be his wife, for she is engaged to another. Some weeks ago, his cousin came up and announced that he was engaged. The cousin, by the way, was to "LANCELOT'S" mind quite an unattractive man.

* * * * *

The other day "LANCELOT" met him and his sweetheart, and in one glance fell desperately in love, and if there is a language of eyes, he read the same message in the girl's eyes towards himself. He has since met the couple frequently, and his feeling for the girl has deepened. He believes she does not care for the man she is engaged to, but does care for himself. What should be done?

* * * * *

Avoid seeing the girl by every means in your power. She belongs to another, and it is not for you to disturb your cousin's happiness by imaginary ideas of your own. The commandment against stealing applies to hearts as well as inanimate things, and to draw a girl away from the man she is engaged to is a form of theft.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE OTHER PERSON

in this punt is reading

The Lady's Magazine.

ARE YOU A READER, TOO?

If not, now is an excellent time to become a regular subscriber to this

FEAST OF FICTION & FASHION.

ALL THE LATEST FASHIONS.
TWO NEW SERIALS just starting.

JULY NUMBER NOW ON SALE.
Price SIXPENCE.

"QUICKLIT"

THE ONLY PERFECT
FIRE LIGHTER
BREAKFAST READY IN 5 MINUTES.

THE "OCEANIC."
THE UP-TO-DATE
HALF-GUINEA
BRITISH BOOT.
SOLD BY ALL UP-TO-DATE DEALERS.

STYLISH. DAINTY.
DURABLE. COMFORTABLE.
Ask for and see the stamp "OCEANIC" inside every Boot.

UP-TO-DATE FOLK USE
"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH
Do You?

Guaranteed free from acid.
Produces quickly a lasting brill ancy.

MANUFACTURERS:
THE MATCHLESS METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 759.] Week ending July 18th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

"ONE IS RICH—ONE A BEGGAR. BEFORE THE WILL IS READ YOU MUST CHOOSE ONE OF THEM FOR YOUR WIFE."

Digitized by Google

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "THE SISTERS." See inside.)

If you wish to EAT WELL
—TAKE—

BEECHAM'S

PILLS.

You will EAT WELL,

because by their specific action on the digestive organs Beecham's Pills remove the sensation of fulness and oppression commonly experienced, give the appetite "edge," and restore the stomach to healthy and natural function.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says:
There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

Neuralgia

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,
27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

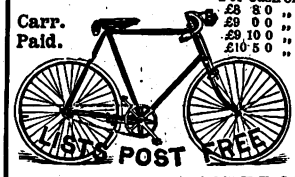
Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheel, Bowden Brake or New Departure, Back Pedal Hub Brake, all Fittings.

Carr. Paid.



For Cash or 12 mo payments
£8 8 0 " 15/10 each.
£9 0 0 " 16/6 "
£9 10 0 " 17/6 "
£10 5 0 " 19/3 "

All a Cyclist needs at lowest prices.

Trailers from £5 5 0, or 10/6 monthly. Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 600 illustrations, sent post free. — METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. ("S.S." Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

Tins, 3d. 6d. & 1/-

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 759.] [One Penny.

Week Ending July 18th, 1903.

THE SISTERS.

BEING THE STORY OF TWO MAIDS AND A MAN, AND THE LATTER'S ROMANTIC CHOICE.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

A Journey With a Strange Ending.

"What a glorious old place! I wonder now if, by some extraordinary chance, I am heir to all these broad acres. But no, that would be too much like a bit out of the fairy-tales I used to read when I was a kiddie, where the Poor Young Man always turned out to be a King's Son."

A few faint, far-off notes, the chime of a distant church clock, floated across the great private park that surrounded the author of these observations, and he consulted his watch.

"Half an hour before my time," he remarked; "I suppose it won't do to get there too soon—it might look as if I had rushed off expecting to hear some marvellous piece of good news. Instead of which, I was only—ahem!—curious. All the same I came by an earlier train than the one suggested. But there's no occasion for me to admit that."

Bernard Osborne stepped back out of the sweeping avenue from which he had been viewing—extended under a cloudless summer sky—the lawns and woodlands of a splendid country-seat.

Depositing himself on a pleasantly-rounded hillock that was screened by a coppice of rhododendrons, he lit a cigarette and took a letter from his pocket. It was written on thick, crisp paper and headed "Cunningham and Cunningham, Solicitors," with an address in a historic county-town in the South of England. Its terms were formal, its contents clear and to the point. Bernard Osborne re-read the epistle deliberately.

"I regret to inform you that Sir James Lascelles, known to you as Mr. Lassal, died suddenly some three weeks ago. I was absent on a tour in Spain and did not hear of the sad event in time to return for the last ceremonies. Being the only member of my firm in the confidence of the deceased gentleman, you could not therefore, be informed of his death, or afforded an opportunity of attending the funeral. I hasten, however, at the earliest possible moment, to make this intimation, and to execute certain instructions with which he had favoured me in view of the circumstances which now arise."

"What circumstances?" queried the reader aloud, then continued his thoughtful perusal.

All rights reserved.]

"If you would be good enough to come down into Hertfordshire, it would much facilitate matters. Your friend and protector, as there is now no reason to withhold from you, was Sir James Lascelles, of Nether Hall, Herts, and Cadogan Square, London. It is at Nether Hall that I should be glad to see you. An excellent train from King's Cross will set you down at Nether Hall station, at 2 p.m., a convenient time for me to await your arrival, and, I trust, a suitable one to yourself. Sir James was a widower, but there is a most capable housekeeper, and you can easily be put up for the night."

The letter was signed, "Yours faithfully, David Cunningham."

Bernard Osborne studied it reflectively. A lithe, well-built, well-groomed, rather quizzical young Englishman, his handsome, good-tempered features wore an expression graver than was their habit. He folded the letter, put it away, and lay gazing across the lush green levels to where the stately front of the Hall itself showed between the huge trees that here and there shadowed the lawns. The smoke from his cigarette floated dreamily in the still summer air.

Mysterious, reticent, unlovable, the person whom he had known as "Mr. Lassal" had been, from early boyhood, Bernard Osborne's guardian and supporter.

Orphaned at an early age, scarcely remembering his parents, and left entirely without resources to the mercy of harsh and miserly relatives, he had no sooner passed under "Mr. Lassal's" control than he began to receive a liberal education.

Without luxury, yet without poverty, he had been guided, almost sternly, from youth to manhood, according to the instructions of his sphinx-like and seldom-seen patron. And now, while he hesitated upon the threshold of the world where—as "Mr. Lassal" had curtly informed him on more than one occasion—he had to earn his own living, he had learnt of that patron's death.

Unable to mourn him with the sincere grief of the heart, Bernard Osborne was yet conscious of a vague anxiety, of a disconcerting loneliness. What new leaf of his life was he about to turn? His mind was busy with a thousand theories as he lay and puffed at his cigarette.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly a report, loud yet sharp, disturbed the silence. It was as if a pistol had been discharged at his elbow. He started up and fell back again, caught in the chest by the end of a low-growing bough that, an instant before, had been rustling its leaves within a foot of him. A cry had followed the report—a cry of feminine alarm. Disengaging himself from the fallen bough, he rose, to confront an embarrassed girlish figure.

He lifted his hat, bowing—the face into which he looked was undoubtedly a pretty one.

"I—I hope you are not hurt," he said, "though to be frank, I don't exactly know what happened to either of us."

The intruder's cheeks flushed crimson; she was a girl of about nineteen or twenty, dark-haired and dark-eyed, and simply, almost carelessly dressed in black. Even her limp sun-hat and the ribbon at her throat were black.

"I'm—I'm awfully sorry," she stammered, "but I was in the tree—er—reading—and the branch broke. Have I hurt you?"

Bernard Osborne contemplated her with an emotion new to him; she was so rosily appealing in her innocent confusion.

"Not in the least," he said, "but you have not got off scot-free." And he pointed to one of the small sun-burnt hands that hung at her side. The soft flesh had sustained a nasty tear and blood was welling in a tiny stream from the wound. She shrugged her shoulders.

"Oh, it's nothing," she retorted, groping with her uninjured hand to take a pocket handkerchief from the feminine receptacle in the folds of her skirt. She could not find one. Bernard Osborne drew out an immaculate square of cambric, embroidered with his initials (for, to tell the truth, he was more than a trifle natty in his personal habits), and tore it in half.

"Permit me," he said, "you have cut a small artery and it must be attended to. I did once, I believe, attend a First Aid course." He possessed himself calmly of the injured member and bound it up. Then he stepped back, as if to leave her free to go.

"Thank you so much," she exclaimed; "good—good afternoon."

"Good afternoon," he answered; reluctantly, it must be confessed, "but your book; you were reading." She coloured again.

"Oh, never mind," she said, "it can wait till another time; I have stayed out too long already. Good afternoon, and thank you."

She went off with the graceful haste of a young fawn, but halted and rejoined him.

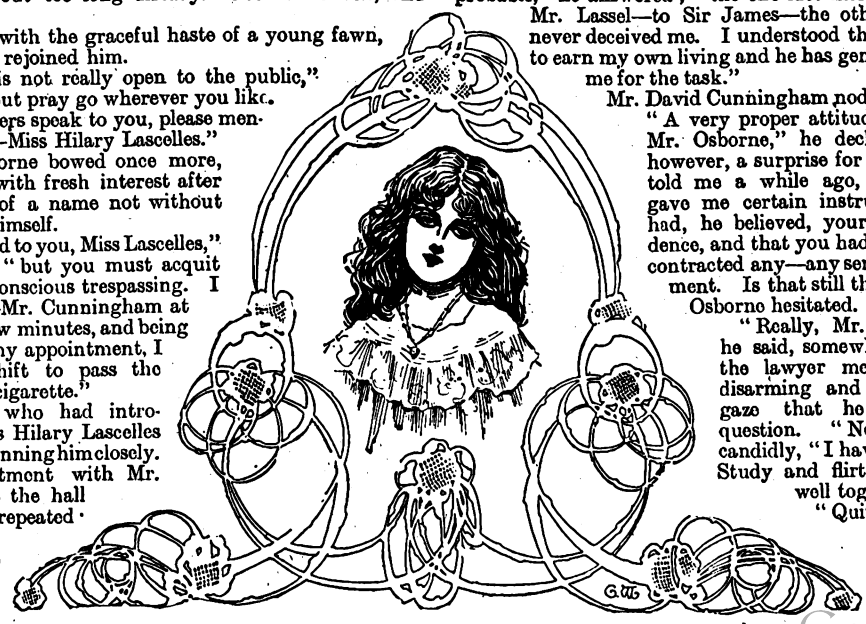
"The park is not really open to the public," she added; "but pray go wherever you like. And if the keepers speak to you, please mention my name—Miss Hilary Lascelles."

Bernard Osborne bowed once more, regarding her with fresh interest after her utterance of a name not without importance to himself.

"I am obliged to you, Miss Lascelles," he responded, "but you must acquit me even of unconscious trespassing. I am to see Mr.—Mr. Cunningham at the Hall in a few minutes, and being in advance of my appointment, I was making shift to pass the interval with a cigarette."

The person who had introduced herself as Hilary Lascelles started back, scanning him closely.

"An appointment with Mr. Cunningham at the hall to-day?" she repeated. "but were you not to have come in the dog-cart—it went for you."



The other coloured in his turn. "I—I came down by an earlier train," he said, "and finding no one waiting for me, I left my bag in the booking-office and strolled over."

Hilary Lascelles hesitated, still studying him. Unexpectedly the chime of the distant church sounded again. It roused her and she made an impulsive motion to take her departure, but spun round on her heel.

"You had better go up alone to the Hall," she told him, with an odd coldness. Her manner changed and she pursued, frankly, "We shall meet there. Don't say you saw me out here, will you?"

"Since you do not wish it," he answered gravely, "no."

She thanked him, and moved off a step but retraced it.

"What is your name?" she asked. Osborne was vaguely surprised by the query but replied without comment.

"Bernard Osborne," he said.

Hilary Lascelles knitted her brows critically, she might have been considering whether or not she liked the combination.

"Thank you," she responded; "and now, for the present, good-bye."

Osborne would have detained her, but she forbade him with a gesture and flitted away, and he stayed, to beguile a moment or two by a search for the book she had chosen to peruse in so singular a spot. Failing to find it, he glanced at his watch, and returning to the avenue, gained in due course the entrance of the old and ivied Hall.

A footman received his card and his inquiry for Mr. David Cunningham, and he was ushered without delay into a large apartment, half ante-room, half library. Arms and armour decorated it, and a substantial pedestal desk occupied a corner. From this latter there rose as he stepped into the apartment an undersized, precisely-dressed man, with a lined, clean-shaven face and twinkling blue eyes. They settled shrewdly upon Bernard.

"Mr. Osborne," said their owner, "I am glad to see you. My poor client, Sir James, told me I should like you; I do. Sit down." He motioned to a chair near the desk and resumed his own.

"You have come here, Mr. Osborne," he proceeded, putting the tips of his fingers together, "with, no doubt, a brain very full of natural conjectures. Let me set one portion of them at rest forthwith. You are no blood relation of Sir James and you are not his heir."

Bernard Osborne bent his head assentingly. "Neither was probable," he answered; "the one fact increases my debt to Mr. Lassel—to Sir James—the other, well, he has never deceived me. I understood that I should have to earn my own living and he has generously equipped me for the task."

Mr. David Cunningham nodded approvingly.

"A very proper attitude on your part, Mr. Osborne," he declared; "I have, however, a surprise for you. Sir James told me a while ago, when—when he gave me certain instructions, that he had, he believed, your complete confidence, and that you had not, up to then, contracted any—any sentimental attachment. Is that still the case?"

Osborne hesitated.

"Really, Mr. Cunningham," he said, somewhat proudly, but the lawyer met him with so disarming and good-natured a gaze that he answered the question. "No," he replied, candidly, "I have been too busy. Study and flirtation do not go well together."

"Quite so," remarked the solicitor; "well, in that case, Mr. Osborne, I can proceed at once to the business on which I have brought you here. And you will please understand that in all I do, I am only following out my late client's explicit instructions. Excuse me for a minute."

Digitized by Google

He got up solemnly and withdrew. Not one minute but ten passed, and still Bernard Osborne was left alone. Finally the door opened and Mr. David Cunningham reappeared, not unaccompanied. With him were two unmistakably beautiful women—both tall, both young, both elegantly, even exquisitely, dressed.

Osborne looked at them—lost in an instinct of admiration that eclipsed all other emotions. He started. One was fair—dazzlingly, imperially fair, the other dark, dark with the rich soft, sparkling tint of hair and eyes and skin that is between blonde and brunette. And in the dark beauty he had recognised the girl whom he had met and talked with in the park. Nor did he wonder that he had momentarily failed to identify in the splendid creature before him, the hoydenish maiden from whom he had parted so unaccountably.

Hilary Lascelles made no sign of recognition, except that her eyes encountered his own with a certain intelligence. Both women, however, were regarding him steadily, acutely. An air of vague disdain on the features of the fair beauty passed slowly, as a shadow passes, and she smiled—a cold little smile.

The lawyer came forward.

"Mr. Osborne," he said, "allow me to introduce you. Ladies, this is the gentleman of whom I have spoken to you. It only remains for you to learn his name; it is Mr. Bernard Osborne. These ladies, Mr. Osborne, are Sir James' daughters. One is his own by birth, one adopted; as to which is his adopted and which his own child I may not enlighten you; it is a secret Sir James kept even from them. Miss Hilda Lascelles, Mr. Bernard Osborne; Miss Hilary Lascelles, Mr. Bernard Osborne."

As the solicitor completed his lengthy introduction the two sisters paused, side by side, a vision of perfectly contrasted beauty in the afternoon sunlight. But neither spoke. The lawyer coughed.

"One of these young ladies, Mr. Osborne," he proceeded, "is rich, one a beggar. Which is which they do not know; Sir James will tell us that. If you would carry out your more-than-father's wishes, you must, before the will is read, choose one of them for your wife."

Bernard Osborne gasped; the thing seemed incredible. Mr. Cunningham fathomed his thoughts.

"If you refuse to make such a choice," he added, "you are penniless, and it is possible that neither of the ladies may prove to be Sir James' heir. In the event of their agreeing to abide by, and to act on, your decision between them, and of your agreeing to make the necessary choice, I am in a position to guarantee that at least one of them shall be handsomely provided for. The position may be a strange one, but it is my duty to carry out my late client's wishes—all of which are laid down in the will itself."

A spasm of bewilderment flitted over Bernard Osborne. Then his eyes settled on the two lovely women before him. Either of them would make a fitting mate for a better man than he could think himself.

Mr. Cunningham saw that he was yielding, and drew out his watch.

"The ladies have given me the requisite assurance," he said, "and, as the will requests, they have laid aside for the moment their mourning, and exercised their own unfettered taste in the matter of attire. You have five minutes to choose your future wife."

Bernard Osborne struggled with a sense of incredulity. Was ever a sane, twentieth-century man confronted with such a problem? But even while he hesitated, his glance was travelling from Hilda the fair to Hilary the dark.

The latter still had a strip of soft cambric about the hand that he had bandaged. She noticed that he was looking at it, and a gleam of gaiety lit up her delicate features and lent them a sweeter, more womanly light than showed in Hilda Lascelles' clearly-chiselled, faultlessly lovely countenance.

He stepped, almost unconsciously, forward, and she, answering the language of his eyes, made half a step in advance.

"Very well," he exclaimed, "I will choose. My sincerest apologies to Miss Hilda, but I have always been so unfortunate as to prefer dark people to fair."

A curious crimson flush stole to the very brows of Hilda Lascelles, but she said nothing. The lawyer drew an envelope from his pocket, and extracted a rustling, legal document. He ran his eye over it, put a finger on a clause, and held it out.

Bernard Osborne saw the indicated phrases. "To my adopted child, Hilary Lascelles, only daughter of my brother Henry Lascelles, one time H.B.M. Consul at Madeira, my love and best wishes for her future happiness in some suitable sphere of usefulness; to my own beloved daughter, Hilda Lascelles, the whole of the properties hereinbefore enumerated."

He had chosen the beggar!

The Way of a Woman.

"It is all very strange! I still feel as if I were dreaming and couldn't wake up."

Hilary Lascelles was sitting in the half light of the great conservatory that opened from the drawing-room of Nether Hall. The gleam of a shaded lamp fell caressingly on her soft brown hair and on the lustrous black silk and chiffon of her dinner gown. She had already returned to her mourning.

Beside her, in the dusk, sat Bernard Osborne, and before her, his hands behind his back and his head on one side, stood Mr. David Cunningham. Through the glass dome of the roof the moon showed a pale blue disc high in the heavens—the evening was far advanced. In the drawing-room without a drowsy footman was securing for the night the fastenings of the French windows.

"You will get used to it very soon," said the lawyer, drily, "almost as soon as Miss Hilda got used to the idea that it was she who was wealthy and not you. And yet when Sir James adopted you on the death of his brother and your mother from fever—it was in Madeira that both Miss Hilda and you were born, and your own mother died within a week of your birth—he conceived the idea of mixing up your identities in order that Miss Hilda should not be spoilt by growing up to know herself an heiress."

Hilary sighed; there was even more in her sigh than in the solicitor's tone of suppressed sarcasm. Mr. David Cunningham surveyed critically the two upon whose quiet tête-à-tête he had intruded with professional coolness.

"Then I am to conclude," he observed, calmly, "that you two young people intend to carry out your rash undertaking?"

"That is as Miss Lascelles chooses," Bernard Osborne told him; "I have offered her my heart and hand; they are hers till she declines to consider them so."

Digitized by Google

Mr. Cunningham chuckled. "I like your pluck, my boy," he exclaimed; "Sir James always said you were plucky. Well, we'll see what you think of it in the morning. I shall not blame you if more prudent counsels prevail. Miss Hilary might really do better for herself financially, and you are a clever fellow—you might marry a rich wife in the end if you waited and played your cards carefully. Think it over, both of you. Good night, I'm going to bed."

Bernard Osborne dropped his cigarette and stamped it out as the lawyer lounged off.

"Don't mind him, please," he said to his companion; "I assure you I would not have things a jot different. I—I have never seen anyone I—I like so well as you. Do let me try to teach you to like me a little before you decide that—that it must all be off."

Hilary smiled—a shy, womanly smile.

"You are very generous," she answered, "not to mind a scrap about the money. But I will not let you bind yourself—yet."

She rose, but he detained her—holding the hand he had bandaged only a few hours before.

"Then I am not to be as lucky as I thought I was?" he said; "I am not to have the treasure that Fate promised to drop into my lap? You are trying to break it gently to me—you care for someone else? I should have guessed that—someone you fell in love with at first sight, as I fell in love with you in the park just now."

Hilary's fingers were not quite unresponsive to the ardent clasp that had fastened upon them.

"How foolish," she said, softly, "I have never seen anyone to love. We have lived here very quietly with our governesses and the servants, almost as though we were prisoners of State. How can I help being—being interested in—in someone who is very generous, very warm-hearted, and not—not very bad looking?"

The last half dozen words were delivered from the threshold of the conservatory; she had slipped away from him with graceful ease. A moment more and she was gone.

Her cheeks glowed and her eyes shone as she glided through the big house to gain her own room and shut herself in. He had even dared to pursue her, she guessed, for a slow, masculine footstep passed an instant later down the corridor. Then, not far off, she heard a door shut, and knew that he, too, had retired.

Her pulses quickened and her breath came faster to think that he—handsome, generous, gallant as he was—had openly confessed himself her lover.

The strange events of the last few hours, her discovery as to her own birth, her loss of the right to grieve, as a daughter, for the stern and not-too-well loved man whom she had believed her father, her sudden change of prospects and position—all were blotted out by the thought that she was beloved.

There are among women rich natures to whom love comes as a sweet and passionate ecstas , lifting them into a new and transfigured world. Such a nature was that of Hilary Lascelles.

She sent away her maid—for was she not now to be poor—and taking the pins out of her hair, began to comb it leisurely, still thinking. For a long time she sat in a delicious reverie, and then a sound in the room attracted her attention. She looked up—splendid in her sweeping evening gown, white armed, white bosomed, her head crowned with the golden masses of her hair, Hilda Lascelles had come into the apartment.

Hilary rose and the glances of the two women met—although they had dined together, in company with Bernard Osborne and the lawyer, they had not hitherto exchanged, in public or private, a word upon the subject of the will or of the younger man's choice.

There was a certain disdain in Hilda's eyes as she studied her adopted sister—the sloping mirror enabled her to contrast her own imperial beauty, perfectly displayed in the elaborate toilette that was still undisturbed, with the latter's more girlish and appealing prettiness. Yet, in her loose dressing-jacket, with her brown tresses streaming over her shoulders, Hilary was a ripely dainty little figure.

"Well," said Hilda abruptly, "and how do you like your prospects? I suppose this Osborne will become a schoolmaster or a tutor or something—he will have to if he is to be able to marry and keep a wife at such short notice. But you can't really mean to—to encourage him to carry out his idiotic agreement and marry you."

Hilary went on combing her hair. "I think I shall," she responded, with provoking gravity; "he seems quite smitten with me, which is very generous, considering that I am practically a beggar. And then he is clever, handsome, and good-tempered. Husbands like that don't grow on gooseberry bushes."

"Nonsense," said Hilda Lascelles, harshly; "he is too young to marry unless he marries money. You know what Cunningham told us, that the pater thought he ought to go into politics and make a name for himself. To be reduced to the necessity of earning a living for a wife and perhaps a family, by teaching or clerking—it would be ruin to his chance of a career."

She came a step closer and laid a hand on Hilary's arm.

"Hillie," she said, calling her by a rarely-used childish name, "you don't think I would let you starve, do you? Put an end to this foolishness between you and Mr. Osborne and I will settle five hundred a year on you for life. It will be best for you, best for him."

The other ceased from combing her brown locks and lifted her head proudly.

"I don't want the money," she said, "it is yours—you are your father's daughter and it was his money. Luck gave Mr. Osborne to me instead, we met in the park this afternoon, I had gone out to get a glimpse of him, if I could, and climbed into the old lime-tree to see the dog-cart go by. The bough broke and I fell, cutting my hand. He bound it up and we talked a little; he had walked over from an early train and was passing through the park."

A sombre anger was gathering upon Hilda Lascelles' features; Hilary did not heed it.

"Of course, I didn't know who he was, at first," she continued, "but I soon gathered it. I took a fancy to him, and I suppose he did to me. I think I would rather have him than the money. If he really cares for me, in three months I shall let him marry me."

A fierce exclamation broke from Hilda's lips and she thrust her adopted sister from her. Hilary knitted her brows and studied the fair, angry face.

"Hilda," she murmured slowly, "you—you don't mean to say that—that you want him yourself!"

Hilda Lascelles set her white teeth. "How dare you—!" she began, and stopped, someone was knocking loudly on the door.

She drew back and Hilary hastened to open it. Bernard Osborne, partially dressed, his throat bare, his head ruffled, sprang in. With him entered a blast of suffocating purple smoke.

"Thank Heaven!" he cried; "I thought this was the room I saw you go into. Come, there is not a moment to be lost—the place is on fire and blazing like tinder."

A scream answered this intimation and Hilda Lascelles—wild with an instantaneous frenzy of alarm—darted out into the corridor. A wall of flame barred one end of it. At sight of the roaring blaze she shrieked again and sank down, stupefied by terror.

Digitized by Google

Bernard Osborne shrugged his shoulders and looked at Hilary. Pale and resolute in her picturesque disarray, she met his glance with quiet self-possession.

"There is a way out through the picture-galleries and the servants' staircase," she said, "and the fire doesn't seem to be in that direction. Shall we try?"

For answer Bernard caught up the collapsed and sobbing Hilda and strode off, Hilary piloting him through the smoke, from one great room to another. He halted abruptly.

"Mr. Cunningham," he said, "his room was near mine, where the fire is the worst—I should have thought of him."

"I will go back," answered Hilary. And she turned quickly. Bernard stayed her.

"You brave little woman!" he said, "but you couldn't fight the smoke. I must go."

He put his lips to Hilda's ear. "Miss Lascelles," he told her, "if you cannot control yourself you will be left to your fate. The way out lies straight ahead."

Setting her down remorselessly, he allowed Hilary to support her, and then darted into the smoke. Hilda gave a scream and fled—through the long gallery towards the stair beyond. But Hilary lingered, retreating little by little from the advancing billows of smoke.

At length a figure emerged staggeringly from them, a figure bearing a burden. It was Bernard Osborne and in his arms he carried the unconscious form of Mr. David Cunningham. Blinded, half-suffocated, the younger man reeled this way and that.

Hilary sprang to him with a cry and, seizing his arm, guided him down the gallery. He clung dauntlessly to his burden and Hilda saw that the lawyer was clad in dressing-gown and slippers and that one of his hands clutched mechanically a small brown bag.

Half an hour later, the little lawyer, assiduously tended on the lawn outside the half-consumed house, none of whose inhabitants had had a narrower escape than himself, was able to sit up and inquire the whereabouts of his bag. When it was put into his hand he wrinkled his singed eyebrows and chuckled. Still more did he chuckle when he learnt of his rescue by Bernard Osborne from the corridor into which, wrapped in his dressing-gown and carrying his bag, he had managed to struggle.

Then, in the lurid light of the blazing house, he opened the bag, to draw out a long blue envelope and wave it.

"If—if this had been burnt along with me!" he exclaimed; "Osborne, my boy, you have done better than you know—much, much better."

And Bernard Osborne had, though it was not until some little while after that he became acquainted with the real purport of the solicitor's enthusiastic observation.

The blue envelope, however, contained a sealed document, marked "To be opened Three Months After My Death." It was the latest and genuine will of Sir James Lascelles, a will by which his fortune was equitably divided. The principal portion of his great wealth went in equal shares to his daughter Hilda and his adopted child Hilary, the remainder sufficed to provide for a handsome bequest to Bernard Osborne and for legacies to old friends and servants.

"The other will," said David Cunningham, in the course of his final explanation, "was practically a dummy. Whichever girl you had chosen, I was in a position to prove her a beggar."

"But—but why?" demanded Osborne, bewildered.

The lawyer smiled.

"You were the son of an old college friend of Sir James," Bernard was told. "He was a strange man, Sir James, and at first he rather resented becoming responsible for your education and upbringing. But he grew greatly to like you, and what is more, to trust and admire you. So much so, that he coveted you as a husband for one of his girls."

"But—but why not have introduced us to one another in a

—a less unconventional way and during his life?" queried Bernard.

"He planned to do so," replied David Cunningham, "but the girls were in the schoolroom and you very properly occupied with your education. If he died prematurely this fantastic comedy was to take the place of the introduction he meditated. He wished to make sure of your disinterestedness, you see.

"There is a codicil even to this will, providing that the bequest to you may be cancelled at my option and devoted to charitable purposes. The discretion was to be exercised if you should act disingenuously towards the lady of your choice on being made to believe that she was penniless."

It only remains to add that between Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Osborne and the latter's adopted sister, there is a gulf which the years tend rather to widen than to bridge.

R. Norman Silver.

"YOUR cook is a very handsome girl." "She is. She mashes the potatoes by smiling at them."

SHE: "Are you sure that it was a year ago to-day that we became engaged, dear?" He: "Yes; I looked it up in my cheque-book this morning."

SHE (an ardent admirer): "I quite agree with you, Mr. Maunder, Drivelle's poems are great rubbish. Why, I'm sure you could turn out that sort of thing by the yard!"

"DODGER is going to have a law passed compelling women to wear their old hats at the theatre." "What good will that do?" "Why, then they will always be willing to take them off."

DOBSON: "Do you believe in second sight?" Hobson: "No, but my wife does. When I go shopping with her she always says to the salesman: 'I'll come in and look at these again.'"

NURSE: "Sure, ma'am, the twins have been making a fuss all day, ma'am." Mrs. Olive Branch: "What about?" Nurse: "It's because they can't have a birthday a-piece, like the Smith children next door. They think they have been cheated."

"JOHN, Charles, William," cried the boys' mother, "where are those apples I left here?" "In our midst," returned the boys, and when the doctor called that night the mother knew that her little darlings had spoken truthfully as well as with a grammatical accuracy that is not universal.

"THOSE flannel shirts I bought here last month——" he began. "I remember it," said the clerk. "It was a great bargain. Do you find them warm enough?" "They were warm enough when I first put them on, but I didn't think to inquire about them this morning." "Inquire about them?" "Yes. Ever since they were washed the baby has been wearing them. Now, if you have anything that isn't quite so much of a bargain, and is a little more likely to remain my size, I'd like to see it."

Digitized by Google

A MATTER OF SPELLING.

The Romance of a Name and an Accident.

It was a summer afternoon in the orchard. The conversation had died down, but I brought it to momentary life with a somewhat belated remark on the subject which had just been under discussion.

"For my own part," I said lazily, lounging on the grass, "I think most names are good enough, but at least preserve me from Obadiah! I knew a man once who was actually christened Obadiah Octavius! And Jemima!—I think Jemima is an atrocity, if ever there was one. Now Dorothy, Dorothea, Theodora, the gift of God, that's the best woman's name I know of."

I spoke with meaning for I had a special reason for thinking so, and I glanced stealthily at pretty Dolly Tracy who was sitting in a low deck chair not far from me, but still a good deal farther off than I could have found it in my heart to wish. But presently when the others scattered themselves a bit I meant to change all that.

As I looked at her now I gathered courage from her bearing; her cheeks seemed to have taken on a pink tinge and she lifted her eyes momentarily to mine, removing them hastily with a reproachful, almost frightened glance which I was at a loss to understand.

The pink colour deepened to red, but as she did not look up again I continued in my selfishness to gaze at her.

Whether she felt my scrutiny and the love that provoked it or not I do not know, but all at once the blush seemed to have become scarlet, distressful, and even to my bewildered fancy a tear trembled on her eyelids, a dewdrop that glistened for a second in the sun and was gone the next as she sprang from her seat and cried:

"Come, the court is in shadow now, who'll have a set of tennis?"

My airy, fairy castles all came tumbling to the ground for the moment, but I was quite willing.

"I'll help you play against Miss Neville and Ted!" I said eagerly.

"No, thank you," she replied coolly, "I don't think we should be at all evenly matched that way."

I felt hurt. Miss Neville and Dolly played about an equally good game. I wondered if she meant to insinuate that I—that Ted——

"All right," I said huffily, "you girls can play us. Come on, Ted."

Ted is my younger brother and I have always considered him extremely lacking in respect for me, but on occasion he can surpass even himself. This was one.

"Rot!" he said loudly, "and have you poaching all my balls! Not if I know it!"

And to cap this rude speech he appropriated Miss Tracy to himself as his partner by ostentatiously turning to her and asking: "Shall we toss for courts or let them toss?"

I accepted the situation with sufficient though not too much dignity, and tried to recover my temper somewhat by slashing all my balls hard and fast at my young brother.

Naturally, I took care they should all go wide of Dolly, and my partner and I were getting an easy victory and I was beginning to feel somewhat better, when Dolly, who had come up to the net for balls, cried out peevishly:

"I haven't got a single stroke in up till now and it's all your fault, Mr. Blake. I consider it most ungentlemanly to slash balls at a lady!"

I apologised profusely and tried to explain that it was just what I had been carefully avoiding doing. It was her serve now, and anxious to please her I was at great pains to lob her a ball that the veriest tyro could scarcely have failed to return. I suppose she had done me the injustice to prepare for a slasher and could not change her mode of defence in time for she only just let her racquet touch it and the ball fell into the net.

I was hopelessly in her black books after that, and the game drew to a victorious close for us but a melancholy one to me.

I wandered away feeling terribly out of sorts. I had meant to put my fate to the test that afternoon, but now I felt suddenly robbed alike of courage and confidence. Dolly could not care for me else she would never have acted like that just when my heart had begun to beat high with hope.

I came moodily back and recrossed the tennis-ground. Oh! this was too bad! I might get over her flirting with young Ted—he was only a boy, but when it came to coquetting with that ass Saunderson it was more than flesh and blood and love and jealousy could stand.

At the side of the tennis-court, under a luxuriantly flowering laburnum tree, had been placed two garden-chairs, and ensconced thereon, their two heads close together under the shade of a huge white sun umbrella, I descried Dolly and Arthur Saunderson.

My blood boiled.

How dared he? that was what I wanted to know! And how could she, my pretty, dainty Dolly, endure to have a clown of a fellow like that dancing attendance on her! Why, he couldn't even shield her from the sun without putting her to twice that amount of inconvenience by crowding her and mangling her delicate muslin dress. And as for elbow-room, he evidently was under the impression she didn't need any.

"I'll teach him manners!" I thought grimly.

Dolly looked over at me just as the thought crossed my mind, but I wasn't going to let her see that I cared, so I shouted to Ted, who was sitting on the drawing-room steps whistling.

"Come on, Ted, I'll play you singles."

Ted accepted the challenge with alacrity and came and picked up his racquet, and we started our game in earnest. Ted is a close match for me at the best of times, still, it's not often that I can't beat him, but to-day he seemed in unusually good form, and my own play was scarcely as steady as usual.

I was annoyed when the games stood at three all, especially with Dolly looking on. I have a bad temper, and everyone knows I am a bad loser, so that it was not surprising if I should determine to carry all before me. I did so.

Ted's balls were here, there, and everywhere about the court, and after frantically returning a difficult stroke the impetus of my desperate effort was such that it carried me on and before I could stop myself I had collided with Saunderson's garden-chair, and its occupant, the white umbrella and I were among the débris.

It was not my business to know exactly what happened after that, but when I came to I was lying on the sofa in the library; the blinds had been drawn down and someone said,

Digitized by Google

"He'll do now." There seemed to be a great crowd of people, and I said I felt all right, and presently they went away and left me with a splitting headache which kept me company for my sins.

When I put my hand to my head I found it was all bound up and there was a great bump on one side, which I said to myself must be the bump of jealousy, and I only hoped it wasn't as large as it felt.

"But, by George!" I muttered out loud, "I was jealous!"

"Please do you want anything?" asked a small voice which seemed to come out of the corner of the room.

I tried to peep out from under my bandages but I could distinguish nothing. However, I recognised the voice and put a plain question:

"Is that you?" I asked.

"Yes, it is," answered the voice quite naturally, but with a little tremble.

"Then I want you," I said promptly.

A small, timid figure crept up to me and said:

"Can I do anything for you?"

"Yes," I said, "but you won't do it, I know," I added, in a tone of fixed conviction.

"How do you know?" said the voice indignantly. "Of course I will! Try me!"

I couldn't see her for the bandages and the bump of jealousy; still, but for them I'm sure I should never have had the courage; as it was I said in audible tones:

"You might kiss me."

Silence.

"You might kiss me," I ventured, in a weak murmur this time.

Dead silence.

"I shouldn't have thought," I said, more weakly still, "that you would refuse a dying man's request."

I own that was my last card, but still I never thought it was going to be quite such a trump as it proved.

Dolly flung herself on her knees beside me and clasped me round the neck in a manner one might have thought certainly calculated to hasten the demise of a man with but a few more breaths left to draw, but which on the contrary had a singularly pleasing and revivifying effect on a man of my naturally robust constitution; so much so, indeed, that in a few seconds I was able to sit up and return with considerable vigour the caresses she had hitherto lavished on me.

"You're not going to die!" sobbed Dolly, "don't, don't say such dreadful things!"

"Do you love me?" I asked.

"Oh, yes, yes—you know I do. And if you had died I should have felt a murderess and Mr. Saunderson would have been one because he put the chairs there; he insisted on putting them there, and now he is covered with bruises and can scarcely walk, and his hands are scratched all over."

"I feel better," I said, ignoring the latter part of her speech. "I think I shall recover—with care. I shall require all your care," I said, sinking back as the memory of the lump on my head and her concluding words occurred to me together.

"Oh, I shall be your most devoted nurse," she said tenderly, as tenderly as even I could wish.

"My sweet Dorothy!" I said.

"But that is not my name," she said, pouting, "and you don't like my name. You said hateful things about it."

"The sweetest name in the world!" I cried enthusiastically.

"But my real name is Jemima," she said, with crimson cheeks, "and Dolly is only a pet name. I quite thought you knew."

And then I suddenly understood everything, but even if my head ached with my folly, what did it matter, my heart was light now.

"It's only a matter of spelling," I declared fondly. "Whatever your name, it would always read Dorothea to me."

Ellice Beere.

Your Editor Chats.

THE Buried Stations Competition is in process of checking and the result will be published in this paper at the earliest possible moment.

I CAN thoroughly recommend the Juggled Letters Competition as being one of the most fascinating that has ever been given to readers of any paper. If you once start trying to put the letters in their proper order you will not want to give up until you have arrived at the best solution obtainable. The competition will be complete in twelve lists, the seventh of which will be found on page 79.

The conditions are perfectly clear, and everyone should be able to understand them. No replies to queries will be given either personally or through the post, but if a point of sufficient general interest is raised it will be dealt with in this column.

AGAIN this week I am offering a gold-plated pencil-case to the reader who sends in the list of stories in this number written in the order of merit in which they are regarded by the majority of readers. I am anxious to find out the kind of stories you prefer, so that I may be able to give you what you like best. Write your list on the back of a post-card, together with your name and address, then send it to PREFERENCE No. 2, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., to arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, July 21st.

I HAVE just been in the country for a few days, away from the heat and bustle of London, and now that I have returned can realise to the full what life must be to those who are never able to get away at all, either from want of time, or, what is worse, from poverty.

Unfortunately, the number of those included in the latter category is very large, and a great proportion of them are children. From want of fresh air many lives have been lost, and growth has been stunted. How can a child be expected to attain its normal physical development when it is always cooped up in a town? Let those who are placed in easy—or comparatively easy—circumstances do what they can to lighten the burden of their less happily and fortunately situated fellow creatures.

To provide a day's pleasure in the country for one child costs only ninepence—that is the sum for which the FRESH AIR FUND can do it—and this includes a good supply of wholesome food. Such a cheap charity deserves support, doesn't it? So won't you help it along?

Send your ninepence—or more if you can afford it—to the Hon. Secretary, FRESH AIR FUND, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Whatever your contribution is it will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. Collecting forms can be had on application.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

A Weir Mitchell Victim.

Telling of the Trick to Bring Together Two Young Hearts.

"Dickie," said Maisie, with a twinkle in her merry blue eyes, "I've got a new idea!"

Handsome Dick Fenning looked at her appreciatively.

"Something novel or you, Maisie," he answered good-humouredly. "I thought your feminine propensities did not go much beyond new hats."

"You needn't be sarcastic," she replied scornfully. "You're not overburdened with ideas yourself, you know, or you would have found ways and means for our marriage. You needn't be jealous because I've gone one better than you!"

"About our marriage, is it?" asked Dick, roused to interest and ignoring Maisie's last home thrust. "So you think you have a plan for our mutual welfare. Go ahead, little girl, and if it's feasible, I'm with you."

"Papa, as you know, Dick, won't consent to our marriage until your prospects are brighter. He refuses to go away unless I accompany him, in case we—we——"

"Bolt?" suggested Dick, by way of helping her on.

"Er—er—yes," agreed Maisie; "thank you, Dick, that's just it. And—and," she continued, with the suspicion of tears in the blue eyes, "he said to me this morning that he thought it time the engagement of his daughter to—to a man not rich enough to marry should be—be—er——"

"Broken off?" hinted Dick kindly.

"Yes, dear, that was it; until he—the man you know—you, Dick—until your position was better financially."

"Oh!" gasped Fenning, "he said that, did he?" and he gave vent to a long whistle; "which means that as my prospects are at present nil, he would insist on our engagement being postponed for an indefinite period!" said Dick woefully.

"My poor boy!" sighed Maisie, "that's just what he does mean. He also said that when he goes away for the summer, he will exercise care that you don't know our whereabouts."

Dick replied by a woefully woebegone expression.

"What we have to do, Dickie, is to get him to some resort where you can stay without his knowledge."

Fenning nodded. "Secret meetings, hair-breadth escapes from the ogre's discovery, bribing the servants, and all that sort of thing!" he murmured.

"Nothing of the sort!" replied Maisie, with a scornful toss of her pretty head. "I've got an idea by which you and I can be in the same house, Dickie—house!" she repeated with emphasis, "and he shall never know."

"Shall never know?" repeated Fenning incredulously. "Impossible! It can't be done, Maisie!"

"You dear, silly old thing!" cried Maisie, kissing him (which necessitated a longer pause than she had intended), "it can be done, shall be done, and we are going to do it! Now for the plan!" said Maisie, looking sweetly fascinating in her excitement. "Ever since papa had a spill in his motor-car he has not felt quite the thing."

Dick looked mischievously at Maisie, and tapped his head solemnly three times. "Is that it?"

"Yes," cried Maisie, laughing. "It buzzes. His dear old head swims and buzzes sometimes."

"Always, I think!" chimed in Dick under his breath.

"Wicked boy!" laughed Maisie.

"Go on!" said Dick.

"Doctor Porter — papa's doctor, you know, and a great friend of ours—he'd do anything for me, Dickie—says he wants two months' perfect rest and quiet, and the only way to obtain the real thing is by the Weir Mitchell process, which means complete rest and isolation for six weeks at least."

"I don't see how that's going to help us. We can't go in for it, and, if we did, couldn't see each other!"

"Have patience, sir, and you will see," put in Maisie, with the calm of exasperation. "Dr. Porter knows of a large hydro in the north where the Weir Mitchell process is carried on to perfection."

"Ah!" exclaimed Fenning, with a nod of approval, beginning to realise the scheme.

"What I have to do," went on Maisie, "is to get Dr. Porter to send papa to this hydro with me. When papa is safely isolated I shall wire for you to come down. Now, you silly old darling, do you see?" cried Maisie in ecstacies.

For expressive reply Dick placed Maisie's head in the neighbourhood of his shoulder.

"But are you sure of the rules of this rest cure?" he asked, after a few minutes.

"Yes, dear, quite. The patient remains in bed for at least six weeks, living the life of a slightly animated snail, merely eating, sleeping, and being massaged three or four times a day; allowed to see no one except by the doctor's permission, and may not even read. The patient is entirely cut off from the world, as it were. Dickie, you can be down the whole time nearly and papa will never know!"

"It's splendid!" agreed Dick enthusiastically. "And, by Jove!" he cried, "I'll work at my books like blazes and see if I can't persuade Aunt Jemima to come down. She wants a change, and the water cure would do her worlds of good. I'll show her no end of attention and try to get into her favour again. She's a good old sort, but has never forgiven me shooting her favourite cat and having to pay for all those windows I broke at college. She told me she altered her will as I was a scapegrace, and all sorts of things. And, Maisie, she—she can chaperon you and need know nothing of your father's orders about me—eh?"

"Indeed," said the girl, "it's a capital plan; and, Dick?"

"Yes, dear?"

"Mum's the word!"

"Rather!"

"In a week I shall have papa at the hydro, and I think it would be better if—if——"

"I avoided you for the present?" asked Dick.

"Yes, dear, if you don't mind?"

"Of course I mind, but I'll do it."

"Go into the country so that I can tell papa you've gone away!"

"Maisie, you're a born schemer!" replied Dick, sweeping her into his arms.

* * * * *

Mr. Benjamin Banks, Maisie's father, offered many excuses why he should not try the Weir Mitchell cure, but all objections were gradually overruled by the persuasions of his daughter, for whom he had a very soft spot in his tender old heart.

As he proceeded to put as many obstacles in the way as he could, Maisie very promptly and carefully pulled them down, pointing out why there was every reason that he should at least give the process a trial. She was backed by their friend

Digitized by Google

Dr. Porter, who, whether suspecting trickery or not, heartily supported Maisie, and emphatically agreed that it would effect a speedy and certain cure.

Such visions of health and strength did their joint persuasions conjure up that in the end the old gentleman stoutly denied ever having resented the idea, and finally declared that nothing on earth would prevent his going at the earliest possible moment.

"At any rate," he said to Maisie, "that good-for-nothing boy, Dick, won't dare follow us. It wouldn't do at all for you to be at the hydro with him there, no chaperon, and I shut up in my bedroom for six weeks. You needn't tell him where we're going. Where is he—he's not been here this last few days?"

"Gone into the country, papa dear."

"Ah! has he? He'll prove himself a sensible young man if he stays there. Why, my dear child, it's a folly for you to be engaged to a penniless pauper with no prospects, and not, I think," he added severely, "strong tendencies for work."

"Oh, papa, he's not penniless!" broke out Maisie; "he's got £200 a year, and writes awfully clever books!"

"Two hundred fiddlesticks! Heaps of people write books, but they can't sell 'em, child!" contemptuously replied the retired merchant.

Mr. Banks had been a steady business man all his life, and scorned the idea of money-making by anything but legitimate business. With him, artists and authors were beyond the pale.

"Who ever knew one who made any money?" he asked.

He fondly anticipated a good marriage for his pretty daughter—good, that is, from his and the world's point of view.

"You can't marry on two hundred a year, Maisie," he said, patting her cheek. "No, you must give up all thoughts of Mr. Fenning.

"Perhaps," he added to himself, "this absurd infatuation will dwindle if they don't see each other for a couple of months."

At this thought he was more than ever determined to get away, and a few days later saw them comfortably installed at a handsome and well-appointed hydro fitted with every appliance and bath known and unknown to the scientific world.

For three days Mr. Banks looked about him and was initiated into the mysteries of hydropathy, and found it healthful and diverting. Then, having consulted the doctor, commenced the rest cure. His daughter was permitted to visit him three times a week, each visit to last only a quarter of an hour.

The time was passed in sleeping, eating (every two hours), and being massaged. Reading was forbidden. His life therefore, did not promise to be very active for the next six weeks. But he resigned himself to his fate, bid a tender farewell to Maisie, and temporarily retired from the world.

Directly her father was confined to his room, from which there did not appear to be any possible chance of escape, owing to the tender solicitude of a most assiduous attendant, Maisie dispatched the following wire to Dick:

"Come at once. Father commenced.—MAISIE."

The following reply came a few hours later:

"Aunt and I with you 8.30 to-day.—DICK."

Maisie discreetly kept out of the way when they came, and Dick was careful to see that his aunt notified their arrival in the visitors' book by writing "Miss Mitchin and nephew."

While his aunt went up to her room, Dick went in search of Maisie, and, after wandering in and out of the numerous public rooms and up and down the corridors, eventually arrived at the Winter Gardens. Seated in a chair under a palm he saw a vision of white feminine daintiness, apparently deeply absorbed in reading. He stepped quietly up to her.

"I've come, Maisie," he whispered.

"Dick!" she cried, "oh, Dick—isn't it splendid?"

There were people about, which Dick resented.

"My name is not in the visitors' book, Maisie, simply 'Miss Mitchin and Nephew.'"

"Dick, you're smarter than I gave you credit for. And how is your aunt?"

"Awfully decent and quite glad to come."

"Papa is perfectly secure. Not allowed out of bed. And cannot possibly know of anything that goes on. Must live the life of a dormouse for the next six weeks."

Half an hour later Maisie and Dick were chatting to Miss Mitchin. She was a dear old soul, with happiness beaming through her spectacles, but terribly conventional, and lived in constant terror of Dick disgracing himself. She was not aware that Mr. Banks would have been furious had he known of Dick's arrival, for she had not been told of the threatened breaking off of the engagement. She was fond of Maisie and liked to see the young people happy and enjoying themselves.

"And so your father has gone in for Weir Mitchell?" she asked Maisie.

"Yes, the doctor said it would be the best thing."

"Perhaps," said the old lady innocently, "this incorrigible Dick"—and she tried to look severe—"will go and see him sometimes."

"He is not permitted to receive visitors," put in Maisie.

"What a pity! Give him my kind regards, my dear, and wish him a complete recovery from me. I'll perhaps write him an occasional note."

"I wouldn't do that," urged Maisie, looking fixed bayonets at Dick.

"It will upset him," chimed in blundering Dick.

"And pray, Richard, why should a note from me upset him?" asked his aunt.

"Well, you see," said Maisie, "he's not allowed to have any letters or notes. He is not supposed even to read."

As the conversation was drifting into dangerous channels, Maisie diplomatically turned it into smoother waters, and the trio retired to rest in a very merry mood.

Dick set himself to study his aunt, and by his devoted attention gradually gained favour.

The days passed pleasantly enough with tennis, drives, picnics, and walking, so Dick and Maisie spent a great deal of time together. Their plan had succeeded beyond expectations. Maisie paid her father periodical visits, but never delivered Miss Mitchin's message.

After three weeks' isolation Mr. Banks was heartily tired of it. He noticed that his daughter looked particularly happy. He said nothing, but thought all the more. He swore at his attendant, hydropathy, and everything connected with it.

"Another three weeks," he gasped one day to Maisie; "but I'll see it out if it kills me," he heroically declared.

"On the contrary," said Maisie, "three weeks more will give you a new lease of life."

Meantime Miss Mitchin had quite made up her mind to alter her will again in favour of Dick, and make him an allowance. She was even so indiscreet as to mention this to Maisie, who was not slow in imparting it to Dick.

A few days after Mr. Banks had stoutly declared his intentions of seeing it out, Miss Mitchin, Maisie, and Dick were sitting in the summer-house on the bowling-green. Suddenly a well-known voice broke upon their ears—a voice that made Dick jump, and Maisie pale.

Digitized by Google

"It was no use," said the voice; "I could stand it no longer. I'm sick of it. Eat, sleep, eat, sleep, day after day, with my limbs sore with the constant thumping of my masseur. No books, no society, no nothing."

"But, my dear sir, pray consider the doctor," came another voice. "Do get back to your room, pray, Mr. Banks."

"The doctor can go to—to where he likes, and I don't want ever to see my bedroom again."

The speakers were getting nearer. Maisie and Dick knew they were caught like rats in a trap. In another moment Mr. Banks and his attendant had turned the corner and were on them.

For a moment Mr. Banks paused and stood stock still, glaring at them. His face went alternately red and purple. At length he stumped up to them in a towering rage.

"And pray," he said, going up to Dick, "what in thunder is the meaning of this, sir?"

"Meaning of it, sir?" repeated Dick foolishly.

"Yes, sir, meaning of it? I will repeat it fifty times if you like."

Miss Mitchin dropped her work and was simply speechless.

"How long have you been in the Hydro, Mr. Fenning?"

"Nearly three weeks, sir," answered Dick.

"How—how dare you, sir," roared Mr. Banks, glancing at Dick and Maisie. "How dare you come down here and take advantage of my isolation?"

"I believe, sir," answered Dick, with a twinkle in his eye which he could not suppress, "there is nothing to prevent my visiting a health resort with my aunt?"

"Miss Mitchin," went on Mr. Banks, fuming. "Madam, allow me to inform you that your nephew is a daring young scapegrace—and—and an impostor. Miss Mitchin, is it possible that you were also in the conspiracy—conspiracy, madam?"

Miss Mitchin's face was a study in consternation and mystification.

"Ah, what an old fool I have been. Of course, I see it all now. Your scapegrace of a nephew planned that I should come down here for the rest cure, and put Maisie up to the trick so that he could be here without my knowledge."

Again Mr. Banks looked very black at them.

Suddenly it flashed across the dear, prim old woman what it all meant. She glanced at Dick and Maisie and smiled—actually smiled.

"Come here, sir," she said to her nephew as severely as she could.

Dick came up to her.

"Is this true, you—you bad fellow?" she asked. "Was it a scheme of yours?"

"It was my idea," answered Dick, hoping he would be forgiven the lie, and he heard Maisie give a little gasp.

"Mr. Banks, I assure you that I am innocent of any conspiracy, conspiracy," she reiterated, "as a babe unborn. What you imply has fallen upon me like a thunderclap. As yet I am rather in the dark, but have an inkling of how matters stand. Perhaps one day I shall be enlightened."

Mr. Banks glared harder than ever.

"Well—well," put in the old lady after a pause; "young people will be young people. Love knows no prison bars and—and—— Mr. Banks, you and I were young once and not impeccable."

Mr. Banks grunted.

"Dick is a young scamp, but I believe"—and she glanced tenderly at him—"he is very fond of Maisie."

Dick's look at Maisie conveyed volumes.

"And pray, what is he going to marry on?" asked Mr. Banks.

"Perhaps something can be done," answered Miss Mitchin; "we'll see."

"Madam," said the old man, "I've been tricked and humbugged, but I had my suspicions, so I resolved to get up and see what was going on. We—we'll discuss the matter in full later in the day—er, that is, if I don't return to my Weir Mitchell, and thumping and sleeping, and eating and——"

Try as she would Maisie could not keep back a laugh which was so infectious that the summer-house was soon ringing with merry peals. The humour of the situation was irresistible.

"Well," said Mr. Banks presently, as sternly as he could, addressing Miss Mitchin, "and pray how are we going to deal with these young people?"

"Deal with them?" she asked with a smile. "I should suggest that the first thing we do is to go and buy them a wedding present."

And they went.

Dagney Major.

GEORGE CHESTER'S MISTAKE.

And How It Was Found Out.

"Charity, kind sir! My poor children are starving!" The speaker was a thinly-clad woman, who shivered in the wintry blast, for it was December, and the keen, frosty air penetrated even the warm garments of the rich. The gentleman addressed was a man of perhaps thirty-five, a rich and prosperous man, who hoped soon to become still more rich and prosperous through an alliance with the fair girl at his side.

"Poor woman!" said Edith Mortimer compassionately. "I have left my purse at home. George, I am sure you will help her."

"Of course I will, my darling. Here, poor woman, take that, and may it do you good!"

As he spoke he drew from his pocket half a sovereign, and put it into the extended hand of the applicant. The poor woman's heart bounded with joy, for she had hoped for but sixpence at the most, and half a sovereign seemed, to her, positive wealth.

"Heaven bless your generous heart!" she exclaimed, with heartfelt gratitude.

"Thank you," said George Chester graciously.

Edith Mortimer rewarded him with a beaming smile.

"I am glad you gave the poor creature so much," she said. "I like generosity. I don't think I could esteem or respect a mean man."

"We think alike on that point, my darling," said Chester. "I never can refuse to give, even if I suspect the object may be unworthy. It makes me happy to make others happy."

Another beaming glance from Edith.

Digitized by Google

"I love you all the better for that, dear George," she said, in a low voice.

"On the whole," thought Chester, "my half sovereign is a good investment, though I can't help grudging it to the beggar. When Edith becomes Mrs. Chester, and I get hold of her twenty thousand pounds, she shan't give many half sovereigns to beggars. For the present, it's policy to be generous."

Of course Edith could not read the thoughts of the man at her side. She believed him to be a genuine philanthropist, while, in reality, he was a mean, selfish, hard-hearted man, yet with tact enough to overcome these traits for the sake of making a favourable impression upon the heart of the heiress.

Edith Mortimer was an orphan, and the absolute mistress of twenty thousand pounds; no small fortune for a girl of nineteen. But her fortune was by no means her chief attraction. She was beautiful, sweet-tempered, accomplished, and her heart was animated by the most generous charity. She had a regular list of pensioners, and would have found if impossible to refuse an applicant who was in need.

As Edith said, she would have found it impossible to respect or esteem a mean man. Thus far, George Chester had succeeded in concealing his real character from her, but the time was coming when it would be revealed. Whenever he was with her he gave liberally to any who asked for charity, but at his business he would have repulsed them with hard and bitter words. He kept a large clothing shop in one of the principal streets in Verchester, but Edith, who lived some little distance outside the city limits, had never been there and knew absolutely nothing of him in his business relations.

Of course there were many who courted the favour of the young and beautiful heiress, but there was only one who came near being the rival of the successful suitor. This was Doctor Goodwin, a young physician, who had recently established himself in the city, and was having a hard struggle to get into a lucrative practice, being poor and without influential friends. But he was essentially noble, of good figure, with a frank, open face, and unusually able and intelligent. Success with him was only a matter of time.

When he saw the rich trader preferred to him, he quietly withdrew, disappointed, but too honourable to attempt to reverse Edith's decision, now that it appeared to be made.

It was made, and the wedding-day was about to be fixed, when something occurred which quite changed the position of affairs.

Edith was walking in Verchester one day when her attention was attracted to a girl of about her own age who was sitting on one of the stone seats placed there for the use of tired pedestrians. The girl was plainly dressed, and in her face and attitude was such an air of despondency, that Edith, whose heart was full of compassion for the wretched, felt herself constrained to stop and speak to her.

"Are you not well?" she asked, in a low, sympathetic voice.

The girl, who was very thinly and poorly clad, looked up.

"Yes," she answered, "I am well."

"But you are sad. You have met with some misfortune, have you not?"

"Yes," answered the girl despondently.

"Will you tell me what it is? Perhaps it is something which I can remedy. Don't think me inquisitive, but I really want to help you, if you will let me."

The girl answered gratefully:

"Thank you for your kindness. It does me good, for I stand in need of kind words."

"Tell me, then, your trouble," and Edith, in her sealskin jacket, sat down beside the plainly dressed girl.

"My mother and I live together," explained the girl. "We are very poor, and mother is an invalid, unable to do much. We have nothing to live upon except what I can earn by the needle."

"That must be very little."

"Yes, it is very little; but I have been cheated out of that little. It is terrible."

"Tell me about it. Is it possible that anyone could be so mean as to cheat you out of the little you earn in that hard way?"

"I will tell you how it happened. A week since, I got a bundle of waistcoats to make for a large house. The pay was very small. By working early and late I could earn about a shilling a day."

"Is it possible? I never heard of such oppression," said Edith indignantly.

"Well, I finished the half-dozen, and this morning took them round to the shop. Instead of paying the money, the proprietor, a rich man, said roughly that they were not well done, and he could only pay ninepence apiece for them. If I would take that he would give me more work. I knew it was all a pretence to cheat me out of threepence on each waistcoat, for I am an experienced hand in that line, and these were made as well as usual."

"And did you take the money?" asked Edith.

"What could I do? There was no money to buy our dinner. I had to take it, but I know that it is impossible for us to get along on that paltry sum. I see nothing for us but starvation."

"Cheer up! I am rich! I will help you!" said the heiress. "But tell me the name of this mean wretch who cheated you."

"It is George Chester."

"Who?" exclaimed Edith, startled and surprised.

"George Chester. I hear he is engaged to a wealthy heiress. but I don't think such a man can prosper."

"I must look into this," said Edith quickly, her face flushed. "It is more important to me than you know. Come to my house."

The girl accompanied her home, and presently the heiress, who had changed garments with the poor girl for a brief space, emerged into the street and made her way to the shop of George Chester. She was so muffled up that her face could not be seen.

"What do you want?" asked a salesman roughly.

"To see Mr. Chester," answered Edith, in a low voice.

"He is busy. He can't see a girl like you."

"I have something important to say to him."

George Chester, on being told this, came forward.

"Well, girl, what do you want of me?" he asked rudely.

"You gave me only ninepence for some waistcoats I brought here this morning," said Edith, in an assumed voice.

"What of that? They were badly made."

"I need the money for my mother. I worked hard, and I am sure the waistcoats were well made."

"Look here! I can't be troubled with you," said Chester roughly. "I gave you all the work was worth."

"My mother will starve."

"Let her starve then. It's no business of mine."

This was too much for Edith, whose indignation was intense.

She uncloaked herself, revealing to George Chester a face that terrified him, so full was it of withering scorn.

"I am glad I have found you out, Mr. Chester," said Edith. "Fortunately, it is not too late," and she turned haughtily and swept out of the shop.

"Edith! Edith Mortimer!" called George Chester, in an agitated tone. "Come back. It's all a mistake. I will make it right."

Edith did not answer, nor turn back, but left the shop with her illusions broken.

The next day it was announced in society that the engagement was broken. Three months later there was a new engagement, but this time it was Doctor Goodwin who had gained the prize for which so many were striving.

The poor girl soon obtained remunerative employment through Edith's influence, and she and her mother never again knew want.

As for George Chester he rued bitterly his fatal mistake; but for Edith it was a most fortunate one, since it saved her from marrying a man whom she would have despised, and gave her a husband whom she could respect as well as love.

C. F. Preston.

Digitized by Google

"HILDA'S HERO."

A Story of the Coming Together of Two Affinities.

His name was Hugh Pollard; his age six-and-twenty. Everybody in Screwford knew him and liked him; he was one of the foremen at the Wearford Valley Cloth Mills.

One wonders by what fatal instinct mill owners are led to choose such lovely spots for defilement. Wearford Valley was perhaps half a mile long, its steep sides covered with hanging woods of beech, with primroses and bluebells, watered by an ever-running melodious stream, roofed from bank to bank with sweet grasses and wild flowers.

A painter, a poet, any man with a soul to discover, stood a good chance of discovering it there. Even if there were no soul to discover, the chance was equally good that the fact of its absence would be discovered. And that was something.

One Saturday afternoon, in the middle of May, a carriage and pair stood before the principal shop in Screwford.

Presently a couple of ladies, one middle-aged, and the other young, came out of the shop, and stood chatting for some moments on the pavement, before entering their carriage.

While thus engaged, Hugh Pollard came along the street towards them. In dress he looked what he was—a workman of the better kind. He was a tall, well-set-up, good-looking fellow, with an unusually refined face; he carried himself erect, and had a manly bearing. He glanced an instant at the elder lady, then at the horses, which were handsome animals, and passed on. The ladies entered the landau, and the carriage rolled away, overtaking and passing the young workman.

"Aunt, do you know who that young man is we have just passed?" inquired the younger of the two.

The elder turned her head, and looked back at the person indicated. Settling herself again, she said:

"Yes. Why do you ask, Hilda?"

"He seemed to remind me of someone."

"That is Hugh Pollard. You remember the Pollards?"

"You don't mean the Pollards of Berle?"

"Certainly. Old Mr. Pollard, you know, owned the three largest mills in the place. He failed while you were abroad. It was an awful crash. Your father, I believe, lost about two thousand pounds in it."

"And was that Hugh? Hugh Pollard? I used to play with him," murmured Hilda. Her voice seemed sad, and all the light had vanished as by magic from her sweet face.

"Yes, we used to know them. It was very sad, dear. The old gentleman died soon after, and Mrs. Pollard and her son were left penniless."

"What is he doing about here, aunt?"

"Ah, now, I do think that is the funny part about it. Why they should stay about here, so near to where they once lived so differently, I cannot make out. It seems so strange."

"But what is he doing now? He looked like a workman."

"So he is, I believe. Let me see; what did I hear about him? Ah, I remember. He went—he was only a boy at the time, you know—he went and got a situation at some cloth mills, and worked side by side with many of his father's former workpeople. Odd, wasn't it?"

"And now?"

"I heard some time ago that he was a foreman, or something of that kind, at the Wearford Mills. But just think of it! He was bred as a gentleman. Why, three months before he was working as a common weaver, he was studying at Cambridge."

"But he had his poor, widowed mother to support."

"Oh, of course it was very noble of him, I suppose. Certainly it was brave. Dear me, Hilda, how time does fly! That was twelve years ago, and it seems only yesterday, so to speak. You were a girl of ten. And now you——"

"Why didn't you speak to him, aunt?"

"Why, Hilda, child, what do you mean? How very absurd! Besides, it is kinder not to notice him in his present condition. Of course, if he should ever lift himself up again, we should be only too glad to welcome him."

"I wonder what value he would place on the welcome?" remarked the girl Hilda, in a voice that was fed with the air of a mood too high and broad for scorn or sarcasm. Nevertheless, on the delicate ear of stately and conventional Mrs. Rickard it grated with the suggestion of a discord.

"If he were a wise man he would attach great value to the welcome," she answered coldly. "But there, enough of an unpleasant subject. Just look at the slope of that wood; did you ever see such a lovely carpet of bluebells?"

Hilda Carrington was an orphan, and lived with her uncle and aunt, Major and Mrs. Rickard. Ten years of her life, however, had been spent in a young ladies' seminary.

She was a tall, handsome girl, with a brilliant colour and a fine figure. She looked the lady down to the ground, and she was what she looked. Her face was in itself a fortune, not simply on account of its pure, high-bred loveliness, but more especially because of its exquisite womanliness, its strength, its intelligence, its humanity.

She suggested at first sight, and at last sight, nothing petty, nothing thin, nothing acrid. Face and form, manner and voice, spoke clearly of a nature rich in passion, in sentiment, in sympathy, in practical wisdom.

She did many foolish things, but they made a better impression than the wise things of many others. She had a large soul, which is better for a woman than a large intellect, and quite as effective. And she believed in soul—a woman's sweetest faith the world over.

Digitized by Google

Frequently left alone with her thoughts the image of Hugh Pollard haunted her.

All the old child-life came back, and its memories, which she shared in common with Hugh, were still vivid and fragrant. She had been fond of boys; would have liked to be a boy herself; had affected their ways and manner. The boys had been fond of her evidently, for she had memories of half-a-dozen lads who had been her close friends.

Among them all, Hugh Pollard stood out as the handsomest, the sweetest tempered, the bravest, and most gallant. A stout-hearted little gentleman, a thorough-bred through and through. And now—— Oh! it was pitiful, she thought.

He was thirteen, and she was nine; it must have been summer time; he put his arm round her neck and kissed her, and added, in an explanatory tone:

"My stars, Hilda, you are a delightful girl, and I do love you!"

No other boy had ever done that or said that; it took place in a hayfield, and even now the scent of the new-mown hay was in her nostrils.

Again, they were together in a little valley, in the shadow of a hanging wood, for the day was hot. Below them was a babbling brook, crossed by a hand-rail bridge. On the other side was an old wall, very high, and clothed with ivy. They sat and gazed at the wall, and fell wondering what was on the other side of it.

Suddenly a head popped over the wall and a voice said:

"Well, my dears, suppose you come in and see for yourselves."

They went in, like true adventurers, and made a find. Such gooseberries, such strawberries, such currants! The apples were not ripe—more was the pity—nor the pears; but they strengthened the sense of abundance.

There was a cottage, too, as pretty as a shell; and an old man, with a laughing face and a white beard; and an old woman with white curls over her ears, and a sweet face, and the softest of voices.

They stayed there, it seemed, for hours, and ate fruit and cream and new bread and butter, and drank tea by the cupful, feeling that it added to their dignity. It was Paradise, which if not found in childhood, is for ever a land unknown.

It is not easy to forget those who stole with us into Paradise, and by the same token the girl grown woman did not forget the boy grown man.

For some days Miss Carrington was in doubt; then she did something that was distinctly characteristic. She left home alone with one small trunk and spent the night with a friend who lived five miles distant.

The next day, as Miss Morel—her middle name—she quietly returned to Screwford and took rooms in an unpretending, vine-covered cottage, the home of Hugh Pollard.

One would not like to say that Mrs. Pollard, Hugh's mother, had no soul; gallantry alone would forbid it. Still, the fact is undeniable that she had a strange sense of being without something that she ought to have had.

The glorious air did not exhilarate her. The superb outlook did not make her break forth into singing. The near beauty of her own garden did not touch her spirit and make it quiver with a nameless tender joy.

This was the way that things affected her son; but she, poor woman, could not forget the past any more than she could love the present.

Pollard, however, had this advantage over his mother—not only had he discovered his soul, but he had also made the profoundly fascinating discovery of his soul's affinity. His other self—his second soul—his feminine counterpart!

"Why don't you marry, Hugh?" his mother once ventured to ask one evening as they were walking in the garden.

"Because I have never fallen in love, and I never shall unless"—and he hesitated.

"Unless what, my son?"

"Oh, you needn't be frightened—not the least bit in the world. There is no fear of it happening."

"No, no; but tell me, what is it?"

"Not with that serious voice and face. Ah, there, now the sun is out and the land is beautiful, I will tell you. Years and years ago, in what seems now like another life, as a lad I had a playmate—a girl. I don't know what has become of her; her people were very rich; I suppose she is married. I loved her—we were only children, you know, but I loved her. She was such a plucky, royal-hearted girl! Now, if Hilda Carrington turned up, I wouldn't answer for the results."

"What do you mean, Hugh? Would you forsake me for her?"

"Now, now don't be so tragic. Hilda Carrington is about as likely to 'turn up,' in that sense, as I am to be made King. Why—why, I'm a mechanic, a poor workman. And she, by Jove!—like as not she's a millionaire's wife now. No, there's no danger. But she has stood since my boyhood for my ideal, mother.

"If she beckoned me, I should say to myself, 'There stands the kingdom of Heaven beckoning me, and blessed is the man who leaves everything for the kingdom of Heaven's sake.'"

There was a ring now, a passion, an enthusiasm in his voice that nothing could hide. His mother made no answer, but an anxious look came into her eyes. "Let us go towards the house," he said, after a pause. "I see our new lodger is picking roses."

Ah, that new lodger! He did not understand it a bit, but she was like an electric battery, he thought. If he looked at her, if he spoke to her, if he even thought about her, there was something about her that made him tingle. What it could be remained a mystery to him for some weeks.

One day, however, it came upon him like a flash—she reminded him of Hilda Carrington! Then he laughed, fell a-whistling, and felt comfortable—more comfortable than he had felt for some time.

"She is no more like what Hilda would have grown into than chalk is like cheese." He told himself this audibly, and felt convinced of its accuracy. He felt so brave, so sagacious. He had explored the mystery; he had broken the charm.

Mentally he laughed to scorn her power over his imagination. He felt quite eager to see her again, to speak to her, that he might realise how the virtue had gone out of her, how dead she had become.

He had not long to wait. It was a delicious evening in June, and the sun was drooping down behind the hills in dull red splendour. She was sitting in an arbour, in a low rocking chair, and the glory of the sun was upon her.

He came along the garden path and raising his hat to her would have passed on; but she spoke to him, and he stood still.

"Do you ever row on the lake, Mr. Pollard?"

"Sometimes, Miss Morel."

"Do you enjoy rowing?"

"Oh, yes. Do you row?"

"No; but I should like to—if I had someone to teach me."

"Oh, I will——" He stopped suddenly, like a hunter at a high fence; and, like a skilful rider, she put him at it again, and helped him over with a touch and a word.

"Will you?" she exclaimed, and her face lit up gloriously.

"Oh, yes; with all the pleasure in the world."

Is this your favourite story? See page 71.

Digitized by Google

"If I am not detaining you." She glanced at the vacant chair, and he said:

"Not in the least. May I?"

She nodded slightly, smiled, and the faintest of flushes deepened her brilliant colour. They talked rowing, they talked landscape, they talked next week's athletic sports, they talked church, they talked politics, they talked—bless me, they talked everything except the main thing, to wit—themselves.

He talked with ease and intelligence, she thought, and, better still, with that subtle sympathy and cast of thought that bespoke the Varsity man, not the weaver of Wearford.

"He is still a gentleman to the core of his brain. He might never have left us. He is one of us yet, and I am so thankful!" was the way she put it to herself that night as she looked at herself in the glass.

And he? He did not come in till late; he had walked the garden for hours. A light was burning in her room; he watched it for some minutes, then went indoors and spent the night with his pipe and his thoughts.

"What a weak fool I am," he said to himself. "I am false to Hilda, my ideal. If she stood before me in flesh and blood, she could not move me more than this woman does. As much! I don't believe she would have a show at all. What does it all mean? She's like music to me—like magic, bewitching music! And all the time I'm fool enough, ass enough, pig-headed enough, to pretend that her charm is Hilda's charm. I looked at her profile, and thought it like Hilda's. I looked in her eyes and saw Hilda's eyes. Her voice was Hilda's voice.

"I'll speak to mother to-morrow. One of us must go, or I am lost."

Not until the evening of the next day did he find an opportunity to speak to his mother alone. He had just made her comprehend that he had something serious to say, when Miss Morel appeared in the doorway.

"Will you give me a lesson in rowing this evening, Mr. Pollard?" For a moment he looked at her coldly, and she added, in an apologetic tone, "Not if you are tired."

Their eyes met and Hugh Pollard was no longer master of his own actions. It was in the gloaming when they returned home, and Mrs. Pollard had gone down to Screwford. They sat together in the arbour talking. Bit by bit the conversation took a personal turn, and she told him how she was her own mistress, and alone in the world.

"The closest friend I ever had was a boy. We were boy and girl together," she said.

"Ha! is that so? That is much the case with me." He sighed, and added: "That was in the old days, when I thought I was going to be a gentleman all the days of my life."

"Did you care for her much?"

"I have lived on her memory. She has been my ideal until—now."

"Do you mind telling me her name?"

"Oh, you won't know her. Hilda Carrington was her name."

"Do you think you would know her again if you saw her?"

"Know her? Well, I think my soul would, if my senses didn't."

"Am I—at all—at all—like her?" she asked, almost in a whisper.

He laughed lightly; then he bent towards her, and, as he gazed into her burning face, suddenly there burst upon him like a flash of lightning, a thought that made him start from his seat and kneel beside her. "Oh, can it be? or am I dreaming? Am I dreaming? Tell me, who are you?" he cried.

"I am Hilda Carrington! Oh, Hugh! Hugh!"

In another moment he held her in his arms.

And the sequel you will read. They were married, of course. And Society had much to say about the match at first. But Hugh was not long in gaining his place even in its eyes. He was able, far seeing, and industrious, and he prospered.

He acquired a large moneyed interest in the mills and this same Society welcomed him with open arms.

A. N. Abell.

THE BOTTLE OF CEMENT.

Telling of a Lover's Strange Predicament.

Mr. Withers' recent experience of the incompatibility of the coat-tail pocket and glass bottles was very painful and embarrassing.

He had returned to his home after a brief visit to London, and had brought with him as a present for Miss Wilson—to whom he was betrothed—a bottle of that remarkable cement which is sold by pavement merchants, and which is by them represented as being much stronger than wrought iron.

It had occurred to him that this cement would be a very nice thing to have in his future house, since, with it, all sorts of broken china and glass could be mended.

On the evening of his arrival home, he put the cement-bottle in his coat-tail pocket, and called on Miss Wilson, intending to offer it to her as soon as he entered the house.

Mr. Withers was ardently attached to the young lady; and when he saw her before him, he not unnaturally forgot all about such merely earthly matters as cement.

The parents of the young lady welcomed him politely, and, after a few moments of conversation, withdrew with a discretion which it is to be wished that all old people would emulate. Being of a frugal mind, Mr. Withers promptly lowered the gas, and proceeded to make himself at home.

The bottle was a stout one, and would perhaps have withstood any ordinary pressure, but as Miss Wilson weighed fully ten stone, and as the back of the small rocking-chair was of hard wood, it is not strange that the bottle yielded.

Mr. Withers was so much interested in the weather and other subjects, such as usually absorb the attention of young men in his position, that he did not notice the breaking of the glass, and it was not until an hour later that a false alarm of father in the front hall induced Miss Wilson to hie quickly to the sofa, and suggested to Mr. Withers the advisability of turning up the gas.

The cement had done its work, and Mr. Withers did not get up to attend to the light, but requested the young lady to discharge this duty for him. She did so, and then noticed his pained and preoccupied expression. To her anxious inquiries he admitted that he felt a little faint and would like a glass of water.

Miss Wilson hurriedly went for the water, reproaching herself for being so heavy, and accusing herself of selfishness and want of consideration.

In her absence the young man made superhuman efforts to wrench himself loose, but the cement refused to yield. When Miss Wilson returned with the glass of water, he looked so much worse that she was really frightened, and he was compelled to tell her the real state of the case.

She was a practical person, and timidly suggested that if she were to call pa, "perhaps pa might be able to free you;" but Mr. Withers said no; he could not bear the mortification of being found in such a situation by any father.

It was finally agreed that he should wait until a late hour, and should take the chair home with him. This was accordingly done, and had not the unfortunate young man been arrested by a local constable, who only discharged him when a severe test proved that his possession of the chair was purely involuntary, his misfortune might never have become generally known.

When disasters such as this are liable to happen to the wearers of coat-tail pockets, it becomes doubtful whether they are not altogether too hazardous for general use. In fact, good authorities maintain that the coat-tail pocket is positively detrimental, and that it should be abolished. E. P. Anson.

Digitized by Google

Letter Juggling Competition.

CASH DOWN. FIRST PRIZE, £25.	CASH DOWN. SECOND PRIZE, £10.	CASH DOWN. THIRD PRIZE, £5.

TWO BILLIARD TABLES (measuring 4 ft. 10 inches by 2 ft. 8½ inches), together with cues, balls, marking board, and spirit level,
And TWENTY-FIVE GRAMOPHONES, each one fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, and accompanied by two records.

• • • • • • •

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct. Only one name must be written on each line.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES." Five more lists will appear.

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

EXAMPLE:
ABGHIIMMNR... Birmingham.

SEVENTH LIST.

73. BEEKMOPR	79. ACDNOOPRSY .....
74. AADEFHMNR	80. AAENRRRST .....
75. ABDEEILLNNOP	81. ADEFHLMOOSW .....
76. AACEMNR	82. BCEGIKLLSYY .....
77. AAADHILLNRR	83. AABELLLSTW .....
78. AHLLOOWY	84. EEORTTTUX .....

Name..... Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

A Woman Hater.

Which Tells of How a Closed Door Led to a Marriage.

EVELYN TREVOR and her young pupil bent their steps towards their favourite haunt, the picturesque little wood at the furthest extremity of the grounds of Mostyn Grange.

It was a lovely April morning, the birds warbled their love ditties in the trees overhead, among the delicate green Spring foliage, while the ground was carpeted with the pale yellow primrose and the dainty blue-bell.

The child clapped her hands gleefully :

"Oh ! do look, Miss Trevor, what lovely flowers we shall have to decorate Daddy's room ! We must fill our two baskets and then come back for more."

"Is your father very fond of flowers, Daisy ?" queried Evelyn, as they busily set to picking the sweet-smelling buds.

"Oh, I do not know," answered Daisy, a little sadly ; "you see, it is three years now since I have seen Daddy, and I was such a wee tot then," she added with a superior, very-much-grown-up sort of air, "that I hardly remember what his tastes are. But surely he must love flowers—flowers are so beautiful, and my Daddy, who is such a hero, must be fond of all beautiful things, don't you think so, Miss Trevor ?"

Evelyn smiled at the child's guileless enthusiasm.

"You are very fond of your father, Daisy ?" she said, half wistfully.

"Of course, Daddy comes first in my heart, then Grannie, and then you, dear Miss Trevor"—and impulsively the child flung her arms around her governess and hugged her.

The young girl warmly responded to the effusive caress.

"Darling little Daisy !"

"I shall tell Daddy how good you have been to me ever since he went away and Daddy shall love you too !"

"Hush, hush, child, you are talking nonsense ; little girls must never speak about things which they do not understand."

"But, dear Miss Trevor, Daddy must love you if I ask him to."

"Daisy, you must not say such foolish things, or I shall be quite angry with you."

"And that would be the very hardest punishment you could inflict on me"—and once more the warm-hearted child embraced her governess.

It was now three years since Evelyn Trevor had come to Mostyn Grange, engaged by Captain Mostyn's mother to look after his little motherless daughter, while he himself was fighting in South Africa.

Mrs. Mostyn had been most kind to her little granddaughter's governess, while as for Daisy, her warm little child's heart had gone out at once to Miss Trevor, so that Evelyn had been very happy during those past three years.

Now a change was to take place, the "Master," as he was styled by the servants and villagers, was returning home at last after his long absence. At Captain Mostyn's own wish he had remained out in Africa long after the conclusion of peace, instead of returning to England.

Evelyn dreaded, she knew not what, feeling somehow the greatest awe of the father of her little pupil, and at any rate she was sure his advent would interrupt the even course of their present life.

When they had picked as many flowers as their baskets could contain, they wended their way back through the long avenue of centenary elms which were one of the chief features of the beautiful old Grange, and immensely admired by tourists when the grounds were thrown open to visitors once a week.

They passed under the massive old stone archway, and through the heavy oak door into the large, mediæval flagged hall, with the monumental carved-stone chimney at the far end, and the walls hung with antlers and quaint, old-fashioned weapons.

Here, in olden times, the Lord of the Manor was wont to sit at his hospitable board ; he and his family and his companions in arms, gathered at the high end of the board, while the menials, foresters, and soldiers sat below the salt.

Evelyn had greatly admired the architectural beauty of this hall when first she had come to the Grange, but now she was so accustomed to it that she and Daisy passed quickly through and ascended the massive dark oak stairs, lit by the large stained glass windows, through which the rays of the sun flowed in with rich ruby and gold tints. They entered the "West Room," which from time immemorial had been the apartment occupied by the owners of Mostyn Grange.

The young girl and the child with deft fingers disposed all their floral treasures in old china bowls and rare and costly crystal vases ; these bright touches of colour seemed to enliven the gloomy, old-world room.

"We might have got the gardener to give us his choicest orchids from the hot houses, but I have always heard Granny say that Daddy hated everything artificial, so it was best only to use these wild flowers."

Daisy's little tongue ran glibly on as they put the finishing touches to the final adornment of the room.

Just then Mrs. Mostyn's maid came up to Evelyn.

"Please, miss, madam would like to see you when you are at liberty to come to her in her sitting-room."

"Very well, Ruth, please tell Mrs. Mostyn I shall go to her directly I have taken off my out-door things."

A quarter of an hour later Evelyn entered the old lady's private sanctum.

"You wished to speak to me, Mrs. Mostyn ?"

"Yes, dear, come and sit down close to me."

Mrs. Mostyn was one of those ideal old ladies so rarely to be found nowadays in our twentieth century, when women positively refuse to get old-looking, and cling to their perennial youth, and the white-haired grandmother seems to be a feature of the past.

Most ladies now, no matter what their age may be, have golden tresses or ebon locks, and smooth, unwrinkled faces. But Mrs. Mostyn did not approve of modern innovations, and she spurned the new and wondrous arts of the toilet-table. She always wore a plain, black silk dress, ruffles at her neck and wrists of the most exquisite old cream-tinted lace.

Her silver hair was braided back from her broad brow under a neat widow's cap which she had never left off since her husband's death, full five-and-twenty years ago ; she was brisk and active in spite of her age and always cheerful, though she had confided to Evelyn that her life had not been free from many deep and cruel sorrows.

Digitized by Google

Evelyn seated herself on the couch by the elder lady's side and Mrs. Mostyn took her hand.

"I have something very disagreeable to say to you, child," she said gently.

The girl started; during the three years that she had been an inmate of Mostyn Grange, she had never heard an unkind word from the old lady. What could she possibly mean?

"I have been unfortunate enough to displease you, Mrs. Mostyn?" Evelyn faltered.

"No, no, dear, certainly not; it is something in connection with my son's return."

"He wishes you to dismiss me?"

"No, indeed; in fact my son does not trouble his head about you in any way; he is quite satisfied with the fact that I tell him I have secured for Daisy a first-class governess with whom I am absolutely satisfied."

"You are very kind," murmured Evelyn, but sorely troubled at the mysterious tidings which Mrs. Mostyn seemed so unwilling to communicate to her.

"Well, my dear, it is no use beating about the bush, I have an unpleasant thing to do, and I must bravely muster up courage to tell you. I am sorry to say that we shall have to change our pleasant institution of your having all your meals in the dining-room with us; the advent of my son obliges me very much against my will to have your meals served to you in the school-room."

Evelyn flushed hotly.

"Oh, it is of no consequence; indeed, it is only natural that Captain Mostyn should object to sit down at the same table as his daughter's governess."

Mrs. Mostyn kindly patted the young girl's cheek.

"Now, now, child, your pride need not be up in arms; I was afraid you would feel this keenly——"

"I ought not to do so, for I know it is the custom in most houses for the governess to have her meals served in her own room; it is you, dear Mrs. Mostyn, who have spoilt me."

"I assure you, my son has expressed no opinion on this subject, it is not that he would object to taking his meals with you because you are a governess; no, indeed, my Lionel has too much sense for that, but he would veto the presence of any woman, were she a princess of the blood royal. He has a rooted aversion to our whole sex, and is what we commonly term a woman hater."

Evelyn looked up with a puzzled expression.

"But Captain Mostyn is a widower; how did he bring himself to marry one of our despised sex?"

Mrs. Mostyn sighed.

"Yes, indeed, he married and in that fact lies the secret of my poor boy's hatred and contempt for all women. His wife—but, nay, we may not speak ill of the dead, besides, she is Daisy's mother. Suffice it to say she made Lionel absolutely miserable, and when her untimely death brought their unhappy married life to an end, he vowed from henceforth he would never have anything more to do with women.

"With the exception of his own mother (thank God he makes an exception in my favour), he thinks that all women are false, and he despises and hates them. You see, dear, I tell you all this, so that you may not feel that the change in our arrangements is meant as a slight upon you."

Evelyn lifted the old lady's hand to her face and pressed her lips to it.

"Dear Mrs. Mostyn, you are always so good and thoughtful for me; how can I ever be grateful enough for all your kindness to me? Please forgive the outburst of ill-placed pride I displayed just now."

"Never mind that, child. Only I must beg of you, as a special favour, to avoid as much as possible coming in contact with my son. I do not suppose his stay here will be of very long duration, as, ever since his wife's death, he has always sought to be on active duty abroad, and he has always been to the front wherever there was fighting going on. Thank God, his life has been spared to me in spite of all the perils he has courted so recklessly. He is passionately fond of his little daughter, who mercifully is not one bit like her mother. She takes after her father."

"Daisy is very like you, Mrs. Mostyn."

"Yes, so people say; Lionel was always supposed to have inherited my features and his father's character."

That same evening Captain Mostyn arrived. Evelyn was sitting in the school-room, when she heard the bustle and noise of his arrival. Daisy had been fetched down by Ruth, in order to be by her grandmother's side to welcome back the returning wanderer, and Evelyn sat facing the supper-tray which the footman had just brought up to her.

It was a dainty little meal, but the young girl did not feel hungry; it was the first solitary meal she had taken in this house; and she felt sad and lonely. Two big tears were slowly coursing down her cheeks.

"How childish and silly I am," she exclaimed, and to change the current of her thoughts she began pacing up and down the school-room.

She stopped in front of a small bracket on which stood a large photograph of Captain Mostyn in khaki uniform, which he had sent to his little daughter from Cape Town. Evelyn took it up and gazed at it intently; a good-looking face certainly, but with a stern and determined look which proclaimed the man therein depicted to have an iron will.

She started back—a tall man in evening dress was standing in the doorway.

Digitized by Google

Just then the door was flung open and Daisy rushed into the room. Evelyn dropped the photograph with a guilty look and burning cheeks, but Daisy was much too wildly excited to notice anything.

"Oh, Miss Trevor, Daddy says I may stop downstairs this evening for dinner in honour of his home-coming. I have just run up to tell you, and also to beg you to go to Daddy's room for me, please. I have not time, as he told me to come down at once.

"This morning, as we were arranging the flowers, my little brooch with the pearl daisies Daddy sent me came unfastened, and I left it on the table, forgetting to pick it up again. Will you please fetch it and keep it for me? Daddy would think it so careless of me to leave it on his table."

"Very well, dear, I shall go at once if you are quite sure your father is not in his room."

"Oh, no, he is with Granny in the drawing-room, and I cannot get hold of Ruth or any of the maids to fetch me my brooch."

Daisy danced gleefully out of the room, and Evelyn, taking a small hand lamp, proceeded down the dimly-lit corridor towards the "West Room." The door was open and she glided noiselessly in, making straight for the table, where the child declared she had left her brooch.

The room was in total darkness save for the uncertain light shed by the small lamp Evelyn carried; she lost some time seeking about among the books and nick-nacks on the table, ere she found the missing trinket, then, just as she laid her hand on it and grasped it, she heard the distant sound of the hall-door opening, a sudden gust of wind swept into the room, blew out the light in Evelyn's hand, while the door slammed to violently.

"How provoking," she thought, "but it does not much matter, I can easily find my way to the door, and feel for the handle till I find it."

Very carefully she groped her way to where she felt sure the door stood, but seek as she might, she failed to discover the handle, and she very soon realised that hers was no easy quest. She felt up and down, but everywhere her hand only came in contact with the smooth oak panelling.

She went round the whole room, feeling carefully against the wall, thinking she must be wrong about the place where she thought the door stood, but all in vain, there seemed to be absolutely no outlet to this room.

Suddenly, with a feeling of intense horror, something flashed across her mind which she had heard of vaguely from Ruth when first she came to Mostyn Grange, about the "West Room" having been used in the time of Cromwell to conceal cavaliers, and that it had been fitted up for that special purpose as a sort of secret chamber, the door was concealed in the panelling, and only opened at the touch of a secret spring.

"Good Heavens!" thought the unfortunate Evelyn, "was it possible that that arrangement still existed in this now modernised house?"

The mere thought of such a possibility was torturing to the now half frantic girl. If this were indeed so, her present predicament was awful, shut up alone in the darkened bedroom of the master of the house, the very man whom she had been told hated the sight of every woman, and of whom Mrs. Mostyn had begged her, as a special favour, to avoid meeting, so long as he remained at the Grange.

Evelyn shuddered at the mere thought of his finding her thus; how could she explain her presence? The quest of the brooch would seem such a futile and childish excuse. Oh, why had she foolishly consented to come to this room?

Every other room in the house was lit by electricity, had this one been left out when all the modern improvements had been carried out in the house? Once more she started round the room, hoping to lay her hand on the electric switch, but her search, alas, again proved to be fruitlesss!

She dared not alarm the house by calling out or knocking on the wall, no, she must trust to one of the maids coming in later to attend to the room before Captain Mostyn came upstairs. Oh, surely it was impossible that no one would come to release her before he came, some one must turn up to save her from that. The unfortunate girl sank down on a chair and indulged in that most feminine of luxuries, a good cry.

Time wore itself on, and to her it seemed that she must have been shut up for days in this dark room waiting for some impending and awful doom with no possible hope of escape.

Suddenly she heard a slight creaking noise, and at the same time the room was flooded in light; she looked up for one moment then shrank back, crouching in her corner when she saw a tall, dark gentleman in evening dress standing in the doorway with his hand still on the electric knob, which she had so vainly sought.

When he saw Evelyn he started back, and the deep frown and angry flush on his face made her feel like a miserable, guilty creature as she reluctantly came forward, stammering excuses.

"Dasiy had lost her brooch and she begged me to fetch it; the wind blew out my lamp and slammed to the door—and—and I could not find my way out." She gasped out the last words in a low, hoarse voice. Oh, could she ever forget the look of cold, withering scorn he cast on her, as he said in hard, deliberate tones:

"I presume you are Miss Trevor? To-morrow you will give what explanation you may think best to Mrs. Mostyn, on the subject of your extraordinary conduct this evening. She is at liberty to believe you or not."

Then he stood aside to let the unhappy girl pass out. Poor Evelyn, she felt as if a hard, cruel blow had been dealt her in the face.

After a sleepless night, white-faced and utterly miserable, she sought Mrs. Mostyn. Would her kind benefactress credit her unlikely tale, or would she, like Captain Mostyn, doubt her word? If so, Heaven help her, she would have to leave her place and seek another situation, with her name under a cloud.

Directly she entered the room the old lady held out her hand.

"My poor child, what a very unfortunate occurrence! Lionel has just been in to tell me."

"Oh, Mrs. Mostyn, he does not believe me!"

"No, but I believe you, Evelyn: that wretched, stupid, secret door is the cause of all the mischief."

Evelyn sank on her knees, and, hiding her face in her hands, burst into tears.

"Oh, thank you, Mrs. Mostyn, for trusting me!"

"Yes, dear, I do trust you implicitly; you need have no fears on that subject, but as my son is so terribly prejudiced against the whole of woman-kind, and against you in particular after that wretched incident of last night, I feel it will be better, perhaps, for you to return to your mother for a short time while Lionel remains here. Daisy can be told that she is to have a holiday while her father is here. Mind, child, I am not sending you away, but I think it advisable for you to leave us for a short time. Still, if you prefer to stay, I leave you quite free."

"Thank you, dear Mrs. Mostyn, but you are right. I shall go home to-day."

"As soon as Lionel leaves, I shall send you word, and you will return to us at once."

A few hours later Evelyn had packed her things, her box was sent to the station in one of the traps, she herself elected to walk by the pretty winding path, which skirted the river and led to the village.

As she was slowly walking on, with a heavy heart at leaving the dear old Grange, where she had been so happy, she suddenly heard a child's scream and a loud splash as of someone falling into the river. She rushed forward in time to see little Daisy struggling in the water.

The child had evidently slipped from the bank in trying to reach a flower or reed, and the current, being pretty strong there, was dragging her towards the mill dam a little lower down, where she would inevitably be dashed to pieces against the revolving wheel.

Digitized by Google

Evelyn felt there was not a moment to lose, and without an instant's hesitation, she flung herself into the icy cold element.

She was a fairly good swimmer, but her progress was much impeded by her clothes, which clung around her and seemed to drag her down with their awful weight, and, as already mentioned, the current was very strong at this particular point of the river.

However, she reached Daisy just as the child was sinking after having managed to keep herself afloat for a time by striking out wildly with both hands and feet. Evelyn caught her round the waist, whispering :

"Don't struggle, darling, trust me, I shall save you."

But the frightened child clung desperately to Evelyn, and her efforts, added to the wet, clinging clothes, made it a deadly and terrible strain for the exhausted girl to reach the bank.

At last, however, she did succeed in landing herself and the rescued child, but she was so utterly worn out that she lost consciousness and fell on the grass, still clasping little Daisy in her arms, just as Captain Mostyn came rushing to the spot.

From a distance he had caught sight of the two struggling figures in the water, but, in spite of his speed, had come up too late to be of any help in the rescue.

Daisy now ran up to him in her dripping garments.

"Oh, Daddy, Daddy, I should have been drowned if it had not been for Miss Trevor, she saved me, and now, oh, Daddy, I think she is dead!"

He stopped one moment to tear off his shooting jacket, and wrapping it round the child, said to her :

"Run, Daisy, as quickly as ever you can to the house; tell Ruth to put you to bed, with hot water-bottles, and to give you a hot drink, and tell them to send help for Miss Trevor."

Then he bent over Evelyn, and soon ascertained she had only fallen into a deep swoon. Very gently he raised her in his arms, carrying her along the path in the direction of the house. He soon encountered Mrs. Mostyn and some of the servants hurrying to seek Miss Trevor as Daisy had carried back her tale of the accident. The maids had blankets with them, and in them they wrapped the still unconscious girl, and carried her back to the house.

The ensuing days were terribly anxious ones for all the inmates of Mostyn Grange, for Evelyn, during her three years' stay, had endeared herself to the hearts of all who knew her.

Daisy was none the worse for her sudden immersion in ice cold water, but poor Evelyn lay between life and death, having developed an acute attack of pneumonia.

Captain Mostyn had not contented himself with the advice of the local practitioner, he had telegraphed to London for one of the most eminent physicians, and had also secured a first-rate trained nurse.

"Miss Trevor—Evelyn, will you consent to become Daisy's mother?"

"Miss Trevor saved Daisy's life," he told his mother, "she shall at least have everything of the best which money can procure. God grant she may pull through, otherwise the poor girl's death will lie at my door."

Poor Evelyn, hers was a desperate case, the doctors shook their heads and said that perhaps, owing to her youth and strong constitution, she might pull through, but it was very doubtful. Her mother was a confirmed invalid, and could not come to her, but Mrs. Mostyn was untiring in her care and devotion to the sick girl, and she gave the nurse all the help in her power.

Then came the day when the doctors declared that the crisis of the case had been reached, and said that night would decide whether their patient would recover or not.

Mrs. Mostyn and the nurse were watching by the bedside, when Ruth glided into the room and whispered that Captain Mostyn wished to speak a few words to his mother. Mrs. Mostyn rose and came out into the little sitting-room which adjoined the large bedroom, one of the best guest chambers, where Evelyn had been moved so as to have more air than in her own room.

"You wish to speak to me, Lionel?"

"Yes, mother, may I see Miss Trevor?"

"See her, why?"

"She is not expected to recover, and I wish to see her once more. As she is not conscious of what happens about her, it cannot harm her. Mother, do grant me this favour."

Mrs. Mostyn looked earnestly at her son, then said quietly :

"Very well, Lionel, you may see her as you wish it."

She entered the bedroom, whispered a few words to the nurse, who at once retired, and then signed to Lionel to come in. He drew near the bed, where Evelyn, white as marble, lay quite motionless. It seemed as if death had already claimed her for its own.

He bent down over her and pressed his lips reverently to her pale brow, then he drew back, buried his face in his hands, and a shuddering sob broke from him.

Mrs. Mostyn laid her hand gently on his arm.

"My poor boy!"

He started and seemed almost ashamed that anyone, even his mother, had been a witness of his weakness; he cast one last lingering look on Evelyn, and then silently left the room.

Slowly the terrible night of watching and suspense wore itself away; the clock had just struck two when the library door opened; Mrs. Mostyn knew her son was there keeping his sad, anxious vigil and waiting for news.

"The crisis is over; Evelyn has taken a turn for the better, Lionel; she is saved!"

"Thank God!" he responded fervently.

* * * * *

A fortnight had passed, and Evelyn was so far convalescent as to be able to get up and lie on the couch, which was drawn up by the window, where she could gaze out on the long and lovely vista of sloping lawns and stately avenues. Little

Digitized by Google

Daisy had been in to see her repeatedly, and the first drive for the patient was now being discussed; as Daisy left the room, Mrs. Mosytn said:

"Evelyn, my son wishes to see you to thank you for saving his little daughter's life."

The girl started and her pale cheeks grew crimson.

"Oh, Mrs. Mostyn, I thought he had left long ago."

"No; he said he could not leave till he knew you to be on the high road to recovery. He has been most anxious on your account and got the best possible medical advice for you."

"Captain Mostyn is very kind; but I would rather not see him, please, if you do not mind."

"But I do mind; Evelyn dear, won't you see Lionel to please me?" pleaded Mrs. Mostyn.

"You have been so good to me, Mrs. Mostyn, that I can deny you nothing. I shall see your son, but it will be a most painful interview to me."

"Will you receive him now?"

"When you will," the girl said wearily with a sigh; "you will stay by me, Mrs. Mostyn?"

"No, dear, I think not," and Mrs. Mostyn smiled.

"Then please send me Daisy."

Mrs. Mostyn bent down to kiss Evelyn.

"Don't be too hard on Lionel, child, because he judged you unfairly once."

Then, before the girl could answer, the old lady left the room. A few moments elapsed, and then there came a gentle tap at the door.

"Come in!" said Evelyn; she half hoped it was Daisy, but the door opened and Captain Mostyn entered. He looked as much embarrassed as the girl herself did. She did not hold out her hand to him, but just bent her head to acknowledge his presence. He drew near the couch.

"I am so glad, Miss Trevor, that you are now rapidly recovering."

"You are very kind, Captain Mostyn."

"I have come to thank you for saving my little girl's life."

"Oh, please do not mention that; I only did what anyone would have done in my place; it was nothing."

"Nothing, Miss Trevor, when you nearly lost your life, through your heroic act!"

She smiled:

"Does Captain Mostyn, a woman-hater, think it of much account whether one woman more or less encumbers the earth?"

"Miss Trevor, this is unkind! I have come not only to express my heartfelt gratitude to you for saving my little Daisy's life, but also to beg your forgiveness for my abominable rudeness to you the first night I saw you. I——"

"Oh! Captain Mostyn please," she hastily interrupted, "do not allude to that evening; it makes me so miserable to think of it. You did not believe me," she added reproachfully.

"Miss Trevor, I behaved like a cad and a brute to you. Can you ever forgive me?"

She averted her head and did not answer. Then he knelt by the couch, and, taking her hand, he whispered:

"Miss Trevor—Evelyn, will you consent to become Daisy's mother; that is, if you can put up with Daisy's father?"

She turned quickly, and snatching her hand from his, exclaimed:

"I do not understand you, Captain Mostyn. You have no right to insult me!"

"Insult you, Evelyn! Does a man insult the woman he loves?"

"You cannot and do not love me, Captain Mostyn. Out of a mistaken sense of gratitude, or perhaps from a false sense of honour, because you misjudged me once, you now offer me a good position—that of your wife. I decline the honour," she said coldly and proudly.

"Evelyn, Evelyn, you are wrong; it is your turn now to misjudge me. I do love you—I swear it by all I hold most holy!"

"You, the woman-hater! how can you love one of my abhorred sex?"

"I am paying a heavy penalty for having so far hated and despised all women! Now the only woman I have ever cared for turns from me and scorns my love!"

"Nay, I do not scorn it, if it is genuine!"

"Evelyn, how can I convince you? If you had seen a fortnight ago the agony I went through when I stood by your bedside and felt that death would snatch you from my grasp, then you would not doubt my love for you."

"When you stood by my bedside—you, Captain Mostyn?"

"Yes; forgive me, but I implored my mother to let me come in and see you once more; I thought you were dying, and, Evelyn—yes, I must tell you, even if you are very angry with me—but I kissed you, as you lay there white and motionless. It is one thing more I have to crave your forgiveness for."

He expected an indignant protest from her, but none came.

"It was no hallucination then," she murmured softly; "it was true—you stood by my bedside?"

"Good Heavens, Evelyn, did you recognise me then?"

"I was in a sort of trance, and I thought I saw you come in and bend over me," (and she lowered her eyes and blushed,) "and kiss me, but I thought it was all a dream!"

"And now you know it is not a dream, you are not angry?" The slight tremor in her voice and a happy light which had passed transiently across her face gave him a little hope.

"No," she answered very softly.

"Would you rather it had been a dream?"

"No."

"Evelyn, do you believe in my love now?"

"Yes."

"And will you not try to love me back a little?"

"No."

This unexpected and decisive answer shattered all his newborn hopes, a deep groan escaped him; then she laid her hand very gently on his, which lay on the arm of the couch.

"Captain Mostyn, I cannot try to love you a little, because—well, because I already love you a great deal!"

"Evelyn, my darling!"

"Yes, I have always loved you, long before you cared for me, before I ever saw you!"

"But, my own dear Evelyn, how is that possible—how could you love me before you ever saw me?" And he now boldly clasped her to his heart and kissed the little quivering mouth, which had at last been led to confess her heart's secret.

"There, you are doubting my word again, Captain Mostyn!"

"Don't call me Captain Mostyn, please; my name is Lionel."

"Well, Lionel"—she uttered the name softly, as if almost afraid to use it—"you see, I was always hearing your praises sung by your mother and little Daisy; your portraits and photographs were scattered all over the house, and although I was only a governess, I was an idiotic, romantic girl, and was stupid enough to fall in love with a man I had never seen. Then came my first meeting with you, when your cruel, scornful words and looks stung me like the lash of a whip. Oh, why would you not believe me?"

"My poor little darling, what a brute I must have seemed to you."

"No, I loved you still in spite of it all, but it was terrible agony to me, and I made up my mind no one would ever know, and you, of course, least of all."

Just then the door opened, and Mrs. Mostyn came in, holding Daisy's hand.

"I hope we are not intruding?"

"Mother, you will have your wish. Evelyn loves you so much that she has consented to put up with me so as to become your daughter. Come here, Daisy, and kiss Miss Trevor; she is going to be your mother and take care of you, and of me!"

"Oh, Daddy, I am so glad!" and Daisy jumped on the couch and flung her arms round Evelyn.

"I said Daddy would love you if I told him to!"

"So, Evelyn," said Mrs. Mostyn, smiling as she kissed the young girl, "you have cured Lionel of being a woman-hater!"

Lily Butler.

Digitized by Google

PLAYING WITH FIRE.

The Story of How a Husband was Brought to his Senses.

HERBERT LATIMER loved his wife, but he liked to occasionally cut loose from her apron strings and enjoy himself. About midsummer, he told Lena that he had "business" in Scarborough, and had to go there—alone, of course. She pouted, and cried, there was an exchange of unpleasant remarks, and Herbert left the house, feeling very unhappy—one of the unhappiest men in London.

An hour later, at the Savoy, he met his old college chum, Reginald Mansfield, to whom he related his troubles, and asked his advice.

"Follow your own inclinations, old fellow," advised Reginald. "Don't permit yourself to be tyrannised by your wife. I am astonished at her efforts to rule you, and only four months after marriage. Go to Scarborough, and she will soon realise the fact that a husband was born to control.

This seemed sensible advice, and in less than a week Herbert Latimer had gone to Scarborough. He had gone without leaving his address with his friend, Reginald Mansfield, and the latter was on his way from the club to Latimer's house to obtain it.

It was his first visit. He had been abroad when Herbert had married, and he had returned but a few days prior to the conversation just reported. On the evening of his arrival he had gone to see a middle-aged lady, an old friend of Herbert Latimer, once the friend of Reginald's own mother. She was a woman of the world, who had kept the depth of her heart and feeling, and who had looked on many of the chances and phases of life with her clear, steady eyes. The talk had turned on Herbert Latimer's wife.

"She is a simple country girl, is she not?" asked Reginald.

"She has a rare and charming nature, strong and sweet—far too good for Herbert. But she adores him—as girls of that character adore men of his."

"Oh, Herbert is not bad."

"Not at all. But weak. A weak Adonis. Men of that kind always have the best love lavished upon them." Mrs. Percy paused a moment. Then she raised her eyes to Reginald's. "She looks like Eleanor," she added, in a gentle tone.

She saw that he changed colour. "How that memory lives with him!" she thought. She alone knew this man as he was. She alone had known closely the dead girl who had been the dream of his young manhood. When people spoke of Reginald as a Lothario, she would remark quietly: "Let us not judge too much from the surface."

"She looks like Eleanor."

Those few words of Mrs. Percy had been persistently in Reginald Mansfield's mind as Herbert Latimer had come to him a few days later with his grievance. They were in his mind as he rang the bell of the young man's house.

Like Eleanor! Was it true? For an instant, as he waited in the dim drawing-room, he wished that he had not come. Then a curtain was raised and dropped again. A slight, girlish figure in a straight, flowing dress advanced. Mrs. Latimer put out her hand.

"You are a good friend of my husband. I have heard of you often; I'm very glad to see you," she said.

But Reginald Mansfield stood for an instant as one bereft of sense. Mrs. Percy was right. Here was the same rare Madonna type of beauty, the same low, broad brow, the same pathetic mouth, the same expression of the violet eyes—his heart beat fast with the sudden ache that he had so often hoped was stilled.

"Are you ill?" asked Lena Latimer, startled. He had already recovered himself with an effort.

"You will think me absurd," he said lightly; "but you look strangely like—someone I used to know."

In his agitation he forgot the object of his visit.

* * * * *

It was a warm, cloudy morning in August. Herbert Latimer had returned from his outing, and, to his dismay learnt that his wife had gone on a yachting excursion to the Solent with the Wentworths, a family with whom he and his wife were very intimate. But this was not the most important part of the disclosure. Reginald Mansfield was with the party!

This was rather too friendly on the part of his old college chum!

Herbert hastened to the home of Mrs. Percy, and to her related his troubles.

That lady endeavoured to calm him by such words as these:

"Oh, that yachting excursion is all right. Mrs. Wentworth is the model of propriety. And young married women must amuse themselves—even when their husbands are away."

"Oh, this is outrageous!" exclaimed Herbert. "Probably you see nothing wrong in Lena leaving London yesterday to 'amuse' herself, as you say, on the very afternoon that she knew I would arrive?"

Mrs. Percy shrugged her shoulders. Her visitor had turned towards the door.

"Where is the yacht likely to be now? I take it that you are informed, Mrs. Percy."

"I believe it is to return to Southampton to-morrow, or the day after. You are not going?"

But he had vanished.

One moment Mrs. Percy stood musing; and her teeth, white and fine still, showed in the peculiar smile that parted her lips.

Digitized by Google

"What will the outcome be?" she murmured. "And then—— Alas! what fools, what astonishing fools men can be, at times, to be sure!"

* * * * *

A mist had come up and lay, an impenetrable veil, over the sea. In the prevailing neutrality of the atmosphere's tints, a woman's yachting dress of blue-and-red made a warm, picturesque spot, blurred and deep, in the foggy perspective. A man, stalking along with swift strides, caught a sudden vision of this dash of colour, and of the slender, well-known figure it clothed at an abrupt terminus of the walk.

It was Lena, and she was not alone. A man walked by her side, too, whom he—Herbert—could have no difficulty in recognising. The tall, loosely built, nonchalant figure, was that of Reginald Mansfield.

The two had stopped now. Their backs were turned. But, sharpened to abnormal acuteness, Herbert's senses could divine, as it were, their mental attitude at the moment, betrayed in the pose of their vague, dark silhouettes. Lena, her head bent away from her companion, seemed to be looking out to sea, and, as Herbert advanced rapidly nearer, something listless, dejected, became more clear in the droop of her shoulders.

But Reginald Mansfield looked not at the sea, but at her. He stood near her, so near that his hand could touch her elbow.

The blood surged up in Herbert's heart, and at that instant the two faced about to retrace their steps and saw him advancing.

Lena was the first to speak. She had turned from white to red and back to white. A suppressed trembling had seized her. But her voice was clear and steady.

"Herbert, dear! You here? How did you know where the yacht would be to-day? I thought you were to be in London! Who told you where we were?"

Herbert's white, dry lips, framed two words shortly.

"Mrs. Percy."

Reginald Mansfield raised his eyebrows.

"Ah, yes. To be sure, she would know. You had a jolly outing, I suppose, Latimer?"

Calmly he met the glare of Herbert Latimer's eyes.

But Mrs. Latimer, laughing nervously, had touched her husband's sleeve. She turned her glance to Reginald Mansfield, and there was something like a wild, repressed appeal in it. Did he read its meaning aright? He took off his hat.

"Will you permit me to withdraw, Mrs. Latimer? I am sure that after your separation your husband's companionship must be the only one acceptable."

He nodded to Herbert, but received no look from the latter in return.

The next instant husband and wife were alone, and then the flood-gates of Herbert Latimer's jealous rage and indignation were opened.

Lena stood silent, with downcast eyes, as the hot words poured over her. She was, then, he asked, like every other woman? The great trust he had had in her truth, believing it so perfect that not even the shadow of a frivolous flirtation could touch it, was, then, proved to be unfounded? He had, perhaps, not been a model husband himself. He acknowledged it.

He had been in the wrong. He had gone after his own pleasures. He had seemed to neglect her. He had, in fact, neglected her. He had the misfortune of having been bred among people who looked upon such things as only trivial faults. But, through all, he had always felt, that, faulty as he might be, she was unassailable. Mrs. Percy, however, had suggested to him, by exasperating innuendoes, all that had been going on for weeks. And a flirtation with Reginald Mansfield, of all men! A flirtation with his own friend!

In intolerable despair he talked on. And then he stopped. What more was there to say? Sharply he turned from her.

Was he going from her? She raised her head, she watched him as he walked away, blindly, as one who is stunned.

"Herbert!" she suddenly cried out, with a rapturous note of joy and love. She ran after him, she clung to him; all her sweet Madonna face was covered with tears and smiles. "Herbert! Beloved! Beloved! It was only to test you, only to teach you, by your own pain, what mine had been!

"Truly, truly, I have given no thought to Mr. Mansfield save such thought as one gives a good, good friend. He has seemed very 'attentive,' as the world speaks of such things, but he has been only kind—oh, so kind! You see, I look like—like someone he loved once, and so he was my friend from the first.

"He saw how miserable I was, dear, about your going off on that trip to which I objected. He realised the pain I felt at your seeming indifference—for, indeed, I thought you cared nothing for me any more! Oh, was I not foolish? Do I not see now in your eyes; do I not feel by the clasp of your arms, how much you loved me in truth?

"But I was wretched, and Mr. Mansfield discovered it, and because he felt as a friend to me he thought of this plan. He and Mrs. Percy. She, too, has been, oh so good to me. Together they contrived it all. She was to see you and tell you when you arrived and I was to go off with the Wentworths on the yacht, and with Mr. Mansfield. It was all to keep up the appearance of the comedy we were playing! And it was to have been kept up much longer; I was not to divulge the truth to you until you were well tried. But I cannot, cannot play this farce another moment when I love you so! I see and feel that you so love me!"

She was weeping now in his arms. Tightly clasped, Herbert held her. When at length she looked up, his face was changed. —graver, colder, firmer than she had seen it.

"Yes, dear Lena, the comedy was played long enough, child, long enough. The lesson has been well-learnt. It has been taken to heart."

A fortnight later Reginald Mansfield returned to London. In the evening he went to Mrs. Percy's. She greeted him with an exclamation:

"Where have you been all this time? In hiding? In every manner I have tried to get news of your whereabouts. And not only I, but Lena, and Herbert Latimer himself. I think the latter wants to thank you honestly for bringing him to his senses. He has already thanked me. Never was a conspiracy crowned with more admirable success. They are turtle doves now—turtle doves! Herbert will remain to the end, I believe, a model mate; and as for Lena, she is supremely, completely blissful. You have done good work my dear fellow."

She paused, and then something caused her to regard him more attentively.

"Turn your face to the light," she said brusquely. Off his guard, he did so. Thereupon Mrs. Percy gave a low expostulatory cry.

"Reginald, that is not why you have been in hiding, is it—not truly this, boy?"

At the tone of deep, interested sympathy, Reginald covered his face with his hands. After an interval he raised his head.

"Yes," he said slowly, "I am afraid it is so. I care for her. She is another man's wife, and it has an ugly sound. But the feeling I have for her could not stain a flower. I thought it was only friendly interest at first, because she was so like—— But she was too like! It was playing with fire. I have been suspecting my real feeling some time. I knew it when Herbert came back, and by the look in his eyes I realised how much he cared for her, and that they would be reconciled." He got up. "Well, I shall have to live it down, as I did the other."

E. Barton.

Digitized by Google

Splendid Serial Story.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

NAMES TO REMEMBER.

SIR TREVOR MAITLAND, of Maitland Manor, Melton.
LADY MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's second wife. Before her marriage with him she passed as a widow named Mrs. Vernon.
JACK MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's son by his first wife.
AGNES MAITLAND } Jack's sisters.
MURIEL MAITLAND }
WOOLF MAITLAND, the present Lady Maitland's only child.
IVY STRANGE, a foundling with whom Jack is in love.
HERIOT NORTH, a friend of Sir Trevor.
MIKE HOLLAND, an ex-convict and burglar who blackmails Lady Maitland, he having been in prison with her first husband.
MARY MASON, Lady Maitland's maid.
DIGBY SCARLETT, an explorer and acquaintance of Jack. It was through him that Lady Maitland's first husband was imprisoned.
GILBERT CHASE, a detective employed by Jack to discover the mystery of Ivy's birth.
VERNON GRANT, Lady Maitland's first husband.

TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.

"The Bond Between."

"I AM 'at home' to no one to-day, Lawson," Lady Maitland said slowly, as she crossed the hall on her way to her boudoir; "remember—not at home."

She had been out for a short drive, yet strangely enough the keen, cold breeze of the January afternoon had brought no tinge of colour to her pale, creamy skin, and a restless, alert gleam had lately taken up its residence in her proud, violet eyes. She sank into a low chair by the fire, and let her long fur coat fall loosely from her.

Outside she had met Doctor Gray, and had heard that his patient was progressing as well as could be expected. The fever had not abated, but the wound in the head was healing.

"He will be better—soon," she thought. "Then I can no longer keep him from asking questions. He is clever in spite of his youth; the man Chase will tell him what he knows and suspects—and the girl will speak. Oh, I see clearly the whole panning out of events when that boy rises from his bed!"

She rose quickly and walked to the window, pressing her hot brow against the cold panes.

"And it was that miserable chit who came between me and my future peace!" she muttered, biting her red lips in a spasm of remembrance; how she had been outwitted by a girl whom she despised and used as a tool. "Had she not interfered with the open window, much might have happened that would have simplified matters for me; but as it is, I owe her something for having dared to come between me and my plans. She, the village foundling!"

She caught her breath with a sudden catch at the recollection of that low, cautious outcry of Nurse Beaumont, when she had claimed her attention to a mark on the sleeping girl's brow two nights ago.

What if there really could be anything in it? What if that pale-faced, quivering-mouthed girl were—— She laughed harshly as she had laughed in the presence of the woman who had pointed it out. "A mere coincidence," she had said, "an idle phantasy of an ill-educated, emotional brain, that could only adhere to one view about a particular mark on the brow of any chance child, that it should necessarily be the one remembered years ago!"

She flung back her head and whispered fiercely to the empty room:

"No! That infant, whether stolen or alive, is dead to me; as dead as though I had seen the earth shovelled upon it. No beggar's brat shall be palmed off on me by any hysterical woman. I have turned my back upon the spectres of the past, and shall brook no hand tearing aside the curtains I have drawn. They are dead—dead as—the man they found in the spinny!"

She put her hand to her mouth, to stifle the words she barely breathed, and a slight shiver shook her, as she walked back to the glowing fireplace and held out one slender, white palm to the flames.

It was cold outside, and the dainty boudoir was like a bird's nest—warm and cosy; but the graceful woman in it was like an ice queen, so bloodless and chilly were her hands and feet; even her heart scarcely seemed to beat, the cold was so intense; but her brain was burning, as it had done since the night of the ball, and the internal fire within her seemed to have fuel added to it with each hour.

"Bah! What a fool I am!" she laughed. "The twilight brings shadows out that haunt me! I will ring for the lamps!"

As she raised her hand to the button on the wall, the door opened, and Lawson came into the room.

"If you please, my lady," he began hesitatingly, "Mr. North would like to see you. I said you were 'not at home,' but he insisted on coming in, as he wishes to say 'good-bye,' and would not be able to come again."

"Of course, Lawson; show Mr. North in here at once," Lady Maitland said, "and bring the lights and tea. Where is Miss Maitland?"

"Helping the nurse, your ladyship, with Master Jack," the man replied, and left the room to usher in the impatient visitor.

Alone, Lady Maitland clasped her hands with a sudden nervous gesture.

"Good-bye!" she thought; "then—then Heriot North knows—something! But how much—I wonder, how much?"

The next moment he was in the room, and she with difficulty repressed the exclamation that rose to her lips. They had not met since the night of the bal masqué, when she had given him her confidence to the extent of trusting him with a secret commission, and that was nearly a week ago.

But the days that had passed might have been years three times multiplied, since they had glided over the head of the man who had given her his allegiance, even unto the eternal unrest of his future life. His face was grey, and lines stood out where before there had only been faint indications of thought and study; and in his earnest eyes, that had formerly been humorous or tender, was an expression of horror and abasement.

While the servant was in the room, arranging the tea-table and drawing the blinds, they talked commonplaces, as people are wont to do when great issues are at hand. But so soon as the door was closed upon his figure, Lady Maitland turned to her visitor with a world of inquiry in her voice.

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

"You have not come to say 'good-bye'? That was surely only an excuse to see me?"

He bowed gravely. "No, it was not, Lady Maitland. I am going to London to-morrow; then shortly, I hope, back to India!"

The level, beautifully-marked brows of her ladyship puckered ever so slightly.

"India, Mr. North? Somehow I imagined that you had given up all such ambitions, to remain in England near your friends—the friends that need you!"

"Then," he said bitterly, speaking in quick, uneven tones, "then it was that I thought I had a career of honour before me, even if love had gone by me. But—but since then, I have lost my honour, my self-respect, and everything that an English gentleman holds dear. Now, all that remains for me to do is to return to India, where, in some remote hill station, I may bury myself and try to live down memory!"

"Will you be so good as to tell me when this strange decision was arrived at, Mr. North?" she said quickly, and the cold note of reproof in her voice acted as a lever to the rising passion of the man.

"Need you ask? Can you really mean that you are in ignorance of what has so recently taken place?" he breathed, in a low tone of intreaty. "Why should you and I play at phrasing speeches, when we—know what we do know?"

The heart of the woman fluttered beneath her lace, and her lips quivered faintly as she listened. But she raised her eyes boldly to him and said:

"You have not yet answered my question, Mr. North. When was it that your thoughts turned again to India?"

"On the night, or rather the early dawn of the morning after the bal masqué, when I was burning—something," he replied, his voice hoarse with emotion—"that morning saw the night of my honour, and—and of yours! Oh!" he cried, "I trusted you so fully; why did you not repose just a little confidence in me before—that—took place? Surely, surely, there was some other alternative?"

There was a short silence, broken only by the dropping of a burnt out log into the china fireplace, then she answered him:

"Why do you speak in such ambiguous language, Mr. North? I am not afraid of anything you may say, so why wrap your pill in sugar for me? Perhaps," she went on bitterly, "I made a mistake in supposing that you would be my friend, or that I could trust you to do something for me without afterwards throwing it in my teeth. Well, even the loss of your friendship, I suppose I shall survive; but at present it hurts me to find how little I knew you after all."

Stung by her words, he relented a trifle from the harshness of the attitude he had adopted, and replied gently:

"I saw the contents of your parcel; the heat of the fire opened it, almost as though it recoiled from the contact! The slippers, handkerchief, wig—all bore testimony to some strange errand in which you had wished concealment! Then—then—oh, Heaven," he cried passionately—"the agony of saying these things to you—the woman round whom I built the worship of my life—is like smashing the panes of a stained glass window and finding that, after all, it was only a reflected glory!

"Then the following morning I heard of the finding of the body of—that creature in the spinny, and my hideous doubt grew into a more hideous certainty. But even now," he said, drawing closer to her, and grasping her delicate wrist, "I will believe in you if you swear that this is all a strange coincidence; that in spite of your having sent this poor wretch money to London, and again meeting him near the Manor gates when you told me it was the girl at the lodge; even then, I say, I will gladly believe your word if you say that it was not you who on the night of the ball met that soul before he went to his reckoning!"

Swiftly and cautiously Lady Maitland pondered her reply. It was imperative that this man should not learn the truth; as she knew it, yet, since he suspected so much that was detrimental, he must be told something that would paint his divinity in less sinister colours—be given some reply that would point to extenuating circumstances.

She turned to him with a sudden impulsive frankness that was not without its charm for the shame-stricken man whom she had chosen for her tool:

"Yes," she said, in a low voice; "you shall learn what has cost me much to keep apart from those I love—much, but not—what you think! For my conscience is clear from that graver charge—I swear that on my word!"

She stopped and flung her white, glistening hands out before her in an abandon of outraged honour.

"Do you think I could have touched my son, whom I love, had such a stain stood between us?"

He bent over her hands silently, but the dread had gone out of his eyes, and he breathed more calmly.

"Put me out of my suspense!" he murmured; "then I will kneel for pardon!"

She smiled wearily. "I lied when I said I had never seen that man before, when you questioned me about him, after you had been to the Messenger Depot in Regent Street. I did not know you then, or I would have spoken more frankly, but I was afraid!"

"Afraid!" he murmured; "in what way?"

"Perhaps," she continued dreamily, "you have heard that when I married Sir Trevor, I was a widow?"

He nodded. "Yes; well?"

"Well," she went on, slowly, clasping her hands tightly; "that creature who was murdered the other night in the spinny, by some strange chance found out my address, and threatened to disclose to Sir Trevor some disgraceful secret he knew concerning—my first husband, unless I paid him for his silence."

She paused, and the lace on her gown rose and fell with her quickened breathing.

"I was terrified," she went on after a pause, "and in my distress made the fatal error of allowing myself to be blackmailed by that man. His demands grew more exorbitant each time, and before the night of the ball he threatened, even after all I had given him, to betray the secret of a dead man to my husband. I disguised myself, as you know, and went to meet him, to beg of him to go away and not worry me any longer."

He leant forward eagerly; each word she said was lessening his burden of doubt, and reinstating her in his holy of holies.

"I understand," he murmured; "how you have suffered, and what a brute you must think me for having imagined such cruel things!"

She raised her hand proudly. "Listen first, before you pronounce judgment! I was desperate when I went to meet that creature, and, had I had the opportunity," she whispered hoarsely, "would like to have silenced him! But when I got further into the spinny I heard a shot, and, afraid of being discovered, I turned and fled back to the Manor.

"The brambles had scratched my hands, hence the state of the handkerchief. Then, hearing that strange things had happened in the spinny, I grew frightened, and gave you the things to destroy. Now you know all," she finished, flinging her head back with its wondrous glory of hair, and looking at him with a sorrowful smile.

"Do you condemn me so ruthlessly after what you have heard? Were you not a little cruel to the woman to whom you vowed an eternal devotion, and then, when she cast herself on your mercy, to think the worst of her afterwards?"

He flushed darkly. "Forgive me; I can only repeat, forgive me! I was a brute; you are an angel wronged by brutes! But you may trust me," he went on, eagerly, "not to betray your confidence. I will cherish it—for it is a bond between us that can never be severed—not even by death.

"I will serve you and stand by you to the end! I believe in your integrity with all my soul! Do not think that I shall ever swerve from my devotion a second time! No mention of your secret shall ever pass my lips. We are knit together in life, in death, by a bond that neither can forget or ignore—for it is the bond between us of honour and shame ; silence and trust ! I am henceforth your liege knight ! "

Digitized by Google

He bent over her hand with an old-world reverence, and she smiled slightly. It had been an effort to bring this strong man back into his chains that had so nearly snapped. She was glad that he had not been present when Gilbert Chase had mentioned the woman he had met ! But now he was safely made secure, and she knew the voyage to India would not take place.

Suddenly she withdrew her hand with a sudden fear. The handle of the door had slightly turned, and her quick ears had been tuned to hear such delicate sounds.

TWENTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.

"When Greek Meets Greek."

As they moved apart the door opened and Agnes Maitland came in, smiling sarcastically.

" Ah, Heriot ! " she said, with one of her rasping laughs, " so I hear you are going in for dealings on 'Change."

" What makes you think that ? " he said, quickly recovering from his surprise.

She smiled disagreeably, and sent a swift glance in the direction of her step-mother, who was busy at the tea-table. " Oh, I fancied as I stood at the door, that I heard you and Lady Maitland mention something about ' bonds,' " she said carelessly. " Was I wrong to think that it was concerning stocks and shares ? " she went on innocently ; " or were you discussing ' bonds ' of a deeper nature, and with no relative value to the City ? "

The slim right hand of the woman holding the sugar tongs quivered slightly, but no other sign was forthcoming that the sharp innuendo of her step-daughter had gone home.

After a brief conversation Heriot North took his leave, and the two women were alone.

" Is Jack progressing ? " Lady Maitland asked in a careless tone. She was thinking about the story she had told the man who had just gone, and was wondering vaguely whether he had believed all the details she had given him.

" Yes," Agnes replied ; " the nurse seems to know her duty. By the way," she went on, glancing at the woman seated opposite her, " I met someone quite interesting when I was away ; doubly so, because you were admired fervently ! "

" Really ? " her step-mother murmured ; " who was it ? "

" A man called Heath," Agnes said slowly ; " Ernest Heath, I think his name was, and he happened to see the group I had taken of you all last summer, and immediately swore that you were the image of his second cousin, Margaret Heath. I said that I did not know your maiden name," went on the voice of the inquisitor, " but that you were a Mrs. Vernon before you married father. By the way, what was your maiden name ? "

Her ladyship's lips parted with a sudden terror. How she hated this woman with the dissecting tongue and ferret's eyes !

" My maiden name," she began slowly, stirring her tea with an icy hand, " was Pearl Lester ; so the man you met must have a cousin strangely like myself ! " and her eyes flashed defiance into the narrow, beady ones of the old maid in the chair. " I should like to see him ; he would be interesting, I should think."

Agnes smiled. " Then you will have that pleasure very soon, Lady Maitland, for I have taken the liberty of asking Mr. Heath to pay us a visit, and see the lovely double of his cousin."

The white, slender fingers of the beautiful woman listening to the hidden venom in the speech of her step-daughter played nervously with the long turquoise chain suspended from her neck and hanging almost to her waist.

Ernest Heath, the cousin who had been but a short time in the home of her girlhood, before going out to his ranch in California—what strange freak of fortune had flung him in the path of Agnes Maitland, she wondered feverishly ! At any cost she must so arrange her time as to be away from the Manor when this man arrived.

She looked up, and caught the ghost of a sneer on the thin, sour mouth of Sir Trevor's daughter, and that sneer braced her to buckle on the armour of self-defence once more

" I am glad," she said thoughtfully, " that you have met a man to whom you seem to be attracted, Agnes ! And I also hope that this time the event will bring about the desired culmination in wedding-bells at Melton Church."

An angry flush mantled the sallow face of Agnes Maitland. The shaft too well did its duty. She raised her eyes and said spitefully :

" Perhaps Melton will be busy with matters other than church bells. For instance, the murder of that man in the spinny. It is a known fact that there is a mystery about it, and I heard yesterday that the detective had picked up—startling evidence—I think were the words."

A tremor shot through the frail-looking woman leaning back in her chair ; but no other indication did she give that the speech had any particular import for her.

" Yes," she said languidly, " it is a dreadful affair ; why discuss it ? "

" Why ? " And Agnes Maitland rose to her feet, towering a lean, gaunt figure, with passion-distorted face, above the wife of her father, upon whose aureole of copper hair the firelight flickered. " Why ? " she repeated again, in a low whisper ; " because I am convinced that the murdered man is the same as he I saw that night walking past the old oak in the spinny—the night that I followed you, and was tricked so cleverly by you and your—accomplice in some secret. But what secret I have never yet discovered. Do you have midnight rendezvous now, Lady Maitland ? "

For an instant a steel band seemed to be growing tighter round the brain and heart of her ladyship, and a red mist descended upon her eyes—only for a moment, however ; the next she was laughing softly, and her eyes sparkled with amusement as she cried gaily :

" Why, Agnes, your visit has imbued you with the spirit of romance to quite an extravagant extent ! It must be the influence of your new admirer, Mr. Wreath—Heath, or some similar name suggestive of rusticity ! "

The baffled woman flashed a glance of mingled hate and doubt at her.

" You may laugh at me," she said, in a voice vibrating with suppressed passion, " but in time I shall know the truth regarding your strange taste for wandering about the spinny with tramps ; as well as the meaning of the secret sign you have with that fool Heriot North ; the bond between you is, I believe, one that reflects no credit to either of you ! "

Lady Maitland drew herself up with a calm dignity. " Do not let your foolish tongue go too far," she said softly. " Remember I am your father's wife. And," she added, " it seems rather a shame to call Mr. North a fool ! He nearly made you his better half, you know ! "

" And would have done," the desperate woman flashed, " had you not come between us with your smiles, and false, glittering eyes ! Even then I would not have felt it so much had you prized what you had stolen from me. But, like the rest, you made use of him, employed him as your lackey ; for with most women of your temperament, you prefer to wash your dirty linen in other people's tubs ! "

She paused, her passion spent. She had been wrung by her own stormy emotions, and the rage of vituperation had fallen foul of the woman upon whom it had been heaped.

She turned to leave the room, then wheeled round. " You think I am mad," she hissed ; " or, rather, it pleases you to think so ; but remember, I have not forgotten the little incident of the night when you were looking at a certain shining thing in your hand, believing yourself alone ! I saw it—I would remember it—again ! And I mean to find out all about the murder of the tramp in the spinny ; for if it is the same man I saw that night, I know who killed him ! "

Her voice, low as it was, reached a figure that stood at the door which had swiftly and noiselessly opened to admit a man.

" I know who killed him ! " The words fell like a thunderbolt at his feet, and he looked keenly at the two women as he came forward.

" So," he thought, " Miss Agnes is playing the game of Paul Pry on her own ! I wonder what she has got hold of ? Anyway, her ladyship can be trusted to keep her own end up with that cat!"

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

After a few brief remarks Agnes left the room, and Lady Maitland sent a light laugh after her.

"Agnes has been entertaining me," she said. "She imagines that she has a clue to the murder in the spinny!"

Digby Scarlett eyed her curiously. Her cheeks were a pale pink, due to her recent encounter, but he fancied he could say something that would chase the colour from them.

"Agnes is clever," he said drily, "with the cleverness of a house tabby—it knows when to purr and when to scratch. By the way," he went on, "have you by any chance lost—anything?"

"Lost anything?" she repeated; "I fancy not. Why do you ask?"

"Because," and he took a step nearer, "because, in crossing the spinny the other night, I came upon a trinket. It was an oval-shaped locket of hammered gold, much stained—by—mud. I opened it, on one side there was no picture; on the other—one of a girl in her first youth. I thought it might belong to you?"

"No, no," she murmured, her teeth chattering as with sudden cold; "I have lost nothing of that nature; I hate lockets."

He smiled gently. "So I supposed. On the back of the photo I took out were two initials; they were 'M. from V.' But as it does not belong to you, I will take it to the police to-morrow—they may find it useful!"

He watched her narrowly, and saw her face blanch to a sickly grey, while her white, even teeth met over her red lips in an effort to keep back the scream that rose to them.

"I have not seen the girl Ivy," he went on carelessly. "It is time I paid my court to my future wife. I will make her a present of the locket!"

"Ah, you brute!" the desperate woman whispered; "why—why should I stoop to deny what you think you know? Supposing that locket were the property of the person you think—what then? I say, what then?"

"What then?" he repeated hoarsely; "why, your ladyship's life is in the hollow of my hand; one squeeze—and it is gone."

She laughed wildly. "Circumstantial evidence, Mr. Scarlett. What can that do, after all?"

He shrugged his shoulders. "Deprive you of a great many things you love, Lady Maitland. Among others, your son Woolf!"

"May I see that locket?" she said calmly, forcing a smile to her lips; "then I can tell whether I have lost one like it or not."

He put his hand to his pocket and drew it out. "I usually keep it locked up, but to-day brought it with me."

With fingers that scarcely could hold the thing she had almost given her soul to possess again, she touched the spring and looked at the photo lying loosely in its place.

His eyes were on her, but as he turned to pick up a glove she quickly tore the picture out and flung it in the fire.

"You vixen!" he snarled, livid with rage; "I was a fool to trust you with it!"

He rushed to the grate, but she barred his way, once more a laughing, radiant woman.

"Outwitted again, Mr. Scarlett! The face you counted on is burnt to a cinder! Now take your locket, and go to the police—if you dare!"

TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.

The Bird Takes Wing.

"Good-morning, Miss Mason; quite a Spring-like day, isn't it?" And Gilbert Chase caught up to the lanky figure of Miss Maitland's maid, who had been steadily tramping on ahead for some time.

She turned sharply to him, her long, narrow eyes greeting him with a brilliant flash. Mr. Chase had what the servants at the Manor described as "a way with him." But strangely enough it was not the rosy-cheeked, blue-eyed Betsy, the under maid, nor the trim, dainty Parisienne Félice, her ladyship's special maid, that attracted the quiet-looking man with the rather weak eyes and diffident manner.

It was Mason, the bitter-tongued, sallow-faced woman with the weird eyes, that had a trick of suddenly flashing into your own when you least expected it, who had caught the masculine fancy of Mr. Chase. Perhaps it was not altogether fancy that actuated Mr. Chase's philandering, but, whatever his motive, it was never attributed to any other than her own surpassing beauty by the usually astute Mason.

"Oh, it's you, is it, Mr. Chase?" she said; "fancy meeting you here!"

"Yes; the unexpected always happens," he assented gravely. "Are you going to leave a message anywhere, or is this just a little stroll for the good of your health?"

"It's my afternoon out," she retorted; "I get it once a week, and every other Sunday."

"Ah; you have a good home, Miss Mason," he said, with a sigh. "I wish I had as good! A lovely house, and a beautiful mistress!"

Mason sniffed aggressively. "'Andsome is as 'andsome does is my motto," she replied; "and I'm not one as speaks without reason, too. I've my own opinion about her ladyship, and she's clever enough to pretend not to notice it; and I must say that she carries things off with a 'igh 'and!"

"Humph!" thought Gilbert Chase, "so there's bad blood between them, is there? This jealous cat will be a mine of information to me, so long as I can get her on the right tack!" Aloud he said:

"Oh, I suppose all big ladies are the same in their ways. They gets like that."

"Big ladies!" sneered Mason. "She may be now, but before she came to the Manor she was no one much; leastways, I've heard the housekeeper say she was a plain Mrs. Something, a widder."

"Plain! Never!" murmured the detective, whose eye had been attracted by the radiant lady of the Manor. But it was his business instinct that prompted him to learn about everyone, whether they came within the range of his professional calling or not.

It was now nearly ten days since he had been quietly investigating the inquiry about the murder of the ex-convict in the spinny. At the inquest the verdict had been given as "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown"; and the evidence brought up regarding the shots had evolved the strange fact that the bullet the doctor had extracted from the head of the dead man was of the calibre ·096, the same nature as that which had so nearly also killed the son and heir of Sir Trevor Maitland, both shots having evidently been fired from similar weapons.

But what had so puzzled the coroner and jury, as well as Gilbert Chase, had been a second bullet in the dead man's shoulder. It must have been fired before the fatal and last shot, as an after-death wound would not have closed up again.

The question that Gilbert Chase had asked himself ever since was, "Were there two people in the spinny that night both bent on murder?" for, if not, why was not the third shot similar in calibre to those which had brought both men down, one indeed, to his death; for the bullet in the dead man's arm had been of the calibre ·032, obviously belonging to a much lighter weapon than which had killed Mike Holland.

"Two revolvers," Gilbert Chase had argued, "did not necessarily point to the presence of two people;" but until Jack Maitland was allowed to see him and throw some light on the mystery, he ferreted and dangled the bait of artful questioning among the different people with whom he came in contact.

"How is the young lady now?" he said abruptly to Mason, who had from time to time stolen thoughtful glances at him; "I mean," he corrected himself quickly, "the young lady who lives at the lodge?"

"Oh, her," said the woman in a mollified tone; "she's a bit pale and peeky-like, but there's not much the matter with her."

Digitized by Google

"She is very lovely," he went on slowly, "she reminds me of someone—or was it a picture?—that I saw years ago. I remember making that remark the first time I saw her ladyship. She has just the same type of face that haunts you. But returning to the young lady—Miss Strange, I think her name is; I suppose she was at the ball on the night of the murder?"

"The murder!" gasped the woman suddenly; "you mean the—man—Mike—Mike Holland?" and her quivering face and dilated pupils showed that she was strangely upset by the subject.

Gilbert Chase looked at her sharply. A sudden thought that had sprung into being died as he glanced at her pale face, and noted her trembling lips. The black hair, growing low down on the forehead, the long, cunning dark eyes, and cruel, vicious mouth reminded him vaguely of another face he had but recently looked upon—the face of the dead ex-convict Mike Holland.

"You are startled!" he said innocently. "What was Mike Holland to you?"

She looked at him strangely, battling for self-control; then smiled a stiff, distorted grin that accentuated the terror in her eyes.

"Nothing," she said thickly. "But I think I saw him alive—in the village—once or twice. The mention of the man's name upset me. It came so sudden like!"

"I suppose," he went on carelessly, "that the poor wretch never spoke to you? These tramps often spin yarns about themselves."

The woman shook her head. "No, I only passed him in the village—we—we never spoke."

"I'm sorry," Gilbert Chase murmured. "You might have told me if he was married or not. I should like to know that. It is important—very!"

She flashed a strange look at him.

"I tell you we never spoke," she said shortly. "If you want to ask those questions, you'd better go to——" She stopped, and with a sudden change of manner, said: "The girl from the lodge can tell you more than I can, Mr. Chase, if you know how to open her mouth; and someone else's too!"

Outside the "New Age" he paused, and said, "Will you come in and have some refreshment? The inn will not be full or noisy, it's too early."

She hesitated, then accepted with a show of diffidence.

In the bar-parlour there were one or two people, a woman and a couple of men drinking. As Gilbert Chase and his companion seated themselves in one of the partitioned-off corners, she cast a hurried glance round, then uttered a low cry that drew all eyes upon her.

The woman standing by the bar turned also, and put out a thin, dirty hand impulsively.

"Why, it's Polly!" she murmured. "Polly, you 'ere? Then you can tell me all abaht pore old——"

With a hasty gesture Mary Mason rose to her feet. "I'm goin' out," she said. "I'm took bad!"

Gilbert Chase followed closely on her heels, his professional scent again on the trail. Fear—large, shrinking fear—was written in the woman's eyes. As she hurried away he looked after her thoughtfully. "Very well, 'Polly,'" he said, with a grim smile, "we will resume our chat later!"

He turned back into the "New Age," and cast a sharp glance round the bar.

The woman from whom Mason had shrunk had vanished.

* * * * *

"Your ladyship will pardon me, but I must insist upon seeing Miss Strange now. I will not keep her long, but it is natural to suppose that she had some reason for her emotion of the other day, and she must, in the cause of justice, tell me what she meant by saying the things she did."

It was a couple of hours after he had re-entered the "New Age" that Gilbert Chase had requested to see her ladyship

(Continued overleaf.)

MOSELEYS FOOD

"MADE IN A MINUTE."

Moseleys Food is

A BOON TO NURSES AND BUSY MOTHERS.

It is richly nutritious.
Forming healthy flesh, bone, and muscle.
Builds up the constitution in a wonderful way.
Ensuring vigorous, well-developed children.
Moseleys Food can be taken and retained by the most delicate stomach.

A DELICIOUS SUPPER DISH,

soothing and conducive to sound, refreshing sleep.

AN IDEAL FOOD FOR EVERYBODY.

We will send FREE a 6d. TIN on receipt of 2d. for postage.

MOSELEYS FOOD Ltd., Sample Dept., Stockport.

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

at the Manor, and he was now in her boudoir, standing before her respectfully, yet firmly. A slight smile of amusement curved Lady Maitland's lips and deepened the violet of her eyes, as she said softly:

"And you really think, Mr. Chase, that that poor child will be able to assist you? Why do you so earnestly desire to speak to her? If I could only assure you of her utter inability to help you."

He bowed gravely, admiring the contour of her face and the creamy loveliness of her hands. The black velvet band that he had noticed before round one perfect wrist had gone, and he found himself wondering whether the donning of it had been a dainty woman's fancy, or whether it had concealed some more subtle motive. Then he pulled himself up with a start. He was actually attributing criminal reasons to the wife of the Chief Constable of Melton!

"I am sorry, your ladyship," he murmured; "but may I ask when it will be convenient to you for me to see Miss Strange? I can call later."

She shrugged her delicate shoulders carelessly. "She is lying down in a nice sleep, but if you will call at the Manor this evening about nine, I will see that she comes down to you. She is staying with us at present, not at the lodge."

He bowed again, feeling himself dismissed by the imperious woman whose beauty, like the perfume from a hothouse flower, overpowered him.

When he had gone, Lady Maitland quickly left her boudoir and went upstairs. Outside the door of one of the bedrooms she paused, and smiled grimly.

"He may call at nine and see her; but I fancy I shall know what she will say first!"

She pushed open the door and walked in. By the side of the bed Ivy was sitting. At the sight of the woman in the doorway she started to her feet, alternately paling and flushing.

"I have come to tell you," her ladyship said coldly, "that the detective is coming to speak to you to-night at nine about the insane words you dropped some time ago in his hearing. If you are not careful," she went on warningly, "you may incriminate someone you profess to love. I wish to impress upon you the necessity of being as reticent as you can, for your own sake—as well as for the sake of others!"

"A detective!" the girl murmured shrinkingly. "Oh, Lady Maitland! I can't see him—I can't! It is awful! He will know—he will find out. And then—and then——"

Her voice broke, and she flung herself down at the elder woman's feet in a tempest of fear.

"Keep me from him! Keep me from him!"

"You little fool!" Lady Maitland hissed. "Pull yourself together. Remember the dead man was—your—father! No one knows but you, and—I! It remains with yourself to bury the secret! Mr. Scarlett will forget it."

The girl drew her hand wearily across her brow. She was trembling, and the cold, icy face of the woman above her inspired her with awe and—dread. Oh, if only she had a mother to turn to—a mother into whose arms she could nestle, her heart would not be so sore.

She rose to her feet silently. And the sight of the ruffled hair on the girl's brow made her ladyship draw in her breath with a thrill.

"See!" she said, in a low voice, drawing the girl towards the dressing-table; "if you are in doubt as to your parentage—look! Have you never wondered at the significance of that mark on your forehead? Shall I tell you what it is? It is the brand of a felon! You are scared with the mark of your father's shame—a broad arrow!"

She flung the trembling girl from her with a scornful gesture.

"Now you know why I want you to be careful to-night! A false step on your part will perhaps be your ruin! Remember!"

She glided from the room, leaving the shame-stricken girl quivering with the burden of disgrace and ignominy that was too heavy to bear alone.

She pushed the soft hair back from her brow again, and felt with burning fingers the brand of shame with which she was doomed to go through life labelled.

Suddenly she sprang to her feet. Her eyes were flashing, and an artificial strength lent energy to her tired limbs.

"They shall never know!" she murmured, "never! Better that I should——" She paused, then shivered.

And the shadows grew darker in the little room where she waited for night to fall.

At nine punctually Gilbert Chase presented himself at the Manor. Lady Maitland received him with quiet dignity, then rang the bell and requested Lawson to inform Miss Strange that she was wanted.

Presently the man returned, looking startled.

"Please, your ladyship, Miss Strange is not in her room; but I saw a note on the table, which I have brought down."

Lady Maitland put out her hand, but the detective interposed quickly:

"Allow me!"

He opened it and read:

"I shall be gone from Melton when you read this. I could not face that man! Lies come strangely to my lips! I am for ever passing out of your lives. You will keep my secret!"

He handed it silently to her ladyship, who took and glanced hurriedly at the trembling words. She was glad that this had happened—that the girl had gone, and the smug-faced detective cheated as she had been.

"Well," she said quietly, concealing her satisfaction, "what can be done now, Mr. Chase? The girl has evidently run away terrified. Had we not better let her go?"

Gilbert Chase smiled grimly.

"I fancy not, your ladyship. I shall apply for a warrant for the arrest of Ivy Strange—if alive!"

Lady Maitland sprang to her feet with startling eyes.

"Arrest! What for?" she breathed hoarsely.

He answered her gravely:

"On suspicion of being guilty of, or the accessory after the fact to, the murder of Mike Holland in the spinny!"

(Another long instalment next week.)

SWIMMING.

By MONTAGU A. HOLBEIN.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s.

Some of the contents are:

Floating—The A.B.C. of Swimming—Breast Stroke—Swimming on the Back—Sea Swimming—Overhand Stroke—Touching and Turning—Treading Water—Under Water Swimming—Plunging and Diving—Training—Water Tricks—Overcoming Difficulties—Life Saving.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

Order Form. S.S.

To Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Swimming," for which I inclose 1s. 2d.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google

The Deaf of the Present Day.

Half a century ago the person who became deaf could entertain very slight hopes of a cure. Medical science had not yet arrived at a thorough understanding of ear diseases, and defective hearing was, in the majority of cases, regarded as beyond relief by medical aid. The deaf person of to-day, however, is in a different position, for the advancement of science in the past twenty years has placed within the reach of the Aurist a means of cure for a class of cases of ear diseases once considered hopeless. Those who do not realise how great has been the success of this special branch of medicine should read the latest issue of The Review of Ear, Nose, and Throat Diseases, which contains an interesting article passing criticism on various forms of treatment, past and present, and describing the latest method of treating ear diseases, based on an external application. This issue of the Review has been placed at the disposal of the public, and anyone who wishes a free copy can obtain it by writing to the Editor, Drouet Institute, 10, Marble Arch, London, W. Those who wish to seek advice will find, enclosed with the Review, a Report Form, by means of which a free consultation by post can be obtained for any case of deafness, or ear, nose, or throat ailment. Whenever possible, however, the Editor advises patients to visit the Drouet Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are, in the morning, 10 to 12, in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultations.

2/- PER PAIR LADIES' SUMMER Unshrinkable COMBINATIONS at 2/- the pair

We are offering an enormous purchase of Ladies' Elastic Ribbed, Woven Combinations at the astounding price of 2s. the pair. Sold by many Retail Stores at double the money. They are perfect in shape, beautifully finished, soft as silk. Ideal garments for summer wear. Colors: Pink, White and Natural.

2 pairs for 3/10: Postage 4d. extra. 4 pairs for 7/6. State size required.

FREE. Our "HOME SHOPPING BARGAIN BOOK." The Great Warehousemen, T. & J. ROBERTS, SHEFFIELD

WOMAN'S DEADLY ENEMIES ARE TOIL & WORRY.

They shorten Life - make it heavy.

WASHING DAY is the day they are active.

THERE'S A REMEDY!!

TRY SAPON THE IDEAL CLEANSER.

NO SCRUBBING! DIRT DROPS OUT!! CLOTHES UNINJURED! HANDS SMOOTH AND WHITE!!

"SAPON" DID IT. "IT DOES ITSELF."

FREE. PACKET ON RECEIPT OF POSTCARD TO SAPON LTD DEPT 69 ST SWITHINS CHAMBERS, LONDON.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

E·P·P·S'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

Icilma

THE ONLY GUARANTEED AID TO BEAUTY.

Nature's remedy for Complexion and Skin Troubles, whether caused by heat, cold, age, irritations or accident. Send 1d. stamp for postage of Free Sample & Booklet with Guarantee.—ICILMA, (Dept. 127) 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Mrs. Conyers,

MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

Digitized by Google

A GRAMOPHONE AT HOME

is a necessity.

In the Garden under the trees, in the cool of the evening, you can enjoy the finest music of the day, either played by such noted Bands as the Grenadier, Coldstream, or Scots Guards, or hear such celebrated Artistes as

SANTLEY,
BEN DAVIES,
ANDREW BLACK,
SUZANNE ADAMS,
ALICE GOMEZ,

and numerous others, sing you all the most charming ballads.

WHY BE WITHOUT ONE WHEN YOU CAN PURCHASE OUR

New No. 3 Style,

Price £3 : 3 : 0

SPECIFICATION.

Perfect Clockwork Mechanism, Bright Nickel Horn, Patent Concert Sound Box, hitherto only supplied with our highest priced machines.
Plays both 7in. and 10in. Records.

On receipt of a post-card we will send you full Catalogues of Records and Prices of Gramophones, together with name and address of nearest dealer in our goods.

THE GRAMOPHONE AND TYPEWRITER LTD.,
21 CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

His Favourite Figure.

Blushing Maiden: "Which figure in the quadrille do you like best, Mr. Spooner?" Enamoured Youth: "Yours, Miss Lamberton."

Not Love, but Safety.

Cora: "Was it a love-match?" Mabel: "Well, as her money paid his debts, and kept him out of gaol, I should say it was rather a safety match."

She Might be Gone.

"Harry, please don't whistle 'The Girl I left Behind Me.'" "Why not, Clara?" "You know we haven't any idea whether the servant will be there when we get back home or not."

Success was Impossible.

Bill: "They tried to get cinematograph pictures of the actress when she was writing a stage letter." Gill: "How did it turn out?" "Failure! She wrote too fast for the machine to follow her."

Poor Pickings.

Carrie News: "Have you noticed the change that's come over Mr. Dudell lately? Something has been preying on his mind for the last two weeks." May Cutting: "It surely must be starved by this time, whatever it is."

An Easy Remedy.

"They say that Nell Gadleigh has broken off her engagement with Harry Hippleson." "Yes, she says he was so affectionate that he wearied her." "Oh! if that was all, why didn't she just marry him and have done with the wearisome part of it?"

Circumstances Alter Cases.

Husband: "What was that you were playing, my dear?" Wife: "Did you like it?" "It was lovely!—the melody divine, the harmony exquisite!" "It is the very thing I played last evening, and you said it was horrid." "Well, the steak was burnt last evening."

What's Bred in the Bone.

"So you think there really is something in heredity, after all?" "I do. Young Mundsley, who is trying to get up a North Pole expedition, is the son of a woman who used to be an inveterate house-hunter, not because she could have used a house if she had found one, but for the mere love of the thing."

Hard to Convince.

The other morning Mrs. Blank was talking to her husband. "I noticed in The Daily Hoodoo that Mr. Blifkins died on Sunday." "It's a mistake, my dear," replied the husband; "he died on Monday." "But the paper said Sunday." "I know it, but it was an error in the print." "I thought so, too, at first, but I got a half-dozen copies of the paper, and it was the same in all of them. They certainly couldn't have made the same mistake over and over again." The husband tried to convince her, but it was no use, and he gave it up.

What Might be Expected.

Gladys: "Isn't it odd that the honeymoon should last but a month?" Rich: "Not so very odd; bills are sent out monthly, you know."

Didn't Want Another.

"No," said Miss Elder, kindly but firmly, "I cannot marry you, but I'll be a——" "Thanks, Miss Elder," interrupted the rejected one spitefully, "but I have two grandmothers."

She'd Drawn Her Conclusions.

He: "I can't get away from my business. I'm wedded to it." She: "I always thought the things that men were wedded to were the very things they seemed to get away from the most."

Sale Made at Once.

"Are those shoes your best quality?" "We have only one quality, madam." "Then why the difference in price? A friend of mine paid 22s. yesterday, and these are only 18s." "We sell by quantity, madam." Quick sale.

Not a Society Person.

Mrs. Nexdoor: "I have found out one thing about that Mrs. Newcomer. Whoever she is, she has never moved in good society." Mr. Nexdoor: "How do you know that?" Mrs. Nexdoor: "She shakes hands as if she meant it."

A Word of Warning.

"Henrietta, dear!" "Yes, ma," from the daughter at the door, parting from her sweetheart, who is just kissing her good-night. "Tell George to look out for the paint." George does not kiss her again. Henrietta thinks it is awfully mean of her mother to give her away, until she remembers that the front gate has been just newly-painted.

It Couldn't be Done.

"It doesn't seem possible." "What's that, my dear?" "Why, Mr. Atkinson, the statistician, says that all the people in the world could stand in a field ten miles square." "Well, they couldn't." "But, hubby, Mr. Atkinson says so." "I don't care if he does. You don't suppose a woman could stand in a crowd like that, do you?" "Why not?" "Because nobody could see her clothes."

The Price of Tears.

A number of married men were recently dining together in a club house. The question was asked, "What trait in your wife do you consider the most expensive one?" The answers were as numerous as the men in the party. With one it was vanity, another religion, or charity, or love of dress. The last man to whom the question was put answered oracularly: "Her tears." There was a sudden burst of assent from every man in the party.

Men Require Catching.

She: "This is an awfully long play. The hero does not marry the heroine until the close of the fifth act. Five acts are too many." He: "But you forget that this is a modern love story, and the scene is laid in the present day. An author must make his play natural and true to life. Formerly love plays were quite short; but nowadays the men are so shy, from being hunted so much, that it takes the most attractive woman a long time to run a man down and capture him."

Too Enthusiastic.

"Teaching to me," said the enthusiastic young schoolmistress, "is a holy calling. To sow in the young mind the seeds of future knowledge and watch them as they grow and develop is a pleasure greater than I can tell. I never weary of my work. I think only of——" "I am very sorry," interrupted the young man to whom she was talking, "that you are so devoted to your profession, Miss Clara. I had hoped that some day I might have asked—in fact I called to-night to—but I hardly dare go on in the light of what you have just been saying." "You may go on, Mr. Smith," said the young lady softly. "I am a little too enthusiastic at times, perhaps."

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Strong Bond.

"F. G. A."—I regret I have not May's address, so cannot tell you whether or not she is the same girl. However, if the answer I gave to her meets the case of yourself and your beloved I am very pleased. Naturally the same questions must occur in dozens of different cases, and the same advice can be taken by all. So to you I say, if you have been intimate with a girl for three years there must be some bond strong enough to inspire hopes of love in future.

A Word on Shoelaces.

"WOULD it be proper for a girl to allow a young man to tie her shoelace for her when she has only spoken to him once or twice?" asks THISTLE.

* * * * *

There's no reason why he should not perform such an act of courtesy. It is not a matter of the length of your acquaintance. But don't tie your shoes too loosely when walking about with young men you only know very slightly.

Not a Matrimonial Agency.

"DULL" wants to meet a young lady upon whom he could bestow his affections. He is a stranger in London, twenty-three, fairly tall, and in a good permanent position.

* * * * *

I cannot agree, "DULL," to your suggestion that I should be the means of introducing you to any lady readers. As I have often said, this page is for advice, and not any kind of agency. My advice to you is to live in as select a neighbourhood as your means allow, and by joining in local church work, amateur theatricals, tennis clubs, or musical gatherings, get yourself into the society of those women amongst whom you are likely to meet the one you seek. Nobody need really be "dull" in London if they only go the right way to work to make good friends.

The Age for Independence.

UNTIL what age should a girl obey her parents in her choice of a sweetheart? For instance, "CECILIA" is deeply in love with a young man to whom her parents have taken objection. "CECILIA" is seventeen, and wishes to know if she is old enough to stick to the young man, whether or not her parents approve of him.

* * * * *

"CECILIA" is certainly too young to disobey her parents in such a matter. They must be very much better judges as to a young man's suitability for her than she herself, and no doubt they have very excellent reasons for objecting to him. My advice is that "CECILIA" should do as her parents tell her about breaking off the engagement. Had she been, say, four years older, she might claim to use her own judgment in the matter.

Respect versus Love.

"J. A. R."—No, I do not think the case you refer to is the same as your own. But the answer will apply in your case. You say you respect and like the older man more than anybody else you know, and that your relationship with the younger has never developed into love.

* * * * *

Well, if you can definitely say you like and respect a man, that is almost strong enough ground on which to listen to his proposal, especially as the man to whom you refer seems devoted to you, and to be a gentleman in the highest sense. If you really like and admire him, depend on it in years to come the sentiment will mature into something deeper.

Getting a Proposal.

"EDITH" knows that her young man loves her, but though they have been walking out together for several years, he has never told her so. Her friends say it is about time they were engaged. Should she tell him this, or should she let him know by strategy?

* * * * *

He is evidently very nervous and reserved. Perhaps you had better leave the matter of speaking to him to your parents or guardian. He must confess something to them, and they are usually more skilful in the matter of extracting such things than a girl herself. Naturally you wish the matter to be settled. Strategy is dangerous, unless very skilful. I know of a girl who brought about a proposal by the simple device of flirting with others. I do not recommend this, though in some cases it has been very successful.

An Indifferent Lover.

"U. L." suspects her young man of being tired of her. They have been together for two years and a half, but lately he has grown very different in his manner. When asked the reason he told "U. L." that "he thought they saw too much of each other." "U. L." says they meet twice, at dinner-time and tea-time, and every night regularly. He lodges next door. How can "U. L." alter his attitude?

* * * * *

Well, "U. L.," it is quite possible for young lovers to see each other too often. A man ought to have certain intervals in which to see his friends or take exercise, and naturally he does chafe a little if always in his sweetheart's company. Why not suggest that he should transfer his lodgings for awhile to some other district? No doubt he is very fond of you, and after a week or so of absence would probably return to you fonder than ever. I have known such little absences work wonders in restoring jaded lovers to a proper state of warmth.

Choosing Between Two Girls.

"A YOUNG man knows two girls. From their manner he believes both are in love with him. One is bright and sparkling, the other sedate and fond of home life. He cannot decide which to marry. What is he to do?"

* * * * *

My correspondent had better leave off meeting the girls altogether. If possible, let him pay distinct attentions to one or other of them without committing himself to a proposal, and if he finds that he is growing in love with her, let him stick to her. Most men would select the bright, sparkling girl in preference. I do not know my correspondent's own temperament, so cannot say what is the case with him.

* * * * *

Usually the best marriages are between those who are opposite in the matter of "brightness and frivolity." Two of that kind are very likely to clash. A serious man is well suited in "a bright, sparkling wife," and a "bright, sparkling man" generally requires a sedate, home-loving wife to see that his vivacity does not lead him astray.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

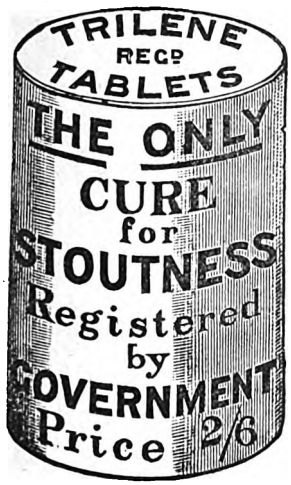
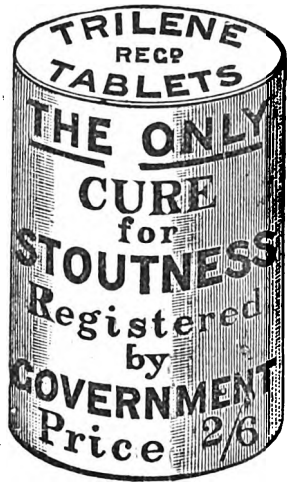
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says "I weighed 12st. 6lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Listorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1899: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have don world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 33 inches. I hope soon to be 32. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets.

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 87 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

"No Better Food."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., etc.

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., etc., lecturing on Foods, says: "The chief text in the Gospel of Nutrition is that Tea and Coffee are not Foods at all, while Cocoa is an admirable and sustaining diet. Than FRY'S PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA, no better food product of this nature can be obtained or used."

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

No. 760.] Week ending July 25th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

Glaring through the window was a weird-looking man, holding up a hand which had lost the tops of two fingers.

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "The Face at the Window." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

THREE GRAND

KODAK

AMATEUR

PHOTOGRAPHIC COMPETITIONS.

£1,000

(ONE THOUSAND POUNDS)

in CASH Prizes.

£500 for Pictures on N.C. Film (non-curling and orthochromatic).

£300 for Pictures on KODOID Plates (thin, flat, and unbreakable).

£200 for roll-films developed in KODAK DEVELOPING MACHINE.

Ask your Dealer for full particulars, or write direct to DEPT. 35,

KODAK LTD., 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, LIVERPOOL; and 72-74 Buchanan Street, GLASGOW.

Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, W., 171-173 Regent Street, W.; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery

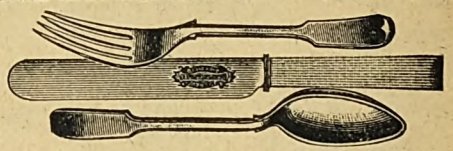
... THE ...

"ENTERPRISE" PARCEL, 25/-

Of Household Cutlery and Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white 'Ivorette' Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 2 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of "Columbian" Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.



51 PIECES FOR 25 SHILLINGS.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.

TERMS. Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if you are not perfectly satisfied.

No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Cutlery and Plate, etc., Post free.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

Something Absolutely New.

Death to Dirt, but Preserves the Fabric.

Perfect for

WOOLLENS

SILKS

AND LACES

'SAPON' makes Washday Playday.

FREE TRIAL PACKET on receipt of postcard to SAPON Ltd., Dept. 68, St. Swithin's Chambers, London.

Digitized by Google

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

Short Stories

No. 760.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending July 25th, 1903.

The Face at the Window.

Telling of a Ring and its History.

"MISS MORETON, Elsie! I must call you by that dear name! Let me tell you how I love you, how all-consuming is my passion! Nay, do not turn from me. Surely the objections which weighed in my disfavour eighteen months ago are no longer existent, and you can find some love, some pity, for me in your noble heart! Let me tell you what I have endured! Only let me plead my cause!"

The girl was startled by the passion that would show itself in spite of the speaker's efforts to suppress it. She saw the yearning look in his eyes, the agony of suspense in his whole countenance; at the first words she had involuntarily shrunk from his touch, although it was merely the placing of his hand lightly on her arm, but now came the revulsion of feeling. She was doing him an injustice and she was sorry.

"I am not turning from you, Mr. Kirke," she said hesitatingly. "But you startled me, and——" She stopped, but continued hurriedly as she observed that he was about to speak. "I was not expecting this! I feel that the time is hardly appropriate. My poor father has been dead scarcely twelve months, and Ralph——" Her lips quivered; she could say no more.

A strange expression flitted across his face; he bent over her hand and kissed it, and when he raised his head again his face was calm.

"It may seem so to you, Elsie," he said, more quietly and still making use of her Christian name. "To me, consumed by a passion which I can scarcely restrain, it is long, so long! Do not think that I wish you to forget those whom we both mourn, but would even they wish you to hug the cup of sorrow all through life! If they were not selfish——"

"Oh, no!" she broke in. "Ralph was the most unselfish of men, and my father too would not wish it. Yet it is not possible to efface grief so soon!"

Kirke bowed.

"Still, may I not dare hope that there is some chance of my having the supreme joy of devoting my life to making you happy? The tender memories will rise at times, but I shall not mind. Was not Ralph Moreton, your cousin, a friend to me? I did not grudge him his success in winning you, and I willingly stood aside; but since his untimely end, only a short time before that of your father, I have felt that I—— Elsie, dear, don't weep! I am so sorry!"

The tears had started to the girl's eyes. Fate had been very cruel to her during the past few months; she had lost her lover, who had died in Egypt, and her father, whose sudden death from heart failure had left her an orphan and heiress to much wealth.

The double blow had caused a breakdown in health, and had made her think that life had no further attraction for her. Youth, however, is buoyant, and time is a great healer or killer of pain, so she had recovered some of her old cheerfulness and much of her interest in life. Nevertheless, this incident had opened the old wounds and the pain was severe!

Basil Kirke watched her emotion with concealed vexation. His annoyance, it must be said, was tempered by a certain amount of gratification at the reflection that the girl had not rejected his advances; there was yet hope!

"I can afford to wait," he murmured inaudibly. "I have made the first open step, and I can go on! I may safely leave matters as they are for the moment; it will be unwise to push them further now."

Aloud, he said:

"Elsie, forgive me! I will not distress you by pleading my cause further. Some other time you will listen to me. I have bared my heart to you, and you will not wound it thoughtlessly?"

It was an artful speech, and had the desired effect. Elsie exclaimed:

"Oh, no, no! I feel so sorry for you, and I will try to——" Then she remembered the significance of her words and cut short the sentence in confusion.

Basil murmured something about leaving her to herself, and rose to depart. He shook hands with her and left the room; he knew the house well enough, and could let himself out as he had done before.

"Dear me!" So ran Basil Kirke's thoughts as he reached

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

the hall and took his hat. "What a change in my sentiments. When she gently told me that she could not accept me, less than eighteen months ago, I wasn't so upset about not having her as I was because I saw that my rejection meant that I must do something more serious than love-making, and in another direction, if I was to get the old gentleman's money!

"But now I am really and truly in love with her, madly in love with her! I have risked the result of——" he involuntarily glanced round to see if even his thoughts had been overheard, and his face paled a little—"of what I did at great risk, in order to win that girl! I mean to have the money, but I want her as well now! Without her, what will it be?

"How strange that I should change so! What a wonderful power this sweet girl has obtained over me. I almost regret—— Bah! I can get through that! Sometimes her soft eyes will appear to be casting reproaches at me, but it will be nothing more than fancy on my part, for she will know nothing! How can she?"

He was staring at his reflection in the mirror in the hall-stand, staring without seeing; he came to himself with a start, and hurried towards the door.

As he placed his hand on the lock to open the door, he grated the knuckle of his forefinger against a sharp corner; it did not remove the skin, but he sprang back as if a serpent had bitten him.

"I had forgotten it," he said aloud, evidently referring to something other than the sharp corner on the lock. "Shall I ask her now or wait? Wait! No, it isn't safe; I ought to have asked for it sooner!"

Elsie was surprised to see him re-enter. She had dried her eyes, and was deep in thought.

"I came back to ask you what has become of that ring which I gave to your father on my return from the East," he told her. "Do you still keep it locked up in a box? I should like to destroy it! I always feel that it is unlucky and I reproach myself for having yielded to your father's love of curios. I have a creepy sort of feeling that it carries misfortune. Your father's death followed so soon after he had it, and I tremble now lest it should bring bad luck to you."

"Fancy you becoming superstitious!" Elsie smiled. "If it contained a wonderful stone which had once formed the eye of a wooden god in a temple and the Hindoos were after it, and so on—you know all the rest."

"Oh, there's nothing of that nonsense about it," he remarked, trying to imitate her light tone. "It didn't come from India at all; there's no stone in it, and it wouldn't fit the finger of an idol! No, you may rest quite easy on that score. Yet, I would rather have it and destroy it."

Elsie shook her head. "It hasn't brought ill-luck to me, and I have had it for a year in my box. It is quaint, and I thought I would wear it sometimes. See, I have it on now."

She stretched out her hand, at the same time he put forward his right hand as if to catch her arm; the movements were quick on both sides, and Elsie's hand slid along his cuff. His ear caught a grating sound, and he nearly cried aloud.

"What is the matter?" asked Elsie, noticing his perturbation.

Basil glanced hastily at his wrist and found that the skin was intact; on his shirt cuff was a scratch that seemed full of significance to him. He repressed a shudder with difficulty, and replied, in a voice that still showed signs of mental uneasiness:

"Oh, it is nothing. I must be a trifle shaken to-day—which is not extraordinary perhaps," he added, with a meaning glance. "Yes, I see that you are wearing the ring, and I want you to give it to me!"

"I will not encourage your superstitious fears," she retorted, with a laugh. "No, I have taken a fancy to it. It was a tight fit for my father's little finger, but it fits my third finger fairly well—just a little easy, but that is all. I intend to wear it to show that you are quite wrong!"

He was forced to give up the attempt, but his face was white and his expression hard, as he left the house.

Elsie took the ring from her finger and examined it. There was nothing particularly attractive about it; she wore it merely because it had belonged to her father, and it was taken from his lifeless fingers.

It was made of gold, with curious carved work all over it; in the place where a stone is usually set in rings of that shape, there was simply a boss of gold also carved with fine lines in fantastic patterns.

"I thought I heard it scratch something," she mused, her brows slightly contracting in the process of examining the hoop of gold. "And I thought once before that it caught in my dress. I don't see anything spiky, though!"

She replaced it on her finger and wore it till she retired for the night, when she put it back in the box where it had lain since her father's death.

"I will give way to his wishes," she said, a blush suffusing her cheeks. "Ought I to mourn so long? Perhaps I am wrong; perhaps I ought not to shut myself off from my fellow creatures, as I have been doing. And what am I to say to Basil Kirke? He has waited, faithful, to the words he spoke eighteen months ago. He still loves me—he loves me more than ever, if I read him aright! Oh, Ralph, Ralph, my love!"

She flung herself on her knees in front of a chair, above which hung the portrait of a handsome young man of three-and-twenty, strong, straight-forward, and bold; she buried her face in the cushions of the chair and wept.

Basil's persistence won for him a good place in the estimation of Elsie; she did not love him, but she recognised that she might do so in time. She threw off her sombre dress and emerged still more from retirement in order to accept the invitations which kind-hearted friends poured upon her.

She went to parties, to exclusive teas, and to many society functions, and she commenced to take much more interest in her surroundings.

Basil rejoiced; he was not rich—in fact, it was usually a struggle to prevent creditors from taking the final disagreeable step of issuing a summons for debt—yet he contrived to obtain invitations for most of the functions at which Elsie Moreton was present, and he engaged her attention as much as the conventionalities would permit.

At the end of another month he flattered himself that he was making splendid headway. True, Elsie had gently corrected him for using her front name, and he called her Miss Moreton, but she had done it in a way that suggested to him that he would have the right to call her Elsie before long.

The matter of the ring had only been mentioned once; that was when he asked her if she had put it safely away and she replied that it was in the little carved box on her dressing-table.

Elsie Moreton and the elderly lady who lived with her and managed the house, had arranged to attend a parochial entertainment on a particular Wednesday evening. On the very morning, Basil came to Elsie with three stall tickets for a special performance of a merry comic opera which was taking the town by storm, and he was visibly disappointed when he found that Elsie and "the dragon" could not go.

Digitized by Google

"I am very sorry, but I am positive that I mentioned this entertainment to you quite a week ago," protested Elsie. "How odd that you should have forgotten! Do you not recollect my telling you about the different things which the parish children had made? The poor children, I mean!"

Basil professed utter ignorance, but he passed the affair off lightly, saying that he would go alone. His face wore an expression the opposite of vexation when he left her presence and found himself alone.

Elsie and her escort attended the entertainment that evening, returning about half-past eleven. The two servants had been told not to sit up, as Miss Moreton and Miss Bland would take supper with the vicar after the entertainment and would be home late. The two ladies, therefore, let themselves in, and at once proceeded to their respective bedrooms.

Elsie was busy with her thoughts as she entered her own room, or she would have noticed that a light was burning. It was not till she had taken off her gloves and was extracting the pin from her hat that the fact struck her.

"How careless of Lydia," she murmured, moving towards a wardrobe in the corner. "She——"

At that moment, a muffled figure dashed from the wardrobe and made for the window. Elsie was a girl of considerable nerve, but this sudden appearance unnerved her for a moment, and in that time the intruder had reached the window, threw it open, and scrambled out.

Recovering herself quickly, Elsie sprang after him, but was too late; the burglar had dropped to the ledge overhanging the door, and from this point easily reached the ground. Elsie raised an alarm, but it was too late, and the robber escaped.

In the confusion and excitement that followed, Elsie was the only one of the four who kept her self-possession.

While a maid summoned a policeman, she examined her room to see what had been taken. Certainly it would be jewellery, which the thief could easily slip into his pockets, for he had taken no parcel with him, and he had not left a packed bag in the hiding place from which he had been driven by Elsie's approach.

She looked in her boxes, but nothing was missing. How fortunate! She had disturbed him. She shut up the boxes, but another thought took possession of her, and she again looked in the carved box in which she kept the strange ring; it was gone!

Elsie was puzzled. Why should anyone rob her of that ring? There were others far more valuable in the same box. For an instant the old story of Hindoos tracking and recovering a consecrated treasure came to her mind, but she dismissed it with disdain. That was no Hindoo whom she had disturbed, A Hindoo would have done the thing more artfully. It was a mystery.

Elsie decided not to mention the fact to the policeman, so that official looked important, and decided that the rascal had been disturbed before he had had time to plunder the house. He promised that inquiry would be made, but Elsie seized the chance and said that she did not wish to be further troubled, as she had lost nothing.

It was two days later when Basil came to tell her about the performance, and to hear her account of the parochial entertainment. He also brought two invitations to a ball to be held a week later.

"I want you to come with me!" he pleaded. "Will you?"

It would be tantamount to an announcement of their engagement, but somehow she could not resist. She seemed to be under a fascination; the fierce passion that lighted up his eyes acted strangely upon her.

Moreover, she was upset by the theft of the ring; now that the excitement had worn off, the mystery disquieted her. Perhaps there was some tragedy connected with that golden hoop, after all!

Perhaps—horrible thought!—it was not unconnected with her father's death! She felt that she was becoming hysterical, and she was glad of his protection.

She told him of the mysterious occurrence, and he looked very grave.

"I am thankful that it is gone," he said, and his tone was so sincere that it admitted of no doubt. Then he saw his advantage and he took it. "I should never forgive myself if I once became convinced that it was that ring which brought about your father's death!" he cried vehemently. "And to think that it was I who gave it to him."

Tender-hearted Elsie responded immediately.

"It wouldn't have been your fault in any case," she said gently. "It was done in ignorance; and, even supposing the idea to be correct, the responsibility rests with those who encompassed his death, and not with the innocent giver of the ring. But all this is foolishness on my part; I am distraught; we will not talk of it any more."

The subject was dropped, but, try as she would, Elsie could not entirely rid herself of the sensation of dread that had attacked her. She was easily startled now; sometimes the slamming of a door made her jump. The "dragon" insisted that a change of scene was necessary, and it was decided that they should have it after the ball.

The change did come after the ball, but it was different from their expectations.

Elsie roused herself for that night; she looked radiantly lovely, and created no small amount of envy among less physically-gifted and less wealthy young ladies; Basil was envied for his good luck by half the men present, and he knew it, but this made him the more happy.

It was a brilliant success, every dance on Elsie's card was claimed, and she had to dance them all. The music, the intoxication of exquisite dancing, and all the other attributes of a ball of that description had their effect on her, and she banished care and sorrow in order to enjoy life to the full.

The only bar to Basil's thorough enjoyment was the fact that he did not get a chance of drawing Elsie into the conservatory in order to ask her to be his wife.

"I must try to get my opportunity this evening!" he murmured. "I ought not to let this evening slip! But how? The dragon will be in the carriage with us!"

He left the ladies in order to make inquiry about the carriage, and returned with a look of vexation plainly visible on his countenance.

"There seems to have been some misunderstanding," he said gloomily. "Our carriage has not arrived! It is past the stated time, so I fear that it will not come. I have had to hunt up two hansom cabs! Couldn't do better!"

He conducted them to the entrance, and, by some manipulation and before Miss Bland realised what had happened, he placed her in one cab and sent it off, thus securing Elsie for himself. He was very careful about placing her in the conveyance, allowing her ample time to arrange her dress so as to avoid undue crushing, and then he got in, and away they went by another route. Basil was exultant; here was his opportunity, and he would make use of it as soon as they were fairly on the way.

"It's a good maxim that says you can make opportunities if you have a mind to do so!" he thought.

He turned to Elsie. Her face had lost its animation; something seemed to oppress her. The sentiment appeared to affect him also; it was like a damp cloud falling round them, a premonition of coming evil.

Digitized by Google

He endeavoured to shake it off, and opened his lips to speak, but a frightened cry from Elsie caused him to look in the same direction. The sight filled him with terror.

Glaring at him through the window of the cab, with the light shining full upon him, was a man—a man with a weird aspect, wearing a strange head-covering, and holding up a hand which had lost the tops of two fingers!

The apparition vanished, and Basil fell back in the cab, shaking with fear. Elsie, greatly frightened also, was unable to say anything.

Basil did not recover his self-possession. The cab reached its destination, the dragon was ready to receive Elsie, but Basil could only muster up strength to shout out his own address and the cab rolled away, leaving the astonished women looking after it in blank surprise!

Elsie waited for Basil Kirke to appear on the following morning and make some explanation and apology, but when the visitor was announced by the maid it was in these words: "A gentleman wishes to see you, miss; but he will not give his name."

Before Elsie could reply, the stranger pushed his way in and the maid retired.

"Ralph!" Elsie gasped. "Ralph! I thought——"

Then she fainted in the arms of the lover whom she had believed to be dead.

"But how is it?" she asked later. "How did the horrid mistake occur, and how——"

"I came upon you too suddenly!" he interrupted regretfully. "I couldn't wait. I will tell you all about it.

"Basil Kirke tried to kill me. He wanted money, and he had resolved to have it. He determined to get rid of those who stood in his way—me, your father, and yourself! If I died, your father would leave all his money to you, and I should not be able to marry you, naturally. As you had rejected him once, so spoiling the chance of getting the money easily, he thought you would refuse again, and you were to be sacrificed!

"He did it, as he thought, by means of that ring. It had a receptacle under that boss of gold, with a tiny spring which, when the ring was pressed, caused a tiny point to protrude and scratch. That point, when hidden, rested in poison of the most virulent type.

"A mere scratch would cause death in two or three minutes, and the symptoms of death were those of syncope! You probably never discovered it, but when the upper part of the ring was pressed against the finger on which the ring was placed, that pressure caused the point to protrude from the outer and upper portion of the ring, ready to scratch!

"He tried it on me, and scratched me. My Hindoo servant sucked the poison out of the wound, for he knew what it was. Basil came in just in time to see him doing it, and he scratched the faithful fellow on the upper joint of two fingers. To save himself from death, the Hindoo lopped off the top joints without hesitation.

"Basil fled, believing that we should both die; but the Hindoo was safe, and he had done enough for me to preserve my life. The effect of the poison on me, however, was to rob me of reason and keep me in bodily weakness for many months."

"But why did someone not send word home?" asked Elsie.

"Because Basil had robbed me of all my belongings that might have shown my identity, and my servant, having been engaged by me as a temporary help in Egypt, knew nothing about me. Then we came home, and my servant tracked Basil, and saw him in the cab last night.

"In the meantime I had learnt, with the greatest grief, that your father had fallen a victim! Yes, it was so!

"Basil fell madly in love with you, and that fact saved you! He tried to win you, and so spoilt his own plan. Thank Heaven! He was arrested this morning, and confessed his infamy. The ring is in his possession now, it seems."

"Then it was he who entered my room the other night."

"Yes," returned Ralph gravely. "Now let us forget it. We are re-united and we will strive to make each other happy after much suffering, dear!"

George Day.

METCALF'S BOOMERANG.

Which Brought Great Trouble on his Household.

"Mrs. Metcalf," said the magistrate, "do I understand that you make a charge of assault and battery against Mr. Metcalf?"

"Not exactly, your worship; you see——"

"One minute," said Metcalf. "Permit me to explain the matter. Is your worship acquainted with the Australian boomerang?"

"Yes, I am."

"Well, you will know that the peculiarity of the boomerang is when you throw it forward it flies backward and hits something behind you."

"When you throw it behind you what does it do?"

"Comes straight to the front. On Tuesday I bent the kitchen poker into the boomerang shape and began to study the scientific aspects of this remarkable weapon."

"What for?"

"Partly for the sake of developing scientific truth, partly for the purpose of killing ducks. If I want to kill a duck with a boomerang what do I do? I walk away from him. I go off in the opposite direction. This lulls suspicion in the duck's mind. Suddenly I take careful aim, say at Jones' man who is chopping wood in the next yard. I let fly, and the first thing you know is that the boomerang has gone whooping over my shoulder and killed the duck—dead—dead—dead as Julius Cæsar. It's one of the most beautiful sights in the world."

"Did you ever kill one that way?"

"Well, that is just the point. No, I did not. I am practising. This is what has excited Mrs. Metcalf. Wednesday morning, while I was in the yard trying the thing, I forgot. I aimed at the bird-cage in the porch, and the poker went over my head and straight through the kitchen window. I apologised to Mrs. Metcalf, and tried again. This time I aimed right at the kiethen window, intending to hit the bird-cage behind me. The boomerang must have got twisted somehow, for the scientific principle was temporarily suspended, and she went bang through the kitchen window again."

"Did it strike Mrs. Metcalf?"

"Struck her head, your worship. But I explained and bent the poker back to the proper angle. Then I aimed at the pump and let her fly. She went up, turned over, flew behind me, and nearly brained Matilda, the servant girl, who was coming out of the coal cellar with a scuttle of coals, unhappily, at that moment."

"Where is Matilda?"

"In the hospital. She is having a trepan—a kind of trap-door let into her skull. She will sue me as soon as she comes out. It is hard to suffer for scientific truth."

"But have you managed to hit any ducks yet?"

"I'll tell you. I caught a duck and tied it down to a gooseberry bush. I projected the boomerang at that duck two hundred and seventy-three times, not counting once when it slipped. I hit everything within forty feet of the bird; I hit all the loose ducks and chickens; I smashed the glass in the hot-bed; I sent the poker twice through a sheet on the clothes-line; I dug up all the flower-beds, smashed eleven flower pots, ruined two young peach trees, broke the top off the pump, and maimed one pet dog for life, but I never hit my particular duck once, I don't know why. Probably I haven't got the hang of the thing yet."

"And Mrs. Metcalf wants you to stop practising, does she?"

"Yes, sir. But I'm going to learn, if I have to go out to Australia to get the knack of it."

"Well, I hold you in £100 not to fling that boomerang again outside Australia until you learn how."

"Very well, your worship, but I'll leave for there by the first train to-morrow."

O. P. Arson.

Digitized by Google

THE MAKING OF A MATCH.

How a Blind Girl Helped Two Lovers.

EVERY day the blind girl sat in her accustomed place facing the park.

She sold matches in little blue boxes at a penny each. A gentleman who lived at one of the houses close by frequently gave her sixpence for a box, and he never omitted to wish her "Good morning!" when he passed, and he talked to her as if she could see like other people, which pleased her very much, and she looked for his coming. She would lift her small face to him and smile as she thanked him, her beautiful blue eyes gazing blankly into his.

A card was round her neck hung by an old piece of black ribbon, bearing the words, "Totally blind."

The girl knew her benefactor's footsteps quite well; she could easily distinguish them from many others on the pavement at the same time.

She felt sure he was young, his step was so buoyant—and rich, for he constantly rode in cabs—and handsome, with curly hair, and dark eyes, like the heroes of stories that her grandmother read to her.

One day he asked her if she liked flowers, and when she said yes he gave her his button-hole, which was a beautiful gardenia, and she took it home that night and the grandmother pronounced it to be a "camilla," but in her young day she said they never smelt nice like this one. After that he constantly gave her his button-hole when he came home about seven o'clock before going out again.

One afternoon he had ladies to tea with him. They alighted from a carriage just beside the blind girl. Their dresses rustled, and they smelt deliciously of scent.

"Remember, Violet," one said, "it is no good your ever thinking of Harold St. Leger, he is only a younger son."

The other one laughed as she answered:

"My dear mother, he has not proposed to me yet." They went up the steps and the blind girl heard no more.

In about an hour's time they came out again and the harsher voice was thanking their host volubly for "such a pleasant time," and the silent listener on the pavement imagined the speaker was getting into her carriage as the gentleman said in an undertone, she thought, to the other lady, "Till to-morrow!—all the waltzes after No. 10."

There was no answer audible, and the carriage drove away.

The blind girl knew quite well that waltzes were dances, and dances were associated in her mind with beautiful piano-organs, which came and played in their street, and thrilled her strangely.

The music gave her visions of a world where no one was blind, and the men and women were like angels who danced all day long with rhythmic motions, in diaphanous draperies—and sang beautiful songs.

The blind girl helped to support her grandmother, who was bedridden but active enough in mind.

Jane kept her informed of the doings of the outside world in which the older woman had never lost her interest since she had been housemaid in "good families."

The girl would tell her of the crowds of carriages, the silk dresses which rustled by her, and little snatches of conversation which she overheard; and the shoutings of the newspaper boys were never missed. The old woman liked to hear of the great people who died and was duly interested in any "'orrible crime."

Jane told her of the kind gentleman who gave her sixpences instead of pennies, and the grandmother speculated as to who he could be; she surmised he was a "Member of Parliament," which was the greatest honour she could confer on him, for she had lived ten years in the family of a rich M.P., and she never tired of talking of the parties they gave in the season.

Jane had been doing very well lately, and as it was summer her grandmother thought the girl should have a new ribbon round her well-worn sailor hat and she commissioned a friendly neighbour to purchase a small length of a nice "maginta" or blue ribbon—blue of the shade known as "rial," for choice.

With the encouragement of the new adornment Mrs. Richards bade her granddaughter find out who her unknown benefactor was.

That morning the familiar footsteps approached as usual about eleven o'clock, but, alas! they passed her by without a greeting. He did not take a hansom that morning and she noticed that he walked slowly and heavily.

About two o'clock, when the streets were quieter, he came back, but not alone, and with him walked one of the ladies who had had tea with him—the one who had the nicer voice. The girl recognised her by the perfume she used. They walked up and down in front of the camp stool and its occupant, who heard their conversation quite clearly.

"Mother says if I don't marry Stornoway she will take me abroad at once, and I shall certainly never be allowed to write to you."

"Oh, darling, why am I doomed to poverty? Why am I not my elder brother?"

"I should not like you if you were."

"And I am not rich enough to give you the luxuries you ought to have."

"Oh, yes, you are, I know my own requirements; all the same, Harold, just at present I dare not see you again, it will be better for us not to meet for a bit."

"It is like starving a man—and I can't even have a crumb of comfort in the shape of a letter."

"No, dear; but trust me as I trust you."

"I do, darling."

"Good-bye!" and the blind girl imagined their hands were clasped; then the lady hurried away and the "gentleman" went straight to his house and the door slammed.

The next day he came as usual and walked straight to Jane.

"Good morning. Where's my box of matches?" and he tendered sixpence.

"Here, sir." And the blind girl lifted her sightless blue eyes to his face as she handed him a box.

He lit a cigarette.

"Isn't it awfully dull sitting here all day?"

"No, sir."

"Would you like me to try to get you into a home where they teach you to make all sorts of things?"

She hesitated before replying. "No, thank you, sir. I should miss the streets; it is so cheerful 'ere."

"Ye gods!" the man involuntarily exclaimed, "I wish I possessed your philosophy."

Jane Richards had the magenta ribbon in her hat and she remembered the grannie's injunctions to discover "the gentleman's" identity.

"Please, sir," she said timidly, "are you a lord?"

The man laughed outright.

"No; why do you ask?"

"Me and grandmother was wondering who you are. Grandmother expects you are a Member of Parliament."

The man laughed again.

"Oh, no, I am nothing but a younger son—my father is a lord, but that's no help to me—it is rather a drawback. I have two brothers older than myself."

Digitized by Google

Jane was breathless with interest, but he was not disposed to tell her any more of the family history; he changed the conversation by asking her if she would like some fruit.

The blind girl hesitated—this time from shyness, but she finally said she would.

"Very well, come into my house, and my housekeeper will give you anything you like."

Very gently he led her up the steps, and when his man appeared bade him tell Mrs. Stiggins to give her whatever she liked to eat and drink.

This was a great day of events to detail to grannie, but she knew she would be disappointed that "the gentleman" was not a "Member of Parliament."

The London season was drawing to a close—on a Friday evening towards the end of July the evening newspapers had only one special piece of information to impart to their readers, and this the small boys shouted to the detriment of their vocal organs:

"Engigement of Lord Stonway!"

"Son of the Markiss of Ross about to marry!"

The door of the Hon. Harold St. Leger's house was opened and he himself called a paper boy, and then the door closed again. The blind girl heard. She, too, asked a boy for a paper as he passed her.

"Yer can't see to read," he jeered.

"No, but here's an 'apenny if yer'll jest read me the name of the lady that's going to marry that lord."

And the boy condescendingly spelt out the name of the Hon. Violet Staples.

The blind girl's heart beat with excitement and sympathy for "the gentleman."

Luggage was lifted on to a cab the next morning and he went away without a word of farewell to her.

The heat was stifling. Jane asked the girl who fetched her in the evenings not to come till nine o'clock as she got more air sitting there than in the stuffy little rooms at home.

It was nearly nine one evening a week later, when a cab dashed up and a lady hastily alighted, dismissed the hansom, stood still a moment, then walked a few steps one way, then as quickly turned and walked back again.

He placed an exquisite bouquet in her lap.

The blind girl instantly recognised the familiar rustle of her skirts, accompanied by a perfume which reminded her of lilac.

Up and down, up and down went the footsteps. Jane could hear her breathing rapidly, and occasionally she stamped her foot on the pavement in an agony of impatience.

"Can he have gone?" she murmured half-aloud. "He said if I was not here by eight o'clock he would know there was no hope," and she referred to a letter crushed in her hand.

The blind girl decided on action, and guided by a stick and her ears, she approached the lady.

"I beg pardon, ma'am, but the gentleman 'as gone—he went about a quarter of an hour ago."

The lady started.

"What do you mean? How do you know I am waiting for anyone?" she asked guardedly but eagerly.

"I 'spected you were, as I thought 'e was waiting for someone too. I know the gentleman—'e is very kind to me."

The lady gasped.

"Then he has gone, I couldn't get here at eight o'clock, and now I am too late! Oh, what shall I do?"

"The address 'e gave the cabman was 4 Grindley Street, ma'am. I 'ear wonderful well, although I can't see."

"Oh, my good girl, how can I thank you!" And the lady grasped the blind girl's hand. The next moment she was hailing a passing hansom, and before she got in she took a sovereign from her purse and pressed it into Jane's hand.

"No thank you, ma'am, the gentleman is very kind to me. I'd rather not take it, ma'am, thank you."

"4 Grindley Street, and drive as quickly as you can," was the order given, and the blind girl heard the horse being thrashed, and it galloped away.

A feeling of great pride and happiness surged through Jane's simple soul to think that she had been the means of helping the pretty lady (she felt sure she was pretty) and the "kind gentleman."

The next morning the Hon. Harold St. Leger ran hastily down the steps of his house. His feet had regained all their old buoyancy. He went straight to the blind girl and he took her hand, and he pressed it warmly.

"What a kind and clever girl you are! All through you I am the happiest man in the world," he lowered his voice—"this morning I am going to be married to the lady to whom you gave my address last night; no one will know till it is all over but you! Her mother wanted her to marry someone she didn't love, but instead she is going to be my wife."

"Oh, sir, I am so glad."

"But if you had not acted so splendidly as you did by going to her and telling her that address it would have been too late, for I was afraid she would have to marry another man, and this morning I was going right away abroad. So you can imagine with what gratitude we look on you—and my future wife says she wants you and your grandmother to have a little cottage in the country quite close to our house."

"Oh, sir, I would like that. I have never 'eard birds sing or smelt 'ay growing in fields."

A few hours later a carriage and pair pulled up in front of her and someone alighted and placed in her lap an exquisite bouquet of gardenias and lilies and tuberoses.

The footsteps were familiar, but they had gone before she had time to thank the giver. But Jane knew it was the bride's bouquet, and her heart was full of pride, and she strained her ears to catch the sound of wedding bells which she knew must be ringing somewhere for "the gentleman" and his lady.

Ella MacLachlan.

Digitized by Google

Barbara's Choice.

Telling of a Test of True Love.

"FATHER, may I have a word with you?"

"Certainly, Neil; what is it?" said Lord Ralston, glancing up from his paper, and then—frowning slightly as he caught the expression on his son's face—"Not another scrape, I hope?"

The Honourable Neil caught his underlip in his teeth—a characteristic trick of his when annoyed.

"I trust I don't quite deserve that, sir," he said reproachfully. "Upon my word, I've tried my best to be decent, and it's nearly two years since you had occasion to reprimand me."

"Well, now I think of it," replied the Earl, "you have certainly been pretty quiet of late. But—what is it then?"

Now, although the young man's eagerness to unburden himself was obvious from his manner, yet the abruptness of the question seemed to disconcert him not a little. He blushed all over his handsome, sun-tanned face, and thereupon commenced stammering something, the portent of which was more or less lost in his heavy military moustache.

For a moment the Earl regarded him doubtfully, his whitening eyebrows slightly elevated in surprise; but by the time his son had managed to articulate a fairly audible sentence they had dropped to the other extreme in a heavy frown of displeasure.

"I—I—the fact is, father, I want your consent to ask the lady, with whom you saw me yesterday, to be my wife."

It was out at last, and, hot and eager, the young guardsman stood—a disgrace to his regiment by reason of the limp absurdity of his pose—awaiting a reply. With irritating deliberation the Earl rose from his seat and carefully adjusted his eye-glasses.

"H'm," he grumped. "In the first place, Neil, what do you know of the young—er—lady's connections? Does her father follow any profession, or is he a gentleman at ease?"

"Mr. St. Moyes has been very unfortunate," said his son shortly. "He is, I believe, at present somewhere on the Continent."

"H'm!" grumped the Earl again. "Something somewhere on the Continent, eh? Probably a billiard-marker at Boulogne. Nice prospect, certainly! And the mother—is she on the Continent too?"

The whole sentence was one concentrated sneer, and the young man flushed hotly.

"Mrs. St. Moyes," he rapped out, "is too great an invalid to receive anyone. I have never seen her."

"So," commented Lord Ralston sweetly. "Father unfortunate, mother an invalid—promising relations, upon my word."

He fell to pacing the room with measured strides, his chin incircled by a lean finger. All at once he stopped, and, bending slightly, stared down at a photograph standing among several others on a small table near the door. It represented a young lady of very considerable beauty, posing in the costume of a bygone century.

"I don't remember that you mentioned the lady's profession," remarked the Earl, abruptly recovering the perpendicular, and resuming his perambulations. The inflexion was indescribable, and his listener visibly writhed.

"I never could see," began he, with some warmth, "why the Stage should be deemed such a discreditable profession. However undesirable it may have been in the past, rest assured, sir, it is very different now."

"Ah, well," replied the Earl languidly, "we won't go into that at present, I think."

And, dropping his eye-glass with a shrug, he resumed his seat.

The Honourable Neil pulled himself together before replying.

"I want you to understand, sir," he began resolutely, "that I have permanently made up my mind. I am determined, come what may, to marry Barbara St. Moyes; but would, of course, prefer to do so with your full consent."

Practised diplomatist that he was, Lord Ralston showed neither anger nor surprise.

"I presume, then, that you have already obtained the lady's consent?" he said tentatively.

"Well—no," admitted the young man. "You see, Barbara will not definitely accept my offer until she knows your views about the matter; so you can understand that I am anxious to know my fate."

The Earl rose, and laid a hand on his son's shoulder.

"My boy," he said, "all my wishes are for your happiness. However, this thing can scarcely be settled out of hand; for instance, there is your mother to be consulted. Suppose we leave it over until to-morrow? Come, now."

The young man looked his disappointment, nevertheless he bowed acquiescence. After all, twenty-four hours would soon pass; and besides, nothing could ever affect his determination to marry Barbara—nothing—nothing—never!

It had gone hard with better men than Neil in their attempts to outwit his distinguished father, so there was no necessity for the young man to call himself hard names when, the next morning, he discovered that Lord Ralston had left town "on urgent business connected with his estate."

Nevertheless, he did so anathematise himself—reviling his stupidity in not having clinched matters the day before. However, there it was, and there was now nothing for it but to possess his soul in patience until the Earl should return.

Very little time sufficed to put Lord Ralston in possession of ample information concerning Miss St. Moyes.

Her father, it seemed, at one time an artist of repute, had suddenly developed a mania for drink and gambling, thereby destroying all his chances of success, and ultimately resulting in his flight from the country, leaving his wife and daughter to manage as best they might. Ever since his desertion, some four years ago, Barbara had been obliged to exploit her histrionic gifts in order to procure a livelihood for herself and her invalid mother.

"H'm!" murmured the noble Earl. "There oughtn't to be much difficulty in disposing in these undesirables. Dissolute father, ailing mother, devoted daughter. I don't think I'm far wrong in crediting this damsel with sense enough to see that 'a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.' I'll try it, anyhow." Having delivered himself of which enigmatic utterance Lord Ralston rang the bell.

Digitized by Google

An hour or so later Miss St. Moyes was waited on in her flat at Kensington by a gentleman of polished manners and pleasing speech, who adroitly conveyed the intimation that, in the event of a permanent cessation of her intimacy, with a certain youthful scion of a noble house, a sum of not less than ten thousand pounds would be forthcoming, and no questions asked.

With swiftly growing indignation she heard him out, and then, springing up and facing him like a tragedy queen, she gave him her mind so vigorously that, with a nervous clutch at his hat, her visitor flashed out of the room, and gained the street with all speed.

Lord Ralston received the news of this initial rebuff with a smile, but not so the curt note he received from Neil a few hours later, containing the information that, owing to certain discreditable conduct on the part of a distinguished member of His Majesty's Government, Miss Barbara St. Moyes had decided to accept him (Neil) unconditionally.

By no means disconcerted at the unexpected turn affairs had taken Lord Ralston coolly played his next card; with the result that, a few days later, Barbara's name figured among the list of distinguished guests at Rotherfield Hall, the Earl's country seat.

Now poverty, with its endless shifts and contrivances, is apt to have a narrowing effect on the possibilities of a woman's nature; consequently, amid the luxury and refinement of her new surroundings, the little actress—conscious that at last she had found her true element—fairly revelled in the delights of the moment; determining that, if it lay in her to prevent it, the old life should never see her again.

The announcement of her engagement to Neil had been fixed for the end of the month, that arrangement, though she knew it not, being part and parcel of a deep-laid scheme, emanating from the fertile brain of the distinguished host, by which he hoped to be permanently rid of her at the end of that time.

Meanwhile, lulled into a false sense of security by reason of the charming treatment meted out to her on every hand, she thoroughly enjoyed herself.

By no means the least attentive member of the company was the noble Earl himself, who, several times took her over the estate, explaining at length the working of the huge coal-mine from which he derived a large portion of his income.

One thing, however, Barbara noticed, though without troubling herself to account for it, and that was that the Earl in the course of his remarks, was continually drawing comparisons between his own property and that of Sir George Meldrum, who owned the adjoining estate; and always greatly to the disadvantage of the former.

"Really, my dear young lady," he said on one occasion; "you should see Sir George's place! Why the fellow could buy me up twice over. He's the coal-king of the county, you know; whereas I possess but a single mine, and if anything happened to the place I should be practically a pauper."

It may, or it may not have been this newly-acquired knowledge that Sir George Meldrum was the "coal-king" which made Barbara so ineffably gracious to him throughout the whole of that evening.

The middle-aged Baronet had been a frequent visitor during Barbara's stay at Rotherfield Hall, and had contrived, one way and another, to pay more attention to that lady than the Honourable Neil quite liked.

Barbara found Sir George a distinctly pleasant, if rather ordinary sort of man, and as for the fact of his being a bachelor, that affected her neither one way nor the other, even if she ever gave it a thought.

She never quite knew what prompted her to sit out that last dance with him. Suffice it to say that, wearied by her previous exertions, she had suffered herself to be led away, and that the next thing she realised was that the Baronet was pouring out protestations of eternal love, with an earnestness that at once startled and repelled her.

Vexed that he had not known of her position, and angry with herself for having behaved to him in such a manner as to justify the course he had taken, she was about to disillusion him in a few well-chosen words when the sound of approaching footsteps fell upon her ears.

"A terrible thing," came in the deep tones of a man. "The workings are flooded . . . mine's no earthly use now . . . Poor old Ralston, I'm afraid he'll never survive it. Poverty comes hard to men like him!"

No more; the voices passed out of earshot. Stunned and dazed, Barbara tried to realise what it was that had happened.

Gradually out of the whirling chaos of ideas, her mind grasped the salient fact—that with her lay the choice—of poverty, with its mean surroundings, or of wealth, with all that makes life worth living. Poverty, want, and weariness; the cramped stuffiness of rooms in a suburban street; the hideous alliteration of a life of endless toil. The prospect sickened her.

Her mother too; how could she tell her that it had all come to an end? That the future held nothing for them but what was grey and gaunt and sordid. Oh, the unspeakable horror of it!

"Dearest," murmured the low, persuasive voice at her side, "may I take silence for consent?"

She came to herself then, and remembered. Neil loved her. Before all the beautiful women of his own set he had chosen her—the little actress. She could bring him nothing—nothing—but her beauty, her purity, and her love; his was the sacrifice. And she did love him? Oh, yes, yes! more than anything; more than all the wealth and luxury the wide world held; more than life itself!

"Oh, no, no!" she breathed. "Sir George, I am deeply conscious of the honour you do me, but—oh—it cannot be!" And then in a moment she was up and speeding from him as a wild thing flees from the foot of man.

* * * * *

"Oh, Neil, Neil!"—she was sobbing in his arms—"don't let it make any difference, dear. We are young, and we can work; and oh, my darling, I want you more than anything. Poverty doesn't matter if I have you."

* * * * *

The flooding of the mine did not prove such a serious affair after all; being, as a matter of fact, confined to a single "working" and a disused one at that. Also, when four men met in conclave in the Hall library, some things were said which threw a somewhat startling light on the occurrence in question. Two of the number were well-known sporting characters, the third was Sir George Meldrum, and the fourth was the Earl himself.

"All I've got to say," remarked one of the former, "is that the filly came out of the test well. You should have seen her jump though when Charlie, here, laid it on thick about the 'poverty.'"

The Earl smiled.

"Nothing like a trial to bring out the quality, is there?" he said.

"There isn't," agreed Sir George. "But"—with a comical grimace—"I half wish she'd disappointed you, Ralston, after all. I could have done with her myself."

"You!" laughed the Earl. "She's heaps too good for you. Look here, boys; that youngster of mine has hooked a treasure. I'm sure of it now; and although it's cost me over thirty pounds to flood that blessed "working,' I don't regret it."

Barry Sheil.

IN TWO WEEKS' TIME

we shall commence a

New Serial and a New Series.

Full particulars will be given next week.

Digitized by Google

A BREACH OF CONFIDENCE.

Telling of how it Brought About a Wedding.

SHE sat with her pen in her hand, but she could not write. Her heart was full of a story that she had heard recently and could not forget—the story of a woman who had been happier than herself, and yet more miserable. She stared at the blank paper before her instead of writing, and she said to herself:

"Why are all the chances in life given to those who are not fit to use them? If such a love had been mine once I would never have let it go. There is no price that I would not have paid to keep it; and she—she threw it away for vanity!"

The story was very real to her, because she loved the man who had told it, and yet she had taken the telling of it to mean that the true history of his life was over, and that he had no love left to give again. The confidence he had reposed in her had been a compliment to her friendship, but a destruction of all her hopes of happiness. Before that confidence was made she had thought that his feeling for her was as deep as hers for him.

She had been married herself; but, though she had had a husband, she had never known true love.

Her marriage had been a sacrifice, made when she was very young, and when she acted almost entirely under the influence of a selfish mother. Her husband proved selfish, too, and—which was worse in her mother's eyes—not so prosperous as had been imagined.

Eleanor's life had been a hard one always, and now she was left alone in the world, except for the little two years' old baby. It was an ailing creature, fretful, and not pretty; but it was something to hold in her arms, if not enough to fill her heart.

She loved it the more passionately perhaps for its infirmities; but sometimes the loneliness of her life overpowered her like a flood of bitter waters; she wanted some mind to speak to, some heart to answer hers.

She was yet very young, only twenty-two years old, and all the currents of life beat strongly within her; all the imperative demands for love, for praise, for happiness, which make so large a part of our youth, were still alive in her heart, and would not easily be silenced.

Her income was insufficient for herself and her delicate child; she added to it in many little ways, as the opportunity was offered to her. She had written a few short stories for a new magazine, which could not yet afford to number famous authors among its contributors, and she had been paid for them.

An accidental meeting with another occasional contributor had given her a friend; and Ralph Webster was at that time, perhaps, the only person with whom she was on terms of familiar friendship, and to whom she could talk on a moral and intellectual level.

His sympathies and aspirations were not unlike her own; they always understood one another at least, even when they did not agree. To talk to him was, therefore, the opening of a new experience to her.

Language had before—at least, spoken language—been only a vehicle for the management of affairs, the expression of desires, the receipt of information. Now it served to exchange thought, to bring two lives into close mental relation with one another, to console, to suggest, to sustain. And she had thought he loved her.

He was a little more prosperous in the world than herself, and he did not guess that she was so very poor; but he was not rich enough to make her feel that she would take much more than she gave if she became his wife. They would work together, as they lived together and loved together. She had thought, with others:

Our work shall still be better for our love,
And still our love be sweeter for our work,
And both commended, for the sake of each,
By all true workers and true lovers born.

And then he had received an appointment to travel as a special correspondent of a metropolitan daily, and he had come to say good-bye to her, and before saying good-bye, had told her this story. She had taken it for a final farewell.

Since his going, three days before, she had thought of nothing else. She had work to do, but she could not do it. How could she throw herself into dream-loves and dream-troubles with this pain of loss and loneliness at her heart? And yet the work was necessary, and she dared not delay it longer than that night.

She had, the day before, received back from her editor a story which she had hoped he would accept, with the intimation that if she would write him one half as long, to be ready in two days, he would almost certainly take it, as he wished to fill up a corresponding gap in the next number of his magazine.

She urgently needed the money. Her baby, little Lorna, was paler and thinner even than usual; the doctor whom she consulted said that the child needed country air. She had hoped to earn enough money to take it away for some weeks to a farm-house, when she sent that story to the editor of the magazine. She must not lose the opportunity which he had offered in its place.

She had thought of a plot—a foolish little, common-place affair—but she could not breathe any life into it. When she forced her thoughts into the necessary channel they flowed back again to another story.

She saw Ralph Webster standing before her; she heard his voice again, telling her the simple tragedy of his life. How graphically he had told it, though not with many words! She could fill in the details for herself.

It was a story of true and patient love, and of shameful faithlessness and falsehood; a story in which the wrong-doer pitied herself and fancied herself a victim, while she accepted her husband's sacrifice and spoilt his life. She had been cruel to him with the cruelty which demands everything, and gives less than nothing in return.

"And yet," said Ralph, when he told the story—he had never repeated it to anyone before—"I never ceased to love her while she lived; and when she died the world seemed empty to me. I suppose it was only this, that I could never take back what I had once given."

There was not much in the story itself, but it held Eleanor's thoughts fast, and would not let them go; because the love that had been so scorned and wasted would have made the happiness of her life.

She must write her tale, but how? She could not cast into its foolish incidents the burning thoughts that possessed her; these were all woven about another thread.

And while she still thought, her child cried, and she had to leave her work to soothe it. She lay down on the bed beside it, and fell asleep. She awoke in the dead of the night.

The anxious thought which watches ever beside the pillow of the unhappy leapt at once to its place in her mind, giving her no respite. "You must write your story," it said. She got up with the resolution of despair, and went back to the table.

"I will write this," she said, "and have done with it."

There was no difficulty now. The facts in her mind ranged themselves instantly into dramatic shape; living words—words that throbbed with her own love, and pain, and regret, and longing, shaped themselves into eager thought.

Digitized by Google

When vain desire at last, and vain regret,
Go hand-in-hand to death, and all is vain.

That was the burden of the writing, and it was a very old one; but it seemed new now, because she wrote it with all her heart.

When dawn broke she had eased herself of the phantom that had haunted her, and was free. How strange it is, this relief that comes to some of us after we have put into words the thoughts that torment us! She was free now, and she wrote the other story—her tale for the magazine; but she knew that it was a miserable affair.

Lorna was worse that morning. Her mother took her into her arms and looked into her suffering face.

"If I keep her here she will leave me, too," she said to herself. "I shall have nothing left."

She wrapped up her manuscript and took it herself to the editor. She wanted to bring his answer back. He was, in fact, waiting for the story, to put it in the hands of the printer, and he was willing to look at it at once. She sat and watched him as he did so, with very little hope in her face. He read it carefully at first, then he turned over the pages rapidly, and finally put the manuscript down.

"I am very sorry," he said, "but it won't do, it isn't up to your usual level. I would make it do if I could, but—it isn't possible."

"I knew," she said, "it wouldn't."

He looked at her in surprise, for she was unfolding another roll of manuscript.

"If you will look at this," she said, "you won't say the same."

He took the paper and began to read casually; then he became interested. He read to the end without speaking. When he had finished he rang the bell and gave the manuscript to the young man who answered his summons.

"This can go to the printer at once," he said; "you have had the necessary directions already."

Eleanor half rose to her feet, and then sat down again. She did not utter a word.

"You have never done anything so good," said the editor; "it is an unpleasant subject, but you have treated it cleverly, very cleverly."

"I shall never do anything so good again," was her strange answer. "I knew you would take it. Would you mind paying me for it now? For I must go into the country to-morrow."

He gave her the cheque she asked for, and she took Lorna away next day.

A month after she saw Ralph Webster again. He had returned unexpectedly, and he sought her out at the farmhouse where she was living with her baby. But they did not meet as friends; she saw him with a shock of surprise, and he looked at her as she had never seen him look before.

"Mrs. Wakefield," he said, "I have no right to follow you here, but I came to ask you a single question." She wondered for a moment—but only a moment—what was coming.

Then she turned to him with a look full of sadness.

"I will answer any question you like to ask," she said.

He had a magazine in his fingers, and he opened it at a page that she well knew. Were not the title letters of it, the whole aspect of it, burnt into her brain? They were part of the crime that she felt she had committed.

"There is a story here," he said, "that occupies a very prominent place. It is called 'Hand in Hand to Death.' I think that you wrote it."

"Yes," said Eleanor, in a low voice; "I wrote it."

"There is no one in the world, except you and myself, that knows the whole of that story. I told it to you because I intended, the next time I saw you, to ask you to be my wife. I wanted you to have time to think of it first. You might not have liked me so well after knowing it."

She folded her child closer in her arms, and bent over it, that he might not see her face.

"I need not speak to you of such a subject now. I know how much you value my esteem—my confidence. You have sold my trouble to the world. I suppose you sold it?"

"Yes," said Eleanor, in a still, strange voice; "I was paid ten pounds for it." She was remembering that she changed the first sovereign to purchase her railway ticket, and that she had calculated how many weeks it would keep her in the country.

"I knew that a woman I loved might despise me," said Ralph; "but I could not guess that a woman I trusted would betray me—for money."

She did not answer him anything. There was that in his tone which made her not care to defend herself. She had injured him in a deadly and cruel manner. Let him say to her what he would. But he said no more; he lifted his hat and went.

A year after that found Ralph Webster a successful man. He had written a novel that hit the public taste; it was full of bitterness and scoffing, but the public liked such bitterness and scoffing, and bought the book.

He wondered sometimes what had become of Eleanor Wakefield. There was no trace of her at her old home, and the editor told him that she had sent him no more contributions.

She had seemed to Ralph a noble woman—a woman whom he might love on an equal footing, with all trust and reverence, without pity or forbearance. And she had failed him strangely and meanly, so that the sting of her offence had not yet left him entirely; but it troubled him a little to remember that she had made no defence. This had put him in the wrong, and made him wonder what her defence could be.

It was in the dusk of evening that he stepped into a railway carriage, which had only one occupant—a lady who, sitting just opposite to him, whose face was now turned from him, and it was only when he had been seated some minutes that something in her intense stillness attracted his attention.

Digitized by Google

She had desired him to forget her presence, or not to notice it, but the effort defeated itself, and his first half-curious, half-unconscious glance at her made him lean across to her.

"Mrs. Wakefield!" he said.

"Yes," she answered, "it is Mrs. Wakefield." Then she added quietly: "I should like, if I may, to congratulate you on your great success."

"You may spare me your congratulations. My success is built on my great unhappiness. None should know that better than you."

"Is it not so with many people?" she asked, gently, ignoring his last remark. "But some are unhappy without success."

He looked at her more attentively. She was in mourning, and she was much changed. The passive attitude of her hands on her lap told him this, as well as the tone of her voice.

"You never followed up your success," he remarked. "Mr. Blakely told me that he expected great things of you."

She answered him nothing.

"Mrs. Wakefield," he went on, vaguely hurt by her silence, which tormented him with an impression of his own cruelty, "I want to apologise to you for what I said when we last met. It was too much."

"It was not too much. I have said more to myself before and since. And yet," she said, turning her eyes full upon him, "I do not ask you to forgive me, because I do not repent. I would do it again, if the past came back to me. It is right that you should know how evil I am. I do not repent. I would do it again. Yet I hate myself for doing it. Besides," she added, in a lower tone, which she could hardly have meant him to hear, "it spoilt my happiness as well as yours."

"I do not understand," he said.

"Why should you understand?" she answered. "It does not matter."

The train was whirling on in the darkness. The noise of its rush, the flashing of lights in the city they were leaving, seemed to increase the solitude of these two, who were so near, yet so far apart; so much akin in spirit, and so hopelessly estranged.

"If it had been for Fame," he said, "I could have understood the temptation better. It would have been a higher sort of temptation. But you did not even sign the story, and you have not republished it."

"I hoped," she said, "that it would be little read and soon forgotten. You had gone away for a long time. I thought that you would never see it. And no one else could ever guess where I got it from."

"You made it very clever," he replied. "I wonder, having gone so far, that you go no farther."

"I shall never write again," she answered. "I have no motive. And what I did write has cost me too much."

He did not understand her; he had not known of her past poverty, nor of her recent loss. But he went on to say: "When I look at you it seems impossible to believe that you did such a thing without a reason. It may have seemed a little thing to you, but it was so much to me."

"I knew how much," she answered; "I knew all the meanness of what I did, the treachery of it, and that it would hurt you if you knew, but I thought that you would never know."

"And you did not love me," he added; but he was watching her keenly as he spoke.

Her eyes flashed upon him for a moment.

"Oh," she said, "it was because I loved you that I could not help doing it. If I could have escaped from the memory of what you told me, and have thought of other things instead, it would never have been written. If I could only have forgotten you!"

He was startled and astonished. He caught her hands and then let them go again.

"I wish I could believe you," he said.

"You need not. Why should you?" she answered. "I have nothing left to give you. What is a love worth that helped me to betray you?"

"And are you still glad you did it?" He had taken her hands firmly now, that he might look into her eyes. There was no tenderness there, only a desperate defiance.

"Am I glad of anything? Can I ever be glad of anything any more? It is only that I would do it again for the same reason. And yet I did not get the thing for which I paid such a heavy price."

"Will you tell me what the thing was?"

"It was only," she answered, "that I thought that treachery the price of my baby's life—and now my baby is dead."

She drew her hands away from his as she spoke. There had come into her eyes a grief that awed and restrained him. He could see that it had nothing to do with himself. Her tone was very quiet. It seemed to leave him at a great distance from her.

For a moment he felt that he had got his answer, and could speak of love to her no more in the presence of such a sorrow. Then his courage came back, and with it resolution. If he was sure enough of his own love for her he could not fail in the end to drive away both her sorrow and her remorse.

"I have been cruel to you," he said; "can you forgive me?"

"I?" she answered tremulously; "how can I forgive you?"

"Because I have been a fool, and quarrelled with my own happiness." And then he added, speaking slowly: "The story was a part of your own life. You had a right to do what you wished with it. At least, you can make it a part of your life if you will be more generous to me than I was to you."

She let him take her hands again. She looked into his eyes searchingly. What she saw there seemed to satisfy her, for she answered irrelevantly:

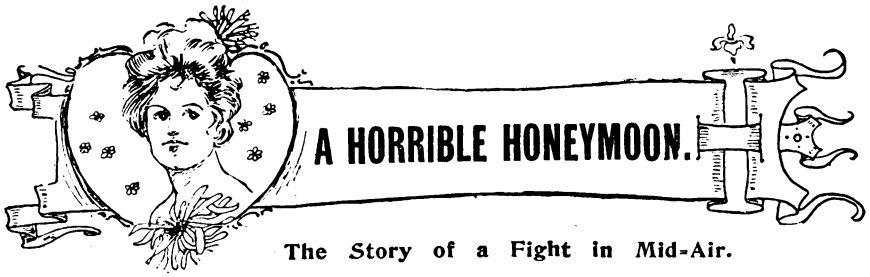
"Oh, I have been so lonely. To live in the world with nothing but myself and your contempt! You cannot guess what it was like."

"Will you live in the world with me and my love, and see if you like it better?"

She had been too long without happiness to fight against it now, and her answer ended his trouble and hers.

A. Armitt.

Digitized by Google



A HORRIBLE HONEYMOON.

The Story of a Fight in Mid-Air.

Hector Eric Gower, artist and journalist, strolled leisurely along the Brighton esplanade, and, with a cultivated eye for colouring, watched the deepening glowing glory of the setting sun and its kaleidoscopic tintings of the blue water below.

He was a handsome man, well set and well groomed, and, from the swift, intelligent flashes of the clear blue eyes, and the frank, impulsive nature which the whole face betokened, one might have set him down as a clever and a brilliant conversationalist.

But there was something about the poise of the head that did not harmonise with the rest of his bearing, and which, though inexplicable to the casual eye of a stranger, was understood by his more intimate acquaintances. And there was a good deal of excuse for it. In a word, the world had been very kind to Hector Gower.

He had distinguished himself as a war-correspondent in the recent Boer war, and Fortune had smiled on him. There are few men who can retain their humility when the world claps its hands. The adulation of the multitude and the undisguised envy of his fellows had added the leaven of conceit to his otherwise healthy character.

It was more than probable that time would eradicate this unwholesome habit of self-applause, and it was hoped so by those who knew him best, for he was one of the best fellows in the world, and no man more richly deserved the fame which had fallen to his lot.

But evolution is a terribly lengthy process, and Hector Gower might have gone on indefinitely in his self-pride but for one unlooked-for circumstance. Sorrow is a swifter factor than time, and pride, they tell us, goes before a fall!

Presently Hector Gower turned in his walk and retraced his steps to the hotel in which his bride of but three short, blissful days was awaiting him.

They were spending their honeymoon at Brighton, the resort of so many when they are on a similar happy errand.

That he and his pretty girl-wife were madly in love with each other, no one who knew them doubted. But, even in this divinest of all earthly joys, the leaven of self was not wholly absent. True, this had been stimulated and fostered by his young wife's passionate devotion and admiration, and therefore in this, as in all other views of the case, there was excuse for the man.

But he had grown to expect this adoration of the "one" just as he did the praise of the multitude, as his natural right, demanded by his genius and his recognised superiority over other men. And his wife was too much in love to deny it him.

So, in his vain-glory, he thought, as egotists are wont to think, that no one but himself occupied a place in her heart or provoked a single thought or remembrance. It is small wonder then that his awakening was as startling as it was wholesome. And it was to come very soon.

Arrived at the hotel, Hector Gower entered his suite of apartments and looked round for his wife. But she was not to be seen, and, after a moment's hesitation, he entered her dressing room.

Still she was not to be seen, and he was just turning away when his eye fell on a daintily-bound morocco writing-case which lay on a small table by the window. He went casually over and looked at it. It was open, and several sheets of note-paper lay on the table.

Unthinkingly, he lifted the sheet of blotting-paper by the side of the writing-case, and, to his astonishment, saw a letter lying underneath. It was in his wife's handwriting, and, picking it up, he began to read it. The action was not positively wrong, but it was not over nice, and it brought its own punishment. For this is what he read:

"Dear Jack.—I received the letter you sent me yesterday by your servant. I cannot tell you how grieved I am that you should have followed me down here. You must know that it is impossible now. If my husband were to find out, he would kill you, and perhaps me too. You must write no more letters to me, now or hereafter. I am sorry to be forced to write thus decisively, but I have really no alternative.

"If you feel but one tithe of the love that you profess towards me, you will think first of my happiness and leave me in peace. I had hoped we might have continued friends, but you have made that impossible. I am deeply sorry for you but you must ask no more of me —now. Good-bye, dear Jack, and forgive me if in any way I have encouraged you in the pursuit of what is now doubly impossible.—Yours very regretfully,

"Cora Gower."

Hector Gower sank into a chair with the letter still in his hand and tried to think. What did it mean? His wife—the wife whom above all other women he had loved and chosen to bear his name and share his fame—and she could write to another man—like this!

His face went very white and the hand that held the letter shook perceptibly. Was this the way she returned his love? The thought stung him to the quick, and his face hardened. And what did the letter convey?

He read it through a second time and groaned. Every sentence pierced him with a new and a horrible significance. Was his wife—guilty? The bare suggestion was agony, but the letter admitted of no other construction. And now the guilty admitted, not the virtue, but the expediency of innocence and acted accordingly.

There was a look of stern resolution in his face as he reached this point in his reasoning.

The door opened, and, looking up, Hector Gower saw his wife standing before him. One quick glance had shown her both the letter which was still clutched in her husband's hand and the terrible construction he had put upon it.

Mutely she stood there, awaiting what she well knew, by the expression of his face, was to follow.

She was very beautiful—a picture of perfect womanhood; but she possessed a spirit which already began to rebel at so swift and hasty a condemnation. So she stood still and waited. Then he rose to his feet, and, tossing the letter on the table, said with a sneer:

"This is interesting, but, if you will pardon the addition, scarcely praiseworthy. A better example of cold rebuke and warm affection I have never seen. The only pity is that it should have been written by a married woman to another than her husband. But that is, perhaps, a mere trifle."

He paused, regarding her sternly. The woman made no reply. She still stood tense and motionless, and, with set face met the terrible accusation made against her in silence.

"You do not even attempt to defend yourself," pursued the man. "And perhaps that is as well, since, in the light of this letter, defence would be fruitless. Well, madam, there is but one course for me to pursue. I will relinquish the love I thought I possessed an hour ago, in favour of my more fortunate rival—'dear Jack'—and will therefore bid you—'Good-bye!'"

With a low bow, in which there was more of mockery than politeness, he turned swiftly, and, putting on his hat, went out of the room without once turning back.

Digitized by Google

Cora Gower stood still, rigid and dry-eyed, till he had gone. Once she tried to speak, but her voice seemed to have forsaken her.

Had she been moved by one passion only, the result might have been different. But bitter indignation was struggling with her love, and before the mastery was won her husband of three short days had gone. Then she sank into a chair, and, covering her face with her hands, burst into a passionate flood of tears.

* * * * *

It was a week later, and the Greens were thronged with eager sightseers. The entire Brighton population seemed to have turned out to witness a spectacle which, it was announced, was to take place that day.

Mr. John Terrett, the well-known aeronaut, was to make an ascent in a balloon of exceptional capacity, with a view, it was whispered, of crossing the Channel. There was a light breeze from the north-west, and, in the centre of the Greens, the great unwieldly giant of the air was slowly being filled with the gas necessary to its ascent.

The aeronaut was himself superintending the work, and a good trip was expected. Mr. John Terrett was a tall, lithe, sinewy man of thirty, with dark, half-Spanish face and flashing black eyes, in which there was more love of adventure than of humanity.

At last all was ready. A dozen men stood about the car, firmly gripping the ropes which held it fast. The sand bags were all in, and the necessary instruments for accomplishing the voyage secured in their place.

There was a momentary hush as John Terrett looked round in search of his aerial companion. A man was making his way through the crowd, and, passing the barriers, entered the inner ring and approached the aeronaut. The man was Hector Gower.

With a curt nod of greeting he followed the aeronaut into the car, and the latter gave a signal for the great straining monster to be cast loose. At that instant a woman's shrill cry rang out among the crowd, and Cora Gower, pale and agitated, rushed into the ring.

"Hector, Hector!" she cried in an agony of supplication. "Don't go! For Heaven's sake—for my sake—don't go with him! You don't know him—oh, you don't know him! He'll kill you! Oh, don't go!"

Hector Gower looked once at the appealing figure of his wife. In the impulse of his heart he almost leapt from the car and took his grief-stricken wife in his arms. Then he remembered, and turned away his head.

There was a cruel gleam in the aeronaut's dark eyes, while a sneer curled his lips as he looked at the woman. Once more he gave the signal to ascend, and, with a mighty bound, the great giant of the air shot upward, amid the cheers of the crowd and the straining of many ropes.

Cora Gower gave one look upward, and then sank unconscious to the ground. Hector saw her there as he leant over the side of the rising car and his heart began to condemn him. But it was too late now.

Presently Hector Gower turned his eyes from the things around him to the aeronaut who was seated at the opposite side of the car.

Somewhat to his surprise, he saw that the man's eyes were fixed upon him with an expression which was anything but comfortable. It might have been only his fancy, but, though he turned his eyes away, he was conscious that those other eyes were still regarding him.

For a few moments he avoided them, but, in the end, met the fixed stare of the man before him. He was not a coward, but there was something in the lack-lustre expression of those horrible eyes that was anything but reassuring. Still the man stared till Hector Gower, unable to endure it any longer, said coldly:

"You appear to be more interested in me than your knowledge of me would seem to warrant."

The man made no reply, but, looking out of the car, watched the now rapidly disappearing panorama of busy Brighton. They were too high up now to be distinguished by the inhabitants of earth, and a gleam of satisfaction came into the dark eyes as he turned them once more on his companion. Then, for the first time since their ascent, he spoke:

"Hector Gower," he said slowly, "you wonder why I scraped acquaintance with you when I found you, like a miserable fool, nursing your wounded vanity in the little inn where you had hidden yourself, like the veriest cur, from the wife you had deserted. I am acquainted, you see, with the position of affairs." And he smiled grimly into the face of his astonished listener.

One quick glance showed her that her husband had seen the contents of the letter he held.

"You may be aware of what has transpired," retorted Hector Gower, "but it is scarcely any concern of yours, I think."

"I have made it so," said the aeronaut impudently, "and that is enough for you. But, in case you still wonder how I obtained this information——"

"Pardon me," interrupted Hector, "the problem has no interest for me."

"I may as well explain," continued the man, utterly ignoring the interruption, "that your wife herself acquainted me with the facts of your separation, and that I—John Terrett—am the 'dear Jack' whom, in company with your wife, you so virtuously condemned.

"We are cousins—she and I, and were brought up together as children, which accounts for her use of my Christian name, though you, in your unreasonable vanity and self-conceit, put quite another construction on the circumstance. She only made one mistake, and that was in imagining I had followed her to Brighton.

Digitized by Google

"This ascent was billed long before I knew you were coming here, but I had persecuted her so much before that she had cause for that supposition. There is, in this wide world, Hector Gower, no woman more pure and true than she who has honoured your name and dishonoured her own by becoming your wife."

An angry flush dyed Hector Gower's cheeks, but the man only laughed scornfully, and went on:

"But you were vainer than any miss of seventeen, and were filled with self-righteous anger when you discovered that one of the worms who crawled the earth beneath your masterful feet had won but a word from the wife whom you had so magnanimously raised to the dignity and glory which appertains to the name of Gower."

Had the speaker held a whip above his victim he could not have stung him more. Every word was a deep home-thrust to the self-accusing man, who now, for the first time, realised his true position. He had been wrong—almost criminal—and he would go back to his deserted wife and ask her forgiveness. But he could endure this man's taunts no longer.

"Look you!" he said, leaping to his feet till the car rocked and swayed in mid-air. "We have had enough of this. Get to earth as speedily as you can, and have done with matters which do not concern you."

Again the aeronaut laughed and said slowly:

"So I sought you out, my strutting peacock, and, pandering to your vanity, persuaded you to accompany me on this aerial voyage. And why?" He rose to his feet and drew from his pocket a glittering revolver. "Because, Hector Gower, I will not see the life of this priceless pearl of womanhood cast before swine to be trampled under foot. You shall go down into the deep sea, and none shall know how you went."

He lifted the revolver and took deliberate aim. There was a sharp report, and a bullet flew past the head of Hector Gower. The swaying of the car had saved him.

With a bound he crossed the car and grappled with his adversary. A wrench of the wrist, and the revolver dropped from the hand that held it and fell into the airy abyss below. But the man's hand was free again in an instant, and the struggle began in deadly earnest.

To and fro they reeled in the rocking, heaving car of the great balloon. Now in the centre, now leaning perilously over the edge, till it looked as though both men must be hurled into the horrible gulf below.

Once more they neared the edge of the car which was rocking violently, so that they could hardly maintain their foothold. Hector Gower gave a momentary glance downward, and to his astonishment, found that the great balloon was rapidly descending.

A faint humming sound high above his head told him that the gas-valve was open and the gas fast escaping from its silken prison. In the struggle, the rope attached to the valve had been entangled among the outer ropes of the car, and the huge balloon, fast losing its buoyancy, was speeding downward into the wide expanse of blue waters below them.

But he dared not relax his hold of the aeronaut. If death came, it should not be by him. So the struggle continued, fiercer than before, while each man's breath came in laboured gasps and the sweat stood on their foreheads.

At last, with a supreme effort, Hector Gower pinned the aeronaut to the floor of the swaying car, and, holding him there, looked about him.

They were within five hundred yards of the water, descending with marvellous rapidity, and death seemed inevitable. But, glancing out on the other side, he saw, to his unbounded relief, a Channel steamer not a hundred yards from the spot where they must soon strike the water.

It was evident that the captain of the steamer had seen their peril, for a boat was being rapidly lowered and manned by the crew. The next instant the car struck the surface of the water. There was a momentary rebound, and, in that moment, Hector Gower released his hold of his adversary and sprang into the sea.

A moment later the aeronaut had leapt to his feet and followed his example, so as to escape the death-trap which the collapse of the great balloon would speedily make for anyone who remained therein.

The two men were quickly rescued by the crew of the boat and went on board the Channel steamer which was on her way to England.

No one had witnessed the terrible fight in the car of the balloon, and its descent was attributed to accident. So Hector Gower held his peace, while the aeronaut slunk out of his way and went below. A few hours and they were in England.

Without a moment's delay Hector Gower took train for Brighton, where he hoped to find his wife. But inquiry at the hotel elicited the information that she had left two days after his desertion, and a great fear came into his heart.

Where to turn he knew not. Perhaps she had returned to her people. He went to the station and caught the night-train to London, determined to find out if this were so. But it was too late, on his arrival, to make inquiries that night, so he went to a hotel and tried in vain to obtain forgetfulness in sleep.

Early in the morning he went in the direction where his wife's people lived, and in doing so passed very near to the spot where the house he and his much-wronged wife had chosen for their future home stood.

As if drawn to the spot by some inexplicable law of attraction, he turned into the street in which it stood. To his surprise he saw clearly that it was tenanted. A maid stood at one of the windows, engaged in some part of her duties.

With a quick hope at his heart, he mounted the steps and rang the bell. He was admitted, and, no comment or surprise being evinced by the maid who opened the door, he passed in and went from room to room in search of his wife.

At last he reached her dressing-room, where she sat arranging the coils of golden hair upon her head. She saw his image in the glass before her and with a little glad cry, sprang up to meet him. Going up to her, he took her tenderly in his arms and kissed her.

"Cora," he said humbly, "I do not deserve one word of forgiveness from your lips. I have been a scoundrel, and have had my punishment. Nay, more, for I must always have my punishment with me, since I can never forget that you too, who did not deserve it, have shared the misery and bitterness of the past week. Dearest, is there forgiveness for me? I am humble now. There is no more pride or childish vanity in the heart of the man whom you honoured by becoming his wife."

Cora Gower placed a trembling little hand over her husband's lips.

"I do not like to see my husband humble himself, even to me," she said tenderly. "I have forgiven you long ago, dearest, and now that you have come back to me I can be happy."

He took her in his arms again and kissed her passionately.

"Why did you come here?" he asked presently. "I thought you would have returned to your people?"

Cora smiled into his face, and the light of love beamed in her eyes.

"Because," she said proudly, "I knew you would come back to me. Because I trusted you, my husband, and would not shame you by speaking ill of you even to my own mother."

"God bless you, darling," he whispered huskily. "Truly it is you women who teach us how to love!"

By-and-bye Hector told his wife of the terrible fight in mid-air which he had had with John Terrett, and a few days later came the sequel, in the news that the famous aeronaut, who had for some time past suffered from some mental disorder, had lost his reason and was confined in a private asylum.

"I am not surprised," said Hector, when he had read the account. "But, even in his madness, he spoke many truths and saw things more clearly than I in my boasted reason."

Thus ended the honeymoon of Hector Gower and his young wife, and, though they have never forgotten it, its effect on one of the two at least has been to imbue him with a deeper humility, a greater unselfishness, and a broader sympathy with those who are about him than ever he had in the first flush of his fame—a fame which so nearly spoilt a kindly nature and a noble heart.

Walter J. Mowbray.

Digitized by Google

Letter Juggling Competition.

CASH DOWN. FIRST PRIZE, £25.	CASH DOWN. SECOND PRIZE, £10.	CASH DOWN. THIRD PRIZE, £5.

TWO BILLIARD TABLES (measuring 4 ft. 10 inches by 2 ft. 8½ inches), together with cues, balls, marking board, and spirit level,

And TWENTY-FIVE GRAMOPHONES, each one fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, and accompanied by two records.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct. Only one name must be written on each line.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES." Four more lists will appear.

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

EXAMPLE:
ABGHIIMMNR... Birmingham.

EIGHTH LIST.

85. AEGILMR	91. ABEHMNOST .....
86. ADENORSTWY	92. ABEEHIMNNOST .....
87. ACEKOORT	93. AEFHIINRW .....
88. ADEFILNRZ	94. ABEEMRSTY .....
89. AACEEHHONNS	95. ACDIKKLRY .....
90. ABENRTOY	96. AACDEHRRSTY .....

Name..... Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

RED POPPIES

Telling of How a Lover Proved that He Was No Coward.

A BOAT was idly rocking on the blue waters of the bay. Overhead the golden sun shone down with dazzling brilliancy, warming the waters to an almost tropical heat.

Not a sound was to be heard in the deep stillness which prevailed. Not a breath of wind ruffled the surface of the water. But for the boat and its two occupants one might have imagined the lonely, rock-girt bay to have been part of some far-off desert shore. Yet it was in sunny England, cut deep into the Devonshire coast.

Away over the great, rugged cliffs a little fishing village nestled peacefully in the valley beneath, through which a silvery stream made music as it sped by to the shining, sunlit bay.

A narrow, winding path ran along by the side of the stream, under the shadow of the great grey cliffs, which the fisher-folk used in order to reach the bay where their boats were anchored.

There was another path, leading from the village up the rugged cliffside to a height of some four hundred feet. But though this led to the very summit of the cliff, overlooking the bay, there was no means of descent on the other side, where the towering sentinel of the bay shot down perpendicularly into the blue water.

When the tide was low the foot of the cliff was fringed with great jagged rocks, black and threatening, like the fangs of some great sea-monster. But the tide was up now, and the deep blue waters of the bay hid them from view.

The boat drifted on to the very spot where the rocks lay, far beneath her keel, and the girl looked up at the beetling cliff above her head. She was not exactly beautiful, but there was an indescribable freshness and wondering innocence in the fair, open face that was irresistibly attractive. There was a soft dreaminess, too, in the large, violet eyes, as she lifted them from the book in her lap to the great grey cliff overhead.

"Well?" said her companion—a tall, dark, handsome man of thirty. "Is your hero dead, that you look so sweetly sad, or is your heroine dying, becomingly and gracefully, in his strong arms?"

The girl made no reply.

"But perhaps your sympathies are with the villain?" went on the man banteringly. "That is not an altogether unfeminine view of a novel. The cliff seems to hold some attraction for you. Has the poor wretch been thrown over by the hero? Put me out of this suspense, Pearl, for pity's sake!" And he assumed an expression of mock supplication.

The girl laughed and looked down at him.

"No," she said. "The hero is pledged to get his lady a spray of edelweiss. They are in Switzerland, you know, and he will have to run terrible risks in order to get it. But he will do it—I am sure he will! Ah, it's only a story! Real men are too prosaic to do such things. It is only we women who are silly enough to be romantic."

"Humph!" responded the man doubtfully. "And what immeasurable and eternal benefit is the getting of this edelweiss going to procure for your heroine?"

"Don't be silly, George!" said Pearl with a pout. "He is going to do it in order to prove his love."

"Is that necessary?" asked George.

"No, but—— Oh, you know, you silly boy! She wants to have a greater proof of it than she has now, and—and she wants to have something that will remind her of how brave and fearless he is!"

"Ah!" responded George, not yet seeing the expediency of the act. "So she has asked him to try to break his neck! Well, I hope he may do it! He has my very best wishes!"

The girl's eyes flashed, while a flush heightened the colour of her cheek.

"That is just what I said just now," she said scornfully. "Real men are too prosaic to do such things. I think, too, there is too much of the coward in them to risk the possibility of so much as a scratch for the sake of a lady's wish!"

"A lady's whim!" corrected the man.

"A lady's wish!" persisted Pearl, becoming a little—just a little—angry at her lover's criticism of the case. "Take yourself, for instance. Would you do it?"

"No," said George quietly. "At least, not without better reason than that you have described."

"Precisely," said Pearl, with a disdainful curl of her red lip. "But you are deceiving yourself. It is not a question of sufficient reason. It is the fact that a natural cowardice stands in your way. In a word, you dare not!"

There was a flash in the man's dark eyes as he heard the words.

"Be careful, Pearl!" he said in a suppressed tone. "Or you may yourself create the 'sufficient reason.' 'Dare not' is a term that no true Englishman can brook."

The girl laughed a silvery, rippling laugh. She had roused him at last. She was very thoughtless. He had sneered at her romance and she longed in some way to punish him for it. And now she had touched the right chord. She meant to make the most of it, and, in her thoughtlessness, forgot that her words could move the man more than the sweeping away of nations.

He loved her—she knew that—but he had no right to laugh at her romance, and she was going to punish him as he deserved.

Once again her eyes wandered up to the sides of the cliff, four hundred feet above their heads, and rested on a bunch of red poppies, growing in a little hollow of the cliff side, some two-thirds of the way up. With a mischievous light in her violet eyes, she pointed out the poppies to her companion.

Digitized by Google

"See!" she cried with a laugh. "There is the very thing! Poppies are as good as edelweiss. Now then, George Drake, you dare not get those poppies for me by to-morrow night! Now mind—it won't do to sneak off to some meadow or cornfield, and pick two or three there, for I shall come here to see if these are gone. You must get these or none, and, if I know you, George Drake, it will be none. Because, as I said just now, you dare not!"

She did not for one moment believe that he would attempt it. Otherwise she would have hesitated before taunting him so. But she liked teasing her handsome lover, and, when he made no reply, she laughed again, merrily and triumphantly, seeing not the flash of the dark eye and the steadfast, determined compressing of the firm lips. For George Drake had heard and accepted the challenge.

The morning had gone, the golden sun had passed its zenith, the boat lay high on the shining sand by the mouth of the stream, and the blue bay, sparkling with a thousand dancing lights, lay quietly sleeping through the golden hours of a summer afternoon.

It was about four o'clock when a figure appeared on the edge of the cliff, high above the blue waters, and stood for an instant gazing out to the great grey headlands beyond. In his hand he carried a long, stout coil of rope, a pointed bar of iron, and a huge hammer.

Slowly and deliberately he moved along the edge of the cliff, until he had reached a spot where the rocky wall, after jutting out into the bay, dropped back again, sheer and precipitous, forming a miniature inlet in the towering cliff.

Half a dozen yards from the edge, he began to drive the long bar deep into the solid earth, bringing down the great hammer with strong, swinging strokes. Soon it was set firm in the rocky soil, and, with an evident purpose in view, the man carefully bound one of the ends of the rope to the still projecting head of the iron bar.

Then he bound the other end securely about his muscular body, close under the armpits, and tested the long rope in twenty different ways. It was evident the man was practical, even in so perilous an undertaking, for his purpose was now apparent.

George Drake was not the man to neglect precautionary measures in a task like this. But the rope held firm, and, gripping it close to the iron bar, he turned his back on the sea and paid out the rope, hand over hand, while he stepped slowly and cautiously backwards to the edge of the cliff.

Close to the brink, he stopped, and, kneeling down, shuffled over the remaining foot of rock, and then slipped over the edge amid a cloud of dust and falling fragments of the cliff, and disappeared from view.

The rope strained, but held firm, and George Drake, feeling its strength, heaved a sigh of relief and went slowly and painfully down, hand over hand, till he had reached the end of the rope, and was able to release his aching hands. There he swung in mid-air with the rope tight about his body, a mere speck against the frowning, beetling cliff.

A moment to recover his breath, and then he began to look about him. Ah, there were the coveted poppies, growing in their little crevice, and tempting him, as Pearl had done, to pluck them! But they were far to the left.

Slowly he began to swing his body, keeping his hands against the cliff side to steady him, till he looked like a huge pendulum as he swayed from side to side.

At last he reached the little group of rocks which formed the crevice for the sheltered poppies, and, putting forth all his strength, he clutched a jagged projection, and held on with straining sinews and set teeth. With a supreme effort, he resisted the recoil, and then, putting out one hand, while he held firmly by the other, he plucked the precious poppies and swung back again to his former position.

For full ten minutes he remained motionless, recovering the strength he had lost in the perilous feat. Then, with a light of triumph in his dark eyes, he fastened his treasures to the collar of his coat, where no harm could reach them, and looked upward, preparatory to climbing the long stretch of swinging rope. But what he saw there made his dark, handsome face grow blanched and haggard as the fear of a terrible death stared him in the face.

The swinging of the rope, drawn tight by the weight of his body, had chafed the straining strands against the edge of the cliff, and George Drake saw, with horror, that the rope was now worn half through. Would it hold when, strained still further, he drew himself up, hand over hand?

The sweat stood upon his forehead as he thought of the hungry black rocks below, and he looked wildly round for some means of escape. But the great towering cliff frowned back at him and gave him no hope. But he must make the attempt.

Gripping the rope high above his head, he drew himself slowly up, while the rope strained and the strands above his head split still more under the added weight. Once

Putting his hand to the collar of his coat, he unfastened a wet spray of red poppies.

Digitized by Google

more he tried, but the rope severed again, and left but one of the three strands supporting him in mid-air. The task was impossible.

Slowly and very cautiously, he let himself down to his former position, and once more looked about him. Beneath him were many projections, but none so large that it might be used as a ledge. And below them again, were those horrible black fangs in the sea, cruel and sharp, ready to rend him if he fell.

All at once, he felt the rope yielding above his head, and, with a quick catch in his throat, he stretched out his hands in a vain attempt to grip the pitiless wall of the frowning cliff. Then the rope broke with a snap, and he fell.

Oh, the horror of that fearful drop! The blood rushed to his throbbing temples, a thousand sparks danced before his eyes, a blinding dust choked him as he sped down over the crumbling rock, and, with fingers torn and lacerated, he dropped into the abyss that yawned at his feet. And then, with a shock that well-nigh shook the breath from his aching frame, he struck a projecting rock and stopped.

It strained beneath his weight, and innumerable little cascades of dust broke loose from its black sides and slipped down the face of the cliff.

The débris which he had displaced on his descent went rattling downward about his ears, but he remained hanging upon a morsel of rock, which might, at any moment, be torn from the grey wall of the towering cliff and send him hurtling down to his death.

But the rock resisted his weight, and held fast to the cliff side. How long could he remain thus? He was lying across the rock, his arms on one side, his feet on the other, and he dared not move more than an inch or two.

Once more he looked about him. He had not fallen more than forty or fifty feet, and, even now, he was not quite half-way down the straight, beetling cliff.

He looked below—still those hungry rocks, for the tide was out now, and little pools lay between the sharp, black fringe of rocks. The sun, too, was sinking down in the west, and the thought of the night that was to come struck him with an untold horror.

What was his fate to be? His only prayer—the only one he could reasonably pray—was that his death might be a speedy one. And so night fell, and the stars shone in the purple sky, while the proud moon swept like a queen across the studded heavens, and, in her turn, went down too, to give place and sway to the orb of day.

The tide had risen in the night, but, when the dawn broke, it was ebbing fast, and presently the sharp black needles of rock pierced the blue waters of the bay and renewed their menace to the helpless, terrified victim above.

How he lived through that night, George Drake never knew. But when the morning dawned, calm, serene, peaceful, he lifted his haggard eyes to the pitiless sky and wondered how long the end would be.

There was no hope from the bay, for the projections which formed the miniature inlet in the cliff side effectually shut him off from the view of fishing boats. From the headlands of the bay to the mouth of the stream, where the boats were anchored, was a straight course, and he was quite out of the line of vision. It was only a tiny rowing-boat, whose occupants were bent on pleasure, that came his way, and the little fishing village was too unimportant to make this a frequent occurrence.

And above him? Well, there might be a bare hope there. Someone might climb to the top of the cliff and discover the severed rope. But, even then, what could they do? And then an idea suddenly flashed into his mind, and his dark, haggard eyes kindled with a new hope.

The rope! There it hung, sheer down the face of the cliff more than a hundred feet below him! It had been severed at the very top, while he hung helpless at the bottom. And, when he had been stopped by the projecting rock, the long rope had swept by him into the abyss below, till reaching its full length, the loop about his own body had stopped it and held it fast.

If he could get to the bottom of that rope, not more than a hundred feet would lie between him and the black rocks below. Even that would suffice to crush out his life, if he should fall back on to those horrible fangs. But the tide would turn again, and be high above the rocks before the golden sun had reached its zenith.

He could not go upward. To stay where he was meant a slow, torturing death. And, downward, there might be a chance.

With trembling fingers and throbbing heart, he hauled up the long rope, till he had the end in his hand. Then, cautiously and breathlessly, he swung it to and fro under the projecting rock, till it curled upward on the other side and dropped limply on to his back.

Trembling with excitement and hope, he made a running noose in the rope, drawing it tight about the projecting rock, thus using the rock as he had done the iron bar on the previous day. And then he waited—waited long hours of suspense and dread, till the tide should be at the flow.

As he lay there, he narrowly scanned the rocks below him, searching for a deep hollow, where he might strike the water with tolerable safety. Then, as the tide rose, he grasped the rope in his torn hands and slid off the rock into the abyss below.

Once again the rope stood his weight, and in a few minutes he had reached its limit and looked downward at the rapidly rising waters of the bay. Presently he took from his pocket a large clasp-knife, and again looked at the rising tide.

The minutes went by with painful slowness. One by one they wore out their allotted time, till the tide was at its height.

There was a swift, determined stroke of the knife across the strands of the rope, a snap as it severed above his head, and George Drake went hurtling down into the blue water beneath him. Would he strike a rock? Some of them were not many feet beneath the water. There was a plunge, and the water, churned into foam, bubbled up and over him, as he went down to the rocks below.

He had calculated well. Right between them he went, striking the hard sand as he touched the bottom. Then, with a desperate effort, he struck out for the surface and looked about him.

How fervently grateful he was now for the skill he possessed in all athletic exercises! But he was terribly exhausted, and it took all his remaining strength to reach the mouth of the little stream, where the frowning cliffs ceased and the golden sand sloped gently down to the edge of the bay.

And what was happening on the cliff above?

Pouting at her lover's absence and supposed neglect, Pearl Seymour put on her hat, and, leaving the village behind her, began leisurely to climb the steep, precipitous path up the side of the cliff.

Reaching the top, she crossed over to the other side, overlooking the bay. A rope lay at her feet, and surprised, yet without thinking, she stooped and touched it. The end of the rope came over the edge of the cliff, and, to her horror, she saw it had been severed by the rock against which it had been drawn.

Digitized by Google

Instantly, her words of yesterday flashed into her mind. The poppies! Surely George could not have taken the taunt seriously. And yet her own heart told her that it was not wholly in jest that her words had been uttered. She had been angry too. But was it possible?

Something glistened on the ground at her feet, and, stooping, she picked it up. It was George Drake's ring! With an agonised cry, she sped back down the steep path of the cliff, and up along the stream, till she had reached the bay.

As she did so, the figure of a man emerged from the water and stood before her. He was terribly cut and bruised, and his face was white and haggard. With a little stifled sob, she rushed up to him, and, flinging both her arms about his neck, cried to him to forgive her.

For a moment the man never spoke, but putting his hand to the collar of his coat, he unfastened a wet spray of red poppies, torn almost to fragments, and held them out to the sobbing girl.

"Don't!" she said, as she pushed them away. "Oh, how could you? How could I have been so wicked, so cruel, so heartless? Oh, my love, my love, can you ever forgive me?"

The man took her in his arms.

"Yes, dear," he said gently. "But you must never say to me again: 'You dare not!' I have been very near death, dear, and have lain all through the long night across a narrow rock on the face of the cliff, with no help, no hope of rescue. But—I have got your poppies!" And again he held them out to her.

She took them and kissed them almost reverently.

"Yes," she said, with deep humility, "I will keep them. Not as a test of your love, nor as a proof of your courage, but as a living reminder that the words of a foolish woman may lead a brave man to his death. And when I grow vain and apt to think over-much of my unworthy self, the sight of these poppies, withered and torn, will awaken the memory of this thoughtless folly of which I am now so bitterly ashamed, and teach me the lesson of all others which I need—the lesson of humility and wisdom."

George Drake drew her into his arms and kissed her.

"It was worth the risk, and the long, long hours of suffering," he said, "only to hear you speak thus nobly. I want you to be a true woman, dear, thoughtful, tender, kind, in whose heart the petty things of life shall find no place. The world is a school, wherein we learn many things, and I, as well as you, have learnt something to-day, which I shall never forget."

And they went back, hand in hand, to the little village in the valley.

M. J. Walters.

PATERFAMILIAS: "Clara, I see that the front gate is down this morning." Clara: "Yes, papa; you know love levels all things."

MISS ANTIQUE: "Are you quick to take a hint?" Young Harum-scarum: "Yes, very." "What would you do if I should turn down the gas?" "Call for help."

SHE: "Surely, my dear, you will consider the matter carefully before consenting to Clara's marriage with old Mr. Cashman?" He: "Certainly. I shall have his books examined by an expert."

CALLER: "You call this garden scene 'June,' but the leaves are all on the ground instead of on the trees." D'Auber: "They were on the trees, but the picture got such a withering criticism from the committee that they curled up and fell off."

SEASIDE VISITOR (at crowded hotel in Margate): "How much do I owe you? How much is my bill?" Clerk: "Let me see, your room——" Seaside Visitor: "But I didn't have any room. I slept on the billiard-table." Clerk: "Ah, well, then, eighteenpence an hour."

YOUR EDITOR CHATS.

THE eighth list of letters in the competition will be found on page 111. Four more lists will appear.

THERE is a gold-plated pencil-case waiting for the person who most nearly places the stories in this number in the order of merit in which they are regarded by the majority of readers. On the back of a postcard write the names of the stories in the order in which you prefer them and then send your postcard to PREFERENCE No. 3, SHORT STORIES, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., to arrive not later than by first post on Tuesday, July 28th.

IN response to my inquiry as to what readers did with their copies of SHORT STORIES after they have finished with them, I have had shoals of letters; the following are extracts from a few of them:

"I invest every week in six copies. Five of them I send to friends in the country with the request to pass them on to another friend when read. The sixth copy I read myself and then put it aside with a collection of literature to send to a hospital or workhouse."

"I think SHORT STORIES the most delightful and cheapest little paper ever published at the price. It is interesting the whole way through. After reading my copies I put them away until I get about a dozen or so, and then send them to friends. I call it my little book of sunshine, because when tired I can often sit and read just one story and enjoy myself for a few minutes."

"I am pleased to say that when I have read my copy I give it to my husband, who, after reading it, sends it along with a copy of THE BIG BUDGET, and sometimes PEARSON'S WEEKLY, to a friend of ours who is a sergeant in the 2nd South Staffs Regiment, stationed at Agra, India."

All the other readers from whom I have heard say that they send their copies of SHORT STORIES on to friends or to a hospital, or some such similar institution. This latter is, I am sure, a very excellent means of disposing of them. The patients like something both light to read and light to hold, and SHORT STORIES meets those requirements admirably.

IN two weeks' time a new serial by Mr. Henry T. Johnson will be starting. It is rather a different style of story from the present one. "THE BOND BETWEEN," but it will be none the less interesting for all that. The number of SHORT STORIES containing the first instalment will be dated August 8th. Readers should give their orders now for a copy to be reserved for them. Mr. Johnson's work is well known to readers of the Daily Express and THE BIG BUDGET.

I HOPE to be able to announce the result of the "Buried Stations" Competition shortly. The amount of work entailed in checking the attempts necessitates the delay.

THE summer is pursuing its course and the autumn days are drawing nearer, but still there is plenty of time for many more FRESH AIR FUND excursions to take place. Contributions have been coming to hand very satisfactorily so far, but it will not do for there to be any falling off, otherwise so many little mites will have to forego their one hoped-for day in the country.

You are not asked to give great sums—ninepence from each person who reads this will be a great help—if you can afford to send more, so much the better. Instead of waiting to see whether at the end of the summer you will be able to afford more than you have saved at present, send what you can now, remembering that "he gives twice, who gives quickly." All contributions should be addressed to the Hon. Sec., FRESH AIR FUND, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and they will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

Collecting cards can be had on application. Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

In the Whispering Gallery.

A PRETTY LITTLE LOVE STORY.

"Now, really, Howard, this thing must stop, it's getting on my nerves," Muriel exclaimed as they walked home together through the long twilight of a Spring day from Mrs. Mortimer's "At home."

Howard looked penitent but persistent.

"You know how you can stop it, Muriel," he suggested.

"There you go again"—vexedly—"and I protest I will not stand it! A woman does not have to accept a man more than once, and I do not see why I am called upon to refuse you times out of number."

"Neither do I. Accept me and get it done with."

"Don't be ridiculous, Howard! If I ever had any notion of doing so you have put a quietus on it, for I could not marry a man of only one idea. For the past month 'Will you marry me, Muriel?' has been the only connected remark you have been capable of, and when you've been too far away from me to say it you have looked it. It has become monotonous and you interfere seriously with my plans."

He smiled down at her indulgently, maddeningly, as one might smile at a spoilt child.

"If I did not know you so well I should lose faith in you," he told her. "'Your plans' are all very well for you to tease me with and toy with, but my Muriel—the Muriel I have known all my life—would never carry them out."

She laughed defiantly, if rather mirthlessly.

"And why not?" she asked. "Even before there was any ground for planning, I told you that if I ever married—which is a matter of much doubt—it would be for the sake of making a startlingly brilliant match. The chance for that has come to me, and I am not going to have it spoilt by any absurd young man who, after having confided his love affairs to me from the time he was old enough to have any, suddenly takes it into his head to fancy that he has fallen in love with his confidante."

"Perhaps it's the fact that I did not have sense enough to do it in the first place that you cannot forgive?"

"Forgive! There's no question of forgiveness; except the fact that you hung around me this afternoon like a thundercloud, thereby keeping the Duke——"

"Where it's best that he should be."

"You are incorrigible, and I tell you this must stop. I've got to have a clear field just now and a steady head. You must leave me alone for—well, we'll say for a month."

"Do I interfere with the steadiness of your head?"—innocently.

"Why, yes—no—of course you do. It's—it's disturbing to any woman to be proposed to indiscriminately, and when the same man does it it waxes boresome. It's grown to be so much force of habit with you that you do it now unhesitatingly and without any sign of embarrassment—quite unromantically."

"Thought you did not believe in romance?" he reminded her.

"Well, I don't, but I do believe in—plans. That is why I insist that you leave me in peaceful pursuit of mine. At the end of a month you may come to see how they have prospered; and incidentally tell me what new fields you have conquered."

"Muriel, do you mean——"

"That at dinners, at balls, at teas, or any place where there is the remotest chance of your proposing to me you shall studiously avoid me. Not only this, but if chance throws us together you will act as though I were only a casual acquaintance."

"But people will talk," he objected.

"Not any more than they do now; and, anyway, I think I shall give them something new to talk about."

"You'll be sorry if you marry the Duke, dear," he said, as they stood on her doorstep.

"Why, may I ask?" she flashed at him.

"Because," he said deliberately, taking her hand, "because you love me."

For just a moment she seemed to waver, then she wrenched her hand free.

"Oh, the conceit of man!" she mocked. "Well, this month will show whether you or I know my mind best."

"You shall have the month, if that's what you want," he agreed unruffled—a bit too unruffled was Muriel's thought—"but don't play too hard with the fire. I don't want to see my little girl get scorched. When the month is up," he continued more gravely, "I will come and give you just one more chance to refuse me. If you avail yourself of it that will be the end. I love you very dearly, but I do not intend to let your perversity spoil my life."

Howard, the long-suffering and forbearing, had rebelled! This was an issue upon which Muriel had not reckoned. Still more to her surprise he made no apparent effort to circumvent her decision, so that she now saw him not at all save at a distance. She tried to fancy that he looked haggard and dejected, but was obliged to confess to herself that he appeared instead most aggressively healthy and contented.

"So much for the constancy of man!" Muriel mused. "Who would think to see him that he was a repeatedly rejected lover?"

Meanwhile her plans, like many unwise ones, were working out beautifully. The Duke pressed his suit assiduously, and she knew that the day was not far off when she must give him his answer. What was it to be?

In this perplexed frame of mind she drove down into the City one day with a friend who wished to make some research in the library at St. Paul's. As they ascended the steps of the cathedral Howard chanced to pass that way, and when his delighted eyes fell on Muriel the temptation to follow her was greater than he could resist. In the gloom of the vast interior he could watch her unobserved, and he fancied that she would seem in some way nearer to him there than when she was surrounded by glitter and glare and other men, as she had been always when he had seen her during these few, interminable weeks.

Muriel and her friend paid the fee and ascended the shallow-stepped winding stairway that leads up to the library and goes on far above it. At the entrance to the library Muriel paused a moment for breath.

"Do you know I have never been to the whispering gallery," she said. "While you get what you want I believe I will go on up."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, do—it's quite wonderful," the other girl replied; and Muriel began to climb again, unconscious that a man came softly after her, not far behind, but effectually hidden by the ever-recurring turns of the broad, spiral way.

Muriel, when she reached the whispering gallery, chatted a moment with the old custodian who dispenses information to the public, then walked to the opposite side of the gallery so that she might test the marvellous acoustic properties of the place. She placed her ear close to the wall in readiness.

"Do you hear, miss?" came a queer, muffled voice.

"Yes," replied Muriel hesitatingly; she had expected to hear more distinctly. Nor was she disappointed.

"Haven't you missed me at all, Muriel?" was the startling question which followed, very clear and in a voice that she knew well.

"Why, Howard!" she exclaimed, entirely taken by surprise.

"You didn't say anything about churches," Howard went on, "and I haven't proposed to you any way. Have you missed me, dear?"

"I believe I have," Muriel admitted.

"Then do come round and tell me about it," he begged; and Muriel went. The sympathetic custodian discreetly turned his back at her approach.

Muriel dimpled and blushed hesitatingly as she gave Howard her hand.

"How's the Duke?" he asked interestedly.

"Quite well, I believe," she replied indifferently. "I'm to give him an answer to-morrow," she went on without looking at him.

"And you'll say 'no'?" he asked breathlessly.

"Not—not unless I've said 'yes,' to someone else first."

Howard's heart beat so that he felt that she must hear it, but he managed to speak calmly.

"The month is not up yet," he said, "and it's to be the last time of asking. What would you say to me, I wonder, Muriel?"

"Oh, Howard!" she cried, as he led her round a sheltering turn in the stairway; "don't be so judicial."

"What then?" he asked, less steadily. She was tantalisingly close to him now. She laid her little gloved hand on his arm with the sweetest timidity imaginable.

"My old Howard of the one idea," she answered softly, and was gathered without further ado into a close embrace.

"This has been the very longest month I've ever lived," he said.

"I should think it had. I thought you'd never give in."

"But you said a month, sweetheart."

"I've said lots of things I didn't mean," she twinkled.

"The Duke?"

"Of course the Duke. As though I could have! But you took such an awfully long time to fall in love with me that I wanted to be quite, quite sure of you."

"You haven't said 'yes' to me yet," he reminded her after he had tried to prove to her the certainty of his devotion.

"'You haven't asked me, sir, she said,'" she laughed happily. "And, Howard, that girl downstairs will think I've tumbled over the rail."

"Then we will go and tell her that you were merely stopped by the male—the very happiest male in the whole world, darling!"

Winifred Alan.

NEARLY A TRAGEDY.

Telling of How a Wife Realised the Value of Her Husband.

"CORA, dear, will you have me? I've run away!"

Cora Dainsford started up from her cosy corner, her eyes dilating with genuine astonishment.

"My dear Mrs. Denman, this is an unexpected pleasure."

The rich tones rang a trifle insincere, and the dark eyes glinted unpleasantly; but the pretty, irresponsible being, who called herself Wilfrid Denman's wife, noticed neither.

"I'm so glad you're glad," she said, effusively kissing the olive cheek of the woman who, not so long ago, had been her rival; thereafter subsiding into a chair and pulling the dainty gloves from her white, be-jewelled hands.

"Of course I'm pleased to see you, Winnie," responded Cora. "Why shouldn't I be? The past, so far as I'm concerned, is dead and buried long ago. But"—suddenly—"why haven't you brought the husband?"

Winnie looked up mischievously.

"Didn't I tell you I'd run away. Will doesn't know where I am."

"You odd child! What do you mean?"

Cora Dainsford drew up a chair, and sat down opposite the little woman, with clasped hands and inquiring eyes. She had never really forgiven this dainty beauty for supplanting her in the affections of handsome Wilfrid Denman. On the contrary, the thorn had rankled badly, and still—although many months had passed, and she herself was now the wife of another man, still it remained in the wound.

"You haven't quarrelled surely, you two?" she queried, fixing her black eyes on the other's face with an intentness that was almost embarrassing.

"No," said Winnie, "that is, not to say quarrelled exactly. But Will is so different somehow. When we were first married nothing was too good for me, and now—well, I'll just give you an instance.

"Yesterday we went out to Madame Rénaud's, and I wore a lovely gown—white lace over pink. It's a perfect dream, and suits me to perfection; but when Will saw it, instead of going into raptures as he used to do, he actually frowned."

There was more than a suspicion of tears in the big, baby-blue eyes.

"'Don't you like it, dearie?' I asked him. 'It is very pretty,' he said, quite slowly; 'but, Winnie, you had that blue one only last week, and, honestly, I can't afford it.'

"Men are always saying things like that, aren't they? But really I never thought Will would turn out like that. He's so glum and preoccupied too. I can't imagine what's come over him."

Winnie threw out her sweet lips in a pout that most men would have voted adorable. She was so fair and pretty that she had been rather extensively idolised by her parents, and her big, hulking brothers, so her little imperious airs might readily be forgiven her.

Cora thought of this, and wondered if it were possible that Wilfrid Denman had some trouble, which he dared not reveal to this gay, child-like little wife of his; and there and then she determined to question her own husband on the subject; confident that if anything were amiss with the firm of Denman, Roper, and Co." he would not be without some knowledge of it.

Digitized by Google

"He neglects me, too," went on the petulant voice. "Would you believe it, Cora, we haven't been to the theatre for weeks—the opera season, too. It's positively scandalous! And, to crown all, he actually rushed off to business this morning without kissing me! What do you say to that? Don't you think I'm justified in teaching him a lesson?"

Now the path of Cora Dainsford's duty lay straight and plain before her, but she chose to ignore it. The opportunity for creating a rupture between those two hearts recommended itself to her as too good a one to be let slip. The old thorn rankled anew, and the vindictive element in her nature re-asserted itself.

"Yes," she said, "I think you are quite right, dear. Wilfrid oughtn't to treat you so, and a little reminder will do him good. You are at liberty to stay here as long as ever you please, dear."

"You darling!" exclaimed Winnie, jumping up, and flinging her arms round the other's neck. "I knew you would sympathise with me. But, oh!"—drawing back suddenly—"what a lovely gown!"

Cora smiled.

"I'm glad you like it," she said. "I donned it a moment ago in honour of a visitor."

"A visitor?" Winnie looked her inquiry.

"Yes. None other than Captain Marshall, your old admirer. He's dining with us to-night. Isn't it a coincidence?"

"Mercy!" cried Winnie. "It's more than that. Why, do you know, I've actually brought that hapless pink dress with me; so at any rate I shan't disgrace you at dinner. What splendid luck!" And, laughing together, the two women made for the upper regions.

* * * * * *

The dinner that night proved an eminently successful function. There were several other guests besides Captain Marshall, friends of Hubert Dainsford, so Winnie gathered from a formal introduction; but the Captain from the first had devoted himself exclusively to her.

He was excellent company, this notorious flirt and flatterer, and although Winnie knew him as such, a pleasurable thrill went through her in response to his honeyed words. It was pure mischief and coquetry too, which led her to acquiesce when the Captain proposed a visit to the conservatory.

Silently, her bare shoulder brushing the sleeve of his coat at intervals, they strolled down the miniature avenue of ferns and palms, to where the fountain hissed and sparkled in the moonlight. Arriving there, they stopped, leant together on the edge of the marble basin, and smiled into each other's eyes.

The Captain was giving little, nervous tugs at his long moustache, a sure sign that he was stirred. He was one of those men who do momentous things on the spur of the moment, without forethought and with a fine disregard of possible consequences.

Similar circumstances had sufficed to draw avowals of love from his lips on more occasions than he cared to remember; nor was he proof against them now.

In a moment he had forgotten Wilfrid Denman, forgotten prudence, and was pouring passionate words in the ear of the woman at his side.

"Winnie, my darling, I can keep silence no longer. I love you; and when I see you as you are now I realise that I can never love anyone else but you!"

His arm was about her, his bold, black eyes were close to her face, and realising then her danger, she sprang away from him, with an exclamation of fear and repulsion.

"Captain Marshall, this is an outrage! How dare you speak such words to Wilfrid Denman's wife! Leave me—instantly. Go, I say!" And she stamped her tiny foot passionately upon the tiled pavement.

* * * * *

Left alone, for the Captain had slipped away with his head down like a beaten dog, the little lady smiled bitterly to herself. Such then were the fruits of her foolish escapade.

Poor Wilfrid! She had treated him vilely. She had been selfish and foolish—a most unwifely wife. But she would go back to him at once. She would implore his forgiveness, he would give it with many kisses, and they would be infinitely happier than before.

Full of this new resolution she gathered up her skirts and hurried off in search of her hostess; but at the foot of the main staircase she came to a sudden stop as the sound of voices from an adjacent room were wafted out to her.

"They say the firm can't stand the strain any longer. Roper must have been mad. And as for Denman, he can't see an inch in front of his nose except where it concerns that extravagant little wife of his!"

Winnie, gripping convulsively at the hand-rail to support herself, recognised the voice as belonging to Cora's husband, next moment Cora herself was speaking. There seemed to be a note of triumph in her voice.

"And does it mean complete ruin for them, then?"

"I fear so. Denman's wife's extravagance will have been the last straw. That woman has simply no idea of the value of money."

"I know; but really I can't say I'm sorry. In fact, I'm rather glad. I hate the pair of them!"

"Tut, tut!" came again in the deep tones of the man. "What a little spitfire you are, Cora!"

Sick and faint, Winnie waited to hear no more, but flew up the staircase, and ten minutes later was out of the house and speeding homewards in a cab.

She thought the man eyed her pityingly as she stepped into the full glare of the electric light in the hall, and a cold shiver ran down her spine.

"Where is your master, James?" came at length, faintly, through her quivering lips.

"In his study, ma'am."

Winnie tore off her wrap, and stole softly up to the door. There was no sound within, so she pushed it noiselessly open and entered.

Next moment a wild cry burst from her as she flung herself headlong upon the man who sat there, grey-faced, with her photograph propped up on the desk before him, and the shining barrel of a revolver pressed against his temple.

Winnie broke out into a cry.

"Oh, Will, Will!"

The weapon went crashing into the empty fireplace, two soft arms stole round his neck, and gradually the despair on the man's face melted away, as he gazed into the blue eyes, dark now with anguish, of his truant wife.

"Oh, my dear!" she cried, brokenly, "another minute and—— Oh, Will, it would have killed me. I've been a horrid, thoughtless, selfish little wretch, dear; but, oh, my husband, I have learnt a lesson now! I'm going to be so good in future—indeed, indeed I am!"

"In future!" A spasm of pain crossed Wilfrid Denman's face. "My darling wife, you don't know, and how can I tell you. An awful thing——!"

She stopped him with a kiss.

"I know," she said softly. "I know all. I heard it only half an hour ago, and that was why I came back. Why didn't you tell me before?"

He crushed her to him then, and kissed her all over face and hair.

"But, dearest," he said at last. "Have you thought? Do you quite realise it? Perhaps in time, with luck and the help of friends, I may be able to retrieve poor Roper's errors. But it will mean years of pinching and economising, and I dread it for your sake, darling."

With an impulsive movement she nestled closer to him; love and hope shining together in her brilliant eyes.

"Dearest," she murmured, "it will come hard at first, I know, but sooner than lose you, my husband, I would endure anything—even the poverty of rags and wretchedness. I love you so."

B. A. Lerish.

Digitized by Google

Splendid Serial Story.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

NAMES TO REMEMBER.

SIR TREVOR MAITLAND, of Maitland Manor, Melton.
LADY MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's second wife. Before her marriage with him she passed as a widow named Mrs. Vernon.
JACK MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's son by his first wife.
AGNES MAITLAND } Jack's sisters.
MURIEL MAITLAND }
WOOLF MAITLAND, the present Lady Maitland's only child.
IVY STRANGE, a foundling with whom Jack is in love.
HERIOT NORTH, a friend of Sir Trevor.
MIKE HOLLAND, an ex-convict and burglar who blackmails Lady Maitland, he having been in prison with her first husband.
MARY MASON, Lady Maitland's maid.
DIGBY SCARLETT, an explorer and acquaintance of Jack. It was through him that Lady Maitland's first husband was imprisoned.
GILBERT CHASE, a detective employed by Jack to discover the mystery of Ivy's birth.
VERNON GRANT, Lady Maitland's first husband.

TWENTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.

The Man of the Hour.

JANUARY was nearly over, and a chastened, humid February with shy suggestions of latent Spring in the air, loomed near. The trees in the parks waved their stately branches, and whispered among themselves the coming fashions in green, rejoicing that the cold wind would shortly cease to whistle through their vivid garments, as it had through their bare, brown branches.

Under one of the larger trees in Hyde Park a girl was sitting, watching with dreamy eyes the ebb and flow of life as it passed before her.

Beyond the park gates the murmur of the traffic fell upon her ears; and the distant calling of the birds as they flew from tree to tree, reminded her of the country woods and fields she had so recently left.

Presently she rose with a shiver; it was chilly, and her thin coat was but a poor protection against the bleak winds. As she strolled towards the exit that led to Hyde Park Corner, a beggar stopped her—one of the usual specimens that drift from pillar to post, living on the charity of chance pedestrians, when not shadowed by that blue-coated bugbear, the police.

"Please, kind lidy, a copper!" the woman whined. "I'm just out of the 'orspital, and am walking to see my sister wot's in the country."

The girl stopped; her gentle heart stirred by the woman's miserable condition. Rags, dirt, and decay were all written in her low-bred face; and, unnoticed by the girl, were the evident signs of drink in the sodden eyes and bloated skin.

"I am afraid I have not much to give you," she said in a kindly tone; "but I will give you sixpence. Have you far to go?"

The woman nodded, and cast a hasty glance round in search of her mortal enemy, "the copper." He was not in sight, however, so she pocketed the sixpence, and said:

"Yes, lidy; I'm going to Melton in Leicestershire."

"Melton!" the girl gasped, with blanched cheeks and startled eyes. "Did you say Melton?"

"Yes, lidy," the woman whined, wondering at the interest so suddenly evinced by the lovely young girl with the "angel face" and sad eyes. "I'm goin' back to visit the grave of my pore 'usbin', 'e was murdered in the wood, and I'm a widder without a penny!"

For a moment it seemed that the girl before her would faint, she swayed and trembled like a leaf, while her eyes looked staring and wild.

"Your husband!" she whispered; "how—how awful! What—what—was his name? I—I—once knew—Melton."

"Mike 'Olland, miss," the woman said dolefully, glad to have created an interest in a "lidy" who might be prevailed upon to dispense her charity more liberally under the influence of pity. "Me and 'im was as 'appy as could be till we lost our little girl, and then——"

She stopped abruptly, startled by the frozen look of horror on the white face of the girl, who threw out one trembling hand to steady her tottering steps.

"Don't—don't say any more!" she gasped. "See! I will give you nearly all I have; I must keep a few shillings, but you may have the rest. It is only half a sovereign," she said, with a pitiful smile, as she pushed the money into the astounded woman's hand; "but—but take it, for the sake of your—your little girl!"

Without waiting for the ragged specimen of humanity to speak she turned and hurried away with swift, eager steps, almost as though she expected the woman to follow her.

"Well, I'm blowed!" ejaculated the outcast, in a puzzled tone; "who would 'ave thought that I should 'ave touched lucky in the park! All along o' bein' tru'fl, s'elp me if it ain't! I calls that real encouragement to go straight—till I'm pinched!" she added, grinning. Then, biting the piece of gold she disappeared among the trees.

In the meantime her benefactress had got half way down Piccadilly before she pulled herself up. The chance meeting with anyone who knew Melton had been an unexpected shock, but the terrible communication the dirty, ignorant, creature in the park had made to her had been a greater shock than she had felt able to bear.

Her only desire had been to tear herself away from the glance of those dark, evil eyes, to hide from the sound of that coarse, illiterate voice.

The woman in the park had been the wife of—of the man whose name she had not dared to breathe, lest it should be suddenly whirled away by the wind, and shrieked over the housetops till it reached the spinny in Melton Wood! That woman—his wife, then the "little girl" that was lost must have been——"

She bit her lips in an agony of shame, as she remembered how she had yearned to lay her head upon a mother's breast, to feel a mother's kiss upon her brow! Now the name she most dreaded was that of "Mother"!

"And he was going to find her for me!" she thought, with a bitter smile. "Thank God that he will never do so now! He will forget when he is better, while I——"

She shivered wearily. It was now nearly three weeks since she had flown, like a thief in the night, from all that she had loved. The long tramp across the country, in order to avoid Melton, to the further station of Chorlton, where she had waited for the London mail; her sole possessions a handbag and Sir Trevor's Christmas present to her of five pounds; that, and a few trinkets, given to her by the boy who had once been her lover, in the days when their love had promised so fair and sweet!

Digitized by Google

She had come to London and had been fortunate in finding a kindly landlady, who let her have a small bedroom for five shillings a week, in the neighbourhood of Bloomsbury. Then there had begun a weary search for employment.

When the last of her little all began to diminish, she had paid an entrance fee at an agent's where posts were found as governesses, companions, and secretaries, but so far had met with no success.

Afraid of being traced by her own name, she had called herself "Ivy Lodge" in the books of the agents, and remembered with a start that she had received a typewritten letter from them that morning to call at the office in Cockspur Street at four in the afternoon. It was nearly that now, and after reassuring herself that she was not followed by the beggar in the park, she turned her steps in the direction of Cockspur Street.

Suddenly she stopped; the street boys were calling out the latest editions of the evening papers, and carried pink placards in front of them. One caught her eye; and the words she read in the huge letterpress were to her like a flaming sword of justice. She reeled like a drunken woman, and caught at a lamp-post to steady herself. The words that had roused her from her lethargy were:—

THE MELTON MURDER MYSTERY!
A Missing Link!
Where is Ivy Strange?

She felt her face flushing and paling with the sudden horror of being confronted by the sight of her own name on the long line of pink placards, and, to her own sensitive imagination, she seemed conscious that the passers-by looked at her suspiciously, as though they had already guessed the secret she had thought so secure.

An insane impulse seized her to stop and cry aloud that "Ivy Strange" was in their midst, and had run away from Melton because she was afraid to stay! But the impulse passed, and with quivering limbs and strained, hunted eyes, she made her way to the agent's office, hearing all the while the clamorous words that flared on the placards:—"Where is Ivy Strange?" "Where is Ivy Strange?"

In the waiting-room she regained a little of her self-control, but looked pale and frightened as she went into the inner office.

"Ah, Miss Lodge," said the lady clerk, regarding the trembling girl before her coldly. "I have a most exceptional post open for a secretaryship to an author. In fact, I would hesitate to have sent for you as you have no experience of any kind, were you not a good Latin scholar, but none of the ladies on my books just now are acquainted with the language. I am afraid, though, even now, that you look too delicate for the work."

The girl flung out her hands eagerly.

"Oh, no, don't say that! I am stronger than I look; indeed I am; and I will work so hard to please him if you give me the post. My languages are good, and I can easily learn to type. Besides, I understand shorthand."

She stopped abruptly, colouring hotly with the passion of words she had let loose from her heart. It was urgently imperative that she got this post, for now her store of ready money was perilously low, since she had been so liberal with the woman in the park.

A strange voice answered her—the voice of a grave, white-haired man, with sad, hollow eyes, and a sweet smile that spoke of past sufferings.

"I think this lady will suit me admirably, madam," he said slowly, looking at the girl with a puzzled expression; "she will regain her strength, perhaps, when her mind is at rest."

"Very well, Mr. Vivyan," replied the woman briefly; "of course, you are the first person to be consulted, and I am glad you came to choose for yourself, instead of letting me send them up to you." Then turning to Ivy, who stood listening in a tumult of relief, she said. "When will you be ready, Miss Lodge, to take up your duties?"

"I am ready now," she replied simply.

Mr. Vivyan rose. "Then you had better come to my house at Surbiton to-night, Miss—Miss Lodge," he said. "I have a housekeeper who will receive you, and to-morrow we can begin work. This is my address."

He handed her a card, and with a bow that included herself and the clerk, he left the office—a strangely distinguished figure that had "tragedy" writ all over it.

When he had gone Ivy glanced at the card and read:

Mr. Vernon Vivyan,
"The Retreat,"
Surbiton, S.W.

"I suppose you know who he is, Miss Lodge?" said the voice of the clerk.

"I am afraid I do not," she replied; "I have not been reading much lately."

"Then I will tell you," said the woman. "He is the author of that celebrated book 'The Pariah.' He has become the man of the hour, like Byron; for one morning he woke and found himself famous. You are very lucky to work for him.'

In the meantime, the man of the hour, Vernon Vivyan, was driving to Waterloo Station in a hansom. He was thinking about the face of the girl he had engaged as his secretary. It was so sad, so haunted by the intangible presence of fear—as his had been once—that immediately he had felt a wave of interest go out to her.

She seemed alone, isolated by Fate from the common daily intercourse with her fellow creatures—as he had been for so many awful years—that he was glad he could, in a small way, make her life a little less burdensome.

Besides, something in her had sent his thoughts backwards on a trail of painful memories. She had one or two little mannerisms—a lilt in the voice, a gesture with the hand, and a movement of the head—that reminded him of the one woman who had been, for a brief month, the Alpha and Omega of his life, and whose delicate soul had been crushed under the Juggernaut of shame until it had killed her, and with her—their child!

Nearly three months had passed since his book had been accepted, and published immediately afterwards, and from that hour he had not looked back.

The book, written with his life's blood, had, indeed, proved a life preserver, and now he was making money; and money to him did not spell luxury or forgetfulness, but—revenge, and the resurrection of a name that had been dead for nearly twenty years.

He had not sent his work into the world labelled by the name of an ex-convict, but had, for the furthering of his plans, adopted his first two names, "Vernon Vivyan," that in no way connected the once shabby, down-at-heel ticket-of-leave man, Vernon Grant, with the author of "The Pariah."

Invitations and offers of friendship he had quietly and firmly refused, his whole heart set on two objects—the work that was part of his soul, and the revenge that was part of his life. To see his enemy in the dust, and—for the sake of those dear dead—to stand an honourable man in the eyes of the world.

When Ivy "Lodge" reached the "Retreat" that evening, she was received by a mild-faced, motherly-looking woman, who showed her to her bedroom and the little sitting-room that had been reserved for her special use.

"Mr. Vivyan would like to see you after you have dined, miss" she said. "He will be in the study."

The girl, refreshed after a dainty meal and a warm bath, brushed her clustering, burnished hair, and fastened a piece of white lace round her neck, as a substitute for the more sedate appearance of the morning, then went slowly downstairs to the study of her employer.

She felt almost happy in the peaceful Surbiton villa, remote from the tear and bustle of London traffic and the title of her new home brought a flood of relief to her heart; for was she not seeking a "retreat" in very truth, where she might not be haunted by the flaming placards with their harsh demands to know where "Ivy Strange" was! Here she was safe, for no one would think of seeking for her in the house of the author, Vernon Vivyan.

Digitized by Google

As she entered the study he rose to greet her, kindly, and with an awed deference, as though the society of a woman was a rare experience to him.

"I hope you have not been disagreeably impressed by the loneliness of the 'Retreat,' Miss Lodge." he said gently. "You are young, and youth loves Life's fanfare of trumpets, while I am old, and only care for the softened shades of life that mellow existence!"

"Oh, no," she said, eagerly; "I hate London. It frightens me, and reminds me of a great, big, human 'Zoo,' where all the animals try to outvie each other in making the greater noise."

He smiled. "Then you were not born within sound of Bow Bells? What part of the country do you come from, Miss Lodge?"

She turned a startled glance upon him. "I—I—come from the—north," she answered evasively; then went on hurriedly, "Did you wish to speak to me about my work, Mr. Vivyan?"

"I only wanted to tell you that I will dictate to you every day from ten to one and three to five," he said slowly. "Your time after those hours will be free to spend as you choose—with your friends or elsewhere."

"I have no friends," she said sadly. "When you do not require me I will be in my sitting-room."

"No friends!" he said, looking at her with interest. "It is an odd coincidence, Miss Lodge, but we are very similar in our circumstances! Are you an orphan?"

"Yes," she answered, with a slight shiver, thinking of the dirty tramp in the park. "I have no parents."

"Poor child!" he murmured, "poor child!" Then he added suddenly: "How old are you, Miss Lodge?"

"I shall be eighteen soon," the girl answered simply.

"Eighteen!" That would have been about the age of the child he had never seen! The child that had never lived to call him father! He could almost have imagined that this girl, with the strangely haunting eyes and manners of speech, might have resembled that child when a baby! Her presence was a painful pleasure to him, in recalling the years that had gone, the years that might have been!

He woke from his reverie with a start, to find his secretary waiting patiently in the room.

"We will begin my new book to-morrow, Miss Lodge," he said gently. "The title is already chosen; I am calling it 'Canker,' and although the subject is tragic," he added smilingly, "perhaps the writing of it may bring us both what we most need."

"Forgetfulness," the girl desired, and the man wrote to keep remembrance green.

The following day they began work, and for a week time passed busily, yet happily, in the "Retreat," for the two human souls so strenuously seeking a refuge from their pasts, those pasts as far apart as the poles, yet knit together in a tie closer than death!

"Miss Lodge," said Vernon Vivyan one morning, "I wonder if you would go to the Army and Navy Stores in Victoria Street for me, and order this list of stationery to be sent up, we shall want it soon?"

Agreeing readily, the girl started, glad of a chance to work for the kind, considerate man who was her master, yet never failed to treat her as a friend, rather than as a servant. His sad face and hungry-looking eyes—as though always searching for someone he never could find—filled her tender heart with a sense of sympathy and fellowship she could dimly feel without understanding.

She carried out her commission at the Stores, then went slowly down the steps, intending to get a 'bus to Waterloo Station.

Suddenly, as she stood on the threshold, a man in a hansom uttered an exclamation of mingled astonishment and exultation, as he caught a flashing glimpse of the slight, delicate girl in black, eyeing the traffic with wide, interested eyes.

It was the work of a moment to stop his hansom, run swiftly up the steps towards her, and take hold of her arm in a firm grip.

"Found at last, my little winged bird! At last my patience is rewarded!"

With a sickening feeling of deadly terror, Ivy raised her head sharply, and gazed into the dark, powerful face of the man she dreaded above all others—the man who knew most of the shameful secret of her life, and whom she had hoped never to meet again. It was Digby Scarlett, and he was looking down into her face with a grim smile of triumph and derision!

TWENTY-NINTH CHAPTER.

In Temptation's Grip.

She opened her mouth to speak, but horror froze her tongue to her palate, and she could only gaze at him dumbly.

"You are surprised, Ivy," he went on softly, his hand still holding her arm closely. "You do not seem so delighted as you should, considering that after all these weeks you have come face to face with your future husband!"

His words had the effect of loosening her speech.

"No, no!" she murmured; "that is all over, Mr. Scarlett. I can never keep my promise now. Let me go! Please let me go!"

His smile deepened, and his voice grew even more caressing as he said:

"Are you aware, my pretty Ivy, that you are wanted by the police in connection with the murder of the tramp in the spinny, and that, if I choose, I have just to lift my little finger and hail the nearest policeman and give you in charge?"

The girl's face blanched, and into her eyes there stole a look of horror and hunted fear as she returned the gaze of the man who held her liberty in his hand.

"How cruel you are!" she moaned, with quivering lips. "Can you not have a little mercy, and let me go? I am doing no harm; only trying to forget the past."

"Why did you run away," he said, softly, "if you were so innocent? Remember, little Ivy, I first did you a service in thrashing that same tramp when I found you in the wood together. You had a secret with him. I listened, and gathered——"

"Gathered what?" she said, with frightened eyes.

"That he was blackmailing you for some reason, and you were terrified lest he should betray you," he replied, watching her closely and noting the sudden gleam in her eyes. "Was that secret yours or—someone else's?"

"It was——" she began, then stopped abruptly. She could not tell what she knew for the dear sake of her lover. Rather anything than let Digby Scarlett guess the truth! "It was—mine!" she said, lifting her head with a haughty gesture. "Now, please let me go, Mr. Scarlett. I—I—am in a hurry."

"You shall not slip through my fingers again, Ivy," he smiled; "you shall either consent to marry me immediately or I shall give you up to the police! Ah, don't struggle, my pretty bird! I have you now, and your answer will decide your fate."

She bit her lip and cast a nervous glance round, as though to seek some way of escape from her custodian. At any cost he must not know where she was staying, for then she would know no peace of mind; and yet she dared not refuse to seem to be falling in with his wishes, or the alternative would be fatal.

"I will agree to your proposition," she said, in a low, strained voice, "on one condition—that you let me go now, and do not follow me. I will meet you to-morrow anywhere you like, but I can't stay now. Oh, please! If you have any regard for me whatever, let me go now!"

He looked at her curiously. Her opposition only increased her charm in his eyes. She reminded him of that other woman who had defied him so often, and sometimes successfully. Now the thought of bringing this girl to his feet was a joy that made him dizzy in anticipation of the working of his hatred upon the woman who had outwitted him so daringly.

When this girl was his wife, then he would drain the cup of vengeance to the dregs. But he would not lose sight of her. That would be too perilous a proceeding. Besides, he was curious to learn what she had been doing all the time she had been in London, while he had employed those weeks in searching high and low for her.

Digitized by Google

"Let me convince you that I am not your enemy, Ivy," he said, caressingly. "It is as much for my own sake as for yours that I wish to help you to evade the police, who are on the look out for you. Trust me! Be my wife!—and then, together, we will go to the sunny south of France, where all fear and misery will be over.

"As 'Ivy Strange,' the 'suspect,' your liberty is not worth a handful of salt; but as Mrs. Digby Scarlett, the rich woman, you will begin to live a new life, Ivy—a life of peace, sunshine, and love. For I do love you, little one, though I may express myself harshly at times. It is the knowledge that I am so far below you that makes me so.

"Come! Tell me that if I get a special license to-morrow, you will meet me and marry me; then we will leave the past behind us, and severing ourselves from all connection with—with the murdered man in the spinny, and obscure relations—only live for the future! Choose, Ivy, between the picture I have painted for you, or the dreary cell of a police-court and the shameful publicity that will follow!"

He paused, and with burning eyes and dilated nostrils waited for the girl by his side to answer him.

For a moment she was silent, carried away by the vehemence and passion of his pleading, and the prospect of the dreadful alternative that awaited her decision if it were not favourable.

She drew in her breath with a long-drawn sigh. If she could only forget the past, how much easier it would be—how much pain she would be spared!

Then, into the tumult of her thoughts, there came the picture of the unconscious form of Jack, the lover who had defended her from the insult of the man to whose wooing she was now half yielding, and there flooded into her heart a great glow of passionate tenderness for the boy she loved, though she might never see him again.

Was it possible, she wondered feverishly, to marry the man who inspired her with no other feeling but fear and hate, while her heart was bound up with another?

She looked round wildly, afraid to say the words that would bring disaster in their wake whichever form they took—whether acceptance or rejection!

"I—I—give me time," she murmured. "I cannot think now; my brain is in a whirl; this is so unexpected."

Digby Scarlett smiled. He almost fancied he had won, and the thought made him concede a point.

"I will give you five minutes," he said, "that will be ample time in which to make up your mind. Remember, your choice lies between myself and—the police! It rests with you whether you spend to-morrow evening in Bow Street cells, or at a hotel in Paris!"

She turned away, and gazed with unseeing eyes into the crowds of passing faces, that crossed and recrossed in an ever-recurring stream.

How to escape? How to frame the words that would satisfy this man and yet not implicate herself, was the question that kept reiterating in her brain.

Suddenly she uttered an exclamation, and made a sudden dart forward, but her arm was closely gripped by Digby Scarlett.

"Come! Your answer!" he said roughly. "Don't dare to play with me. In another moment I will summon that policeman, in whose society you will probably feel more at home than in mine!"

She turned a white face to him in which despair was largely written.

"How cruel you are! Do you consider it a manly thing to hound an innocent girl as you are doing? But since you have driven me to bay, I am forced to answer you. I will, on one condition, marry you, since it is, after all, only exchanging one gaoler for another," she said bitterly; "and that condition is that you tell me whether Jack Maitland is still—alive—or not? If he is—I cannot, even if I rest in a police cell, marry anyone else, for I love him! But if he is dead, then all men are alike to me, it matters not which one I marry!"

His dark, restless eyes flashed with a sudden rage, but he answered her glibly enough:

"Oh! I imagined you knew already; the poor chap died a week ago. It was in all the papers at the time."

Her eyes filled with a sudden mist, as she saw the sunset of her love, and the blow was doubly hard to bear because she heard it from the lips of the man whom she hated.

"Then I will marry you," she said slowly. "My address is——" She stopped suddenly. She could not give him her employer's address, that would be madness. She would instead give him the address of the room she had occupied in Bloomsbury. She had left no trail behind, and he would call only to find that the landlady was as much in the dark as himself.

"My address is," she went on, "18 Upper Guildford Street, Bloomsbury."

"I will go with you there," he said pleasantly. "We will take a hansom, and then can resume our conversation and discuss our marriage."

She shuddered, and, as he strolled towards a waiting hansom, threw a desperate glance round, that suddenly changed into an exclamation of startled joy, for coming towards her was the figure of the kindly man who had taken her into his house, and had been almost a father to her.

"Mr. Vivyan," she cried impulsively rushing towards him. "I want you! I want you!"

But the man to whom she appealed did not hear her cry. He was walking with that abstract look that betokens a mind wrapped in contemplation.

With a terrified glance the girl looked towards the man who held her liberty in his hands, and to her amazement saw that he had forgotten her existence for the time being, and was staring with a livid, frightened face, at the man to whom she had cried.

For a moment she paused, wondering at the strange expression on her enemy's face at the sight of the author, Mr. Vivyan.

Did he know him? she wondered. Or was he acquainted with the fact that she was Mr. Vivyan's secretary?

With a sudden bound she leapt into a passing hansom, and as she drove off, Digby Scarlett, roused from his strange abstraction, darted after her, with a savage exclamation, into the middle of the road, but the hansom had disappeared in the tide of traffic, and he was obliged to return to the pavement, or risk being run over.

"Anyway, I have her address," he muttered. "I will find her later. But that man! To see him, above all others, well-dressed, prosperous, and within a stone's throw of his—daughter! What does it mean? Except," and he shivered—"except bad luck for me!"

Then he followed swiftly the man whom he feared.

That same evening Digby Scarlett made a discovery and an appointment. The discovery was the address of the author, Vernon Vivyan; and the appointment was with a man named Steeve Lampit, the proprietor of a low doss-house down the river way, near Rotherhithe, who did shady deeds for a still more shady price.

THIRTIETH CHAPTER.

The Deed in the Dark.

When Ivy reached the "Retreat," her heart was in a flutter of fear lest she should have been followed by Digby Scarlett.

That he would do his utmost to trace her she knew only too well, and also feared that in his wrath at having been outwitted, he would give information to the police about her presence in London; or, on the other hand, he might have followed Mr. Vivyan, and acquainted him with the fact that his secretary was none other than the "wanted" Ivy Strange; and then once more she would be an outcast, the child of a criminal, and a pariah, branded by the bar-sinister of the broad arrow!

Digitized by Google

When Vernon Vivyan came into the room later, she started to her feet, eager to know the worst—that he had decided to dispense with her services there and then. But his face wore the same kindly expression, and in his voice there was the caressing deference it always had when he spoke to her.

She sighed with relief. For a little while longer then she had a roof over her head. Fate had staved off the blow this time.

"You look tired, Miss Lodge," he said. "I hope your journey to town has not knocked you up?"

"No, thank you, Mr. Vivyan," she replied simply. "I am not very tired."

"I am glad," he smiled, "for I wish you to preside at my dinner-table to-night; I have a guest coming."

"A guest?" she murmured, with frightened eyes and trembling lips. "Is it a lady?"

He shook his head. "No, Miss Lodge, you are the only lady I have spoken to for many years. It is a man whom I met quite recently. He has taken rather an interest in my first novel; and though I would prefer not to invite him here, I feel compelled to offer him some sort of hospitality; and as I belong to no club, the 'Retreat' is the only place to which I can ask him."

She made no response; a horrible dread was making her dumb with fear. Suppose this man was the one from whom she had fled earlier in the morning! Suppose when she descended into the dining-room she came face to face with Digby Scarlett!

She turned desperately to him. "Oh, you have not told me the name of—your guest, Mr. Vivyan," she murmured, forcing a smile to her lips. "I should like to know it."

"Do not be afraid, Miss Lodge," he said quickly. "He is no one who will need an unusual display of costumes. He is a Mr. Heath, from California, over here for a short time."

She breathed softly. How foolish it was to have imagined that it should be Digby Scarlett!

Later, when she entered the dining-room—a slim, girlish figure in black, with wide, violet eyes, and a waving abundance of copper-tinted hair—the man standing beside Vernon Vivyan started as though he had been confronted by a ghost.

"Let me introduce you to my secretary, Miss Lodge," his host said smilingly. "Miss Lodge, this is Mr. Ernest Heath."

The girl bowed silently, noting the shrewd, kindly face of the guest, lit by a pair of keen, blue eyes, and a humorous smile.

At dinner she was very quiet, listening to the two men discussing the different questions of the day; when suddenly the guest of the evening said something that sent the lights in the room whirling round and round in wild disorder, while a strange surging sound buzzed in her ears.

"I see, in the evening papers," Ernest Heath was saying, "that the police are confident of securing the girl concerned in the Melton murder mystery."

Vernon Vivyan raised his eyebrows. "I am afraid I have not read the subject up," he said carelessly. "Who is the girl?"

"Oh, that is not quite clear," said the other. "Her antecedents are at present under a cloud. But her name is Ivy Strange."

The tortured girl took up a glass of water, and put it to her burning lips. The horror of hearing her awful secret discussed so coolly made her want to shriek it aloud, and defy them to betray her! But she sat calmly in her seat, forcing herself to listen.

"Ivy Strange!" Vernon Vivyan murmured. "What a pretty name! And uncommon, too! By the way," he said, turning to his secretary, "your name is 'Ivy' also, is it not, Miss Lodge?"

She moved her lips, but they had grown stiff with fear, and no sound would come forth, except a faint murmur.

"Do you feel ill?" he said quickly. "If so, Miss Lodge, we will excuse you; you ought to go to your room and rest; you have had a long day."

(Continued overleaf.)

"A new preparation which bids fair to revolutionize medical science."

—Sheffield Independent.

"ANTIPON," the new permanent cure for corpulence, takes immediate rank amongst the greatest triumphs of modern science. It solves once and for all the question of the radical cure of obesity, one of the most troublesome of diseases—sometimes one of the most dangerous, owing to the constant menace of what is known as fatty degeneration of the heart.

This marvellous specific supplies medical men and the public with a strengthening remedy for over-stoutness, as opposed to the harmful and exhausting, but never permanent remedies hitherto employed. These so-called cures necessitated starving the body and undermining the constitution by cathartics, sweating, &c. To such crude and painful methods "Antipon" is diametrically opposed.

"Antipon" has a special action of its own. Whilst rapidly destroying and eliminating the excessive fat, both internal and subcutaneous, it acts at the same time as a wonderful tonic, increasing strength and vitality, bracing up the nervous system and giving back the energy and buoyancy of youth.

"Antipon" promotes a healthy, natural desire for wholesome food, strengthens the digestive organs and assists assimilation and nutrition. By thus perfecting the digestion it prevents a waste accumulation of fatty matter in the system. It also prevents a sluggish circulation by keeping the blood (enriched by the increased amount of nourishment) in a normal and healthy condition, so that the waste matter in the system is properly eliminated instead of being deposited by the blood in the tissues. Briefly the great loss of weight in unhealthy fat deposits is met by an increase of sound muscular tissue, greater nerve force, more sustained brain power, not to speak of the more regular functional activity of the vital organs.

The reductive capabilities of "Antipon" can be proved within a day and night of taking the first dose. From eight ounces to three pounds is the loss of weight in ordinary cases. Thereafter the daily diminution is sure and steady until complete cure. With the attainment of normal weight, elegance of figure, nicely proportioned limbs and improved facial outlines, the doses of "Antipon" may cease. No drastic rules as to food and drink are required; the improved appetite may be satisfied without stint.

"Antipon," a pleasantly tart liquid, contains no mineral or other harmful substances. The ingredients, independently investigated by several expert medical men, have been cordially approved, and sound practical tests have confirmed them in the opinion that "Antipon" fulfils all that is claimed for it. "Antipon" gives new life as well as a return to a beautiful shape. Without perfect health there is no physical beauty, and in giving back the one "Antipon" assures the other. Permanent elegance and sounder health are the priceless gifts conferred by a short and economical and pleasant course of "Antipon."

ANTIPON" can be had of Chemists, Stores, &c., price 2/6 and 4/6 per bottle, from stock or on order, or should any difficulty arise, may be obtained (on sending cash remittance), post free, under private package, direct from the Sole Manufacturers—

THE "ANTIPON" COMPANY,

13 BUCKINGHAM STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

She rose unsteadily to her feet, conscious of the keen scrutiny of those piercing blue eyes that watched her with a cynical smile, tearing away the veil from her innermost thoughts.

"Thank you," she murmured; "I feel rather faint—if you will excuse me." With a mechanical bow she went to the door, which was held open by Mr. Heath.

"I trust the effect of the—heat will soon pass off, Miss Lodge," he said politely; but his words sent a shiver through the girl.

When they were alone, the guest said quietly: "How long has Miss Lodge been with you, Vivyan?"

The other started. "Oh, a couple of weeks, nearly," he replied carelessly. "Why do you ask?"

Ernest Heath was silent for a time; many thoughts were passing through his brain.

Then aloud he said: "Oh, nothing, only she reminds me strangely of a cousin whom I last saw about her age—nearly twenty years ago now; but this girl is exactly like Maggie was before I went to California."

Vernon Vivyan started. "Maggie!" Strange that there should be yet another woman in the world with the same haunting eyes of his secretary! "Maggie——" Then he suddenly saw a red mist before his eyes, as a thought rose and shaped itself in his mind.

This man's name was Heath! He had not noticed it at first in the excitement of becoming famous, and the name was a common one. But "Maggie" might stand for "Margaret," and——

"Tell me," he said, lighting a cigar with a shaking hand; "what was the name of your cousin?"

"Margaret Heath—the same surname as my own," replied the other. "I heard she married afterwards. Then, when I came home the first time and called on the old aunt, I found her dead, and so lost all trace of Maggie's married name."

Vernon Viyvan was silent. He could have told the transatlantic rancher the latest details regarding his beautiful cousin of twenty years ago; but they would have been such details as would cause him to rise and revile the man who was his host—the man whose shame had been the means of killing two human souls!

"Well, I have much to do to-morrow," said his guest, after a while; "I shall look you up again after my visit north, Vivyan. It will only be for a few days."

"Where are you going?" said Vivyan, rising also.

"Up into Leicestershire, to visit a famous Manor, known as Maitland Manor," replied his friend. "But the odd thing is," he went on, "the Maitlands are the people who have since had so much trouble over the murder of the man in the spinny, and the missing girl, Ivy Strange, is a foundling they brought up. I am rather interested in Lady Maitland also."

Vernon Vivyan was silent. He had no interest in the history of the unknown Maitlands, who moved in a sphere far apart from his own. His thoughts were set on the strange coincidence that he should be entertaining the only relative of his dead wife, Margaret, and the agony it was to hear Ernest Heath dilating on possible likenesses.

As his guest strolled towards Surbiton station, he murmured aloud:

"That girl puzzles me. Her terror was so apparent, and she was so obviously afraid of me, that I almost believe that the secret the police are searching for is to be found in my friend's house. Her description tallies exactly with that of the missing girl, too."

In the meantime, Vernon Vivyan was reading a letter that had arrived by the last post. It was typewritten, and ran:—

The writer has a trinket belonging to your dead wife, Margaret Grant, and a photo of her baby girl. Both will be given to you if you will be outside the "Great Dane" Inn, Rotherhithe, at half-past eleven to-morrow night.

"How does this correspondent know my new name and address?" he wondered feverishly. "It must be someone who has watched me for a long time! God bless whoever it is, for giving me the chance of possessing something of my dead Margaret's and our child! I will go to-morrow!"

Pressing the paper to his lips, he murmured again: "It's a strange place for an appointment, but I will be there!"

* * * * *

The sky overhead was dark and murky, and the fresh breeze from the river blew keenly in the nostrils of the man who waited in the shadow of the "Great Dane" riverside inn at Rotherhithe.

Suddenly a step came along, and a tall, dark form stood irresolute outside.

"Mr. Vivyan?" whispered the man hoarsely. Then receiving a reply in the affirmative, he said quickly: "Come this way, sir. She doesn't like the glare of the public. She'll be lower down, near the wharf."

He hurried the visitor along by his arm, staving off impatient questions of the new-comer with grunts; and after a time the river came in sight, dark and turgid, lit by the red lights of sleeping barges.

Suddenly the man stopped with a cry, and tried to pull his arm out of the grasp of the taciturn ruffian by his side.

"Where are you taking me to?" he said quickly. "Tell me at once."

He stopped; another form had risen out of the gloom, and bore down upon them.

"What can I do for you, Mister?" he said, with a grin, "a cold bath, or——"

Flinging out his arm wildly, Vernon Vivyan struck the man nearest to him a blow between the eyes that sent him down like an ox. Then, before he had time to turn or cry out for help, a sudden crash descended on his head with a sickening thud. His hat was knocked off, and under the weight of the blow he staggered and fell on to his knees.

Then, as he tried to rise and meet his assailant, two strong arms gripped him round the waist as in a vice, and struggling, writhing, and panting, the two men rolled together towards the river.

(Another long instalment next week.)

How to Take and Fake Photographs.

By CLIVE HOLLAND.

Author of "Practical Hints on Photography," "The Artistic in Photography," &c., &c.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s., or post free 1s. 2d.

Some of the Chapters are:

Chap. I.—THE DARK ROOM.

Its size—Fittings—Stock of Chemicals—Various uses.

Chap. II.—CAMERAS, PLATES, and FILMS.

The choice of a camera—Shutters—Plates and their varieties—The various merits of plates and films, etc.

Chap. IV.—EXPOSURE.

Testing speeds of plates—Table of exposures—Plate speed table—Exposure hints—Don'ts, &c.

Chap. V.—DEVELOPMENT OF NEGATIVES.

Developers—Normal development—Development of over-exposed and under-exposed plates—Local development—Intensification and reduction of negatives—Retouching—Varnishing, &c, &c.

AT ALL RAILWAY BOOKSTALLS AND BOOKSELLERS, OR FROM THE BOOK PUBLISHER, 17 HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Official Tests for Deafness.

The various official investigations into the reported increase in the percentage of deaf people are well described in the last number of the Review of Ear, Nose, and Throat Diseases. The methods used in testing the hearing are also explained, and as they are simple, the reader is advised to apply them at once, for it is now becoming well known that a very large number of people are partially deaf without realising it. As even a slight defect in hearing may suddenly develop into a marked form of deafness, such conditions should be guarded against. The Review shows how this may be done, and to place the knowledge within the reach of all, the Editor will post a free copy to anyone sending name and address. With the Review there is also a Report Form, by means of which anyone can obtain free advice on any case of deafness, or ear, nose, or throat ailments. All communications should be addressed to the Editor, Drouet Institute, 10, Marble Arch, London, W. The Editor advises patients, however, when possible, to visit the Drouet Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are—in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultations.

Plain Women Become Beautiful.

Beautiful Women Intensify Their Beauty.

A Wonderful Book Free.

The Peralia Perfumery Co., of 73 Camden Street, North Shields, will send to every reader of SHORT STORIES mentioning this paper, and enclosing a penny stamp with their application, a wonderful booklet, entitled "Beauty's Boudoir." This book, which reveals many astounding secrets of immense importance to every woman, will be sent strictly under cover. Amongst the many items of information it tells how to remove in one night all Wrinkles, Crow's-feet, Blackheads, Facial Defects, &c. How to make the pimply, freckled face as fair as the lily. If the bust is undeveloped, you can learn how to develop it. If you are too short, how to increase your height. This marvellous book also deals with the hair and informs you how you can curl the hair and permanently keep it in curl without the use of curling irons; in fact, if you are interested in your personal appearance at all, we advise you to send 1d. stamp and your address in full, at once and the Peralia Perfumery Co. will forward you per return this charming book, which deals in a clear and explicit manner with many matters in which women of all ages are interested. There are some wonderful proposals in this book, and no lady reader of this paper can afford to miss this chance of gaining the valuable information contained therein. Address:—The Peralia Perfumery Co., Dept. 14, 73 Camden Street, North Shields.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

Tins, 3d. 6d. & 1/-

A good housekeeper knows

The "pink" of Jams is PINK'S.

PINK'S

JAMS

PUREST & NICEST.

DAILY EXPRESS

ONE HALFPENNY.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor
66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 26 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19
or by Deferred Payment System.
"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."
CATALOGUES GRATIS.
TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.
4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
30 Deansgate Arcade, Manchester 4 King Edward St. Leeds

2/- PER PAIR

LADIES' SUMMER Unshrinkable COMBINATIONS at 2/- the pair

We are offering an enormous purchase of Ladies' Elastic Ribbed, Woven Combinations at the astounding price of 2s. the pair. Sold by many Retail Stores at double the money. They are perfect in shape, beautifully finished, soft as silk. Ideal garments for summer wear.
Colours: Pink, White and Natural.

HIGH NECK SHORT SLEEVES

2 pairs for 3/10: Postage 4d. extra. 4 pairs for 7/6. State size required.
The Great FREE. Our "HOME SHOPPING BARGAIN BOOK."
T. & J. ROBERTS, Warehousemen, SHEFFIELD

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Digitized by Google

No Fear of Bashfulness.

ETHEL (who thinks her country cousin nervous): "Can't you find anything better to squeeze than a felt hat?" Country Cousin: "Wait a bit. I'm only reducin' my energy, for fear I might hurt you."

An Inspiration!

SHE (poetically): "With this golden bright sky, the sighing of the balmy zephyrs, and the far vista across the foamy waves, one can't but dream they are in sweetest Italy." He: "Good idea! Suppose we have macaroni for dinner!"

John Thought he Was a Model.

MRS. FOLEIGH: "Oh, John, the paper is offering a prize for a description of a model husband." Mr. Foleigh: "You want to have a try at it?" Mrs. Foleigh: "Yes, please." Mr. Foleigh: "All right. Just get the pen, ink, and paper and I'll dictate to you."

The Process was Unsatisfactory.

"YOUNG man," said a stern old professor to a student who had been charged with kissing one of his daughters. "Young man, don't get into that habit. You'll find that kissing is like eating soup with a fork." "How so, sir?" asked the student. "Because," answered the stern old professor, "you can't get enough of it."

Smart Husband, that.

"WELL, my dear," said he, as he was dressing, "I s'pose you were right when you told me last night that there were burglars in the house." "Why?" "Because all the money that was in my pockets when I went to bed is gone." "Well, if you'd been brave and got up and shot the wretch you'd have had your money this morning." "Possibly—but then I should have been a widower." She gave him back half his money.

A New Line of Defence.

"So you deny that you ever asked my client to marry you or that you promised to marry her?" queried the counsel for the plaintiff in a breach of promise case, with a comprehensive gesture and an air of surprised incredulity. "No, sir, I admit it," responded the defendant promptly. "You admit it," shouted the lawyer, leaping to his feet and casting a triumphant look about the court-room. "Yes, I admit it, but the conversation alluded to occurred on Sunday evening, and I believe contracts made on that day are void."

The Favour She Asked.

"PAPA, do you know this is my eighteenth birthday?" "Yes, my dear." "Papa, I want you to do me a great favour on my birthday," and the beautiful girl buried her glowing face on the paternal bosom. "And what is the favour my little girl wants?" "Papa, you have influence with the Town Council, haven't you?" "Well, yes, my dear." "Then have them move that gas-lamp away from in front of our gate." Thus it was that the fond father discovered that a daughter isn't a little girl always. She had a young man.

The Objective Case.

"IF I were to offer to marry you," said a particularly disagreeable young man to a pretty young lady, "in what case should I find you?" "In the objective," she sweetly replied.

Hadn't Time for Himself.

"OH, yes," she said, as they were conversing, "I have studied your character, and I think you are above the average of men." "I don't think much of myself," he answered. "Why not?" "Because I'm always thinking about you."

The Feelings were Chronic.

SHE (gushingly): "There are days when we seem more in unison with Nature than at other times; when our hearts seem to beat in accord with the sublime harmony of the universe. Have you ever noticed it?" He: "Indeed I have. It is always that way with me on pay day."

Taking No Risks.

HE (shortly after the introduction): "Excuse me, miss, but do you think you could ever love me if—well—if you should try?" She: "Well, I must say this is——" He: "Oh, don't be offended. It cost me more than £100 to find out whether the last one loved me or not, and I've got to economise, you know."

His Reason was Practical.

OFFICER'S WIFE (fondly): "Do you remember, John, how you used of an evening to hold my hand—my sweet little roseleaf you used to call it, you funny boy—for hours and hours. How silly, silly my old boy used to be!" Old Boy (grumpily): "Nonsense, Jane, don't be stupid. I was always practical and business-like. I did that just to keep you from the piano."

Risky Economy.

WIFE: "But, my dear, we can't afford to stay at home this summer." Husband (in surprise): "Good gracious, can't afford it? Why, we owe the butcher, the baker, the candle-stick maker, and everybody else, and haven't a farthing to pay them with." Wife: "Yes, but if they saw we couldn't afford to go away they would come down on us for the money, and we would have to go either into bankruptcy or starve to death."

Another Sort of Trial.

THEY had tried all the penny-in-the-slot machines on the pier, until at last they came to one that didn't respond to the magic bronze. "Look here, my man," said Crumbles to the pier attendant, "that machine is to try your weight; the next your strength; then your sight; and now I've put a penny in this thing, but I didn't see what it's for." "That, sir," replied the pierman; "oh, that's one to try your temper, sir." And it did.

A Ruse that Succeeded.

MISS JINKS was out walking with an admirer on each side. A storm came on, accompanied by lightning. Jones said he was frightened. Brown thought it a capital opportunity to show off his superior courage before the adored one. "What are you frightened at? I am as cool as can be." "Yes, I should not fear," replied Jones, "if you and I were alone, but I am afraid of Miss Jinks in this lightning, she is so attractive." Brown is still a bachelor, but Jones is not.

Got Him this Time.

MRS. DECOURCEY: "By the way, Pauline, as I passed the drawing-room last evening I heard you and Mr. Millions engaged in an animated discussion on some question. What was it about?" Pauline DeCourcey: "Why, you see, ma, he was trying to maintain that in spite of a short acquaintance it was a girl's duty to kiss her acknowledged lover." Mrs. DeCourcey: "Well, the idea! I never heard of such audacity. Of course you upset his argumentative fabric?" Pauline: "I did, ma. I convinced him in no time that it was the lover's duty to kiss the girl, and while he did it Johnny took the photo. Oh! he can't break away now!"

Digitized by Google

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says: There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

Neuralgia

TO CURE SICK HEADACHE.

Sick headache means an overtaxed stomach and a derangement of the digestive organs.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

have proved themselves a boon for removing that distressed feeling and discomfort. A dose will remove the immediate cause, and if repeated for a few days will enable your system to work normally.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheel, Bowden Brake or New Departure, Back Pedal Hub Brake, all Fittings.

For Cash or 12 monthly payments

Carr. Paid.

£8 8 0 ,, 15/10 each.
£9 0 0 ,, 14/8 ,,
£9 10 0 ,, 17/6 ,,
£10 5 0 ,, 19/3 ,,

All a Cyclist needs at lowest prices.

Trailers from £5 5 0, or 10 6 monthly. Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 100 illustrations, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. ("S.S." Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

ETIQUETTE FOR MEN.

A Book of Modern Manners and Customs.

Send 1s. 2d. to the Editor of "The Big Budget" for a copy of this indispensable guide to Correct Conduct.

PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Signs of Admiration.

How can a girl tell when young men admire her? "E. M. C." is sixteen, and knows very few of the opposite sex. Her parents are very strict, and do not allow her to go out much. There are several young men who look at her when they meet her out. But they do not try to get an introduction. Do they really admire her, or is it her fancy? "E. M. C." has been told several times that she is pretty.

* * * * *

It is a way with young men, "E. M. C.," to look at a pretty girl. They do not always mean that they really admire her, not as would-be lovers, that is to say. If you are pretty, you will have to endure the gaze of the opposite sex. It is generally those who have the least intentions, too, that stare the most at a girl.

* * * * *

You should avoid anything like staring back at these young men, as no pretty girl should cheapen herself. One of these days, the right kind of young man will see you and admire you, and, depend on it, if he is really worth anything, he will find some other way of getting to know you than trying to attract your attention outdoors.

❦❦❦

An Awkward Position.

"JACK" writes to tell me a curious example of parental interference. Some years ago, a new manager came to his people's business, and brought his family with him. "JACK" fell in love with the eldest daughter, and all went well until a few months back, when an unpleasantness took place between the manager and "JACK'S" principal. "JACK'S" people now wish him to break off his engagement with the girl, and are trying their utmost to get her to consent to doing so. If "JACK" persists, he would be unable to bring his wife to meet his relations, and runs the risk of being "cut off with a shilling."

* * * * *

As you say, "JACK," it is unfair to vent the unpleasantness with the girl's father on you and your sweetheart. But the case is one which calls for delicate handling. It would not do to appear to be taking the part of one who has quarrelled with your own people. I advise you to allow matters to lapse for a while between you and your sweetheart—at any rate while there is still any heat between the parties.

* * * * *

Don't break the engagement off, but agree not to see each other for a while. In course of time the incident will be forgotten and probably the girl's father will have gone to live elsewhere. Then, there would be no harm in your bringing about a social reconciliation, even if business relations ceased between the father and your relatives. It would, however, be unwise to fly in the face of those to whom you are bound by interest.

Going to a Wedding.

YES, "H. G.," if you accept an invitation to a wedding it is usual to take or send a wedding-present. You say the engaged couple are only slight acquaintances of yours. Well, in that case, if you cannot afford a good present I think it would be better to send your congratulations by telegraph, or letter, and not to be present in person.

❦❦❦

A Choice of Two Loves.

"DEPRESSED" is thirty-six, and engaged to a girl of seventeen. Lately he has met another lady, this time aged twenty-seven, and, since meeting her, finds that his former love is dwindling somewhat. He is becoming passionately fond of the older lady. Should he break off the engagement with the first one?

* * * * *

I cannot imagine a case where an engagement could be better broken off. The second lady is nearer your own age, probably more experienced, and is therefore more likely to make you a good wife than a young girl. Besides, it would be cruel to the latter to continue engaged to her if your affection has gone. However, I strongly disapprove of your changeable views, and only hope that if you do break off the engagement the young lady will be the gainer, and will meet someone nearer her own age, and of a less fickle disposition.

❦❦❦

A Too Poetic Lover.

"RHODA" suffers from a too poetic sweetheart. All his love letters are couched in verse, and though he pays "RHODA" some very beautiful compliments, she thinks they would be more sincere if uttered in ordinary prose. What do I think about it?

* * * * *

Well, if I were "RHODA," I should certainly grow a little weary of love-letters in verse, especially if the verse were not particularly good or original. If "RHODA'S" sweetheart wants her to take compliments to herself in poetic form, he had much better present her with marked copies of the great poets. When he wishes to say the right things himself, it would be far more genuine to express them in ordinary prose. If I were "RHODA" I should ask her lover to try his hand at commonplace letter-writing to see how he got on, though he might, if he liked, drop into poetry occasionally when so inclined.

❦❦❦

Should Lovers Write About Business?

"BELLA" has a love-letter trouble of quite a different character. Her swain is a prosperous shopkeeper in a provincial town. He writes to "BELLA" every day, but instead of poetic raptures, he tells her all about the day's business, what kind of customers have called, how much they have ordered, and what business troubles he has had. "BELLA" asks me if I think he ought to tell her so much about business matters, and if I think a lover ought to write in this way?

* * * * *

I admire "BELLA'S" young man far more than the poetic type. After all, their future happiness must depend much on his success in business, and it is only right "BELLA" should know the ins and outs, so as to be able to give her help and advice when they are married.

* * * * *

I know one tradesman who owed his success in building up a large business entirely to the interest taken by his young and pretty wife in the concern. She regularly opened all the letters, and having a keen woman's insight, lifted many a load from her husband's shoulder, and by sheer tact and good sense brought about many a big order. Let "BELLA" imitate her example and show as much interest as she can in her future husband's business affairs.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, Fetter Lane, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"No Better Food."

DR. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

Cocoa

"I HAVE NEVER TASTED COCOA THAT I LIKE SO WELL."

Sir CHAS. CAMERON, C.B., M.D.,
Ex-President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland.

ASK FOR THE

'FIVE BOYS' MILK CHOCOLATE

The Milk Chocolate "par excellence."

BRITISH MILK AND BRITISH LABOUR.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"QUICKLIT"

THE ONLY PERFECT

FIRE LIGHTER

BREAKFAST READY IN 5 MINUTES.

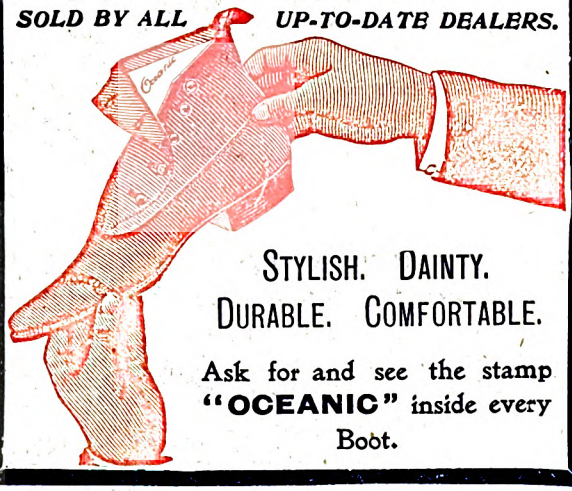
THE

"OCEANIC."

THE UP-TO-DATE

HALF-GUINEA BRITISH BOOT.

SOLD BY ALL UP-TO-DATE DEALERS.



STYLISH. DAINTY.
DURABLE. COMFORTABLE.

Ask for and see the stamp "OCEANIC" inside every Boot.

A GROCER SAYS

there's nothing worth a FIG for cleaning brass scales compared with

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

Guaranteed free from Acid. Produces quickly a lasting brilliancy.

Manufacturers—

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 761.] Week ending August 1st, 1903. [Price One Penny.

"YOUR WIFE IS HERE—GAGGED AND BOUND AND IN OUR POWER!"

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "Twice-crossed Fates." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., says: There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

Neuralgia

HAVE YOU SEEN IT?

The Magazine with the Japanese Cover.

IT'S THE BRIGHTEST AND BEST OF THE LADIES' MAGAZINES.

. . IT IS THE . .

Lady's Magazine

August Issue Now on Sale.

SIXPENCE.

The Element of success.

"My system of business is a strong system and a successful system, simply because it entirely strikes out all risk of dissatisfaction. Sometimes advertisements exaggerate and misrepresent. Sometimes the first appearance of goods is deceitful. Sometimes a bargain entered into hastily is repented of afterwards. My system has struck out all these risks. I receive and execute from ten to fifteen thousand orders every week, and in every case I send the goods absolutely subject to customer's approval, who, if not entirely satisfied after a full and critical inspection, is quite at liberty to send them back and the transaction falls through.

If you are completely satisfied with the goods when received, payment may be made by Easy Monthly Instalments as per scale, or, if you prefer to pay in one sum you will be entitled to select a valuable Bonus Present from Illustrated List sent with goods."

"I PROVIDE EVERYTHING."

SEND A POST CARD FOR ANY OF MY DEPARTMENTAL CATALOGUES

POST FREE. (MENTION NUMBER OF CATALOGUE REQUIRED).

1. Watches. All my well-known Watch Specialities fully illustrated and described. My Watch Department is the Largest Watch-Sales Concern in the World.
2. Tools and Machinery. Thousands of illustrations. Every known Tool and Machine is supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
3. Furniture. Every Furnishing requirement is illustrated. My System of Furnishing by Easy Instalments is fully explained.
4. Mantles & Costumes. A beautiful Album of the Fashions of the Season.
5. Gent's Tailoring. This Stylish Department is splendidly equipped, and is probably the Largest Clothing Business in Great Britain.
6. Boots and Shoes. Beautifully Illustrated. A Splendid Choice of the Newest Ideas in Foot Wear. Contractor to His Majesty's Government.
7. Bookselling Department. Catalogue describes a vast assortment of Standard and Current Literature.
8. Sheffield Cutlery and Plate. The produce of my own Factories illustrated and fully described. Hotel and Shipping Orders a Speciality.
9. Glass, China, Lamps and Stoves. Dinner and Tea Services, Toilet and Bedroom Ware, Lamps, Stoves, etc.
10. Clocks. Every known style and make supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
11. General Draperies, etc. Dress Goods, Blankets, Sheets, Furs, Ladies' Outfitting, Babies' and Children's Clothing, etc.
12. Gold Jewellery and Diamonds. Engagement and Wedding Rings, Bracelets, Brooches, and all kinds of Gold Ornaments, fully illustrated and described.
13. General Fancy Goods. Bags, Umbrellas, Albums, every kind of Leather Goods for Wedding Presents and Home Use.
14. Cameras and Optical Goods. Hundreds of Designs by the most reliable makers.
15. Bicycles and Domestic Machinery. Cycles of all kinds, Mail Carts, Perambulators, Washing and Wringing Machines, Sewing and Knitting Machines, Knife Cleaning Machines, etc.
16. Musical Department. Pianos, Organs, and every known Musical Instrument supplied on Easy Payment Terms.
17. Army and Navy. A Catalogue representing all kinds of Goods required by all grades of the Services.
18. Colonial Department. A comprehensive illustrated Book which deals with the requirements of customers abroad, and quotes Special Cash Discount for Shipping Orders.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. Write for terms and particulars.

J. G. Graves.

69 DIVISION STREET, SHEFFIELD.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 761.] Week Ending August 1st, 1903. [One Penny.

TWICE-CROSSED FATES.

The Story of a "Boy and Girl" Friendship, and what it Meant at a Strange Crisis in a Woman's Life.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

Crossing the First.

"You know that we are having a visitor to-night, Dallas?"

"No, Mrs. Chaloner."

Dallas East turned from the verandah-rail upon which she had been leaning. She was a tall, graceful brunette, with a quick, almost haughty glance, and a clever, thin-lipped mouth. Her short skirts and the brown locks, caught back from her temples with ribbon, were those of a girl still in the schoolroom. But there was something in her shrewd, sensitive, clear-cut features that stamped them with a look of womanhood. They bore the lines of habitual reserve, even of resentment.

Mrs. Chaloner leant back among her cushions and rocked indolently in the bent-wood lounge-chair that held both her and them.

She had laid down her novel, and the afternoon sunshine stole in at a corner of the verandah to illuminate the carefully-waved grey hair, regular white teeth, and wrinkled, yellowish complexion, as if they had been under the theatrical limelight.

"Sir Francis Brunton," she said, "is coming down from Westminster with Mr. Chaloner for the week-end."

"Oh!" answered Dallas, gazing abstractedly out over the green lawns that, shaded by a great old tree or two, swept away to the edge of the silver Thames; "he has been here quite often lately. But you would scarcely know he was about the place. What with his fishing and his Parliamentary papers, he doesn't seem to have a thought to spare for ordinary mortals and their doings."

A slow smile contracted her companion's acute, selfish countenance.

"That's where you're wrong, Dallas," she observed. "Sir Francis has had a good many thoughts to spare for somebody—and that somebody no less a person than yourself."

"Me!" exclaimed Dallas, and added disdainfully, "Oh, I suppose I get on his nerves. I do on most people's."

Mrs. Chaloner rocked calmly. "You do indeed," she retorted, "but it is not Sir Francis' nerves you have contrived to affect, but his heart. He has spoken to Mr. Chaloner about you—amazing as it seems, he is genuinely smitten with you—he wants you to be Lady Brunton."

Dallas stood as if turned to stone.

"Lady Brunton," she repeated. "He wants me to—to marry him! Oh," she added hastily, "I—I don't love him; I—I've never taken enough notice of him to like or dislike him. And he's ever so much older than I am."

"As thirty-eight is to eighteen," said the other; "but no matter, I was sure you would look at it in that light. That is why I told Mr. Chaloner to explain to Sir Francis that I thought it wise to inform you of his proposal myself. There are several considerations that you ought to have a chance of weighing before you commit yourself, in your usual impulsive fashion, against the offer."

The younger woman knitted her brows. "I suppose you are going to remind me," she said hotly, "that I am a pauper on your bounty?"

Mrs. Chaloner winced. "I am going to do nothing of the sort," she rejoined, "I am only going to point out to you that neither Mr. Chaloner nor I are able to provide you with a dowry, and that, should we die before you marry, you will be penniless. Every shilling we have passes to a distant cousin."

She regarded tolerantly the pale, proud face of Dallas East.

"Of course," she continued, "it is not your fault or ours that your mother's property barely realised sufficient for your education and upbringing. Women should never dabble in business; your mother had quite an absurd idea of what her investments were worth. Though she was my friend I must say that she was shockingly deficient in common-sense, or, for instance, she would never have married your father."

The listener bit her lip, and her brown fingers caught nervously at each other.

Mrs. Chaloner rose—the sun was inconveniencing her.

"If you accept Sir Francis," she said, "your future will be secure. You will have wealth, position, a title, and a husband who is embarked already upon a distinguished political career. If you were anything else but what you are—a sentimental, self-willed child—I should have come to you and congratulated you on the astonishing piece of good luck that has brought a future Cabinet Minister to the feet of a dowerless schoolgirl. As it is, I do my duty in warning you of the folly and ingratitude you are quite capable of committing in refusing him."

Dallas East confronted her critic, her eyes blazing, her limbs rigid.

"Have you finished?" she said fiercely.

Mrs. Chaloner shrugged her shoulders.

"Yes," she replied, "and if your expression does not belie your thoughts, Dallas, you had better not begin."

With which dexterous thrust she stepped through one of the French windows into the drawing-room behind her. Dallas watched her with a hard, stern anger.

"It's true," she murmured. "I am a pauper! All I have is myself, and so I must sell myself or go on sponging on people who make my existence odious to me. Oh, why wasn't I born where I could have learnt to earn my own

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

living, instead of having to stand mute out of an intolerable gratitude and hear my father and mother insulted!"

A sob choked her utterance, and descending hurriedly the verandah steps, she darted across the lawn, to thread the winding pathways of the riverside garden, and at last to fling herself down in a grassy corner sheltered by tall privet-hedges.

She lay thus for some time, and then a ripple of clear, bird-like notes fell on her ear. They were too melodious for the voice of any feathered songster, and the air was an operatic one, given with a multitude of delicate variations. The notes were those of a flute, played as that abused instrument is but rarely played out of a great orchestra.

Dallas started up on to her knees, brushing back her brown locks. The music came from the other side of the hedge; she sprang to her feet, went to the leafy wall, and putting her fingers into her mouth, whistled expertly.

A moment more and the musician had leapt through a gap in the bushes, his flute in one hand, a dewy damask rose in the other. A slight, boyish, hatless figure, grey-eyed, and with crisp, brown curls, his grave yet handsome face showed that shy sensibility which goes to form the composition of the true musician.

"I'm so glad I've found you," he said. "I've been playing up and down the hedge for an hour or more. See, there is another of my roses out." And he gave her the splendid scented flower.

Dallas put it to her nostrils and stood with drooped head, drinking deep draughts of the odour.

"Thank you, Kenneth," she murmured, "it is very, very beautiful, and they are larger and darker this year. The bush is improving."

The flute-player paused, watching her. "That is because it is blossoming for you," he said. "Do you know, Dallas, it is just a year to-day since we first spoke to one another over the fence? We have known each other for a whole year."

"A year," repeated the girl slowly. "How time flies! But I don't think I know you all the same, Kenneth; you appear and disappear at the gap in the fence as if you had the gift of becoming invisible. If it wasn't that I could see your house from my bedroom window I should fancy it was all an enchanted wood on the other side, and that you were a fairy prince disguised as a wandering musician."

The flute-player shook his head, frowning. "There is nothing to know," he rejoined, "except that I am Kenneth Haviland, an invalid, living alone with my nurses and tutor. I am ordered to make no friends, I wish to make none, I have none that I wish you to meet."

He broke off suddenly; she had raised her own head and he had seen her pale, tear-stained features.

"So they have been at you again," he commented gloomily. "What a shame—what a cruel shame!"

Dallas tried to smile. "Oh, it's not all that bad," she replied, "not this time. They really imagine they are trying to do me a service. What do you think—there's somebody wants to marry me!"

Kenneth Haviland had dropped his instrument. He bent and picked it up. When he spoke his voice was low and unsteady.

"Is there?" he said.

Dallas nodded, still inhaling the perfume of the rose.

"Yes," she answered, "there is someone rich, titled, not very old, and, they say, awfully in love with me. He has asked my guardian about it, and he's coming to-day, I suppose, to pop the question."

Dallas laughed a trifle extravagantly. The other was fingering the stops of his flute.

"What do you think I ought to do about it?" she continued; "you're the only friend I've got, Kenneth. You know how I'm situated. Ought I to stay and be a pauper on the Chaloners' bounty or marry a man I don't love?"

Kenneth Haviland stooped over his instrument, hiding his face. "I'd rather you didn't ask me, Dallas," he said.

Dallas sighed.

"You are my friend," she retorted, "and you ought to help me. I've got to make up my mind at once. Heaven knows I can't be much worse off than I am with Mrs. Chaloner always reminding me of my pauperism, and Mr. Chaloner scowling over the hotel-bills when we go away."

The flute-player looked up. "What—what is he like," she was asked, "this man they want you to marry?"

Dallas considered. "Oh," she said reflectively, "very nice, nicer than I have quite realised, I fancy. He's a member of Parliament, not young, but not old, to be as successful as he has been. He's dark and tall, clean-shaven, and rather legal-looking. His eyes are blue and kind, and he's very good-tempered and fond of fishing. That's all, I believe, except that he's very rich."

Kenneth Haviland screwed and unscrewed his instrument. He had long, white, delicate hands, like those of an actress.

"You—you don't love him?" he said, in a low tone.

"I don't love anyone," confessed Dallas simply. "I'd rather have a friend like you, Kenneth, than all the husbands under the sun."

A sort of shudder ran over Kenneth Haviland. "I wish you hadn't said that, Dallas," he exclaimed; "I'm not fit to be your friend. If you knew me as I am you would hate me."

"What nonsense!" cried Dallas; "I do know you. I don't know much about you, but that's a different thing. If I didn't trust you, would I ask you what I ought to do?"

The same singular species of shudder passed over the flute-player. "Do?" he said huskily. "Do whatever will make you happy."

He stopped—a harsh voice from the other side of the fence was calling him by his name. He held out his hand. Dallas took it—he had never shaken hands with her before.

"Good-bye," he added, "I shan't see you again. I'm going away—that was what I wanted to tell you."

Dallas cried out in dismay, but he motioned to her to be silent, and with a convulsive grasp of her soft fingers, sprang into the gap in the hedge.

"Good-bye," he said; "I'm glad you called me your friend. I hope you will be happy." And he vanished without a second backward glance into the depths of the plantation beyond.

Puzzled, Dallas retraced her steps through the garden of her own house. The mystery that had always hung about her next-door neighbour seemed suddenly to have acquired a darker, colder shadow—something more than the shadow of the abrupt farewell that had severed their youthful friendship.

The summer breeze dried a tear or two on Dallas' cheek, but she was very sad—sadder than when she had come out for the "good cry" that the sound of Kenneth Haviland's flute had interrupted.

She halted in her abstracted sauntering and looked up. Someone was walking beside her—someone with clear blue eyes, a kindly, "legal" countenance, and a mouth whose firm, quizzical lines were unwontedly nervous.

"Good—good evening, Sir Francis," she said, and paused. Her companion paused too, and drew a long breath.

"Dallas," he began hesitatingly, "Mrs. Chaloner has—has said something to you, hasn't she? I'm afraid it must have startled you. But I have seen for some time that you are not happy here. Forgive my putting it so bluntly."

"It's the truth," observed Dallas, wondering why she had never noticed how bright and kind his eyes really were and how caressing his grave, strong tones could sound.

"Yes," he said, "my poor, lonely little Dallas, it is the truth. Do you think that you could let me try to make you a little happier, Dallas? I am not so old as you may imagine me, dear, and I have a young heart in my breast, or I had, for you have stolen it from me. Dallas, won't you give me yours instead?"

Dallas felt a thrill of power that fluttered her waking womanhood. The man before her had grown pale and the hand extended towards her was trembling slightly. She knew suddenly what it was to be loved, and her lonely heart stabbed her with a bitter pang.

"I—I am very selfish," she said unsteadily, "I—I never thought about loving you, Sir Francis, but—but I do want someone to love me."

Digitized by Google

Francis Brunton put his arms about her.

"And you will let me be that someone?" he murmured; "you will let me try to make your life better worth living, you will let me try to win, perhaps, a little of your love?"

Dallas, mastered by his tenderness and her own solitariness, allowed her head to sink upon his breast. She was sobbing violently.

That night, when she was alone in her room, she opened the window and looked forth at the silent night and the peaceful river. There were no lights in the neighbouring house—an unusual thing, for Kenneth had pointed out to her once the window of his "den," and it, at all events, was seldom unilluminated after dusk.

The perfume of rose-leaves came to her nostrils. She turned and saw that the rose he had given her lay where she had placed it some hours earlier, on her toilet-table. She picked it up. A gem on her finger—a fine diamond in a man's ring—caught the light and glittered. It was Sir Francis Brunton's—he had put it on her finger till he could replace it with a more fitting sign of betrothal.

Slowly Dallas fingered the blossom in her hands—the petals broke loose from the stem, a scented heap in her hollowed palm. She scattered them into the darkness beyond her window and shut the casement.

Crossing the Second.

"Do you know, little woman, I'm afraid I neglect you shamefully. I promised you you should never be lonely after you were married—a pretty way I keep my promise."

Francis Brunton put down his coffee-cup and glanced at the figure on the other side of the dainty tête-à-tête table. The subdued talk and glitter and the rippling orchestral music of the dinner-room in the newest and smartest London hotel restaurant surrounded them, but a friendly pillar, incircled with palms, screened the small table and the two diners.

Dallas smiled—she had been watching her husband's thoughtful face. Francis Brunton was three years older than when, in a certain riverside garden, he had asked her a momentous question, but he looked three years younger.

When he laughed, by comparison with his former grave self, he seemed almost boyish. Dallas had become a woman—in her handsome dinner-gown and diamonds, a rarely beautiful and imperial woman.

"Was that what you were pondering?" she said. "How foolish! You know that I am very happy—very, very happy."

"Are you?" murmured her husband, and he leant to gaze into her bright face.

Dallas' eyes answered for her.

"Of course I am," she said. "I like to watch you climbing up—up—up, with people wondering at you and admiring you, and know all the time that only I have the key of your heart. I am a very insignificant person, I know, but it makes me feel proud. When they made you Home Secretary, I had to snub you every day for a week, to show you that I wasn't afraid of you—don't you remember?"

Francis Brunton clasped his wife's hand under cover of a loaded epergne; they were lost to the crowd of well-dressed diners about them. She patted his fingers caressingly, and looked at a jewelled watch set in the bracelet at her wrist.

"You mustn't stop flirting here with me," she said, "or something will go wrong at the House and the Opposition paper will write nasty little paragraphs about the absence of the Home Secretary. I am going to drop in at the Accringtons' and then on to the Damers' for supper. Another late sitting for you, I suppose—never mind, the session will soon be over and then——"

"Then for Nice once more," said Francis Brunton, rising. "Heigho, I wish I could turn the clock back and have our honeymoon over again."

"And have to re-live the last three years," observed Dallas saucily. "No, thank you, dear, we might miss the Home Office on the way."

Her husband frowned. "Just at the moment," he confessed, "I believe I shouldn't be sorry. I hate this recurring problem of 'to hang or not to hang?'"

Dallas sighed. "You mean that Glasgow murder," she said. "Yes, but, after all, dear, you are guided by what the judge and the Crown lawyers think."

The Home Secretary put her cloak about her shoulders.

"I know," he answered, "but the responsibility is mine. I am tempted to be merciful, but the judge is adverse and so are my other advisers. The fellow shot the policeman, it is true, but the wound was not in a necessarily vital part and only proved fatal by complications. And there was something heroic in the stand he made that his companions might escape. I should like to save him, but it is unquestionably a dangerous precedent, since the police must be protected in the exercise of their duties."

"I don't see," said Dallas, woman-like, "that it's any use being Home Secretary if you can't please yourself."

Francis Brunton smiled sadly. "One has only a sort of casting-vote," he replied. "Come along, little woman, don't let my worries afflict you."

He donned his crush-hat, and, her hand upon his arm, led her to her carriage. Ten minutes later he was alighting from a hansom in Palace Yard, and she was sweeping up the great staircase at Accrington House.

Lady Brunton had become socially one of the best-liked and one of the most unfeignedly respected of young matrons. Her frank good-nature, her shrewd common-sense, her quick personal pride, and, above all, the "grand passion" that existed between her and her popular husband, had opened for her many a door that stands closed to the merely rich and smart.

"See, there is another of my roses out." And he gave her the splendid scented flower.

Digitized by Google

It was late when her carriage stopped at her own door in a quiet street off St. James'. As she descended from the luxurious brougham she looked up at the neighbouring clock tower and sighed—the light at its summit showed that the Commons were still sitting.

A footman opened to her, and she went on upstairs to her boudoir; most of her household were already asleep, for her rules were those of a considerate and intelligent mistress.

The door of the boudoir stood ajar and the apartment was lighted. Concluding that her maid had heard her arrival, and preceded her to the room, Dallas passed in.

The door closed behind her, swiftly, noiselessly, and she felt herself seized from behind. A gag was thrust into her mouth, a silk handkerchief bound over it, her wrists were fastened, and she was partially released. Her cloak had dropped from her shoulders, her fettered hands were still held by her assailants. They were two men—both vigorous, roughly-dressed, and masked—from upper lip to forehead.

She regarded them steadfastly—supposing them to be burglars. Then she noticed that nothing was disarranged in the room, no drawers or cases stood wide to suggest the rapid expert rifling of the modern cracksman. Her maid, too, a pleasant English girl, sat gagged and bound in a chair—pale and terrified.

One of her assailants—the taller—spoke to Dallas quietly.

"You are Lady Brunton," he said, "take it coolly—we hope not to have to do you any harm. But if, for our own purposes, we have to take that muffler off your mouth, remember that a cry or a call will mean your instant death." And he showed her a long, keen dagger.

Dallas shivered.

"Come," he added, loosing his own grasp upon her wrist and shoulder, and passing before her and his companion into the adjoining apartment. It was a small writing-room that Francis Brunton had had fitted up and comfortably furnished in order that, when working at night, as he had been often compelled to during the three years that had slipped away in arduous political labour, he might be near his wife. There was a wall-telephone in a corner, affording a means of communication between husband and wife during late sittings at the House.

The chief of the masked men approached the telephone and rang up. The number that he gave was a familiar one to Dallas—that of the members' telephone at the House of Commons.

"Will you ask Sir Francis Brunton to come to the telephone?" he said, when the connection had been made. "Lady Brunton wishes to speak to him."

There was a pause and the three waited.

"Yes?" said the man at the telephone suddenly; "is that Sir Francis Brunton?"

Another pause.

"Sir Francis Brunton," went on the masked stranger at the instrument, "I am speaking to you from the room adjoining your wife's boudoir. Her life depends upon your silence and self-control. Remain where you are and listen to me."

He stopped an instant—an instant only.

"Your wife is here," he said, "gagged and bound and in our power, but uninjured—as yet. You will give me your word of honour as an English gentleman that John Howland, now lying under sentence of death at Glasgow, for the murder of a policeman, will be reprieved. If you refuse, on your return here you will find your wife stabbed to the heart."

Dallas, overpowering her guardian, sprang forward. The realisation of her husband's agony had given her an irresistible strength. But it passed as quickly as it had come. The man at the telephone seized and held her.

"Let him hear your voice," he commanded, "and I swear to you, if you scream or cry, I will lay you dead at my feet."

He set the blade of his dagger to her bosom and his comrade took off the bandage and removed the gag. The other motioned to the telephone. Dallas put her lips to the mouthpiece; the other still had the receiver to his ear.

"Darling," she said, "don't think of me; do what—what is right."

She was dragged back and regagged, an oath echoing in her ear.

"Something's wrong," exclaimed the taller of her captors, snatching up the momentarily-relinquished ear-piece, "he screamed out."

The speaker listened intently and then started back. "Someone says he's fainted," his ally was told; "the chance has missed fire. We must carry her off and work it that way."

Dallas wrenched herself free and turned to bay. But her hands were bound behind her and she could not get at the gag in her mouth. She sprang to the bell, but the man with the knife intercepted her. His companion, who had remained mute throughout the whole singular episode, stepped between.

"No more of this," he said; "I'm sick of it, do you hear?"

His voice was strangely familiar—Dallas racked her brains to identify the stern, tremulous tones. But there was no time—the two men had grappled angrily. The younger man staggered back out of the fierce, silent struggle; he had wrenched the dagger from the elder, but his mask had been disarranged and it fell to the ground. Dallas gasped—the face revealed was that of her one-time friend and confidant, Kenneth Haviland!

He came towards her, his face white and his eyes drooping.

"Forgive me," he faltered, "I didn't recognise you at first; I did not know it was Brunton they—they wanted you to—to marry. I—I—it was only bluff—a—a mad idea, but we wouldn't have hurt you."

Dallas shrank away as he advanced.

He stopped, wincing.

"You can't understand," he said, "the man they are going to hang is my father. I hate him—he brought me up to be a thief and a forger, but I couldn't stand by and let them hang him. He—he held the police at bay that I might escape."

His companion flung himself upon the speaker. Far off there was the sound of wheels and hoofs—a wild, mad gallop such as seldom or never breaks the night quiet of the London streets.

"Away, you fool," Kenneth Haviland was told; "we're tracked—that's coming here."

He threw open a second door to the room and darted out. Kenneth Haviland stayed to loosen the cord about Dallas' wrists and to snatch the gag from her mouth.

"Forgive me," he said, and was gone.

A moment or two later, Francis Brunton, panting and dishevelled, sprang into his wife's boudoir, to find Dallas, half distracted with pity and anxiety, calling his name into the transmitter of the telephone. He caught her to him, and, strained to his breast, she contrived, between the suffocating sobs and shuddering sighs of a nervous collapse, to tell him what had happened.

"His son," he murmured slowly, "poor lad, poor lad!—my darling, what is the matter?"

A sudden sharp cry—half scream, half exclamation—had broken from his wife's lips. Francis Brunton's head—but a few hours before a mass of crisp, dark curls—was snow-white.

* * * * *

The Home Office reprieved John Howland, alias Haviland, and a window giving on a flat roof from an upper landing of the house in St. James' was closed with iron bars. Through it Kenneth and his companion had entered that night on their mad errand.

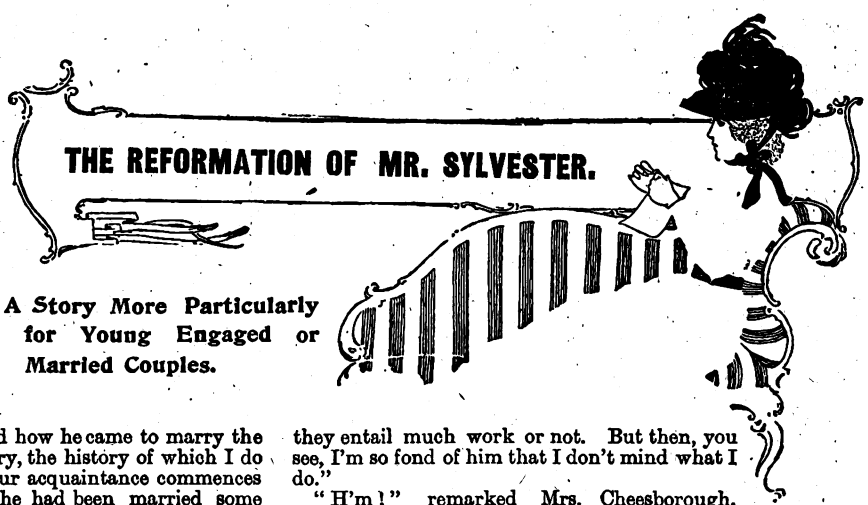
What he had told her was too true. The Haviland gang had been responsible for a brilliant series of international forgeries extending over years. Of those forgeries Kenneth had been the actual executor.

Trained from youth to the science and art of forgery, and kept in seclusion that he might practise it, his soft, woman-like hands had achieved some of the most marvellous imitations that ever harassed European and American commerce.

He and his more resolute companion—the practical chief and organiser of the gang—succeeded in effecting their escape beyond the reach of extradition laws. Nor was Dallas sorry. She will always pity him—except, perhaps, when she looks at her husband's handsome white head.

R. Norman Silver.

Digitized by Google



THE REFORMATION OF MR. SYLVESTER.

A Story More Particularly for Young Engaged or Married Couples.

By the way, this is not exactly a story, or a romance, or anything of that sort, but it is simply a history in which a large moral is to be found.

Hugh Sylvester was handsome; that fact was undeniable. And before he had married his pretty wife he had been quite indispensable at every fête, soirée, garden party, and dance. In fact, they made of Hugh Sylvester quite a little tin god, and as time went on he grew to regard himself in such a light. Now this was a great pity, for he was one of the best of fellows, if only his friends would not try to spoil him.

How he escaped the clutches of various matchmaking mothers and how he came to marry the girl he loved, is quite another story, the history of which I do not propose to set down here. Our acquaintance commences with Mr. Hugh Sylvester after he had been married some months.

The Sylvesters occupied a flat in the north of London. It contained one dining-room, one living room, one odd room, a scullery, and two bedrooms. In fact, it was one of the latest triumphs of the builder's desire to economically benefit young married couples. The locality, too, was a very nice one—on the verge of the countryside and yet within easy reach of town.

Mr. Sylvester's salary, whilst not large, was quite sufficient for comfort and the swelling of a bank account. In addition to all these advantages, Hugh and Madge Sylvester were very much in love with one another. Then, one naturally says, what more do they want?

There was, however, a flaw in the setting which did not appear until just about the time when we make the acquaintance of the Sylvesters.

The origin of the said flaw lay, of course, in that failing of Hugh Sylvester which I have just chronicled. He had set himself up on a pinnacle, or rather it was the doing of other people, and whilst deeply in love with his wife, he had grown to regard her as—well, just as someone belonging to him who would do all he required and worship him into the bargain.

I do not think he was actually very conceited, but the homage and attention he had received before he was married had given him a remarkably good opinion of himself.

Thus it became apparent to Mrs. Sylvester that Mr. Sylvester was not quite all he might be in the matter of his treatment towards her. He had everything he required, and would have been very surprised if his wife did not see that he was as comfortable as he could be, and perhaps at her expense. And there lies the secret of the flaw. Madge Sylvester was too fond of her husband to deny him anything and in consequence he developed a large bump of selfishness.

"My dear Madge," remarked Mrs. Cheesborough, as she sat at tea in the Sylvester's flat, "you pamper up that husband of yours too much. You feed him on the fat of the land until he regards his home as a restaurant and orders anything he fancies, no matter how much trouble it causes; you conform to every opinion of his, you wait on him hand and foot and do his every bidding.

"And what is the result, what do you get for it all? Why, simply that his lordship is graciously pleased to allow you to work for him, until extravagances become duties and ordinary duties are thankless tasks. Now, my dear, you can get cross if you like, but I've wanted to say it for some time and now I've said it."

Madge Sylvester remained mute, and sat with a thoughtful expression puckering up her pretty face. Presently she said:

"I'm afraid you're right. I have noticed that Hugh wants such a lot of things done and never troubles to inquire whether they entail much work or not. But then, you see, I'm so fond of him that I don't mind what I do."

"H'm!" remarked Mrs. Cheesborough. "And you're going just the way to lose his love by pampering him so."

Her only reply was a very astonished look from Madge.

"Now, listen to me, my dear," went on Mrs. Cheesborough, and for the next half hour she gave a considerable amount of advice of a wholesome nature to Madge Sylvester. And when she left at about six o'clock, these mysterious remarks might have been heard:—

"Now you'll do all I have suggested, won't you, Madge?"

"Yes, dear."

"Then His Imperial Majesty will become Prince Charming again. Good-bye, Madge."

"Good-bye, Maud."

And that was the Reformation Council.

On the following evening at about half-past six Mr. Sylvester arrived home and let himself in with the latchkey. He walked into the dining-room, but, to his surprise, found it empty. I say he was surprised, for Mrs. Sylvester made a rule of rushing to relieve him of his coat, hat, and stick, and then put them in their various resting places.

Mr. Sylvester stood waiting for some minutes, and then with an injured air exerted himself sufficiently to remove his outdoor garb. Then he gazed into a mirror, adjusted his tie, smoothed his hair, curled his moustache, and, with a self-satisfied smile, went to look for his wife. He found her in an easy chair in the bedroom reading a novel. He stood in the open door and waited for her to rush to him, but she neither rushed nor looked, simply turned over another page. In a much injured tone, he said:

"Madge!" And again waited for her to fly to him.

Then she did look, but did not fly.

"Hullo, Hugh!" she said. "Back again?"

He was too astonished to respond.

"Well, aren't you going to kiss me?" she went on.

Mechanically he went across and kissed her. There was something wrong here, he thought, whilst he thoughtfully tugged at his moustache.

"I suppose you want some dinner now?" was the next remark that fell on his astonished ears.

"Er—yes—of course," he stammered. Whereupon Mrs. Sylvester got up and sailed out of the room, gaily humming a lively tune.

Hugh Sylvester stood and gazed in wonderment at his wife's disappearing figure. Left to himself he collapsed into a chair, and thought until he was almost green in the face and his moustache loose with tugging.

"Dinner is ready, Hugh!"

"Dinner can wait!" Hugh savagely muttered to himself, and he still sat thinking. Presently his wife called him again.

"Your dinner is getting cold, Hugh."

Digitized by Google

Then he jumped up and hurried to the dining-room, where he found his wife half way through her dinner.

"Well, you might have waited for me," he grumbled.

"My dear boy," replied Madge, "I told you ten minutes ago that your dinner was ready."

"But when I didn't come you could easily have waited. What is for dinner?"

"Veal, dear."

"Veal!" he cried.

"Yes, Hugh. A very nice cut indeed."

"But, Madge," he cried, in an excessively injured tone, "you know I don't care much for veal."

"But I like it better than any other joint, Hugh. And this is the first time we have had it since we have been married."

Mr. Sylvester ate his dinner in ungracious silence.

When the meal was over and all cleared away, Mr. Sylvester picked up a book and began to read. He filled his pipe and lit it, and was beginning to feel very comfortable when suddenly he heard his wife's voice.

"Hugh!"

"Hullo!" was that gentleman's not very gracious response.

"I want some coal brought in, will you come and do it for me, please?"

Had she asked him to get the moon I doubt if he would have been more astonished. Never since they had been married had he done anything of that sort. Surely that wasn't for him to do. But, however, he slowly and reluctantly closed his book, and with a much aggrieved air he managed to raise sufficient energy to fill the scuttle and carry it to the dining-room, but he did it with very bad grace. Then again he arrayed himself before the fire, with the self-conscious air of one who has done noble deeds.

"Hugh!"

It was his wife's voice again. Was he never to have any peace?

"Well?" he called.

"You might come here and reach this jar down for me."

"Great Scot!" he muttered, "is a man never to get any rest?" Then he departed to the kitchen.

"What is it you want?" he demanded.

"You see that jar of pickles on the top shelf, well, I want it got down."

"Jupiter! Well, couldn't you get at it without troubling me?"

"Oh, Hugh, it's not often I ask you to do anything. You see, you have to have the steps, and they are down in the basement; then if you'll get those we can get at the jar all right."

Slowly he departed down the stairs, and in about ten minutes' time came back again, puffing and grunting, with the pair of steps on his back.

"Now, then," he said, grumblingly, "I'll get the jar down."

"It's all right, Hugh. I got it down myself as you were such a long time gone, by pulling the table over to the wall and putting the chair on it. Will you carry the steps back again now, please?"

"Mr. Sylvester's thoughts would have rivalled Turner's painting of Venice for picturesque and lurid colouring. But with mighty self-control he restrained himself and started out of the kitchen on his journey back. No sooner had he gone than Mrs. Sylvester shook with silent laughter, whilst she softly murmured:

"Poor dear old boy. He doesn't take to it very well."

When Mr. Sylvester returned to the dining-room again his wife was very comfortably reclining in the armchair which he had vacated. Again he thought considerably.

Presently he had to go out into the scullery to fetch his slippers, a thing that his wife had always hitherto done. And when he retired to rest that night he was in a decidedly dissatisfied frame of mind.

Much the same sort of thing happened the next evening and the evening after that, though, Mrs. Sylvester has since said, it was as much as she could do to refrain from departing from the counsel of the Council and making Hugh sit down whilst she waited and fussed over him; but, luckily, she persevered. On the Thursday night, though, came the crowning stroke of all.

When Mr. Sylvester reached home he found a note stating that his wife had gone shopping with Mrs. Cheesborough, and would not be back until about eight o'clock.

The note went on to say that there was some steak in the larder, and the potatoes and greens were all ready for boiling on the gas stove. Mr. Sylvester was absolutely dumfounded, such a thing had never happened before. But still, there was only one thing to do, so he got to work.

"How to be happy though married," he groaned, as he hopped round the kitchen on one foot—the other having unfortunately got in the way of the frying pan which he had upset; he had also burnt his fingers in his attempt to save it.

But he eventually got the steak in the frying pan, and lit the gas under it. Then it occurred to him that he had seen his wife put grease into the frying pan when she was cooking. Whereupon he skirmished for grease.

After some trouble, he found a cup standing on a shelf in the larder which he pounced upon.

"Ha! The very thing!" he cried. "I'm sure lard is greasy."

Then he placed a large portion in with the steak, and turned the gas on full under the meat and vegetables.

The meat smelt very peculiar as it was cooking, and while Mr. Sylvester rushed to the door to answer a tradesman, the steak became a glorious black colour. However, he placed it on a hot plate in the oven to keep warm whilst the vegetables cooked.

Presently he came to the conclusion that they had cooked long enough, and removed both saucepans into the scullery. Here he attempted to pour the water off, with the result that half went up his sleeve, and, with an agonising yell, he dropped the whole affair.

Potatoes flew everywhere; Mr. Sylvester spoke fluently. However, he collected as many as he possibly could, and placed them with the steak and cabbage.

"Reckon the drains must be out of order," he muttered, as he carried his dinner into the dining-room.

He arrayed himself at the table and set to work on the food before him with much gusto. Suddenly he gave vent to an exclamation of disgust, then he groaned, and wanted to die.

Slowly he staggered to an armchair and fell into it, all the time moaning in an agonising manner.

In the midst his wife entered, and gazed at him in terrified surprise. Then she rushed across to him.

"Hugh!" she cried. "Whatever is the matter?"

Feebly he pointed to the dinner and groaned out:

"I've been poisoned, Madge. Oh, let me die in peace."

"What do you mean, Hugh?" she asked in concerned tones. Then she commenced to sniff, and cried:

"Whatever have you been doing with beeswax, Hugh?"

"Beeswax?" he moaned. "When?"

Then she suddenly glanced at his plate and saw that the gravy, now nearly cold, was fast setting in a white mass. Then she bent and smelt it.

"Why," she cried, "you've got beeswax here."

"That's lard!" he feebly remonstrated. "I got it out of the cupboard."

"What, from a cup?" questioned his wife

"Yes."

"Why, that was the beeswax," she cried.

"Oh!"

With a shriek of dismay he rushed from the room, and about half an hour afterwards returned, very pale and white but quite well again. His appearance so upset Madge that the Council's counsel was quite forgotten, but then, of course, he was an invalid that night.

However, I happened to call round there not long ago, and surprised Sylvester in the act of bringing up more coal, and he was whistling over it, too. And no longer is Madge simply Mr. Sylvester's wife, nor does Mr. Sylvester still imagine himself a little tin god, but they are one of the happiest couples I know.

E. Newton Bungey.

Digitized by Google

A PLUCKY ESCAPE.

Proving that Honesty is the Best Policy.

"A TELEGRAM for you, miss!"

I took the yellow envelope from the porter of Inkermann Mansions somewhat reluctantly.

A telegram to a woman in the nursing profession generally means a fresh case, and I didn't want another case just then.

The fact is I was quite tired out and was returning to my modest flat in Inkermann Mansions with the full intention of taking a few weeks' absolute rest.

The telegram however was destined to upset all my plans. It ran as follows:

"To Nurse Compton, Inkermann Mansions. Earl's Court.

"Can you undertake slight mental case at once. Wire decision direct to L. Duvernois, Esq., White House, Hadlow-on-the-Hill. "SPENCER LEIGH."

The signature decided the matter. I had been on Sir Spencer Leigh's list of nurses for some months, but it was the first time the great nerve specialist had sent me a case.

I decided to accept it at once, and, making my way to the nearest post-office, wired my reply as directed.

An hour later, just as I had finished packing my modest trunk, the porter appeared with a second telegram.

"Motor will meet train arriving Hadlow Junction 8.5.

"L. DUVERNOIS."

I turned to the railway guide, and ascertained that the train in question left Victoria at 6.30. Then I glanced at my watch. It was six o'clock. That gave me just time to drive to the station, and left no margin for calling on Sir Spencer Leigh. Of course it was better to hear the details of a case direct, but no doubt he had provided ample written directions pending a personal interview.

It was not an inviting evening even for a short journey. The murky fog of London developed into a clinging damp mist as we got out into the open country, and when at length I stepped on to the platform at Hadlow Junction I shivered as I thought of the cold drive in a motor-car.

I had just given up my ticket, when a short, thick-set man, with a brown beard, stepped to my side.

"Nurse Compton, I presume?" he said, raising his motor cap, then as I bowed he added in a smooth, refined voice—"My name is Duvernois. I hope you don't mind rather a long drive. It is cold, but there are plenty of wraps, I think."

There were. In fact, when enveloped in the long fur coat, which Mr. Duvernois insisted on wrapping carefully round me, and with a huge rug over my knees, I felt thoroughly inclined to enjoy my first drive in a motor.

My companion seemed astonished that it should be a new experience for me. "But I forgot," he added courteously, "the automobile is not yet as popular in England as it is with us in France."

"Then you are not English?" said I bluntly.

"No, but I have lived here a good deal, and have at least, I think, mastered your terribly difficult language."

"You speak English wonderfully well," said I, "and my patient——"

"Can only just make herself understood. But no doubt you speak French, Mademoiselle?" he added quickly.

"I used to, and I understand——"

"Pardon, Mademoiselle, but I must beg of you not to reveal to my mother that you understand French, or she will insist on talking, and the doctors have decided that the quieter she is kept the better."

"Please tell me all about your mother's case," said I eagerly. "I had no time to go to Harley Street before I left town, so until I see Sir Spencer Leigh——"

"That will be some time hence," said Mr. Duvernois, "because I understand he is starting for the Riviera to-night. He has, however, left full directions about my mother's treatment, and I can, of course, give you the outlines of her case myself.

"Briefly then, her present mental disturbance is due to shock. Three months ago, when on her way to London, she met with a railway accident. When she recovered consciousness it was discovered that the brain had sustained partial injury. She had completely lost her memory on some points, while on others she was as clearly intelligent as ever. For instance, she recognised her maid, Françoise, but not me, her son. Curious, was it not, Mademoiselle?"

"Very curious, and very sad for you, I should think," said I, glancing at my companion's pale, melancholy face.

"Ah, yes, sad indeed, for my poor mother was devoted to her son. But figure to yourself, Mademoiselle, that not only does she not recognise me, but at times she imagines that I am her son's valet and the husband of her maid, Françoise. It is lamentable, is it not? But I am not discouraged. The doctors all assure me that her recovery is a mere question of time, patience, and a quiet, secluded life.

"That is how I came to take a house in this out-of-the-way place. I hope Mademoiselle does not mind the solitude of the country?" he added courteously.

"Not in the least—in fact, just now I am very glad of it," said I.

"That is lucky, for we are three, nearly four miles from Hadlow Village, and ten from the railway station. Ah! there is the church," he added, as we turned into a straggling village street, where the lights from the cottage windows gleamed cheerily in the winter dusk.

We stopped for a moment at the post-office which was at the same time the village shop. Mr. Duvernois exchanged a cheery good evening with the buxom post-mistress as she handed him a bundle of letters and proceeded to inquire after his mother's health.

"She's going on very nicely indeed, thank you, Mrs. Reid," he said courteously, "and the doctors are hoping that your splendid moorland air will soon put her right."

"That's good news, sir," said the woman, and stood smiling in the doorway of the shop as the motor sped up the village street.

Perhaps it was the change from the cheery cottage lights, perhaps that I was beginning to get tired, but it seemed to me as though the narrow, ribbon-like road, winding upwards over the moor, would never come to an end. Then suddenly it curved round sharply to the right, and nestling in a cup-like hollow of the hill, stood a substantial white house.

Digitized by Google

It looked a very cheerful place from the outside, with its twinkling lights, and when I crossed the threshold and was ushered by a rosy-cheeked country girl into a cosy dining-room, where the preparations for a dainty meal were set out, and a huge fire roared up the wide chimney, I began to think I had found very comfortable quarters indeed.

It was not until I had made an excellent meal and enjoyed a cup of coffee, such as one seldom tastes out of France, that I was joined by Mr. Duvernois, who proposed, if I were sufficiently rested, to introduce me to my patient.

I rose at once and followed my host across the square hall to a well-furnished drawing-room, at the door of which he paused and knocked.

"May I come in, ma mère?" he said in French, and as there was no response he opened the door, and we passed into the room.

Coming out of the brilliantly-lighted hall, the room seemed to be in semi-darkness, being lighted solely by a small reading-lamp placed on a table beside a high-backed chair.

In this chair, her eyes resting on the book in her hand, and the lamplight falling on her piled-up masses of white hair, sat the handsomest elderly lady I have ever seen.

She took no notice of our presence, till Mr. Duvernois placed his hand on her high-backed chair and said smoothly:

"Ma mère, I have brought you a charming young lady as a companion." Then, turning to me, "Mademoiselle," he said, "allow me to introduce you to my mother, Madame Duvernois."

The old lady's book fell to the floor with a crash, as she rose to her feet.

"How dare you address me by that common name? How dare you introduce me as your mother?" she said in low tones of contempt.

Then she pointed to the door. "I wish to be alone. Go! And enjoy the society of your wife and fellow plotter!"

Mr. Duvernois bowed, and with a patient smile on his melancholy face left the room.

Then the old lady turned to me, and as I met the glance of her handsome dark eyes a sudden memory that had not been stirred for years darted across my brain.

I was an awkward schoolgirl, spending a summer afternoon with a little French school-friend, whose aunt was the most beautiful woman I had ever seen.

She had coal-black hair that rippled above arched brows, and eyes that were the exact counterpart of those turned so searchingly upon me.

"Surely you are Madame de Latour?" I was beginning, when I felt a hand laid across my lips.

"Hush!" she said, "you seem to know me, child, but you must not explain at present." Then she added in harsh, loud tones, "As Mr. Duvernois has been kind enough to provide me with a nurse, I shall be only too glad to avail myself of your services. I am tired of Françoise—as she is well aware," she added, turning to the sallow-faced Frenchwoman who had glided noiselessly into the room without my noticing her approach.

"Unfortunately Nurse Compton does not understand French," said Françoise, flashing a warning glance at me. "So that if Madame wishes to converse, it must be in English."

"How very tiresome," said the old lady, with a yawn. "I cannot hold a rational conversation in that barbarous language.

"Bed, Françoise?" she broke off. "Very well; but since Nurse Compton is here she can relieve you at anyrate for to-night."

"Pardon, madame, but Monsieur's orders are——"

"About as futile as his pretensions to be anything more or less than one of the biggest scoundrels unhung!" said the old lady coolly.

Françoise smiled a contemptuous smile as she turned to me.

"She's pretty bad to-night, nurse, don't be astonished if she insists on telling you her real name is Latour, and that Monsieur Duvernois is not her son but a valet, and my husband."

"I think I understand," said I.

It was a whole week before I found myself alone with Madame de Latour without being conscious of the espionage either of Monsieur Duvernois or Françoise.

The week had, however, not been wasted, for I had succeeded in convincing both Françoise and her husband of my complete gullibility as regards my patient.

I openly bewailed the fact that the poor lady should have such an unpleasant delusion with regard to her son. I pitied Monsieur. I sympathised with Françoise at being forced to live in such an out-of-the-way little place in this quiet Angleterre.

Of course, no doubt, it was the best thing for Madame's health—in fact, Monsieur must be the most devoted of sons to carry out the doctor's directions so minutely, but there was just one thing in which I thought Monsieur was mistaken. His mother did not have sufficient fresh air, I argued, and most doctors were agreed that in mental cases driving was most beneficial. True, Sir Spencer Leigh had not mentioned it, but if I were to write and ask whether a daily drive in the motor——"

"There is no necessity to do that, nurse," interrupted Mr. Duvernois hastily.

"We can try the experiment, and if my poor dear mother likes it, well and good. Unfortunately I shall not be able to drive her myself every day, but my chauffeur understands his business, so it will be all right. Only don't let mother chatter too much, I can't bear to think of the servants being aware of the extent of her infirmity, and if she insists on talking French——"

"You forget, I don't understand French, Monsieur!" said I, laughing.

"Oh, I forgot, nurse; but I am quite sure you understand your business, and if, with your assistance, we can only get my poor mother well enough to enjoy life a little and transact some simple family business, which is at present at a standstill for want of her signature, I shall take care that our gratitude to you takes a very substantial form indeed."

"Thank you," said I, in a tone that left no doubt I had grasped the inner meaning of his words. Mr. Duvernois had decided to try the effect of a bribe, and was obviously satisfied with the result.

So was I, for I had gained my point, and was to drive with Madame de Latour alone, for, curiously enough, Françoise, who had intended to accompany us, had a violent fit of sickness just as the motor drove up to the door—and this in spite of the fact that I had given her a specific of my own some little time before.

When we got into the high road I gave the chauffeur some directions in French.

"Sorry, mum, but I don't understand no foreign lingo," said the man with a good-tempered grin.

"I only asked you where you were going to drive us," said I.

"Wherever you wish, mum. Master didn't give no orders; he said Miss Françoise would know where it was best for

Digitized by Google

Madame to go. I've to meet master at the London train at 7.15. There's plenty of time between this and then for a good long drive, mum. It's rather pretty towards Lewes, across the downs and along the Newhaven road."

"Newhaven!" I exclaimed, and caught my breath with excitement before I added quietly:

"How long would it take you to drive us to Newhaven, Armour?"

"Well, it might be done in about two hours and a half, mum, but then we'd have to get back, you see, and that might be too far for the mistress."

"It sounds rather fatiguing," said Madame, with a little yawn, "suppose we go as far as this place—what is it you call it? Louis—Yes? And, cocher."

"Yes, mum."

"Drive, vite, vite. I want to feel what it is like to go quickly. You understand?"

"Yes, mum," said Armour, and applied himself to the brake, for we were already going at an alarming pace down hill.

Madame de Latour drew me down beside her, and thrust a tiny local railway guide into my hand.

"It's a month old," she said in rapid French; "but let's hope the boat trains haven't altered.

"See you, my child, I have been studying that little book for a whole month, and if we can only get to Newhaven in time to catch the boat——"

"But Armour would perhaps suspect."

"Leave that to me," said the old lady, her handsome eyes flashing with determination.

"But tell me," I said eagerly, "how came this man Duvernois and his accomplice to shut you up in the White House and keep you a prisoner all these weeks? Of course their object must have been money, but how did they hope to obtain it?"

"Chiefly by means of a chapter of accidents, my dear nurse, all of which seemed to play into their hands.

"To begin with, my son Raoul and I made up our minds that we would go for a tour round the world. The idea was Raoul's, of course, and since he desired me to go with him, I was ready.

"We had no one to consult as to our movements, having no near relations except my little niece, your schoolfriend, who is now married and with her husband at Pondicherry.

"We intended to begin our travels by coming to London, and it was when we were half way between Dover and London that the accident happened. It was horrible, quite horrible! my child, and it was weeks before I could get the shrieks and groans of the wounded people out of my head. Raoul was killed," continued the old lady, in a quiet voice.

"I remember kissing his dead face, and then something seemed to snap in my brain, and when I came to my senses, weeks later, it was to find myself in this out-of-the-way place, well-cared for, as I thought, by Françoise and her husband. It was not for some time that the full extent of their rascality dawned upon me.

"I made several efforts to escape or at least communicate with the outside world, but without success. My letters were never sent, my telegrams were intercepted, I was watched like a prisoner in the Bastille, I saw no one except the servants, who had previously been informed of my mental derangement."

"But surely Sir Spencer Leigh——" I interrupted.

"My dear child, I never saw him, he knew nothing about my case."

"But his telegram to me?"

"A myth, dear child, to induce you to come."

"But why?"

"Françoise was beginning to get ill, she couldn't stand the anxiety of watching me night and day, whereas a nurse, responsible to a great physician—with her reputation at stake——"

"Go and enjoy the society of your wife and fellow-plotter."

"The wretches! But what was their object in all this?"

"Just to get my signature to a transfer of shares valued at something like £10,000, which Grosjean intended, I fancy, to turn at once into cash, before disappearing with his wife."

"But how did they get the money for current expenses?"

"We had taken out letters of credit for several hundred pounds so as not to be hampered on our travels. Raoul's signature was easy to copy."

"But if he was dead," I interrupted gently.

"Yes, Raoul was killed, but they buried Antoine Grosjean, his valet, in the little Surrey churchyard, Françoise even had the audacity to show me a photograph of the grave," said the old lady, in a quiet, even voice.

There was silence for a few moments, as we slid rapidly down the slope of the downs and went whirling along a smooth, straight road.

"That is Lewes, over yonder, mum," said Armour, as we came in sight of a sleepy looking country town.

"Tell him to stop at the nearest inn and order some tea for us and some refreshment for himself," said Madame de Latour with a slight yawn.

"But do you think we have time?" I whispered anxiously.

"Oh, yes, plenty of time," said the old lady carelessly, as Armour pulled up at the door of an old-fashioned country inn.

"This will be all right for your beer, coachman, but I don't think it looks clean enough for tea. Just drive us to that nice little baker's shop further down the street, then you can leave us for half-an-hour while we enjoy our tea in peace," she said quietly.

Armour grinned delighted acquiesence, and having brought the motor to a standstill in front of the baker's shop, hurried back to the White Hart. No sooner had he disappeared within its hospitable precincts than Madame de Latour quietly took her seat by the driving wheel.

Digitized by Google

"What are you going to do?" I exclaimed, aghast with astonishment.

"Do?" echoed the old lady, her great eyes flashing. "Why, what I've done scores of times before with Raoul. What I've done in imagination ever since I caught sight of this thrice-blessed motor. I'm going to drive at full speed into Newhaven and catch the boat for France!"

I shall never forget that drive, if I live to be a hundred! It seemed to me that the county of Sussex slid by like a panorama, as we tore along the roads, stopping every now and then to study the sign-posts or make an inquiry from a villager as to the nearest route.

But when at last we jerked over the cobble-stones down to the quay at Newhaven, and saw that preparations were being made for starting the boat, for the first time that day I saw the glitter of tears in the handsome dark eyes of my companion.

She hailed one of the porters and asked if she had time to send a wire before the boat started.

"Yes, mum, she starts in seven minutes. There's plenty of time to send a wire, post-office is just at the end of the quay."

Madame de Latour intrusted me with the telegrams which she had already written out.

One was to her lawyer in Paris, and the second to the superintendent of the French police.

Then we went on board, and a couple of minutes later were steaming out into the channel.

Madame de Latour gripped my arm as we stood watching the white cliffs of England grow fainter and fainter in the distance.

"So that little comedy is ended," she said, drawing a deep breath.

"Comedy?" I echoed incredulously.

"Yes, my child, what else? To be kept a prisoner for three months by a maid and a valet savours more of comedy than tragedy, I take it. Of course it depends a little on the point of view."

"I should think so, indeed," I interrupted vehemently, "I only hope those two wretches will have no chance of seeing anything but the tragic side of this business!"

Thanks to the intelligence and energy of the French police, my wishes in this respect were fulfilled even sooner than I expected.

The precious pair received the heaviest possible sentence for their crime which it was in the power of the judge to pronounce.

In spite of the fatigue of the trial Madame de Latour's splendid pluck never deserted her, nor, I may add, did her sense of humour.

"My child," she said a month later, as we drove to the station en route for the Riviera, "what do you suppose is the moral of all this unpleasant business?"

"Why, that honesty is the best policy, I suppose!" said I, smiling.

"Yes, of course, but there is an up-to-date one as well, and it is that in these days every woman should know how to drive a motor."

"It certainly proved a useful accomplishment in your case, Madame," I smilingly admitted. Morris Coleborn.

Maude: "You wouldn't know my fiancé now if you met him." Nell: "Why, has he changed so much as that?" Maude: "That isn't it exactly. I've changed him."

Mother: "Who has eaten the cake in the pantry?" Undaunted Infant: "I did." "And what did you do that for?" "I heard you tell Jane always to keep the cupboard shut. Yesterday she forgot, so I thought I would punish her by eating all the cakes."

"Come, old man," said the kind friend, "cheer up; there are others." "I don't mind her breaking the engagement so very much," said the despondent young man, "but to think that I have got to go on paying the instalments on the ring for a year to come yet! That's what's annoying me."

Your Editor Chats.

I hope to be able to announce the result of the Buried Stations Competition at an early date. Readers may rest assured that everything possible will be done to insure its publication at the earliest possible moment.

The order of popularity of the stories in Short Stories for July 11th was as follows: "Won Without Wooing," "The Wrong Miss Smith," "The Course of True Love," "The End of a Feud," "Toby's Rival," "Which Shall It Be?" "Violet Caryll's Quest," "Only a Model," "A Story in Letters." A gold-plated pencil-case has been awarded to Mr. A. Cartwright, 53, Newington Street, Belgrave, Leicester, whose list gave the order most correctly.

I take this opportunity of thanking "M. R.," of Iona, for her very kind gift of some flowers from that island, together with a picture post-card showing some of its beauties. I can assure her that they were much appreciated, and I am glad to know that Short Stories is just as popular in that far-away island as it is everywhere else.

Owing to the advent of Bank Holiday next week's Short Stories will be published on Friday, July 31st, instead of on Tuesday, August 4th, so you will be able to have it to take away to read during the holiday. The price will be the same as usual.

In this issue two new features will start. One of them is a splendid serial story by Henry T. Johnson, entitled "The Snare of Gold." The plot is a novel one, and the long instalment which will appear next week will give you a good idea as to what developments will take place.

The other feature is a series of stories called "The 'Bridge' of Ruin." These are the confessions of a girl gambler. The writer of the stories was left a small competence by an aunt, and shortly after the death of this relation was invited to stay with a school-friend in her country house. There she was initiated into the mysteries of Bridge, at which game she lost more than she could ever hope to pay. The instalment published next week tells you how she was led to continue to play, not understanding what she was doing, and other difficulties into which she got will be related in succeeding instalments.

Once again I make my appeal for the Fresh Air Fund. Contributions have been coming in most satisfactorily up to the present, but in the rush of getting away for their own holidays, people are apt to forget that there are little children in the big cities who are absolutely dependent on the help of friends for the one day's country holiday which they get in the whole year.

Before you go away to enjoy yourself, don't forget to send something along to ease these little lives. Ninepence pays for a whole day's outing for one child, allowing for plenty to eat and drink. That isn't a great sum, is it? If you can't afford to send ninepence, send what you can afford. Any amount, either more or less, or the exact sum, will be gladly received and acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. Address the envelope containing your contribution to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. The sooner you send it the better, as the summer is advancing, and of course the outings can only take place in the summer and early autumn.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

A Binding Contract.

The Story of a Curious Betrothal.

THERE was a very satisfied look on the face of Johnnie Owen as he slowly made his way down a certain street in a central part of London. It was dark, and the street was one of those which, at night, are visited only by waifs and policemen; the former go there in order to find shelter for the night in the big doorways, while the guardians of the peace walk through it in twos and in the middle of the road.

Johnnie Owen was about ten years old, and his story was a common one. He was not at all sure that Mrs. Owen was his mother, but, however that might be, she had beaten him so unmercifully of late that he had made up his mind to leave the wretched place which he had called "home" and endeavour to get along by himself.

He was tall for his age, with an expression of countenance that indicated ability to shift for himself; he had earned some sort of existence in various ways for the past month, and had selected Parker Street as a sleeping-place for want of money to find a bed.

"Ninepence in one day!" Johnnie exclaimed, in a tone of mingled joy and amazement. He could scarcely credit his good luck, despite the comfortable sensation which made itself felt in the region where his waistcoat ought to have been. "Thruppence on fish, bread and pudden, and sixpence left! That'll start me in somethin' for to-morrer, and then p'raps I can go on decent! I might ha' had a bed to-night, but that would spoil the look o' that piece of silver. No! I must sleep in the doorway a bit longer!"

By this time he had reached the particular warehouse the porch of which formed his sleeping apartment. There was a nook in it that kept him out of the wind, as well as out of sight of the policemen who walked in the middle of the road and seldom ventured on the pavement to flash their bull's-eyes into the nooks and corners.

"I feel a bit tired to-night!" yawned Johnnie, walking up the three steps and feeling his way to the nook. "I can do—— Hallo! Bobby!"

He had touched someone or something, and he had at once concluded that it was his natural enemy, the man in blue. He was out in the road getting up speed for flight before he realised that he had heard a timid cry when he had placed his hand on that something under the porch.

"Sounded like a gal's voice!" muttered Johnnie reflectively, pulling himself up short. It occurred to him that the intruder was some waif, like himself, who was more afraid of his approach than Johnnie was of the policeman. "I'll see!" he added.

Cautiously he went back to the steps.

"Who's that?" he demanded sharply.

He remained on the alert, ready to "bolt" if a policeman shot out from the secluded corner in answer to his question; but the sound of the voice reassured him completely.

"Oh, please don't hurt me! I've runned away!"

Johnnie penetrated the depths of the porch, took out a box containing a dozen wax vestas, dropped by some reveller, and ignited one. Holding it so that the light fell upon the object before him, he saw a girl somewhat younger than himself.

She was very poorly clad, but her clothes were not quite so ragged as his; her face was rather pretty notwithstanding the marks of tears and the signs of hunger. The child—she was little more — was crouching in a corner and gazing at him with appealing eyes.

"You won't send me back? You won't hurt me?" she queried piteously. "I'm dreffful hungry, but I'd sooner be hungry than go back!"

A fellow-feeling sprang up within the heart of Johnnie Owen.

"You needn't fret yourself about that!" he rejoined decisively. "I know what it is to be whacked, and I'd sooner be hungry! Look here! We can be pals, you know, me and you! I think I'll like you better'n a boy to chum up with, straight! What's your name?"

"Mary Bates; they call me Polly!" answered the waif simply.

"Don't know as I like Polly," returned the lad critically. "I'll call you Mary. So you're hungry, eh? Well, you wait there while I get somothin' to eat!"

He vanished, returning very quickly with a supply of fried fish, bread and pudding that had transformed the silver coin into three bronze ones, and lessened his capital by one-half.

"There you are!" he cried. "Now, go it for all you're worth!"

Mary Bates did ample justice to the repast, and when she had finished Johnnie proceeded to make her as comfortable as he could.

These two young persons were among the inhabitants of the great city who may be classed under the head of "Not wanted." Each was in the way, and in each case the flight was hailed with satisfaction by the unwilling guardian. They chatted together till they fell asleep, and in that curious conversation they settled their plans for the future.

In the morning Johnnie gave her twopence, keeping the odd penny for himself; that was to buy food with during the day, and they were to meet again at night under the same porch. Johnnie was to do as he had been doing for a month, picking up a livelihood somehow. Mary was also to busy herself about the market and the surrounding streets, in the hope of picking up a trifle in the way of food or money.

Johnnie was impressed by the fact that he had two persons to look after now, but he shouldered the added responsibility with quiet determination.

During the next few days a strong attachment was formed by the one for the other of this strange pair. Johnnie assumed the position of protector and bread-winner towards his little mate, and Mary accepted the position and grew very fond of him. Their affection was tried and cemented by an incident which occurred at the end of five days; this was a narrow escape from the clutches of a constable.

Johnnie had earned a few pence, and Mary had picked up a trifle also; they had purchased a cheap supper and had eaten it with all the relish of hunger. Then they had wended their steps towards the familiar porch in the corner of which it was their custom to sleep side by side.

They were talking in an animated fashion about what they intended to do when they were "growed up" and this caused them to neglect their ordinary precautions. They had ascended the three steps and were nearly in the arms of a man in uniform before they realised their danger.

Digitized by Google

"Scoot!" cried Johnnie, dragging Mary forcibly down the steps, just in time to evade the policeman's grasp. "Look out! He'll have us!"

They were off with the fleetness of young deer, and they did not stop till they were well out of that street. The policeman's mate must have been searching some other doorway; if the two had been together, Johnnie and his charge would have been caught, in all probability, and hauled off to the station and the workhouse afterwards.

"But why must we run?" asked Mary, when they felt secure.

"'Cos they'd have us up and they'd send us to some school, where we'd be treated awful strict!" answered Johnnie promptly.

"And whacked?" inquired Mary tearfully.

"Certain!" pronounced Johnnie confidently, although he felt some doubt rising within him as soon as he had given the answer.

"I wouldn't mind bein' sent to a school if they didn't whack you," observed Mary thoughtfully. "We could have jolly games together. I've heerd of boys and girls having games at school, and you and me could have fine fun, couldn't we?"

"Does yer think we'd be together?" asked Johnnie, with a mixture of pity and contempt for her ignorance. "'Corse we shouldn't! We'd be sent to different places!"

"What!" gasped Mary in dismay. "They mustn't part us! I couldn't bear it, could you?"

"No, I don't fink I could!" replied Johnnie mournfully. "But if the bobbies get us, that's what they'll do! I'm afeard they will get us one night. They, and the people from all sorts o' Homes, is always on the look-out! Some of my pals 'as been cotched!"

"I b'lieve I'd die if you was taken from me!" Mary began to sob. "Let's do something so as they can't take you from me, so as we must be together!"

"How?" asked Johnnie dubiously.

"If we was married," remarked little Mary thoughtfully, "they could do nuthin'. I've heerd Mrs. Potts scream out to Mr. Potts as no one could part her and him! How is that?"

"Oh, it's easy 'nough if you've got the money!" returned Johnnie confidently. "I've seed 'em go into the church! They stand and kneel aforo some railin's, and a man says somethin' out of a book, and it's all over."

"We ain't got no money, I s'pose?" asked Mary disconsolately. "But wouldn't it be all the same," she demanded eagerly, as an idea struck her, "if we stood aforo some railin's and took hold of hands and said as we wouldn't part?"

Johnnie didn't know; he said he would have to inquire, but they could make a bargain with each other not to part and to marry when they got enough money. Mary readily accepted the proposition, and the two children clasped hands and vowed to carry out the arrangement.

In making and ratifying a bargain in this way the waifs were doing exactly as many grown-up people do in certain localities all over the country, and to them this solemn shaking of hands was as binding as any vows ever exchanged between the contracting parties of a matrimonial alliance.

"That settles it!" declared Johnnie in a tone that admitted of no doubt concerning his sincerity. "We belong to one another, and we can't go and marry nobody else when we grows up!"

"And they can't take us away from one another now, can they?" asked Mary. She dreaded the idea of being separated from Johnnie and she was trying to persuade herself that separation was an impossibility.

"Not altogether," replied Johnnie dubiously. "You know that they keep the men and women apart in the workhouse, unless they're old, and we ain't old, you see!"

"I wish we was!" sighed Mary.

"The best way is not to let 'em get us!" declared Johnnie. "We must keep both eyes open for the copper at night!"

Although he was not certain about the question of separation, he was confident and jubilant concerning the impossibility of either getting married to another than to his or her present partner, and Mary held the same belief. That belief made them happy.

Their happiness, however, was of short duration. It was nearly a week later when Johnnie, arriving at the improvised lodging, found it occupied by a policeman. And as he (Johnnie) was a little earlier than the appointed time, he concluded that Mary had not arrived, so he had no hesitation in dashing away in order to escape his enemy.

He kept a watch for Mary, for the purpose of intercepting her, but he saw no sign of her although he waited till midnight. Then the truth came to him and made him sick at heart. Mary had been taken and would in due course be sent to a Home! He had lost his little wife!

Johnnie hung about the police court and workhouse, to his own imminent danger, in the hope of gleaning some tidings of Mary. If he could find out where they had taken her, he would contrive to effect her release! But his own fate was sealed; he was caught sleeping in a doorway two nights later and was sent to an industrial school.

The years rolled by. The two small persons wept bitterly over their separation at first, but in time their grief subsided and they benefited greatly by the care and training which they received. Those few days which they had passed together seemed something like a dream to them, and yet a dream with some reality about it.

Each cherished a loving memory of the other, and the childish vows exchanged between them appeared to retain all their force. Many a time, as the years passed by, each one had the same thought, even when they were old enough to fully understand the meaning of marriage.

"I'll never marry another girl if I live to be a hundred!" was the solemn declaration of Johnnie Owen, as he toiled away at the trade to which he had been apprenticed. And Mary Bates, old enough to act as maid to a young lady, ignored the eager glances cast at her pretty face by the young men of the neighbourhood and thought only of Johnnie Owen. "It may have been very foolish, and I may be very silly to still think of him," she would murmur, "but he was good to me and I shall always love him! I wonder where he is and what he is doing?"

Many a time, too, Mary Bates would catch herself glancing at the stalwart form of some young fellow and asking herself if Johnnie had grown into a man resembling that one. She would compare the visionary Johnnie with the substantial form on which her eyes had rested, and would speculate on the points of difference between them.

Then she would sigh and shake her head mournfully while she murmured, "I wonder if I shall ever see him again?" It did not occur to her for one instant that Johnnie had developed into a man whom she could not admire; that was an utter impossibility!

Eleven years had passed; she was twenty and she was in London again, her mistress having come to town for a brief stay. The return to the Metropolis had the effect of increasing her longing to learn something about Johnnie, to see him if possible. She tried to suppress the wild notions that flitted across her brain, but the more she tried, the more persistent did they become.

"How can I find out?" she asked herself. "It is so long ago! Perhaps he has earned enough to start in business on his own account; he was sharp-witted and strong, and therefore just the one to get on. Where could I inquire?"

She dared not intrust her secret to anyone, so she could not make much progress; she made a few tentative inquiries, but they were unsuccessful. Then an idea entered her mind which almost startled her.

"If I cannot see Johnnie, I can at least see the place where we sheltered during those few nights! Is the street still in existence? Dare I venture?"

She found that the street was still untouched by modern improvements, and that its reputation had not improved. It would be a risky thing for her to venture there at night, and, moreover, what was the good of doing so? Was it worth while, just to gratify a fancy? She dismissed the idea, but it came back with greater energy, and finally she yielded.

Digitized by Google

She obtained permission to remain out later than usual that night, and towards ten o'clock she found herself at the entrance of the familiar street. She was muffled in a cloak and in the darkness she might have been mistaken for a man.

Her heart beat more rapidly as she crept stealthily along the street, passing doorways in which, she was certain, homeless creatures were sleeping. A shiver of fear shook her frame when she realised that she was fairly within the boundaries of this dreaded locality, but the recollection of Johnnie Owen filled her with another sentiment and she forgot all danger.

"This is the spot!" she murmured as she stopped before a porch. "Is anyone there?"

Timidly she approached and ascended the three steps. How familiar it was, even after this long interval! The place was vacant, and she heaved a sigh of relief; yet she experienced a sentiment of disappointment which she could scarcely explain. Did she really expect to find Johnnie Owen sleeping there? And would she have been glad had it proved so?

She half knelt in the corner where they had lain, huddled together, and, drawing a box of wax matches from her pocket, she gently struck one and peered at some marks on the wall. Her eyes filled with tears as she saw them again, still readable after the lapse of years. No paint had covered them. "Johnnie. Mary."—Yes, there they were, a symbol of union! Would Johnnie and Mary ever be united?

"Never, I fear!" she breathed, rising to her feet and passing to the steps.

"Are you in need of help, my good woman?" asked a strong, manly voice with a touch of sympathy in it. "Can I help you?"

Mary shrank back. She wished to avoid the good Samaritans who go about in this way in order to help others.

"Thank you!" she faltered. "I was myself seeking to—to——"

"Who is it?" demanded the new-comer in quick, agitated tones.

In an instant a match was lighted by the stranger, who held it aloft in a manner that allowed its fitful gleam to fall for a minute on both faces.

"Mary Bates!" gasped the man. "Is it Mary or am I mistaken? I am Johnnie Owen! I came to see this place. I have been here often and often at night, wondering if I should ever get any news of Mary. You are Mary! Yes, I know!"

He dropped the match as he saw the expression on her face and was about to fold her in his arms when a thought arrested him.

"I had forgotten," he said tremulously. He took her hand. "We can shake hands, as old friends, but—but I was hoping, hoping, that each of us still held to the childish vows of eleven years ago! Perhaps it is not so? Mary, tell me and let me know my fate!"

"Why else should I be here?" she managed to stammer out, thankful that it was too dark for him to see how furiously she was blushing.

He folded her in his arms, happy in the reunion after so many years.

"Our names are still there, as we scratched them one night," he remarked, as they went away. "The next time we write our names in company, it will be in a church register!"

G. Hubert.

A MAN'S MISTAKE.

A Pathetic Little Love Story.

"Gwen, old girl, I'm in love."

A faint, pink flush crept into the girl's thin cheeks and made the pale, somewhat worn-looking face, seem almost pretty.

"You—in love?" she asked softly.

Her companion laughed, an awkward, half-apologetic sort of laugh.

"You never suspected it of me, did you?" he said.

"No," replied the girl, and her dark eyes grew strangely tender.

"I have told no one but you," he went on. "She wishes it to be a secret for the present."

All the colour went from her face. She looked haggard even in the dim firelight.

"A secret," she said. "Why a secret?"

"We've known each other such a short time, she is afraid people will laugh at us. They wouldn't understand, she says."

"I suppose not."

"But you understand, Gwen, don't you? I begged to be allowed to tell you. I wanted you to be the first to wish me joy."

"And I do, Tom. I do, with all my heart."

She spoke without a tremor in the low, clear voice

"It seems to me I have known her all my life, and she feels the same about me, Gwen."

"That is because you love each other."

"I knew you would understand!" he cried eagerly. "I told her so, Gwen. I told her all about you, about our friendship, and all I owe you."

"Was that necessary, Tom?"

"Necessary!" He laughed joyously "Why, Gwen, I have no secrets from her."

"No," said Gwen, "of course not."

"I know what you are thinking—she may possibly be jealous."

The girl started, as though she had been struck.

"Jealous of me?" she cried. "Who could be that?"

"To tell you the truth, Gwen, she was—just a little—at first. Then I explained to her what a good, true friend you had always been to me, and how I had learnt to love you as a sister, who was so much better, and wiser, and——"

"And older than you, Tom. I hope you told her that."

"I've never given it a thought, Gwen."

"I shall be twenty-nine next birthday. I daresay I might be forty-nine for all you cared. Tom, tell her that. It will satisfy her."

"She is satisfied. Do you remember, Gwen, what I've said to you so often? Men are your friends, not your lovers."

"I remember. There was something about me, you said, something you couldn't quite explain, which made me different from other women."

"Yes—and which separates you from their common fate. You're strong, and self-reliant, Gwen. You know how to make your way in the world, and you want no man's help. I sometimes think it's that that keeps us at arm's length. We know that you can do without us, that you don't need our protection, and so we shrink from offering it. You're too brave for us, Gwen."

The girl smiled strangely

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps you're right," she said, "but you didn't come here to talk about me. What is she like, Tom?"

His face kindled.

"Other people call her charming and pretty," he said, "but to me she is the most beautiful woman in the world. And yet she is hardly a woman, but a lovely, innocent child, Gwen, and as helpless as a child."

"And that you love most of all," said the girl. "You love to take care of her."

He began to laugh, from sheer happiness.

"She is so young—barely eighteen—and so ignorant of the world. Life, for her, is full of dangers. Oh, I must guard her well. Gwen, if you only knew the joy a man has in the helplessness of the woman he loves!"

"I think I understand," she said. "Let me see her picture."

"How did you know?" he asked, with a shamefaced smile, and drew from his pocket a tiny leather case.

She stirred the glowing coals into flame, and knelt on the hearthrug to examine the portrait.

It was a pretty, commonplace little face, with a somewhat affected expression—possibly due to the photographer, Gwen reflected.

"It's not a good likeness," said Tom, looking over her shoulder, "and, of course, all the colouring is lost. She has lovely hair—bright gold when the sun is on it—and a real complexion, Gwen, like a young child's."

"She must be very pretty."

"I wish you could see her, but you will soon, I hope. She's coming to town, with her people, next month."

"Mayn't I know her name?"

"Of course. I'd quite forgotten you didn't know. It's Lucy Mannering."

She noticed how fondly his voice lingered on the name.

"Lucy," she said. "I think it suits her, and I remember now that you mentioned her in your letter. She has been staying with the Harwoods, too, hasn't she? I know now," she added, with a light little laugh, "why you wrote to me so seldom, Tom."

"I was a selfish beggar and I've never asked you, Gwen, how you've been getting on. Splendidly, as usual, of course?"

She smiled a little bitterly.

"If you choose to call it that," she said. "I can always get plenty of work."

"And you deserve it."

"Such as it is."

"Oh, come now, Gwen, you, a successful journalist, oughtn't to talk like this. Why, thousands of women would give anything for your position."

"I daresay."

"But not many of them have got your brains or your enterprise."

"Don't you think so?"

"I always said you were bound to succeed, Gwen, when I watched how you stood up against all odds, how you smiled at rebuffs that would have made other women weep, how you bearded the editors in their dens and calmly told them that your stuff was what they wanted, and how, when they declined your manuscripts time after time, you only laughed and declared that your hour would come some day—do you remember, Gwen?"

"Yes, I remember," she said wearily.

"And your hour has come!"

"Yes, I got what I wanted, Tom."

"I knew you would. You are so cool and plucky and unmoved, Gwen. Sometimes I feel almost afraid of you."

"Afraid—of me?"

She stared at him, with wide eyes full of pain.

"Almost afraid," he said. "You are so different from other women. Sometimes, Gwen, you are almost unnatural, you seem so proud and strong and independent."

"If he only knew," she whispered to herself, and in that moment she realised the vast gulf that stretched between her and this man who understood her so little.

"Forgive me if I send you away now," she said presently. "I have a story to finish for The Epoch to-night, and it's weighing on my mind."

"Weighing on your mind!" he exclaimed. "I don't believe you allow anything to weigh on your mind, Gwen."

"Don't you?" she asked listlessly. How little he understood!

The Editor of the The Epoch had rejected her last contribution, with a curt note to the effect that the story was scarcely up to her usual mark.

No one but Gwen herself knew how she winced beneath that criticism, as beneath every rebuff of the same sort. They were plentiful in her profession, but somehow that did not make them easier to bear.

To her editors and colleagues, Gwen seemed a case-hardened journalist who pocketed snubs cheerfully, as a matter of course, and showed a commendable appreciation of her own ability.

They little guessed what agonies of doubt and self-distrust the girl endured at every business interview, at every post that brought back a rejected manuscript; what bitter tears she shed in secret; how, at times, she would cry out in her loneliness and feel afraid—desperately, hopelessly afraid of the struggle that lay before her, the sordid, miserable struggle for mere bread-and-cheese that had been her lot almost ever since she could remember.

The success that had fallen to her share had cheered her, but it did not suffice to set at rest the terrible doubt of herself and her powers that tormented her so persistently.

Sometimes, at the end of a more than usually hard spell of work, her over-taxed brain would suddenly refuse to respond further to her call upon it, and then an awful fear would seize her—the fear that she had come to the end of her resources, that her stock-in-trade of ideas had been exhausted, that she had, in fact, "written herself out."

At such times she would sit at her desk for hours, wild-eyed and white-faced, unable to pen a single line, wondering desperately what the end of it all would be.

And then, all at once, in the midst of her misery, a thought would come to her, bringing a light to her tired eyes, and a flush to her cheeks, that seemed to transfigure the anxious face and make it strangely beautiful.

She was not altogether friendless. He had told her, again and again, in his boyish, impulsive fashion, that he admired her more than any other woman in the world; and though she smiled at his extravagance, it was infinitely soothing to her.

He had never pretended to be in love with her. Indeed, he had hurt her often enough by his thoughtless, outspoken comments upon his own and other men's attitudes towards her.

But—there had been no other woman.

Perhaps, some day—who could tell?—he might—he might—Gwen never got beyond this point. She was proud; she tried to be proud, even to herself.

It was pride that made her smile her calmest smile when she was most discouraged and depressed; pride that made her silent in her suffering, even before him, and when he understood her least made it the more impossible for her to undeceive him.

There had been no other woman.

Well, that was over now.

"My love to Lucy," she said, as Tom bade her good-bye that night.

"My love to Lucy," she whispered to herself, when the door had closed behind him.

Then she began to laugh.

She was too proud to cry.

Grete Hahn.

Mrs. Sequel: "I understand your husband can't meet his creditors." Mrs. Equal: "I don't believe he wants to, especially."

Nodd: "I think that doctor of mine will give us something to stop baby's crying now." Todd: "Why?" Nodd: "I'm going to move next door to him."

Digitized by Google

Letter Juggling Competition.

CASH DOWN. FIRST PRIZE, £25.	CASH DOWN. SECOND PRIZE, £10.	CASH DOWN. THIRD PRIZE, £5.

TWO BILLIARD TABLES (measuring 4 ft. 10 inches by 2 ft. 8½ inches), together with cues, balls, marking board, and spirit level,
And TWENTY-FIVE GRAMOPHONES, each one fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, and accompanied by two records.

• • • • • • •

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct. Only one name must be written on each line.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of $25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of $10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES." Three more lists will appear.

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

EXAMPLE:
ABGHIIMMNR... Birmingham.

NINTH LIST.

97. AADEFLRSU	103. AEEKLMSS .....
98. ABCEGHLOSWY	104. ABBCEELORSTTU .....
99. AACEGINRRST	105. ADEEGLNNY .....
100. AABLLMOR	106. ACHHIKLLPUW .....
101. BCENOORSY	107. DEEFIMNORRSU .....
102. CEGHHNOOST	108. ACEEFILSWYY .....

Name..... Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

MR. HOLT'S COUSIN.

The Romance of a Wounded Man and His Amanuensis.

"I'm very sorry for you, Leigh!"

"Thanks. You've said that before, though."

"Well, you need not be so disagreeable; I really am sorry for you, and would help you if I could."

The speaker was an elderly man, with an intellectual face and a head of tangled grey hair, who stood by a couch, on which lay a young man with his head bandaged and his arm in a sling—the victim of an accidental collision with a 'bus in Fleet Street.

"You had better try and put it all out of your mind for a month," he went on compassionately. "You can't work, so what's the good of worrying?"

"The fact that I can't work is the reason why I worry," said Leigh. "If I had only finished my book before this accident happened I shouldn't care. But publishers are like time and tide—they wait for no man, as you might know, one would think!"

"I thought the doctor did not want you to use your head at all," said the elder man.

"Oh! He doesn't mind now. I'm all right again really; only he says he must keep my eyes bandaged for another fortnight, 'just as a precautionary measure.' Precautionary humbug, I call it!"

"Well then, employ an amanuensis," said Morris Holt, taking no notice of the last remark.

"So I would, if I could find one worth having; but how can I find one while I'm stuck here on this sofa? And, somehow, when a fellow is ill, people seem such a bother."

"I have a young cousin whom I think might do," said Holt. "I never thought of it till this minute; I always forget everything! A college graduate. Has written some creditable articles for the Dispatch, and the Editor says is destined to achieve distinction. Comparatively unknown, and too poor to ask high terms; very accurate, a good scholar, and would be glad to accept the position of amanuensis."

"Well, that praise means something from you," said Leigh, rather grudgingly. "We might have an interview to-morrow afternoon, anyway, if you'll arrange it for me."

"All right; I must be off now. I only meant to stay two minutes, but I had no idea you had been so ill."

He shook the uninjured hand, and made his way towards the door, tripping against a stool as he peered short-sightedly for the handle.

A shout from Leigh made him pause as he was closing the door.

"Stop a minute! What name did you say?"

"Holt. Sydney Holt," he said, opening the door an inch or two and shutting it again.

"Poor chap!" he muttered, as he made his way down the stairs of the flat. "But it's just the thing for Sydney. I'll go round there now."

Morris Holt was one of the most oblivious and absent-minded men in the world, but he had a fund of kindness within him when he remembered to use it, and on this cold, wet November evening he went nearly a mile out of his way that he might convey the news of employment to his young relative at once.

It was a dingy street into which he turned, and the house at which he stopped was one of the dingiest of the row An untidy servant-girl admitted him, and stood aside to let him go up to the first floor.

Mr. Holt stumbled up the dark staircase and knocked at the first door he came to.

"Come in!" cried a voice from the inside, and he turned the handle and entered. The room was like hundreds of others in cheap lodging-houses. The furniture was worn and shabby, the ceiling discoloured, and the window-panes not very clean; but there were a few touches here and there which showed that the occupant was a person of refinement.

A girl, whose curly hair was cut short over her head, and whose pale face showed the marks of overwork, threw down her pen and rose to greet him with a smile.

"Why, Cousin Morris!" she said; "I have not seen you for weeks!"

"No, my dear," said Mr. Holt, sitting down in the chair she pushed forward for him. "I have been out of town. Called at Grant's office yesterday, expecting to see you, but learnt that you had completed your work there a week ago. What have you been doing since, Sydney?"

"Nothing; that is, nothing certainly remunerative. I have just been engaged on a sketch that I hope to dispose of to one of the literary papers."

"I am sorry I have not been able to help you more," said Mr. Holt, with a little remorse in his tones. "But it is next door to impossible; everything is so crowded. However, I am forgetting what I came to tell you, and I must make haste, because I am going out of town again to-morrow, and I am very busy. A friend of mine who is writing a book has had an accident, and can't use his eyes for a time. He is worrying himself to death about it, and wants to get someone to help him. It must be someone up in the classics, because there are a lot of French quotations, so I suggested you, and he would like you to go round to-morrow afternoon. There's the address."

He threw a card on the table as he spoke, and got up to go.

"But shall I be able to do what he wants?" said Sydney doubtfully.

"Oh, yes; I told him all about you, you know, and he thought you would do."

There were many other things that Sydney wanted to ask, but her cousin was in a hurry to be off, and she could not detain him. She stood for a long time with the card in her hand after he had gone, as though it could tell her all the things that he had left unsaid.

OLIVER LEIGH,
18, Bloomsbury Square.

That was all. She had never heard the name before, and it conveyed nothing to her mind. But she had no doubt about going, for her funds were so low that it seemed to her sometimes as though starvation were not far off.

Her hopes had been very high when she had completed her education, and tried to obtain a position as teacher in a school; but as she learnt more and more of the over-stocked condition of the teaching world, they had sunk lower and lower. Her cousin had no influence with anyone of importance in London, but he had procured her a few pieces of literary hack-work from time to time, which just kept her head above water.

Digitized by Google

She set out about three o'clock the next afternoon, and made her way to Bloomsbury Square, and to the number designated, which proved to be a flat-house. She pressed the electric button of the door, and a bright little boy admitted her.

"Mr. Leigh?" he said, in answer to her inquiry. "Yes, he's in. Second floor," and so saying, he disappeared down a passage, leaving Sydney to make her way up.

The door at the head of the second staircase stood open, and her timid knock was answered by a voice, in obedience to which she entered.

The room formed a strong contrast to her own. A bright fire burnt in a grate, throwing its leaping lights and shadows over the picture-covered walls and the soft hues of carpet and curtains. But Sydney's eyes were not attracted by the room; they were fixed in mute surprise upon its owner.

She had expected to see an elderly, grey-headed man, like her cousin; but the hair that appeared over the bandages was thick and dark, and the figure in the armchair was that of a man in the prime of youth. She was so taken aback that she hesitated on the threshold, uncertain what to do; but in the meantime he could not see her and she was obliged to speak.

"My cousin, Mr. Morris Holt, asked me to call on you to-day about some work," she said.

"Oh, yes; come in," said Leigh. "Excuse my getting up; I'm rather lame. Holt was here yesterday, and said he thought you could do what I want; but I shoud think you're very young by your voice!"

Sydney thought that his manners were decidedly peculiar, but she knew that she must not mind such things as these.

"Yes, I am young," she said, "but I am fairly well educated, and have had some experience in literary work, too."

"Oh, well, I daresay you'll do all right," said Leigh. "I'll try you, anyhow. My doctor says I mustn't do more than three hours' work a day at present. He's a chum of mine, who comes in every morning to bandage me up for the day, and all that kind of thing; so we had better work from two till five, if that will suit you."

"Very well, indeed," said Sydney.

"All right, then. We ought to finish the work in a fortnight; I hope you can write a clear hand. Oh, and about terms; will two pounds a week do for you?"

"Certainly," said Sydney, who had not dared to expect so much.

"We may as well begin at once, then. You'll find the papers on the writing-table. Tell me when you are ready, and I'll fire away."

Sydney arranged the papers and began to write. The book was one dealing with certain aspects of the French drama, showing that many of the so-called new Society plays of the day were really founded on dramas well-known in France from thirty to a hundred years ago. The quotations made the work difficult; but the subject was one which thoroughly interested her, and the time sped rapidly away.

Five o'clock chimed out at last from the little clock on the mantelpiece, and Leigh gave a satisfied sigh.

"I suppose we must stop," he said, "or I shall get into a row with my doctor. However, we've got on capitally, so I won't complain. Be sure you come punctually to-morrow."

"I will be certain to be here," said Sydney, opening the door as she spoke.

"All right, and if you see your cousin, you can tell him I think you'll do very well. You really are very clever, though I should think you're not much more than a boy!"

Sydney gave a startled little gasp as he muttered the last words, and escaped before he could add anything more. So this was the meaning of his cursory remarks and his off-hand way! Morris had evidently spoken of her as his "cousin," without mentioning her name; or, even if he had mentioned it, it would have told him nothing unless he added an explanation. Why had she not been called Ada or Caroline instead of Sydney?

During her journey home she was debating what she could do. Should she ask her cousin to explain? But he had gone out of town, and she did not even know his address. Should she explain the mistake herself? But the idea was too formidable! And after all, it was only an hour or two in the day for a fortnight; it would soon be over.

She hardly noticed the discomforts of her room that evening; her mind was too much occupied with the events of the day, and instead of worrying over her money troubles when she went to bed, she fell asleep wondering what the morrow would bring.

Leigh was waiting for her when she arrived the next afternoon.

"Here you are!" he said, cheerfully. "The doctor says

"I say, young man, you ought not to leave your love tokens lying about."

Digitized by Google

I'm none the worse for the work yesterday, so that's all right. We'll soon finish, at this rate."

Sydney soon became as interested in the book as the author himself. It showed a depth of research and a broad way of dealing with facts that gave her a very high opinion of his mind. She admired him also for his patience under the trials that had befallen him, and day by day she found herself looking forward more eagerly to their hours of work.

Leigh, on his part, felt a growing admiration for his secretary.

"You never bother me, somehow," he said, one day. "Some fellows are so clumsy, knocking things over and making all sorts of mistakes. But you are uncommonly quiet, I must say, and yet you are sharp enough, too! That suggestion you made yesterday was really very good; I thought about it a great deal in the night."

"I am glad you think I can do the work," said Sydney.

"You do it remarkably well," said Leigh. "You really ought to turn out something or other very creditable one of these days. I don't know why I always imagine you are so young; I suppose it's your voice."

"Can I do anything more for you before I go?" said Sydney, passing over the difficult question.

"Yes. I wish you would just give me a rug. I get so cold sitting here, and the doctor won't let me try my ankle yet."

Sydney felt a rush of sympathy go through her, but she dared not express it. So she put the rug softly over him and went back to the writing-table.

"Recently I have felt in a poetic mood," said Leigh, in a dreamy tone. "I don't know why, but I seemed to think of stars and music, and the sweet South on a bank of violets, all in a breath just now."

"Good afternoon," said Sydney, opening the door and taking a sudden departure.

"I shall have to tell him," she said to herself desperately, as she hastened down the stairs. "And yet—there are only three days more!"

"I say, young man," began Leigh, in a playful tone, when his amanuensis arrived on the next afternoon, "you ought not to leave your love tokens about on other people's tables! The doctor told me I might take a walk around my room this morning; the housekeeper was to have helped me, but she never appeared, so I had to clutch on to the things as best I could, and as I caught hold of the writing-table, I found this!"

He held up a ribbon as he spoke, which Sydney recognised directly as one that she had missed when she reached home.

"Well, are you not going to ask for it back?" said Leigh, finding that he got no answer. "I shall tell your cousin the little tale when I see him next!"

"Please give it to me," said Sydney, in a low voice.

Leigh thought that he had given offence, and relinquished the ribbon at once. It seemed to him rather foolish to be upset by such a trivial thing, but he was too kind-hearted not to try to make amends.

"I shall be quite sorry when our work comes to an end!" he said pleasantly, when five o'clock sounded the hour of Sydney's departure.

"So shall I!" thought Sydney, but she did not say so.

"In fact," went on Leigh, "I have something to propose to you. The doctor says the bandage may come off my eyes in a day or two, but I am not to use them much at first. Will you stay on and help me, if you have nothing better to do? No one has ever suited me so admirably as you have done, and I do not feel inclined to let you go."

Sydney's heart beat almost to suffocation. How could she answer him? In a day or two at most he must discover the deception she had practised on him.

"You don't seem to like the idea much!" said Leigh, in a disappointed tone. "Perhaps you have something else in view; but I gathered from what your cousin told me that you have not been getting on very encouragingly. Has your father other plans for you?"

"I have no father," said Sydney, glad of a question that she could reply to. "I have been an orphan for some years, and I never had any brothers or sisters."

"Then why will you not agree to my proposal?" said Leigh. "It would be only a temporary thing, and I would not stand in the way of your taking anything else that turned up."

"It is not that," said Sydney, in a low voice.

"What is it then?" asked Leigh, rather peremptorily.

Sydney could not reply, her heart was too full. She felt her eyes filling with tears, and in the effort to choke down her feelings a sob escaped her lips.

Leigh gave a sudden start, and half rose from his seat, but sank back again as his injured foot gave way under him. Sydney watched him anxiously; she dared not speak, but in another moment she saw him raise his hand as though to tear the bandage from his eyes.

"No! no!" she cried, fear for him overcoming every other feeling; "you must not do it; you will ruin your sight for ever." She darted forward as she spoke and seized his hand.

Instead of snatching away his hand, Leigh took hers between both his own, and held it firmly. It quivered like a frightened bird in the captor's grasp, but he would not let it go. It was small, and soft, and warm, and he stroked it lightly with his fingers.

"This is not a man's hand!" he said.

"Oh, I will tell you the truth!" cried Sydney despairingly. "My cousin told me about your work, and I wanted the money so much, and he said that he had told you all about me. And then when I came I found you did not know, and he was away, and I could not make up my mind to tell you, and I hoped you would never find it out! But now I will go away, and I shall never come back."

She drew her hand away from him, but as he released it, he pulled the bandage from his eyes before she knew what he was doing!

The sight that met his eyes he will never forget till his dying day. The small, slight figure before him was clad in a dress of some dark woollen material, that any woman would have told him at once was old-fashioned and cheap. But Leigh saw nothing of that; he only knew that the curls that lay tossed all over the little head glittered like gold in the firelight, that the pale cheeks were tinged with delicate colour, and that her eyes shone like stars through the tears that hung on their lashes!

But the vision only lasted for a moment. Turning passionately from him, she caught up her things and flew from the room.

How Sydney found her way home that evening she never knew. A tumult of feelings surged through her heart, but in the midst of it all one resolve was fixed within her—nothing should ever take her back! What though her work was unfinished; what though she had not as yet received the much-needed money? She would rather starve than ever see him again!

Leigh, meanwhile, was passing through an equal tumult, but his thoughts were much pleasanter than Sydney's. His principal fear was that she would fulfil her threat of not returning; and as the next afternoon came and went, dragging out its weary hours in dull loneliness, he became gradually convinced that she had really meant what she said.

"Never mind, I'll go and see her to-morrow," he thought. "I can get downstairs and into a cab well enough now."

But when the next day came a sudden thought flashed upon him that filled him with dismay. He had not the vaguest notion of her address; and, more than this, rave and storm as he might, there was no chance of his finding it out unless her cousin had come back to town!

He had been allowed to exchange his bandage for a shade, and reaching pen and paper he wrote off a hasty note, with no explanations, merely asking for the address.

But Morris Holt was still out of town, and the note lay unopened amid a pile of letters on his writing-table for several days, during which Leigh went through an agony of suspense. Perhaps his note had been lost, and had never reached its destination; perhaps she had guessed what he would do, and had forbidden her cousin to send the address.

Digitized by Google

Then a new agony began. She had told him herself how much she wanted the money; perhaps she was starving, and there was no one to help her. He worried and distressed himself till the doctor shook his head and ordered him to take a trip south.

Leigh took no notice of his advice. Everything seemed to go by him in a dream, until one day a postcard was brought up to him, with two lines written upon it, that ran like an electric stream through his frame. The words were these:

"Only just back in town. No. 24, Watts Street."

Sydney was sitting alone that afternoon in her cheerless room. She could not afford a fire, and the clinging damp made everything chilly and uncomfortable. She had at last heard of a chance to teach a private school, but the salary was small.

A week ago at this time a very different scene had surrounded her, but that thought was too painful to be borne as yet! A ring at the bell and a heavy step on the stairs roused no expectations in Sydney's mind; no one ever came to see her but her cousin, and she thought that he was still away. But to her surprise, the steps paused at her door, and the servant-girl threw it open without any attempt at announcement, and in another moment Oliver Leigh stood before her.

He was breathless with his ascent, and leant heavily upon his stick; but he had left off his bandages, and his eyes rested eagerly upon her.

"I should have been here days ago," he exclaimed, "but I had no clue to your address, and I was obliged to wait until I could get it from your cousin. The days have seemed like an eternity!"

He pulled the bandage from his eyes before she knew what he was doing.

He paused; but Sydney could find no words in which to answer.

"Are you angry with me for coming?" he asked. "You would not be, if you knew how terribly I have missed you."

"I am not angry," said Sydney, in a scarcely audible voice, while she raised her eyes for a moment to his.

Leigh's face brightened.

"I cannot part from you again!" he exclaimed. "I have come here to-day to ask you to be my wife."

"But we have known each other such a little time," said Sydney, trying to repress the joy that trembled through her at his words. She knew that she should never love any other man as she loved him, but she feared that he might be yielding to a sudden impulse which he would afterwards repent.

"Do you call it a little while?" he said. "It seems to me that I have known you for years. You must remember that a fortnight of work together like ours is worth a year of ordinary acquaintance. No, I cannot take that as an answer. The only thing that will send me away is for you to tell me that you do not love me. Can you tell me that?"

There was an intreating accent in his voice against which Sydney was not proof.

"No," she said, softly, and the brief negative conveyed a whole world of assent.

The dreary room, with all its chill dulness disappeared as if by magic, transfigured and glorified by a haze of golden light.

Cold, weariness, poverty, all were forgotten, blotted out from Sydney's memory, by the sudden rush of happiness; while Leigh felt that this was the moment for which he had been waiting all his life.

"You must not forget that you owe me two days' work," he said, at last, looking at her with a smile.

"I don't owe them!" said Sydney playfully. "You have never paid me anything yet at all!"

Leigh's smile faded, and he bowed his head on hers.

"I can't bear to think of what you have suffered, my little one!" he said. "But that is all over now. There is nothing to wait for; let us be married at once, and we will arrange for a wedding trip. I believe the doctor told me I ought to go down south for a little while—say to Bournemouth; so we will forget all these dark days in love and sunshine! I shall never be thankful enough that your cousin sent you to me."

"Do you think we need tell him all the story?" said Sydney anxiously.

"No, dear, no!" said Leigh. "It is too sweet a story to be spoilt by telling; we will keep it all to ourselves."

And thus it came to pass that when Morris Holt read the letter that told him of Sydney's engagement he said to himself with his usual abstracted smile:

"Ah, yes, I saw Leigh was interested directly I told him about her; Sydney may thank me, after all, for having settled her in life."

M. Milner.

Mrs. Bacon: "Is this young salad?" Bridget: "Yes, ma'am, so young that I had to wash and dress it."

Excited Wife: "Wake up, Henry! The house is on fire!" Sleepy Husband: "Great Heavens! Now we'll have to move again!"

Pretty School Teacher: "Thomas, state some of the beauties of education." Thomas (oldest boy in the class): "Schoolmistresses."

Agony Column Notice: "Teddy, come back. All is forgiven. Pa kicked the wrong man. He did not know it was you.—Stella."

"What was the trouble between you and young Mr. Softy?" "Why, he said his brain was on fire, and I broke a hand grenade over his head."

Husband: "You're not economical." Wife: "Well, if you don't call a woman economical who saves her wedding-dress for a possible second marriage, I'd like to know what you think economy is!"

Digitized by Google

A Fraudulent Bankrupt.

Telling of a Good Intention and Broken Engagement.

With a meditative kind of sigh, Mr. Richard Granville laid the newspaper on his writing-table by the side of a letter to which was attached a cheque for £150. The newspaper and letter had reached him by the same post; the newspaper was a daily journal published in the town in which Granville had lived till five years previously.

"So this is what may be called the end of "The Fraudulent Bankruptcy Case," murmured Granville. "The Express tells me that Laxton has completed the payment of his creditors, interest and all, and the letter comes from Laxton with the balance of the money lent to him in order to give him a fresh start. And what about Winnie? I wonder if she ever deigns to give a thought to me?"

Business in the solicitor's office was not brisk that morning; so, when Granville fell into a day-dream and lived that incident over again, there was nothing to interrupt the course of his meditation.

Richard Granville was, at the time of that incident, a man of forty-five. He had never been married; he had devoted himself to the law, and after a great deal of hard work, he had acquired a very comfortable business in his native town. And then, like so many other men before and since, his thoughts had turned to matrimony and he had fallen violently in love with Miss Winnie Saunders, the daughter of a large manufacturer in the same town.

There was not the slightest doubt that it was purely a heart affair with Granville; the appearance of Winnie had worked a transformation in his inmost being.

He was amazed at the thought that he had lived so long without passing through the experience of love; it was almost incredible that he could have been so dulled by the desire to get on that he should have entirely escaped the arrows of Cupid.

Yet it was so; this was no case of a disappointment in earlier life. He realised for the first time what was meant by being in love! And, as is usually the case, he was in love with a vengeance!

There was some disparity between the ages of the two lovers; for Winnie was not yet thirty, and still looked very charming, whereas Granville, as already stated, was fifteen years older. However, a difference of that kind is not a serious obstacle, and the couple became engaged.

Looking back, Granville was inclined to query the affection of Winnie for himself; something within him said that she accepted him because she wanted a husband not engaged in manufacture, but a member of a profession.

Was it love or ambition that made her reply in the affirmative to his impassioned declaration and question? When such questions arose in his mind, Granville brushed them aside and loyally adhered to the belief that Winnie did love him and that it was all his fault or the fault of circumstances—he could not decide which.

It had all come about through the Laxton bankruptcy.

About a month after the announcement of the engagement of Granville and Miss Saunders, the town was surprised by the statement that Laxton had fled, after having collected most of the money owing to him, and leaving some heavy debts of his own unsettled.

Little by little the details became known, and then it was found that Laxton had obtained large supplies of goods from Saunders and others, and had immediately disposed of these goods for cash. With this money he had decamped, leaving Saunders and others in a towering rage at having been sold in that manner. Laxton's credit had been good, and the defrauded merchants had only done what they had done many times before.

Mr. Saunders was furious; his own people could scarcely approach him, and Granville dare not go near him for a day or two. Saunders was not much in favour of having Granville for a son-in-law; the solicitor was not rich enough. Winnie was in tears.

"I wish something could be done to get the money back, Richard!" she moaned. "Papa is not hard up, so far as I know, but bad debts have been rather plentiful of late, and he is always as cross as two sticks if he loses only a few pounds. But, to make things worse, people are saying that it serves papa right, because he accepted bills from Laxton and charged him a heavy rate of interest for the accommodation. I think that means that Laxton did not pay on a monthly account, but got four or six months' credit.

"And then"—here Winnie hesitated—"papa says that if you—if you—I don't like to say it!"

"Tell me what he said, my love!" requested Granville, feeling uncomfortable.

"He said that if you were a smart lawyer, you ought to be able to get his money back for him! Papa says that if Laxton's affairs are simply wound up and a warrant issued for his arrest, that won't bring the money back! If Laxton is put in prison even, that won't make the loss less to papa! Do you think you could see any way to get papa's money out of Laxton, Richard? It would be such a feather in your cap, and papa would think such a lot of you ever afterwards!"

That was rather a big task, but Granville's anxiety to please Winnie and to get into the good graces of her father, made him daring.

"It is not an impossibility!" he said reflectively. "It might be done. I'll think it over, Winnie, and try!"

"Oh, I should be so glad, Richard! Thank you so much!"

Granville was not satisfied with verbal expressions of gratitude from his loved one, and the kisses which he demanded intoxicated him and caused him to become more sanguine of success. By the time he left Winnie he had as good as promised that he would get the money back.

On the following morning he looked somewhat blankly at his own reflection in the mirror. Nevertheless, he had promised to undertake the case, and he must do his best.

"I must find out where he is, that's the first move!" said Granville disconsolately. "Then I suppose I must go to him and threaten that I will haul him up before the police unless he gives me what he owes to Saunders. Rather shady conduct for me, yet——"

He slowly shook his head and turned from the mirror.

Granville felt tolerably certain that Laxton would not attempt to leave the country; he sat down to think where the missing man would most likely take refuge, and he suddenly remembered a remark dropped by the bankrupt three or four months before—a remark overheard and not intended for the ears of others. Granville saw its meaning in the light of later events, and he jumped up with an exclamation.

Digitized by Google

"I'll wager that he's in London, in the East End!" he cried. "He might start such a business there, or buy up one, and nobody would suspect that he was there! I'll set Mallett at work!"

Mallett was a private inquiry agent. He received full particulars of Laxton's appearance and some other details, and two days afterwards he replied that he had located the individual mentioned. Granville gave it out that urgent business called him to London and he was off by the next train.

"It isn't an elegant locality where the fellow has settled!" remarked Mallett drily, when his friend Granville called on him. "You might have placed a little more confidence in me, by telling me what he has done!"

Granville reddened.

"I am prepared to swear that he is no ordinary criminal!" said Mallett quietly. "I'll tell you what I think of him before you say a word. He is an honest-minded man who has had a run of ill-luck which has made him forget himself and deviate from the right path!"

"You've about hit the nail on the head!" cried Granville in surprise. "How did you deduce that? But, to show that I wish to keep nothing from you, I will tell you all I know!"

He related the story of the bankruptcy, and Mallett began to ask questions.

"Well," said Granville slowly in reply, "I have found out that this Laxton has had a lot of trouble. Fate seems to have been against him lately. His wife was ailing for years, and that took money out of his pocket. His two children died, trade went wrong, competition was keen, men like Saunders charged a high rate of interest for taking his bills of acceptance, and finally his wife died.

"It appeared as though misfortune would pour down upon him till he went under, and at last he did go under. Now, what is the best course to pursue? You are a good judge of human nature, I should say, or you wouldn't get on so well in your special line!"

"I should call upon him," said Mallett with a quiet smile, "and have a friendly chat with him. I know that my advice will surprise you, but I'll undertake to say that you will get nearer to the attainment of your object than if you adopt any other method!

"Exactly what course he will adopt in order to make restitution I cannot say, but I prophesy that he doesn't like his present occupation and that he would be glad to find himself free to go about and make a fresh start in his own line elsewhere! With a fair show, that man ought to succeed moderately; he has a good amount of business acumen!"

Granville didn't like the idea; he became reflective and shuffled his feet nervously.

"It's your best course!" said Mallett. "I see that you understand that you must go alone, and you don't like it! Well, if you take half a dozen policemen or detectives with you, you'll do nothing!"

"You're right!" admitted Granville regretfully. "Which is the best time?"

"Near midnight!" replied Mallett promptly. "This is Saturday," he went on, ignoring Granville's shudder, "and he will be tired of work, sick of this new and distasteful business. He will be closing up, so you will get him at just the best time to work on his feelings. It will be what people are fond of calling the psychological moment!"

The idea put forward by Mallett was a novel one; it interested Granville, although he would have preferred not to be compelled to carry it out alone. Nevertheless, he summoned up courage and went to the street named by his friend. He had no difficulty in finding it, for it had earned a notoriety of a disagreeable character!

Granville was attired in a manner suitable to his position, but certainly not suited to the locality. Two or three suspicious-looking individuals eyed him furtively, making him feel uneasy, but he went boldly on his way.

"It is for Winnie's sake!" muttered Granville. "I wouldn't do it for Saunders himself; but the dear girl thinks it would be good, and so—Oh, this is No. 7, I suppose!"

It was a low-class eating and lodging-house, frequented chiefly by sailors. It was not a thieves' den, where sailors are fleeced, but its former proprietor had endeavoured to establish a place where the tars might feel safe and get fair value for their money. Honesty paid him well, for Jack is generous, and he usually got well paid for looking after the sailors ashore.

Laxton, then, had taken this house! It was a strange haven of refuge, but Granville conceded that he was probably safer there than elsewhere from the chance of discovery and arrest!

The solicitor entered while a man was putting up the shutters; that man was the fraudulent bankrupt; the lawyer recognised him. Laxton had not noticed him enter the shop, so, when his task was finished, he locked the front door and turned to walk back to his little parlour. As he turned, with uplifted hand, to extinguish the gas jets as he went along, he saw Granville and stood still in surprise.

"What are you here for?" he demanded at length. He spoke fiercely, his fists clenched, as one prepared to fight for liberty. "Speak! What do you mean by coming here? How did you track me?"

He stepped forward with a threatening gesture. Granville wished himself at home, but he presented a brave front, and spoke in a conciliatory style.

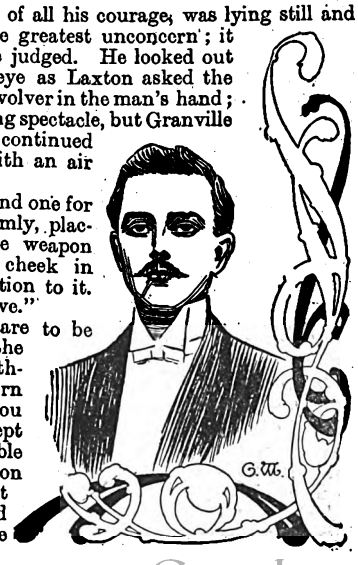
"I have come to have a chat with you about your bankruptcy, Mr. Laxton! Don't be alarmed! I wish you no harm, but I think it will be possible to——"

He was unable to proceed, for Laxton had sprung upon him with a hiss like that of a serpent, and had him by the throat. Granville had been pretty good at wrestling in his young days, but many years had gone by without practice and his art was lost. He made as good a struggle as he could, not raising the least cry, because he wished to keep the shop to Laxton and himself, if possible. He anathematised Mallett and Saunders, but he was in the mess now and must go through with it.

He essayed to make Laxton understand that he bore him no ill-will, but Laxton would hear nothing. In three minutes Granville lay helpless on the floor, Laxton still holding him, though not so tightly, by the throat.

"I thought I was safe here!" panted the fugitive. "But you have got your detectives to track me! I don't know what your game is, but I'll never allow you and your men to take me! See this?"

Granville, by the aid of all his courage, was lying still and assuming a look of the greatest unconcern; it was the best policy, he judged. He looked out of the corner of his eye as Laxton asked the question, and saw a revolver in the man's hand; it was not a tranquillising spectacle, but Granville nerved himself and continued gazing at the ceiling with an air of indifference.



"One ball for you and one for me!" said Laxton grimly, placing the muzzle of the weapon against the solicitor's cheek in order to call his attention to it. "I'll never be taken alive."

"Nobody says you are to be taken," remarked the solicitor easily, and without attempting to turn his head. "When you think that you have kept me in this uncomfortable and undignified position long enough, you might permit me to rise and have that chat I spoke about. I must say that you don't treat your visitors very courteously!"

Digitized by Google

Laxton was puzzled. He gazed curiously at his prisoner for a few seconds, then released him and rose slowly to his feet.

"You can get up!" he said, and his tone was that of a mystified man. "I'm done—I can't understand! What are you getting at?"

"I hope you have a clothes-brush!" said Granville, rising and dusting his things with his hands. "Well, shall we go into the parlour?"

"You haven't anyone outside, ready to pounce on me?"

"How can they, with the door locked?" asked Granville.

"No! I forgot that, although they could get in by the private door. Well, come in, I have another way out if anyone is really trying to trap me. But I am inclined to think you're acting square!"

They sat down at the little wooden table and Granville began the conversation. He spoke kindly to Laxton, endeavouring to show him how foolish he had been to forfeit a good name and make himself an outlaw, liable to arrest and imprisonment; he told the fugitive that it would have been better to act like a man, to face the situation and appeal for time and assistance to make a fresh start.

"I am sure that you would have obtained what you wanted," concluded Granville. "And it is not too late now. What have you done with the money?"

"I paid some of it away for this business; it's a paying affair, and, although I am unfitted for the life, it will enable me to hide and to save money!"

"And then?" asked Granville. He was entering into the spirit of the thing; here was a chance of redeeming a fellow-creature, and he wished to do it. Bother Saunders' money! That was not the only consideration to bear in mind!

"It is my intention to pay all I owe!" responded Laxton slowly. "I could not do it up there on the lines I was working. I had no chance! I don't have to give bills with high interest now, because I have the money!"

"But you are always liable to discovery and arrest!" urged Granville. "No, I won't split. Let me persuade you to return and make amends."

"But I shall be run in all the same!" objected Laxton hesitatingly.

He was wavering, so Granville pressed the matter harder. It was a strange rôle for the solicitor to play! Saunders was the chief loser by the bankruptcy, about three-quarters of the money belonged to him, so if Laxton were to refund all he had decamped with, Saunders ought to be ready to consent to the withdrawal of the warrant, and to making things smooth for Laxton.

"I shall really be scoring on his account!" thought the future son-in-law. "I'll undertake to say that he will do as I wish!"

"Will you sell this business, return to the old place and refund the money if I undertake to assure you of your freedom and a chance of a fresh start?" asked Granville. "Come now, think of your good name, and ask yourself what the dear ones would think of you!"

The last appeal was effective. The man's eyes filled with tears and he wept like a child.

"I'll do it!" he declared finally. "It will take about a month to realise this business, but I'll sell it and go back as soon as possible!"

"Will you put that promise on paper?" demanded Granville.

"No!" cried Laxton firmly. "I give you my word. Have I asked you to put your promise on paper?"

Granville could make no reply to this. A few minutes later he left the shop and, escorted by Laxton, walked to the nearest better-class locality, where he secured a cab to convey him to his hotel.

The following Monday afternoon saw Granville back in his office again. The last scene of the bankruptcy case was enacted in a small hall about five weeks later, when the fugitive appeared for examination.

An arrangement had been arrived at whereby the warrant had been withdrawn, and it was expected that the final proceedings would not last long.

Laxton had paid back all the money with which he had decamped, and the creditors were unanimous in the decision to accept the debtor's proposal to pay them the remainder if they would allow him to start again.

Saunders, in his spite, would have pressed the matter against Laxton, had not Granville forced him to consent by pointing out that all would be lost if his undertaking were not backed up. Granville refused to tell anything about Laxton's hiding place till Saunders consented.

The examination did not last many minutes. Granville was one of the persons called; it was considered advisable, in order to create sympathy and favour for the unfortunate man, that the solicitor should narrate his visit to Laxton, and how Laxton had been induced to see his error and make restitution.

Granville was the hero of the hour; a man who could bring about such a change was worthy of all honour! Granville related what had taken place, but he studiously suppressed all reference to the struggle.

There was a murmur of applause as Granville concluded his evidence and turned to retire to his seat. The solicitor received a shock, however, when he heard himself recalled by the barrister who was watching the case for the Board of Trade. As Granville faced about, he could not help noticing that certain persons or groups of persons looked very knowing.

"Is it a fact, Mr. Granville, that the bankrupt, when you entered his shop, tried first to throttle, and then to shoot you?"

Granville turned ghastly pale. His eyes involuntarily sought those of Laxton, and he read in them an expression of such utter contempt that he felt annihilated. Both knew that if this were proved against Laxton he would be charged with attempted murder; he might get off lightly, but it would ruin his prospects. Moreover, it was a breach of his (Granville's) undertaking.

Further, it would be a blemish on his own reputation. How had it become known? Like a flash he remembered that he had told Winnie in the excitement of success; he had asked her to keep it a secret on the next day, but she had by that time most probably told her father, and he had told others. Laxton's contempt was to be interpreted as scorn for a man who tries to make himself a hero to his friends in spite of all his promises and professed good intentions!

"Surely, Mr. Granville, that is a very simple question! Either it is true or it is false!"

These words restored Granville's self-possession; prompt reply was necessary. He stood erect once more, calm and collected. He must keep his promise to Laxton at all costs.

"It is absolutely false!" he said firmly.

There were several cries of "Oh!" but Granville was so firm that his reply was accepted. Miss Winnie Saunders and her father hurried home, and the language of the latter towards his future son-in-law was decidedly uncomplimentary, to say the least of it!

"What a boaster!" raved Saunders. "He tells a pack of lies to make himself a hero. A hero indeed! He's as big a rascal as Laxton! And I've been telling people what a man of nerve my son-in-law is! Why, we shall be the laughing-stock of the place! It's abominable that a man should lower himself to tell such untruths!"

Poor Granville! He received a curt note from Winnie, breaking off the engagement; he could not protest, for he had done wrong. She believed that he had told a deliberate lie; so he had, although the circumstances were just the reverse of what she believed! Yet, what could he do? He had given his word to Laxton, whose salvation probably rested on his assurance being kept.

Granville lent Laxton a sum of money to help him to begin life anew in another town. He himself found it necessary to make a change a short time later.

"I did not tell her for the sake of boasting, far from it!" murmured Granville, as he gathered up the newspaper and letter. "It was an unfortunate circumstance. Who was to blame?"

Which question he found it impossible to answer. Can we answer it?

George Dayford.

Digitized by Google

Splendid Serial Story.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

NAMES TO REMEMBER.

SIR TREVOR MAITLAND, of Maitland Manor, Melton.
LADY MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's second wife. Before her marriage with him she passed as a widow named Mrs. Vernon.
JACK MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's son by his first wife.
AGNES MAITLAND } Jack's sisters.
MURIEL MAITLAND }
WOOLF MAITLAND, the present Lady Maitland's only child.
IVY STRANGE, a foundling with whom Jack is in love.
HERIOT NORTH, a friend of Sir Trevor.
MIKE HOLLAND, an ex-convict and burglar who blackmails Lady Maitland, he having been in prison with her first husband.
DIGBY SCARLETT, an explorer and acquaintance of Jack. It was through him that Lady Maitland's first husband was imprisoned.
GILBERT CHASE, a detective employed by Jack to discover the mystery of Ivy's birth.
VERNON GRANT, Lady Maitland's first husband.
NURSE BEAUMONT, who knew Lady Maitland previous to her second marriage.

THIRTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

Nurse Beaumont Writes a Letter.

"Nurse! Nurse! what month is it? And how long have I been lying here?"

"It's the first week in February, and you have been ill for nearly six weeks, Mr. Maitland," replied the low voice of Nurse Beaumont, as she moved the boy's pillows, and put a cooling drink to his lips.

"Nearly six weeks!" he echoed wearily. "I don't understand; it seems a year to me. Somehow I find a difficulty in remembering how I came to be here. Tell me what happened?" and he looked her calmly in the face, noting her perturbed manner and nervous hesitancy.

"Your head was hurt, sir!" she murmured softly; "but you're getting better now."

"My head!" he repeated wonderingly; "I don't remember it. How did it happen?"

The woman cast an anxious glance at him, afraid he should, by talking, learn too much, and so throw himself into a relapse. Nurse Beaumont had guessed much from the boy's ravings while in delirium, and she had dreaded his first hour of convalescence.

"Tell me," he reiterated impatiently, "when was I first taken ill?"

"On the night of the fancy dress ball, sir," she said soothingly. "There now, the doctor said as you were to keep quiet and not excite yourself!" she went on quickly. "Let me give you a little beef-tea, sir."

The invalid pushed her hand away. "Don't give me that stuff, now! I want to talk. Tell me, nurse, how was my head hurt? Did I fall?"

"No, sir; you were found shot in the wood on the night of the ball!" she repeated. "Do not talk so much, sir," she pleaded, "or you will undo all the good that has been done."

But her patient did not hear her. He was looking with a puzzled frown through the window, where the tops of the trees swayed and bowed under the breeze.

It was difficult to collect his thoughts; somehow they seemed to hang back and refuse to come at his bidding, when once they had trooped too rapidly into his brain. But now his sole sensation was one of extreme languor, he only wanted to lie and count the sunbeams that danced into the room on a fine day, or the raindrops that splashed against the panes.

Counting, always counting, until he fell asleep, and then to wake and begin once more. Surely there was something beyond it all! A world where people did more than count; where, perhaps, they laughed and sang, and loved——!

Loved! A thought sprang into his mind and drifted into a question that sparkled in his eyes and quivered on his mouth.

Loved! Why, there was someone he loved! He remembered now! Someone with violet eyes and hair bright like the sunbeams he had wearied of counting!

He sat up and beckoned the nurse to him. His eyes were shining and his face was flushed.

"Nurse! I want her!" he laughed softly. "She must have come often to see me when I was ill and could not speak to her; but now that I am better she stays away! Send for her, nurse, at once. I want her—my living sunbeam!"

"Who am I to send for, sir?" she said, with trembling lips.

The boy laughed. "Why, Ivy Strange, my sweetheart, nurse. Go quickly, and say I want her. I shall wait impatiently till you return with her. Go! Go!"

The woman hesitated. To refuse to do his bidding would throw him into a state of excitement that would be dangerous in his present condition; and, on the other hand, when she returned without Ivy Strange—as she must do—what explanation could she give? How stave off the tornado of questions that would follow?

She moved to the door slowly, the eyes of the boy in the bed following her eagerly.

"I will send someone to look for her, Mr. Maitland," she said. "I cannot leave the sick-room alone; but one of the maids is sure to be about."

"Don't be long, nurse," he replied. "I must see her. It will be better than all the tonics in the world to look at her face again!"

With a sigh Nurse Beaumont went into the corridor and cast a hasty glance round. There was no one in sight, and she softly made her way downstairs and knocked at the door of Lady Maitland's boudoir.

"Come in!" said the low, even tones of Sir Trevor's wife; and entering, the nurse stood in the presence of the beautiful woman whom she feared and wondered at each hour she spent under the roof of Maitland Manor.

"Your ladyship," she murmured, "Mr. Maitland is asking for—for her—Miss Ivy. What am I to do?"

Lady Maitland drew her brows thoughtfully together. She was looking especially lovely that afternoon, robed in a gown of white cloth that clung to her exquisite figure in lines of classic beauty, and her cheeks had lost none of their soft, dimpled curves in spite of the trying time of her stepson's illness.

"Have you said anything to him," she asked coldly, "that he should have mentioned the subject?"

"No, your ladyship," the woman replied. "He burst out with it quite sudden-like, and sent me to fetch her to him; and, oh, your ladyship," she went on hurriedly, "what can I tell him that will satisfy him without giving him a relapse?"

Lady Maitland rose slowly from the couch, and eyed the trembling woman before her with a tolerant smile.

Digitized by Google

"You need tell him nothing, nurse," she said quietly. "I will follow you, and satisfy Mr. Maitland without exciting him. Of course, I am afraid that Miss Strange is lost now so far as he is concerned. She is either dead or worse—in the hands of the police!"

Nurse Beaumont looked at her with a strange expression.

"Then, your ladyship, you still believe that the mark I pointed out to you was nothing more than what you called a 'coincidence'?" she asked in a low voice. "Even then, your ladyship, I am certain I am right!"

"You may go now, nurse," said Lady Maitland, coldly ignoring the woman's speech completely, "and tell Mr. Maitland that I shall be with him in a few minutes."

With a last wondering look the woman turned and left the room, a curious expression on her mouth.

When she had gone Lady Maitland went to the escritoire in the window, and, unlocking it, took out a dried, yellow-looking paper she had not glanced at for some time.

"Child Dolores died, aged one year!"

She had received that brief statement when staying at Nice as Mrs. Vernon, nearly seventeen years ago, and it had given her much satisfaction, as the final cutting away of all the old moorings, leaving her safe and happy on the verge of a new life.

Now this nurse-woman, with her babbling tongue, had persisted in clinging to the idea that she had originally mooted, an idea that set the delicate teeth of her ladyship on edge, and sent a bitter gleam of hatred into her eyes. The woman was mad, and as soon as the boy upstairs could do without her services, she would see that Nurse Beaumont left the Manor.

"How I hope that wretched foundling girl has vanished for ever from our lives!" she murmured, relocking the desk. "She got away successfully, and even the efforts of the police have failed in tracing her. I wonder whether the river hides her secret?"

She left the room and presently stood by the side of the bed where Sir Trevor's son and heir lay.

He looked at her impatiently; a shade of disappointment crossing his face as he saw that his stepmother was alone.

"Where is Ivy?" he said, moving his head impatiently.

Lady Maitland turned to the nurse, who stood obedient in the room. "Nurse, will you please leave us?" she said softly. "I will not excite your patient too much, nor stay too long!"

The woman turned to do her bidding, and as her ladyship bent over the boy to kiss him she slipped swiftly behind a screen that was used to keep away the draught when people entered or left the room.

"Well, mater, you have something to tell me, I suppose?" said Jack, a weary inflection in his voice. "Is it anything concerning Ivy?"

Lady Maitland looked at him thoughtfully. He had evidently forgotten the incidents of the night of the bal masqué and the breaking of his engagement with the girl from the lodge. She would jog his memory just a trifle; not too much—that might bring about awkward consequences.

"Yes, dear," she said, placing one white hand upon the boy's brow, "it is concerning Ivy that I have come to see you; but you must promise not to excite yourself."

"Tell me," he interrupted quickly. "Don't keep me in suspense! What is it?"

She leant forward, her eyes searching the boy's white face that lay upturned on the pillow. "Ivy did not confide in me, as you know, Jack," she began. "She kept me outside her thoughts, and resented being asked any questions. But one thing she did tell me was that on the night of the ball she was engaged to Digby Scarlett!"

With an exclamation, the boy started up in bed and clutched his stepmother's white hand excitedly. His face had flushed, and the old fever-light shone in his eyes.

"Digby Scarlett! Can that be true, then?" he cried. "I fancied that I must have had some nightmare that confused those names together! Don't tell me that while I have been ill she has forgotten me!" and his eyes flashed piteously into the tender violet ones looking down upon him.

"I am afraid, dear," she murmured gently, "that there is yet something worse to tell you—something that may hurt your pride, yet at the same time show you where your love was misplaced."

She paused to watch the effect of her carefully-chosen words.

He moved his head restlessly, whilst his mouth quivered. "Nothing you can ever say will make me think that!" he said at last. "Whatever has happened, she once returned my love, and still possesses it. But tell me what you were going to say."

"Only this," his stepmother repeated softly, "the girl upon whom you have lavished so much affection left the Manor three weeks ago, leaving no address behind her."

"Well," said the boy impatiently, a warm moisture breaking out on his brow and on his smooth upper lip. "Why did she go? Who drove her—an innocent, country-bred girl, from her home? Tell me!"

He raised himself upon his pillows, and gazed steadily into the face of his father's wife.

Lady Maitland sighed softly, and murmured:

"It was a mystery, until I received this letter from Digby Scarlett this morning. He went to London some days ago—after Ivy Strange had left. I thought it odd at the time that he should neglect the pretty place he has taken so recently, to wander about London in this fearful weather, but his letter explains a great deal that puzzled me."

Jack put out his hand; it was shaking as though an icy blast had chilled the blood in his veins.

"Let me see!" he said hoarsely, his blue eyes blazing with passion. "I must know the worst!"

Silently she took the letter from the little jewelled bag at her waist and gave it to him, watching keenly the expressions that flitted across the boy's fair face.

The letter was short and crisp, containing but few lines, but they were lines that made the breath of Jack Maitland come from between his lips in quick-drawn gasps.

"Dear Lady Maitland," it began. "You will be pleased to hear that I have met Ivy in London, and we made arrangements to be married quietly, then leave for the south of France. She looks very happy.—Sincerely yours,

"Digby Scarlett."

He crushed it tightly in his hand, as he might have held the throat of the writer had they met.

"Married!" he murmured. "I can't believe that she would be so heartless. Oh, God, why did I wake to consciousness to hear this? I would rather have died believing in her!"

Suddenly he started up, and seizing his stepmother in a feverish grasp, he cried wildly: "You were right, after all, mater. She did not love me. It was—it was that man Scarlett! He won her from me while I lay a helpless log!"

He fell back upon the pillow with a laugh—a desolate echo of mirth that made the woman behind the screen shiver with fear for his reason.

Lady Maitland rose from the chair by the bed and looked at the boy who lay quite still, with the laugh lingering on his mouth.

"So he is convinced now!" she murmured. "Then he will trouble me no longer, and that—other has got the prize for which he worked! I have done my share of the compact! Now I am free—free—free!"

She glided from the room with a smile on her lips, and came face to face with Nurse Beaumont, who was entering to look after her charge.

"Ah, nurse," she said softly, "I have had my little chat with your patient. I was very quiet with him, but I am afraid he is just a trifle upset by the news I told him!"

Digitized by Google

The nurse looked after her mistress thoughtfully. "Yes," she muttered, "and I don't wonder at the poor boy being upset in his weak condition at the news I heard you tell him! It was not right, and in spite of my holding my tongue about the past, I don't mean to let that poor young fellow's life be spoilt if I can help it!"

She bent over the boy and touched him lightly on the hand. It was clenched tightly round the letter which her ladyship had left with him and forgotten to take back. Nurse Beaumont looked at it curiously. She wondered what news it contained that had helped to upset him.

"Poor boy!" she said softly, "so she has told you about your little sweetheart having gone! I don't think though," she added under her breath, "that you were told what I know, and what her laydship refuses to know!"

Jack moved his head, then his eyes opened, and met those of the nurse close to his own.

"What's the use of trying to drag me back to life?" he said bitterly. "The incentive to live has gone now!"

She bent nearer to him, and whispered cautiously: "No, no, sir! The incentive to live has not gone! You owe it to the—young lady you love to get well and fight for her. She needs it, poor child—she needs it badly!"

He turned sharply to her, an eager, questioning look in his eyes: "What do you mean? Why do you speak in that way? What do you know, nurse?"

She cast a nervous glance at the door, then said softly: "Your sweetheart is in sore danger, sir, and you are the only one that can protect her. I have only been here since the day after the ball, but I have kept my eyes open and seen more than most people reckon. And I tell you that you are doing a sore wrong to that sweet child if you let her fall into the hands of those that wish her ill!

"Get well, sir; eat and drink what will put strength into you, for each drop of new life you gain will be a step towards her! And," she continued, "her life is in worse straits than yours, sir!"

Fired by her strange words and secret manner, the boy stretched out his long, white hand to the woman who had warned him.

"Nurse!" he exclaimed excitedly, "I was a weak, cowardly fool to have put my own feelings first, before those of the girl I love! But I will get better!" he cried. "Feed me up, and I will take everything and anything you like, so that I can be once more a man, to fight and to hold!"

As he fell back upon his pillows, exhausted by the unusual excitement, Nurse Beaumont placed her hand on his burning brow.

"Then go to sleep," she said authoritatively, "that is what you are to do; don't dare to speak another word, Mr. Maitland, because I shall not answer you!"

As he turned obediently on his side, the past that had eluded and puzzled his brain, came back in a flash of luminous light across the darkness that had fallen over his mental vision, and he remembered everything—the scene between himself and Ivy when she had said she loved him alone, but would marry Digby Scarlett.

Then the appointment between himself and his rival, to fight out their claims to the girl; after that his memory faltered, and he could only recollect the stroll through the woods to meet his enemy; then a cloud descended once more, blotting out everything save his love for his tender-eyed sweetheart, who wanted him to save her from some fearful trouble.

After a while Nurse Beaumont bent over the patient and saw that he had fallen into a quiet sleep. Then she softly took from between his fingers the letter he still possessed, and quickly read the brief message it contained, afterwards placing it back in his hand.

"There is something behind all this!" she murmured thoughtfully. "He knows, like everyone else, that a warrant was out for that poor young lady's arrest. Though I'm certain she's as innocent as the babe unborn! Then, if he knows it, why does he want to marry a girl the police are after?"

She shook her head, then sat down to write a letter to a friend whom she had left in London, on the eve of taking a new situation as housekeeper. Her note was brief, saying she expected to be back in London as soon as her patient was better; then she added: "I am inclosing a shilling for you to do me a favour, dear Eliza. Will you, when you are down the Strand way, call at Somerset House and ask to see the death certificate of Dolores Grant, died July 30th, about seventeen years ago? I will tell you all when we meet."

Then she sealed and addressed the letter to:

Mrs. Riley,
C/o Vernon Vivyan, Esq.,
The Retreat,
Surbiton,
London, S. W.

THIRTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

The Long Arm of Coincidence.

"Hallo, Chase! What are you doing in London? It's ages since I had the pleasure of gazing at your extremely expressive countenance, my respected colleague."

Gilbert Chase shook hands with the man who accosted him, the ghost of a smile relaxing his mouth.

"Yes, it is rather an age, George!" he said thoughtfully, turning to walk beside his companion. "I am in town investigating one or two points dealing with my present job!"

"Ah!" ejaculated the man who had stopped him—a big, red-haired individual, with a humorous face and a peculiarly soft voice. "I heard you had the Melton murder in hand. Making much headway with it?"

His fellow-colleague smiled. "I fancy I am getting together one or two links. It is not an ordinary case."

The two went into the "Marble Halls" in the Strand, and sat down to drink their respective healths.

"Talking of out-of-the-way cases," said Frank George thoughtfully, "guess who I met the other day?"

Gilbert Chase shook his head.

"Can't imagine."

"Why, that old gentleman 'lag' who got fifteen 'stretch' for forging his pal's name, and was released on his ticket some few years ago. You remember him, because you were the junior who helped to arrest him—Vernon Grant was his name."

"Ah," said his friend slowly, "I remember, of course. What was he doing? Anything shady?"

The other shook his head. "No; he was looking quite the gentleman, spruce and well-to-do, and not in a suspicious way either, like most of the old hands when they get on a new 'lay,' but in an open sort of style. I had my doubts at the time," he went on musingly, "that there was a little foul play over that case, but it never came out, so I suppose it was the ordinary thing."

Gilbert Chase laughed cynically.

"Why, George! you're getting softening of the brain, aren't you, to go out of your way praising an old lag?"

"P'raps I am!" his friend said, with a slight flush. "Anyway," he added, rising from the table, "you've got your work cut out, old chap, to get hold of that missing girl. She seems to have vanished, so far as all trace of her can be found."

"Yes," answered Chase slowly, "the earth swallows some people up in a most mysterious way. But I don't despair—yet. It's early days for that."

As the two men parted, the thoughts of the man who was still hopeful of finding Ivy Strange drifted back to the old case which his colleague had re-opened—the forgery case in which Digby Scarlett had been the prosecutor, eighteen years ago.

Suddenly he quickened his steps. "It may lead to nothing," he muttered, "and, on the other hand, it may help me to form some idea of the character of the man who prosecuted. I've got a feeling that the master of the 'Rest' needs careful knowing, and any insight I can get into his personality will satisfy my professional curiosity, and throw some light on his present attitude. I have not forgotten that the missing girl was the bone of contention between him and poor Mr. Maitland!"

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

He hurried to the British Museum and hunted up all the old files of the Monograph of eighteen years ago, with dogged perseverance, until he found what he wanted. Then carefully, and with an absorbing interest, he read all that was printed regarding what had been a criminal cause célèbre at the time.

"Well," he muttered, closing the files thoughtfully, "in reading that over in the cold light of reason with the picture of the man before me as he is to-day, I'm almost inclined to agree with old George, and say that the poor wretch Grant was a cruelly-wronged man; and yet, there must have been some motive for the other to have plotted so diabolically—if he did, that is."

Seized with a sudden idea, he turned over the files of a Sunday paper of the same date, containing the usual sketches of the prosecutor, defendant, and other people closely concerned in the case.

As he glanced at the distorted faces in the paper that bore but slight resemblance to the originals, he started violently, as he came across one of a girl; underneath the sketch were the words: "Prisoner's bride, Margaret Grant."

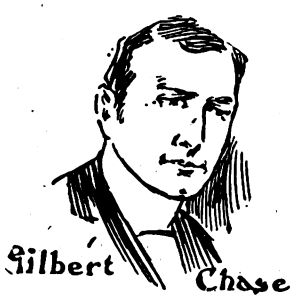
"Great Jupiter!" he muttered, a thrill of excitement making him breathe quickly; "I must be off my 'nut,' or else I have come across a regular find that fairly takes me by surprise!"

He bent intently over the face in the paper that fascinated and baffled him at the same time. It was that of a girl with a strangely imperious beauty; but it was not so much the beauty that startled the detective as the fact that he had but recently seen a similar face that might almost have been the twin to that in the Sunday paper.

"Let me think!" he muttered; "this will take careful handling; it's a delicate subject. I must not miss one single point as I trace it, for I have to unravel two mysteries with one clue!"

He turned over the pages, again reading minutely the description of the couple on their honeymoon when the prisoner was arrested. They had been married, so the paper said, just one month; then that would make the wedding take place about the end of October, as the man, Vernon Grant, was arrested about the end of November, at the address of a Mrs. Phillpot, in Ennismore Gardens, West Kensington, whose first-floor he and his bride had taken.

"Mrs. Phillpot, 14 Ennismore Gardens, West Kensington," he murmured, scribbling the address in a note-book. "I will see if she can help me, since there is no other address in the paper, and she won't remember my face by this time as one of the men who took him away. But I can't understand, all the same," he mused, "why this sketch should be the living image of that other woman—unless—unless——" and he chuckled grimly as he closed the heavy files, "unless I am on the trail of a very interesting discovery!"



Half an hour later he was in the sitting-room on the first-floor of No. 14 Ennismore Gardens, speaking to the same plump, motherly-looking woman who only a few weeks before had been questioned by Digby Scarlett.

"I can only tell you, sir," she said, "that poor Mrs. Grant left me about a year after her husband was put away. She and her little baby girl went with the nurse; the only address I knew being Southampton. After that I heard no more about them until the poor young thing's brother came to see me last December."

Gilbert Chase opened his eyes. "Let me see," he said thoughtfully, "was he a fair, bald-headed man, with a red beard?"

"Gracious, no, sir!" Mrs. Phillpot replied. "He was from America, he told me, and asked just the same questions as you are asking now. And as for being fair, he was tall and very dark, with black eyes, and a long moustache, and very beautiful teeth that any lady might envy—quite a gentleman, he was."

"Ah! you don't remember this brother's name, do you?" he asked carelessly.

She puckered her brows thoughtfully. "I can't say as I can, sir," she said apologetically; "I only know as it was a name like 'Rigby,' then another like some colour. But what it was, I can't for the life of me remember; I was always a bad one for names,"

"I wonder," he said, pressing a sovereign into her hand, as he prepared to depart, "whether Mrs. Grant left a photo of herself with you? It will be most useful if you have one, on account of the uncertainty I have in tracing the lady."

"Now I come to think of it, sir," Mrs. Phillpot murmured, "I fancy there was a picture left in a book Mrs. Grant had given to me when she was packing. I put it in a frame, and in the different spring-cleanings it has got mislaid by now, but I will go and see if it is in the box that I keep my old pictures in."

She left the room, and Gilbert Chase smiled grimly.

"Although I am not searching for Ivy Strange I am getting at the root of a much more subtle mystery! So it was a gentleman whose first name was 'Rigby,' and whose second sounded like some 'colour'! I fancy I could very easily guess those two names correctly!"

He glanced round the room thoughtfully. On the book-shelf were several volumes that looked like the reference-books that abound in the apartments of landladies. He took one down—the oldest and most shabby, and turned over the pages quickly. They were faded and yellow, almost dropping out of their binding, but as he quickly scanned them he saw one that made him hold his breath.

It was the usual stereotyped recommendation:

"Mrs. Phillpot has been more kind to me during my stay with her than can ever be repaid with money. 'Speech is silver, but silence is indeed gold." (Then followed the signature of the writer of the flattering words.)—"Margaret Grant."

With a quick glance towards the door Gilbert Chase tore this page out of the book and slipped it into his pocket. Then he replaced the volume on the shelf, as Mrs. Phillpot entered the room with a triumphant smile upon her face.

"At last, sir!" she gasped. "Just when I was afraid it was lost! It had slipped behind some books in the box."

He snatched it eagerly, and for a moment could hardly believe the evidence of his own eyes.

The face of the girl-bride of the convicted ex-convict of eighteen years ago was the image of the girl now wanted by the police on a charge of murder, or complicity of murder!

He looked again, keenly, and with an almost painful intensity. The face in the faded photo. was colder and prouder in expression than that of the girl Ivy Strange; yet, at first sight, the similarity was startling, and set a train of thoughts running in the detective's mind, suggesting weird possibilities of a great mystery of which he alone appeared to hold the key.

He thanked Mrs. Phillpot for assisting him, and promising to return the photo. when he had had it copied, he ran quickly down the steps and hailed the first hansom he saw.

His blood was boiling with suppressed excitement, and in the usually vacant blue eyes a gleam flickered that would have startled some people had they seen it. He put the photograph in his pocket-book, then took out the piece of paper that had lain forgotten among the musty books on the shelf so many years, until spotted by his professional eye.

Digitized by Google

He read the brief commendation thoughtfully three times, conning each word, and even letter, with microscopic attention. Then he again turned to another division of his pocket-book and drew out three tiny scraps of paper which he had puzzled over for some weeks, and compared two of the pieces with two words written on the sheet of paper.

They were, strangely enough, the same in either case; "silence" and "money," and as he glanced at them, Gilbert Chase drew a long, satisfied sigh.

"It's very odd," he muttered, "they are so much alike that they might even have been written by the same hand. Yes, in spite of the lapse of time, there is the sign of similar formation in the letters! It's another proof of the long arm of coincidence.

"I am glad I did not leave those important bits of paper at the 'New Age'; they were trifling evidence before, but now"—and he closed his eyes thoughtfully—"now they have become a clue of double importance. I am glad I met George. I owe him a debt of gratitude he will never know for sending my thoughts back to that old case. Now to return to Melton, and interview one or two of my old friends!"

As he stood on the platform at St. Pancras, waiting for the train to fill up, a man brushed against him roughly and passed on without troubling to apologise. With a frown Gilbert Chase glanced at him, then raised his eyebrows in momentary recognition. The man hurrying towards the first-class carriages of the train, and looking with an ugly scowl upon everyone in his path, was Digby Scarlett.

"He looks as though he had had bad news," said the detective grimly. "He would look worse if he knew where I had been!"

At that moment a telegraph boy came running quickly alongside the train, a telegram in his hand.

"Are you Mr. Digby Scarlett, sir?" panted the boy.

Quick as lightning came the detective's reply. "Yes," he said coolly, throwing a shilling to the youth, "I am expecting a telegram."

Then, with gentle finger, he opened the orange-tinted envelope. It was dated from Rotherhithe and contained the brief message:

"Plant successful. 'V.' drowned accidentally. Send money.—LAMPITT."

THIRTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

Like Sweet Bells Jangled.

SIR TREVOR MAITLAND'S beautiful wife gazed thoughtfully from her boudoir window out where the bare trees stood sentinel on either side of the drive, and the fresh presence of Spring in the air was as balm after the cutting winds of January.

Pearl Maitland was happy, with a proud sense of victory in her happiness, for she had overridden obstacles before which other women would have stood aghast.

Her inimitable audacity had steered her through a storm of suspicion that would have caused even a stouter heart than hers to quail before such terrible odds. But she had come through all with flying colours.

In each encounter she had outwitted the enemy, and now it was with a sense of relief and joy that she sat thinking about the future.

Nurse Beaumont had left, and Lady Maitland smiled slightly as she remembered how she had intercepted a letter that estimable woman had left on the table to go with the post-bag.

She had distrusted her somehow, in spite of her silence concerning their past connection, and seeing this letter, had confiscated it, made herself acquainted with the contents; then, smiling grimly, had flung it in the fire. "So much for Nurse Beaumont!" she had said.

Now that Digby Scarlett had gained his wish she was free to pick up the threads of her life where she had laid them down in order to fight a silent, strenuous battle for the sake of her boy.

Her secret was doubly a secret now, since she had drawn the claws of her enemies—except those of Agnes!

Then she laughed softly. After all, what could Agnes do? It was some time since she had mentioned the man whom she had met at the house of her friend, and probably, seeing that her shaft had fallen flat, had forgotten the incident.

"Yes; now I will forget the past three months of horror!" she murmured, picking up the book she had held loosely on her knee.

It was by a new author, and attracted her both on account of the strong, human note it revealed, and the fact that the writer had the same name as that on the envelope Nurse Beaumont had written to her friend in London.

Suddenly the door opened, then closed softly.

"Is that you, Trevor?" she said lazily, without turning her head.

"No, Lady Maitland," answered the intruder. "It is I—Heriot North."

Something—a note of aloofness in the voice of the man who shared with her part knowledge of a midnight rendezvous—sent a thrill of fear through her. Had she miscalculated her security after all?

"I am glad you have come to see me!" she said brightly. 'I was wondering if you had gone to town."

"I did not go to town," he said coldly. "I stayed away because I could not come!"

"Could not come?" she repeated, her breath quickening; "what do you mean?"

He came nearer to her, yet she noticed that he avoided touching her. "I mean," he said, in a low, intense voice, "that I was tricked and deceived by you that other afternoon, when you told me your version of what happened in the wood. I believed you implicitly! Oh, Heaven!" he cried passionately, "I forged my soul to yours in a bond of silence that I must keep now! And you let me—you let me vow fidelity to a lie—to knit myself to a——"

She raised her hand with a sudden imperious gesture.

"Hush, you madman! Not so loud! Explain yourself!"

He drew his hand across his mouth; it was wet, and quivered like a child's.

"There was a woman in the wood that night," he said slowly, "a woman with black hair! You knew it, and you lied to me with a smile on your lips!"

She looked at him curiously. In spite of anything he said to her she felt that he would not betray her! He would rather die first!

She pushed back a stray wisp of hair; it was damp with sudden moisture.

"How did you learn—that?" she said softly.

"How?" he returned bitterly. "Can a man close his ears to what is a common subject wherever he goes? It was scarcely a whisper at first, then it grew into a positive statement. I heard how the detective had caught the wrist of a woman, upon whose arm he had left a bruise. Then—then I remembered the band of black velvet you had worn round your wrist for some days since the night of the bal masqué. And my eyes were opened!"

She went up to him swiftly, and in the firelight her face looked strangely lovely.

"And because of that—Heriot," she murmured softly, "you hurl your condemnation on my head! Is it fair to listen to such reports, and then—because you had my entire confidence—to jump to such hasty conclusions? I thought you would be true to your vow for ever."

He shuddered. "Yes; to my vow of silence I must be true; but the ideal to which I clung has crumbled! You admit that the story you told me was false, then?" and he unconsciously gripped the back of a chair in his eagerness to learn that there was some particular he could still believe.

"The story I told you about that man possessing a secret of my dead husband, was true!" she began slowly. "I have told you the truth, so far as you were entitled to it! Now," and she drew herself up haughtily, "what more is there that you wish cleared up? You have heard both accounts—which do you believe, mine or the other?

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

"I repeat," she continued, after seeing that he was still silent, "that I saw no one else in the wood that night. What reason would I have for an unnecessary lie? Come! who has been trying to poison your mind against me, when I have learnt so nearly to rely upon your strength, to trust to your—your regard!" The last word she breathed so softly that it barely reached him.

He flushed guiltily. The subtle influence her beauty exercised over him was once more beginning to draw his strength from him, like the fumes of a noxious flower.

"No one has poisoned my mind," he said quickly. "As I said, I heard reports about a woman in the wood. Men talk among themselves idly, and in view of the bond between us—knowing what I did—perhaps I may have jumped to a hasty conclusion."

"Men?" she murmured thoughtfully. "What men?"

"Oh, I heard Digby Scarlett discussing the affair some days ago," he replied, "but now that you have convinced me that you were not the woman about whom is all this wonder and suspicion, I do not care who she was. I fear I am impulsive," he went on, feeling he had made an exhibition of himself "but ever since I burnt those things for you I have been haunted by the fear of discovery—for your sake!"

She put out her hand. "Let me impress one thing upon you—avoid Digby Scarlett; he is a bad man, a false friend, and—I hate him!"

"Hate him!" he said, in surprise. "Why? Although I fancied I had met him somewhere before, I did not notice him much. Have you known him long?"

A curious expression crossed her face. "No; we met some few months ago—quite recently; but I have known him long enough to hate him!" she said, in a low, bitter tone.

"It is unfortunately true that listeners hear no good of themselves," said a suave, well-bred voice behind them—a voice that sent a cold shiver through Sir Trevor's wife, and chased the colour from her cheeks, as, sending a startled glance at the door, she and her companion saw in the flickering firelight the tall figure of Digby Scarlett, with a sinister, smiling expression on his mouth, looking from one to the other. He came forward slowly.

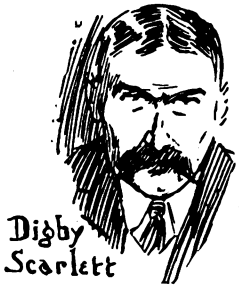
"I am afraid," he began, turning to Heriot North, who was gazing at him in an embarrassed silence, "that her ladyship made a slight error in saying she had known me for a few months only!" Then, addressing the cold, beautiful woman who faced him defiantly, he said: "Shall I say how long it is since we parted, Lady Maitland?"

Heriot North made a movement towards the man who had spoken such insolent words to the woman whose secret he shared.

"I wish to hear nothing that you can say," he replied curtly. "The length of Lady Maitland's acquaintance with you has no interest for me."

Digby Scarlett laughed.

"Not," he went on, "if I can tell you that it is eighteen years since this lady and myself parted! The occasion was tragic; the scene—a criminal court!"



He stopped abruptly, as Heriot North sprang forward and struck him across the mouth.

"You lie!" he exclaimed hoarsely. "You contemptible cur! Take back your words!"

Livid with rage, the other wiped his mouth, and when he withdrew his hand it was red.

"Lie!" he gasped; "you quixotic fool—look at that woman's face! Ask her if it is not true that she is a bigamist, with no right to the title of 'Lady Maitland!' Look at her trembling lips, and frightened eyes, then ask her 'ladyship' to relate about her marriage with a convicted felon still living!"

There was a pause, broken neither by the cornered woman, in her beauty, nor by the two passion-gripped men, but by a low, inarticulate sound that came from the door.

Instinctively they turned, and, tottering into the room, with a distorted face and foolish, babbling mouth, came Sir Trevor Maitland, the squire of Melton!

(Another long instalment next week.)

A splendid new serial romance by

HENRY T. JOHNSON

will commence next week. Its title will be

"THE SNARE OF GOLD."

She: "A motor car is a distinct disadvantage." He: "How's that?" She: "There's no horse to hit when you're annoyed."

Employer: "You put that note where it will be sure to attract Mr. Smith's attention when he comes in, didn't you?" Office Boy: "Yes, sir, I stuck a pin through it, and put it on his chair."

"Yes," said the teacher, "the egg represents all that is gentlest in creation—the cooing doves, the tuneful song-birds, and the stately swan. Johnny, what other gentle things are hatched from eggs?" "Snakes, ostriches, alligators, sparrow-hawks, and eagles," said Johnny.

Bertie: "What! Only married a year, and yet you are so downcast!" Wally: "Ah, my dear fellow, I never imagined that a wife would prove such a costly article." Bertie: "Yes, a wife is a costly article, that's true; but then you must remember that she lasts a man a precious long time."

SIXPENNY EDITIONS OF FAMOUS NOVELS FOR HOLIDAY READING.

Adventures of Captain Kettle. By C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne.
Further Adventures of Captain Kettle. By C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne.
The Adventures of Nell Gwyn. By Frankfort Moore.
Becky. By Helen Mathers.
The Woman of Death. By Guy Boothby.
David Harum. 825th Thousand.
A Loyal Lover. By Mrs. Lovett Cameron.
Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler. By Richard Marsh.
Lady Jezebel. By Fergus Hume.
Queen of the Jesters. By Max Pemberton.
The Parasite. By Sir A. Conan Doyle.
Paul Beck. By M. McDonnell Bodkin, K.C.
Guilty Gold. By Headon Hill.
A Honeymoon in Space. By George Griffith.
A Patched Up Affair By Florence Warden.

At all Railway Bookstalls, Booksellers, etc., or post free for 8d. from C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

HEARING AND HOW TO KEEP IT.

An instructive article on "How to preserve the hearing and how to cure deafness" appears in the last REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE, AND THROAT DISEASES. Anyone whose hearing is failing should send for a free copy of this Medical Journal. Address all communications to The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED)

absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free, supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by

MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

2/ PER PAIR

HIGH NECK SHORT SLEEVES

LADIES' SUMMER Unshrinkable COMBINATIONS at 2/- the pair

We are offering an enormous purchase of Ladies' Elastic Ribbed, Woven Combinations at the astounding price of 2s. the pair. Sold by many Retail Stores at double the money. They are perfect in shape, beautifully finished, soft as silk. Ideal garments for summer wear. Colors: Pink, White and Natural.

2 pairs for 3/10: Postage 4d. extra. 4 pairs for 7/6. State size required.

FREE. Our "HOME SHOPPING BARGAIN BOOK."

T. & J. ROBERTS, The Great Warehousemen, SHEFFIELD

BORAX STARCH GLAZE IMPROVES ALL STARCH

The Assurance of a Perfect Finish

is in every packet of Borax Starch Glaze. It not only gives a pliable stiffness and a brilliant gloss, but also prevents the iron sticking and saves all the wearing friction of excessive ironing.

No starch made can give the finish you wish to obtain of itself.

Borax Starch Glaze is necessary to all.

Use it next ironing-day, and be convinced.

1d. packets—good for several ironings—wherever starch is sold.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

Write for FREE SAMPLE AND NOVELTIES.

Name this Paper and your Grocer.

BORAX DRY SOAP FOR WASHING EVERYTHING.

Icilma

Nature's Remedy for Complexion and Skin Troubles, whether caused by cold, heat, age, irritations or accident. Send 1d. stamp for postage of Free Sample and Booklet, explaining the action of Icilma on the Skin.—ICILMA (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheel, Bowden Brake or New Departure Back Pedal Hub Brake; all Fittings.

For Cash or 12 mo. payments

Carr. Paid.

£8 8 0 ,, 15/10 each.
£9 0 0 ,, 16/8 ,,
£9 10 0 ,, 17/6 ,,
£10 5 0 ,, 19/3 ,,

All a Cyclist needs at lowest prices.

Trailers from £5 5 0, or 10/6 monthly. Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 600 illustrns. tions, sent post free.—METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' Co. Ltd. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

THIS IS . . .

Don Q.

The latest hero in fiction, whose startling adventures are to be found in

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

Another story about him appears in the August Number.

Published August 1st. Price 6D.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

DAILY EXPRESS.

ONE HALFPENNY.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

Digitized by Google

No Danger!

She: "If you attempt to kiss me, I'll call mamma." He: "And what will happen then?" She: "Oh, nothing, for mamma isn't at home."

Different Kinds of Love.

Tom: "Women don't love men for what they really are, but for what they have done!" Kitty: "And men love women for what their fathers have done!"

Passing Away Time.

"What are you doing in here?" asked the other fellow who had just come in. "Just passing away the time," was the answer, as he handed his watch to the pawnbroker.

Not at all Strange.

Hicks: "Isn't it strange that while my hair is getting grey my moustache is not?" Mrs. Hicks: "Oh, I don't think so; your moustache is about twenty years younger, you know."

Qualities to be Inherited.

"I hope you appreciate the fact, sir, that in marrying my daughter you marry a large-hearted, generous girl." "I do, sir" (with emotion), "and I hope she inherits those qualities from her father."

Flattery Won the Day.

Ardent Suitor: "I lay my fortune at your feet." Fair Lady: "Fortune! I did not know you had money." Ardent Suitor: "I haven't much; but it takes very little to cover those tiny feet." He got her.

Not a Nice Mind.

She: "It can hardly be questioned that every woman is more or less of a mind reader." He: "Do you think you could read mine?" She: "I'd rather not. Mamma is a little particular as to the character of my reading."

Cheaper to Part.

Miranda (sobbing): "It is better in every way that we should part, dear Orlando." Orlando (in a choked voice): "Only in one way, dearest." Miranda: "Yes, beloved?" Orlando (overcome with emotion): "It is cheaper, darling."

Matters they Overlooked.

Syms: "Ah, my boy, you are to be envied. An artist's life is an ideal one. The affairs of everyday life do not engross you." Daubers (whose pictures do not sell): "Not a bit. Why, we sometimes entirely overlook such prosaic matters as breakfast and dinner."

Better Thus.

Miss Saged (to veterinary surgeon): "Oh, dear, Mr. Simpkins, I am so afraid dear little Fido is going to have rabies." Mr. Simpkins (after careful examination): "Indeed, miss, I don't see any signs of it." Miss Saged (caressing him—Fido): "But his poor dear little tongue is always hanging out of his mouth." Mr. Simpkins: "That, my dear madam, is in accordance with a merciful dispensation of Providence. You see if it hung out of his ear, he might experience some little difficulty in drinking."

A Religion Worth Embracing.

Kate: "No, Hattie does not attend any church; she says she is her own religion." Harry: "That is a religion I would like to embrace."

Impossible to Do it.

Doctor: "I would advise you to take a walk every morning before breakfast." Sappy: "But, doctor, I—ah—never get up until after bweakfast, y'know."

It was a Strong Fish.

Wife: "Are you sure you caught this fish?" Mr. Gayfello: "Of course." Wife: "It smells very strong." Mr. Gayfello: "Strong? I should say it was. It nearly pulled me overboard."

Both were Pretending.

Mrs. Smythe: "Before we were married you used to pretend that you liked to have me sit on your lap for an entire evening." Smythe: "Yes, and you used to pretend that you preferred to sit in a chair."

Moonlight was Cheaper.

"I'll woo thee in the moonlight," sang the lover to his girl, who was gazing fondly on him from the casement; "It's much cheaper than the gaslight," sang her father, the old churl, who was taking observations from the basement.

He was Absent-Minded.

He is a very absent-minded man, and was thinking earnestly when a light shower came on. "Jack," said the young woman with him, "why don't you put up your umbrella?" "I have tried to," he answered, "but I couldn't get a penny on it."

Too Much of a Good Thing.

"I believe in trying to put as good a face as possible on everything in times like these, Maria," said Mr. Billus, looking again at the bill that had just been brought in; "but it does seem to me that seventeen shillings for complexion wash in one month is putting it on a little too thick!"

He Ought to Know.

A clergyman, having performed the marriage ceremony for a couple, undertook to write out the usual marriage certificate, but, being in doubt as to the day of the month, he asked: "This is the ninth, is it not?" "Why, parson," said the blushing bride, "you do all my marrying, and you ought to remember that this is only the fourth."

No Tinge of Bitterness.

"Does it not throw a shade of bitterness into your heart in the autumn," she said, "to see the trees all leafless, and to hear the wind sighing for ever in mournful monotony? Does it not make you feel that there is too much that is bleak in the world?" "No," he answered, "it weally does not." "Why?" "Because my papa is in the coal business."

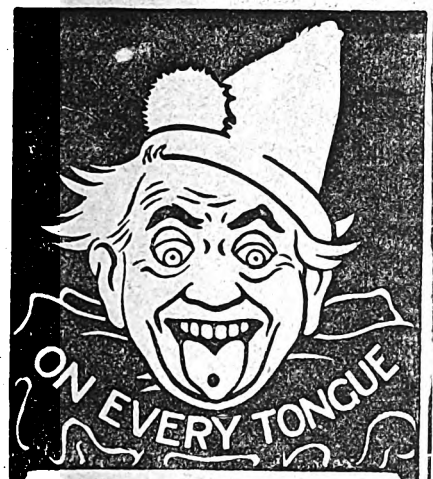
Couldn't Have Forgotten Anything.

When the train made its first stop after leaving home, Mr. Simkins, who had been in a brown study for several minutes, raised his eyes, which had a troubled look in them, and remarked: "My dear, are you sure we haven't forgotten anything?" "Of course we haven't," responded the good lady cheerfully. "I would have thought of it the minute the train started."

Too Willing.

"Dear me," he whispered, "do you think if I married you, your father would forgive us?" "I'm sure he would, dear," she asserted, softly. "And would he give us a house of our own?" "I know he would, dearest." "And would he give us enough to live beautifully on?" "I'm sure of it, Harry." "And would he take me into the firm?" "Certainly he would." "And let me run the business to suit myself?" "Of course he would, darling." She snuggled closely to his bosom, but he put her aside coldly. "I can never marry you," he said, hoarsely. "Your father is too willing to get you off his hands."

Digitized by Google



1/1½ Page 2/9

Woodcock's Pills

For Wind on the Stomach Biliousness, Indigestion, and all Stomach and Liver Troubles, there is no remedy so safe and sure as these famous Pills. A substitute is a risk. Purely Vegetable, tasteless, mild and tonic in action. 50 Years Increasing British Reputation.

SMITHS

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers, Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc. The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

Tins, 3d. 6d. & 1/-

PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

SAPON THE IDEAL CLEANSER

"IT DOES ITSELF!"

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Going to South Africa.

You are in love with a young man in South Africa, "QUEENIE," who wishes you to go out and join him there. Your parents object to your going so far away. You are very fond of him, and would like to go.

* * * * *

If he is in a good position in Africa, and could make you a good home, and has proved that he is fond of you, I should certainly accept his proposal. It would be better, though, if he could return for a little time, to be married at home, and to personally convince your parents as to his fitness to be your husband. Naturally they do not like the idea of your going so far away without being satisfied that all is as it should be.

❦❦❦

What to Do with the First Wedding Ring.

"A LADY who has become widowed at twenty-five," writes "ONE IN DOUBT," "has become engaged again two years after her husband's death. On her lover's next visit he wishes to give her a ring. She wants to know what should be done with her wedding ring under the circumstances. Should she cease wearing it?"

* * * * *

There is no known rule on this point. Opinions differ as to the disposal of the late wedding ring. However, I believe it is usual to continue wearing it until the day of the second marriage ceremony. Many women who have married in widowhood continue their first wedding ring for the rest of their lives, sometimes, however, transferring it to the other hand. However, it is usual to discontinue the first wedding ring on having the second placed on the hand.

❦❦❦

Troubles of a Careless Man.

"W. E. R." accepted an invitation to a party recently, but forgot the date and mislaid the invitation card. What could he do to get out of his dilemma?

* * * * *

I should find out from a mutual friend the date of the party. If, however, you do not know any other guest, there is nothing for it but to write a polite note to your hostess asking her to let you know the day, as you have mislaid the card. She will think it very careless of you, but that would be better than going on the wrong day or not appearing at all.

* * * * *

If you do not like to risk offending your hostess by writing to inquire the date, I should get out of it altogether by writing again saying that important business or something prevents your coming to the party. I am afraid the careless man is compelled to descend to many such fibs to make up for his faults.

The Introduction Question.

"ANXIOUS."—You see a girl about constantly, yet have not the courage to address her. You sit behind her at church, and her sister lives with her husband at your seaside town. How can you get the necessary introduction?

* * * * *

It should not be difficult to get acquainted with her sister's husband. I suppose he belongs to some club, or takes part in some local work, which ought to bring you easily into touch with him. That would lead to an introduction to his wife, and after that to the girl by whom you are so attracted

❦❦❦

And Again.

"A. E. W." wishes to get acquainted with a young lady, who lives near him. Would it be the proper thing for him to walk to the station with her in the mornings, if he bids her "Good-morning?" He finds it difficult to get to know her in any other way.

* * * * *

If the young lady shows an inclination to acknowledge your "good morning," there would be nothing against your speaking to her at greater length as time went on. That is for her to decide. Do not thrust your acquaintance on her, if she has not shown any desire herself to know you.

❦❦❦

Should Men Wear Rings?

"TROUBLED" is engaged to a girl, but is in doubt whether or not he should wear an engagement ring himself. What is the usual thing under the circumstances?

* * * * *

It is purely a matter of taste. Some men indulge in such fancies as rings and jewellery generally. These would certainly wear one on the occasion of their engagement, and his sweetheart, observing her lover's taste for rings, would probably present him with it.

* * * * *

On the other hand, many men dislike the idea of rings altogether, thinking them not only a trifle effeminate, but apt to interfere with any manual work or sport. These would be unlikely to wear an engagement ring. Personally, I have no opinion on the matter, as it is entirely a matter of taste and temperament. One thing, however, I might add, and that is that a display of many rings on a man's finger is not only vain, but vulgar.

❦❦❦

Finding One's Counterpart.

"MACFIE" writes: "How should I go about getting my counterpart in the female community? There must be a means, and I should think, from the way you write in 'In Confidence' that you are the one to answer it."

* * * * *

Thank you for your appreciation, "MACFIE." One's counterpart, of course, does not grow on wayside bushes, to be gathered by the seeking. The idea that every man has his "counterpart" is rather too much believed. The happiest marriages are between those who are by no means counterparts.

* * * * *

No doubt, looking on marriage as a sort of convenient arrangement, the counterpart is what is sought, but the question of love drives all such considerations out of the case. Do not go about speculating on which woman is your counterpart, because you will probably make the usual mistakes. Wives are rarely found by calculation. Wait till you meet a woman who inspires some deeper feeling, and then go into the question as to whether she has the qualities you look for.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FROM

A LECTURE ON COCOA

BY

DR. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

"A Cocoa Bean is a kind of Vegetable Egg, which contains all that is needed to build up a living body . . . . Cocoa is a combination of foods—of true foods in every sense of the term. . . . But see that you get a really good cocoa. I should say use

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

Cocoa

which is my IDEAL OF PERFECTION.

There is NO BETTER FOOD."

Sold only in 6d. Packets—¼ ½ and 1-lb. Tins.

WHITE AND GOLD LABEL.

Digitized by Google

Holiday Enjoyment.

The capacity for enjoyment, of whatever kind, is dependent on such physical conditions as, in the majority of cases, are entirely under our own control. We are all, more or less, aware that the neglect or indifference to apparently small ailments takes the enjoyment out of our daily lives. If this indifference and this neglect have no worse results, they, at any rate, deprive us of the ability to enjoy opportunity when it comes. But they also, by slow degrees, sow the seeds of permanent organic trouble. Men and women do not wish to see darkened the bright and happy days which life presents to all. There is a prescription whereby health is maintained at its greatest vigor—a simple, easy, pleasant method within everybody's reach. In a word—

BEECHAM'S PILLS

THEY HAVE STOOD THE TEST OF THE MOST EXACTING EXPERIENCE THROUGH MANY YEARS.

Nothing has been found to equal them as a general restorative and renovator of the human system. Bear in mind that BEECHAM'S PILLS will do what is claimed for them, because they are a special preparation of purely vegetable extracts, highly concentrated, finely balanced, and carefully compounded to suit the needs of the generality of men and women.

AND ONE WORD MORE ABOUT HOLIDAY TIME.

Some of us will suffer from temporary indisposition, chills, over-fatigue, a run-down feeling, and many minor disturbances of health functions. Remember that one can really rely on BEECHAM'S PILLS at any moment as a friend in need, so that we can surely feel that we shall enjoy our holidays to the full.

THEY MAINTAIN THEIR REPUTATION FOR KEEPING PEOPLE IN GOOD HEALTH AND GOOD CONDITION.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 pills), 2/9 (168 pills).

6,000,000 Boxes Sold Annually.

Digitized by Google

POWERFUL SERIAL STORY STARTS INSIDE.

SHORT STORIES

No. 762.] Week ending August 8th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

She pushed the pearls off one by one as she walked along.

Digitized by Google

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "The Man with the Strange Eyes." See inside.)

THREE GRAND

KODAK

AMATEUR

PHOTOGRAPHIC COMPETITIONS.

£1,000

(ONE THOUSAND POUNDS)

in CASH Prizes.

£500 for Pictures on N.C. Film (non-curling and orthochromatic).

£300 for Pictures on KODOID Plates (thin, flat, and unbreakable).

£200 for roll-films developed in KODAK DEVELOPING MACHINE.

Ask your Dealer for full particulars, or write direct to Dept. 35,

KODAK Ltd., 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, LIVERPOOL; and 72-74 Buchanan Street, GLASGOW.

Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, W., 171-173 Regent Street, W.; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

Headache

Kaputine cures the most obstinate Headache or Neuralgic Pains in ten minutes. Is the only preparation of its kind having the confidence and recommendation of Medical Men.

Kaputine THE SAFE

Dr. Andrew Wilson, F.R.S.E., says: There can be no hesitation on the part of anyone suffering from Neuralgic troubles to employ Kaputine—the safe remedy.

The only remedy of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.

Kaputine Ltd., Huddersfield.

Neuralgia

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED)

absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free, supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by

MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

300 Gold Medals, &c.

Half a tea-spoonful is sufficient to make a cup of most delicious Cocoa.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

No. 762.] Week Ending August 8th, 1903. [One Penny.

NEW SERIAL STORY. STARTS TO-DAY.

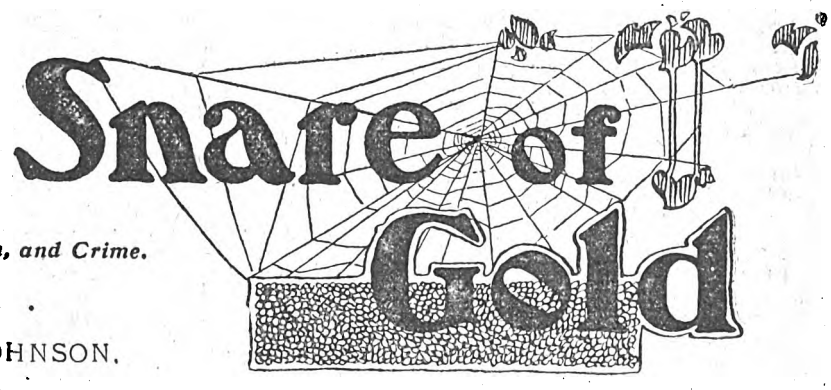
The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

By
Henry T. Johnson.

FIRST CHAPTER.

The Chamber of Death.

Tick! Tick!

No other sound but that, the tick-tick of the death watch, broke, nay, intensified the silence of the death chamber. Presently the door opened, and with hushed tread four men, sombre of mien and garb, entered, furnished with implements of trade.

Methodically, impassively, they advanced to where It was lying in Its resting house upon the trestles. Casually they glanced at It, with no want of reverence, but with the stolidity born of long and constant usage.

And yet one of them remarked, involuntarily: "Looks like life, might be sleeping."

"Yes," said another, "wonder what it was?"

"Stiffikit says heart failure," said a third.

"Half a tick," remarked a fourth, who had moved to the door, responsive to a subdued tapping, "a genelman says if we'd like a little something before or after we've finished we'll find it in the room there on the right."

"He's very kind," said Number One, "let's get it over quick, mates."

"What's the 'urry?" asked Number Two, "the chap inside there ain't impatient."

"Not now," said Number Three; "it's hurry as brings on his complaint."

"Well, come along," said Number Four, "a little stimulant won't do any of us any harm."

And together they trooped through another door down the short winding stair to where, upon a table, stood a spirit tantalus, a tray of glasses and some sandwiches.

Once again only the tick-tick of the death watch sounded in the death chamber, except that from below there came at times a hum of subdued talk, a clatter and a chink, for the sandwiches were good, the spirits excellent.

George Geldart murmured: "So tired!" Then he dozed again. Presently he moved uneasily, stretched out his arms and yawned, dropped them; they hit on something hard, like the side of a chest or box.

"What a thundering long time I've been asleep," he said, with another yawn. "Hardly like a sleep, more like a torpor, anyway, must get up. Wonder what's the time? Blinds down, but it's daylight, and this is December, too. What are these boards? Why—what's it mean? These partitions—what's the matter?"

All of a sudden he gazed into a mirror on the opposite wall. Then a great gasp of horror convulsed his frame, and his cheeks blenched white as the weird, strange folds over his brow, his face and form. With a whimpering shudder he sank back again, then sprang up in the haste of terror. Not there—not there—he mustn't lie down there!

No, no; out and free he clambered. Then awhile stood still clasping his bandaged forehead with his hands. With dilated eyes again he glanced at the strange, weird sexagon still yawning there upon the trestles, then, with instinctive terror, he slid back the lid, closing the yawning interior, crept backwards away from it lest he might again fall into that rigid sleep—lest once again they might lay him there.

Voices! A man's and—a woman's. Still moved by instinct he flung aside the wardrobe door, drew himself within, closed it, stood there trembling like an aspen, cold as ice, and with the beads oozing from every pore as though the eyes were thawing.

"Would you like to look at him?" It was Eric asking.

And it was Clare who whispered: "No, no! I should read reproach in that face now."

"Why should he reproach?"

"Because, perhaps now things are clear to him; perhaps the dead know things the living keep from one another."

"What then?"

"Well, Ronnie was his favourite, till——"

"Till he robbed him."

"Till he thought he robbed him. But now perhaps he knows the truth, and that's why, Eric, I daren't look at him—daren't stay near him. Come, come away!"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Come along then. I, too, feel a trifle creepy here. There's one thing to be regretted."

"That he was cut off so soon?"

"No, no, not that."

"That we deceived him and wronged your brother?"

"No, no! I'm thinking what a pity, or, rather, what a shame it was that to the last he cherished that idiotic prejudice of his against Life Assurance."

"Eric, how hard you are! I wonder sometimes if you are conscious of any other emotion save the lust of gold."

"Oh, yes, yes! You don't know me yet. There is something else I yearn for."

The man there in his hiding-place could not see the sparkle in the girl's eyes as she raised them quickly to the speaker's face, but he noted the eager, yearning tone.

"Oh, yes, yes, I know. I think I know—anyway, I can guess, there is something else you crave."

"Yes," he answered. "Power!"

"Oh!" Her voice died in almost a wail, and Geldart heard her companion whisper in her ear, "Oh, yes, yes; there is one other thing I prize—your love."

"It is well you prize it," she said, "for it has made sacrifices enough for you."

"I know—I know."

There came a tap at the chamber door. Geldart could hear the frou-frou of the girl's skirt as she slid from the room and presently he heard another voice, the voice of Boanerges Blagdon, the friend he had so often befriended, and a suave, unctuous voice that Geldart knew to belong to a suave, unctuous, swat-bellied, double-chinned, blue-cheeked, bald man whispered: "We're quite safe now, Eric."

"Oh, yes," the other answered, "dead men tell no tales."

"It saves a lot of trouble, he'd have made an awful row when he learnt what we'd been doing with the firm's money, almost as much as when he found my promissory notes were missing."

"Yes, you can reckon that it was that excitement that brought on the fit that killed him."

"Don't say that."

"Why not? Because it's true; you know it is."

"Yes, yes," the other whispered in a lowered tone, "it was a frightful ordeal for me to go through—to tell him he was dreaming, that he never lent me the money, and that I never gave him any promissory notes. And, oh, his face when he went to his private safe to produce them, and pulling out the drawer within rummaged it over to find them, and failing to find them, shouted: 'They are stolen—stolen; my Ronald who has robbed me in other ways has robbed me of these, and I can see that you are in league with him.'

"Oh, I shall never get it out of my eyes, his face that had grown so pale turning from white to grey and from grey to purple, never shall drive from my ears the sound of his groan as he fell face forward full length on the floor."

"I wish you wouldn't keep on talking about that," said the other. "I wish, instead of talking, you'd pay up."

"Pay up what, Eric?"

"The price you promised me—the price I had to pay somebody else for getting your notes of hand."

"Why, why, Eric, we were both in the swim; the money was to make up your losses as well as mine."

"I don't care; you promised, remember, honour amongst ——"

"Don't—don't use such language, Eric. Don't say such uncomfortable things. You'll have to split on yourself as well as on me, and then you have no proofs." The voice was now more unctuous than ever, and then—Geldart could imagine, though he could not see, the stride the other made across the room, his fists clenched, his eyes dilated, and he could hear his words.

"So, you traitor, double-dyed, you'd betray even your fellow traitor; you'd play the same trick on me! No evidence now? That's where you're wrong. I've the evidence of one who at my bidding would tell the truth to her own eternal ruin. I'd tell the truth, too, if you came your tricks with me; I'd send you to Portland, if I had to go there with you, and toil there shackled limb to limb with you in chains."

"Oh, Eric, Eric, you mistake me!" the other answered in a trembling voice. "I know—I know; yes. You did the work—anyway, you got it done, and you shall have your price."

"You'll have a bad time if I don't," the other growled, and Geldart, listening, felt his heart turned to ice.

But he was to hear more yet.

"It's a dreadful business, Eric," said the other, drawing near the coffin, "on second thoughts I don't think I'd like to see him. I feel as if—as if—but then that's all imagination; he died a natural death."

"Yes," said the other, "and he died very conveniently."

"Well, it saved a lot of trouble. With all his eccentricities there'd have been some hard swearing to have got him safe away."

"Well, then, we should have sworn hard; Mac would have given the certificate. Anyway, he died and saved us the trouble—and the expense."

"Yes, yes, and it's better for him to be in there—and where he's going, than to be shut up in padded rooms and things, because he'd have been very violent, and he was always so very restless—superabundant energy they called it—but his abundance has all vanished now. Come along, Eric, I don't feel comfortable here."

The door clicked behind them. And, with icy beads trickling from his brow, silently, stealthily, George Geldart, emerging from that wardrobe, crept towards that other door ajar, listened to the clink and the clatter, heard a voice, "Now then, mates, back to business!" and another, "All right, only let's finish up, it ain't likely the cove in there will grumble at being left waiting!" Back from that door he crept, back to the wardrobe, wrapped bodily in grave clothes, mentally in thought. Softly he smote the left palm of his right fist, registering the stroke of an idea.

From within he drew a pair of Indian clubs, a set of golf clubs, a well-filled cricket-bag, a gun-case, and, swiftly crossing towards the trestles, pushed back the lid, then, with these things and the linen folds that swathed him, filled the emptiness that he had left. Then he withdrew within the wardrobe.

A moment later Number One, wiping his mouth with his sleeve, said: "Buck up, chaps! I fancy some of 'em have been in to see what's keeping us so long, I heard somebody movin'."

"Righto!" said Number Two, fixing and commencing to drive the screw, to make up for lost time. "Now we shan't be long!"

"Fancy a chap like him inside having to leave the good things of a house like this to go where he's a-going," said Number Three, in whom Hollands induced melancholy tendencies. And Number Four chimed in with—

"Just what I was thinkin', Alf, he won't do the feastin' where he's goin', though in one way he'll furnish the banquet."

And as they talked they went on screwing.

At last their footfalls receded down the stair—and then were gone.

Once again the man thrust back that wardrobe door, once again closed himself in darkness. For he heard another voice coming nearer—nearer.

"You might have waited just a little while—you might have let me look upon his face again. I've left the house, I'm leaving England, you've driven me not only from my home but from my native land, but you might have let me see him once. No, no! If you don't mind, I want to go in there alone."

And from within that wardrobe George Geldart heard the door close with a click, heard the sound of footsteps crossing the floor, then of knees sinking heavily upon it.

Heard yet another sound, a sad and cruel sound to hear; a strong man sobbing, clenched his own teeth and lips to keep down a something swelling in his own throat, listened with all his ears, with all his heart, and this is what he heard:

"Dad, dad! Oh, God, it was a bit too cruel! They might have let me see him once again—might have let me look on him, though never more he'll look on me. And now—Oh, father, father, you can't hear me—you wouldn't believe me when you could, but, oh, perhaps you might have done—in time! And now you'll never know. Oh, dad—dad! You're gone from me—gone believing wrong of me, who would sooner have died than wronged you. Oh, I loved you so!"

Digitized by Google

Then there was again a deathly silence for a while.

"Dad—perhaps it's best—for you'll meet mother, where you're gone—and she will know—and tell you!"

Click! Once again the door was closed.

Ronald was gone! Ronald, whom he had wronged—on whom the shadow of a wicked lie had lain, whose brother had been even crueller to him than was Abel's.

And then George Geldart left his hiding-place again, locked both doors, donned a suit of tweeds and a hat, an overcoat, a pair of boots, and, waiting and watching his opportunity crept down the silent stairs, across the lofty hall, silent as the grave to which he had so nearly gone. Softly closing the door behind him he went out of the house that he had lived in, out of the life that he had lived.

SECOND CHAPTER.

A Fortunate Encounter.

George Geldart traversed the thronged and busy streets like one in a dream.

An eerie, weird feeling possessed him; in this living world, bustling, and hustling, and thronging to and fro all round him he felt somewhat of an intruder. To that world he was now George Geldart, deceased; his life story a tale that was told, and the world had closed the book of it and placed it on the shelf of the books of the dead and done with.

Then he became conscious of a terrible hunger, not the keen, healthy hunger he had been used to feeling after a day with the hounds, or over the fields of his place at Penshurst, a healthy yearning that one enjoyed in the very anticipation of satisfying it, but a faint, sinking feeling. He was thirsty, too.

Hullo, a restaurant, the very thing! Striding in, he approached the counter, called for a glass of claret, and scanned a menu lying on the counter.

"Sixpence, please sir," said the brisk waitress, placing the glass of claret before him.

He smiled involuntarily at the idea of George Geldart, the connoisseur, calling for and awaiting with impatience a claret at sixpence a glass.

He dived his hands into his pockets. Empty! He tried the waistcoat, that cover, too, was drawn blank. The jacket—he hadn't a sixpence about him. On his declaring this the waitress promptly withdrew the glass of wine, while he could only fix on her a stare as blank as his pockets.

Only half conscious of the subdued titter running along the counter, he was about to transfer that stare to the menu when the proprietor, a fat man with black and oily curly hair, took it away, remarking contemptuously, "We have no trade on tick in dis here house, guv'nor," and in his anger and confusion, forgetting awhile hunger, thirst, and the physical weakness they were inducing, he strode out of the shop amid murmurs of "What cheek!" "Poor chap!" "Didn't work it this journey!" and so on.

He would find Ronald and would put things right. Aided by his second son, who would stand by him to the death, he would denounce the elder, who had lied and cheated so foully, "blighting his wholesome brother."

He sought the hotel where the lad, turned from his father's door, had put up. He had left that very day, taking all his traps, the waiter believed he was going abroad, but as to his destination they were ignorant.

Yes, yes, he remembered the boy's words, it was to be his last day in England. And the result of George Geldart's inquiry at the hotel shaped the strange course of his life from then.

Why didn't he go back to his own house, where abundance was his own? Because the purpose which was on him when he so strangely left it restrained him; the determination to test, even in the furnace of his own agony, the true and the false, the gold and the dross, this and a strong sense of fear lest those who had planned, having robbed him, to immure him all his days, should, now that Ronald was gone, none knew whither, succeed.

Ah, a street fountain! He dashed across the road, despite warning shouts, at the imminent risk of being knocked down by a railway van, filled and emptied the metal cup chained to the marble again and again.

Still he felt faint for want of food, the faintness was increasing and he wanted to hold out.

He began to wonder how long he had fasted, how long he had lain in the chamber where the death watch ticked. Then all at once his heart gave a leap. Here along the street came at a brisk walk old Donaldson, his friend and neighbour, he'd ask him for a sovereign for an hour or two.

Then he hesitated. Would it mar his plan? They were within a few yards of each other ere he had decided, and all at once Donaldson looked up full in Geldart's face. He turned from florid to mottled white and purple, clapped his hand to his left side with a gasping ejaculation, "God! how like!" then went hastily on.

Geldart walked on a bit farther, and then came to a standstill. A sight that one does not often care to see met his gaze, and caused him to turn his eyes in the direction from which it was approaching.

What was that? Why were cabs and 'buses slowing down? Why were people in the street ahead there staring into the road, some raising their hats? What was this advancing?

"By Jove, it's Geldart. Don't you remember me—Stanyer?"

Digitized by Google

A cortège, headed by two men in black with white ties and flowing hat-bands, things they called "weepers."

Why, the men were mutes, yes, there behind them at a walk came a team of stately steeds, all raven black, with flowing manes, and big black plumes were nodding above their heads.

Geldart liked the old-fashioned plumes, had always said he'd like them for himself. How splendid they were, those coal-black steeds, with their black velvet trappings! And it was an open car they drew, his own idea again, and within it there was something that could not be seen for the mass of flowers, wreaths, hearts, harps, and anchors heaped over it, and each side of that car another man in black with a white tie was walking, carrying a wand.

Then came a carriage, and there, within the sombre framework of its windows, was seated his son Eric. How hard Eric's face was looking. Ronald would not have sat so hard of face and dry of eyes, but Ronald was not there—not there. Ronald was leaving England, the knowledge of this intensified George Geldart's sense of loneliness and fear.

Then came another carriage of mourners. His cousin Ferdinand, who had been such a distant cousin since he had made such strides in politics and public life, folding his arms and looking conscious as ever of his importance. And beside him his cousin Jack, whom he had been obliged to slightly cold shoulder, because Jack had really slipped so far down the ladder; even his black suit looked rusty and seedy—and—poor Jack, his eyes were quite red and his cheeks looked moist and shiny.

Opposite to him sat—well, what impudence! old Blagdon—his traitor partner, the thief and villain who to screen his theft, would have sworn away the liberty of the man whom he had wronged. Then other private carriages of friends—and enemies!

The doctor's brougham—there within it sat the scoundrel who, for a price, would have sent him, a trusting friend and patient, into durance. For a price—a price! Oh, the Snare of Gold! What meshes it made about the souls of men; and in the last carriage came the servants.

"Who was that old toff?" one bystander asked another, and, despite his vulgarity the inquiry gratified the subject of it. Not so the rejoinder.

"Oh! only old Geldart, something in the City, pot of money, but no class, pig-headed as they make 'em!"

It was gone, and presently came jingling along the street, a gaudy turn-out got up to advertise a new comic paper. Then a motor-car coughed and snorted past, and next there came a prancing pair of greys, driven by a coachman with a bouquet for a button-hole. And within the carriage sat a girl in a white veil beside a man with a red face and a mauve tie.

How strangely the web of life was woven!

It was a queer feeling that possessed him; it was like beginning life again, opening a new story, a sequel to one to which Finis had been written. Certainly with the exception of what he stood in, he was as penniless as when first he came into the world.

Then the thought flashed across him. If it were not so, if he had only the means to keep himself afloat, if he could only lay his hands upon one of the many thousands standin in his name in the books of various banks and corporations—why then, free and unfettered, he could devote his life to the great scheme that had evolved and shaped itself within his brain, the Secret he possessed, or rather that possessed him, the secret process of working the markets.

He had never developed it to anyone, had hinted at it, pledged his faith in it, just as he had when, upon his broaching the idea without revealing it, his son and Blagdon—that thief Blagdon—had laughed him into angry silence.

And he remembered with anger swelling in his heart, how they had looked at each other significantly. Why, yes, they would have made these very words of his, wise words though they were, links in the chain of cruel evidence that should deprive him of liberty, of management of his affairs, even of self-control, of all that makes life worth living.

Then he reflected. To-morrow, or perhaps to-day they'd read his will, the will which in a burst of anger he ten days ago had made, revoking his other will, leaving Ronald penniless, his bright, breezy Ronald; Ronald, who, thank God! he had learnt, and not too late, was no rogue and thief; Ronald, far more sinned against than sinning. Ah! when again they met it would be the father who would have to ask for pardon.

And then George Geldart reflected, he would have to set to work to get things right, to undo the tangle Fate had fashioned, and he had complicated.

"By Jove, it is!"

A hand descended on his shoulder. He turned and stood confronting a man wearing a long, flapping overcoat, a Colonial hat, and a pair of riding boots. A man, iron-grey bearded, predisposed to run to flesh, with the air of one who has won success and meant neither to forget it nor let the world do so. A man who seemed to expect you to stand still while he looked you up and down and right through, and delivered his verdict upon you; a matter of paramount importance to you.

"You don't know me, Geldart?"

"Not from Adam," answered the other.

"Of course not," the stranger went on, "I don't suppose a dozen people on this side even know that I'm alive."

It was almost on Geldart's lips to answer, "I can say the same," but he checked himself, and the other continued:

"I wonder if you remember Stanyer?" Then, after a pause, he added, "and the Mincing Lane days?"

"Stanyer? Stanyer?"

Geldart's Mincing Lane days went a long way back—back to the time when he left the Charterhouse—long before Charterhouse left "Smiffel"—and went to learn business routine in the counting-house of Berridge and Smilax.

All in a flash he located his man, though it was not easy to identify the big, sleek, assertive, elderly man before him with the lank, loutish, hungry-looking lad, the Stanyer of those days.

"Why, surely you're not Seedy Stanyer?"

The other man's lips and eyebrows for a moment angrily twitched, then he broke into a rather forced laugh.

"You've got it," he said, "you chaps nicknamed me 'Seedy' because—I was—well, I was seedy, I was very hard up in those days, and you were mostly young swells, sons of rich fathers, some of you paying premiums—I remember!" Then, just as Geldart with a nod was about to pass on, Stanyer exclaimed:

"Come and have a glass of wine."

Geldart, whose very soul seemed craving for the wine that had slipped almost from his lips, said eagerly: "Thanks." Then, after a moment's hesitation, "But, no thanks, I—I——"

"Come along," said the other, taking his arm. "I'd like to have a chat about old times." And Geldart, physically and morally too weak to resist, suffered himself to be led back into that very restaurant he had walked out of so crestfallen.

"What's yours?" asked Stanyer. "Claret? Here, miss, glass of your best claret, and a whisky-and-soda. Fancy,

Digitized by Google

Geldart, my meeting you this very day, I've just returned to England."

"Then you've been abroad?"

"For twenty years! By Jove, old man, I should think you wanted a glass of wine!" for Geldart had drained his glass and placed it on the counter with a contented sigh, and with action so emphatic, that with a click the fragile stem was broken.

"Confound it! I'm so sorry!" he exclaimed, hastily diving his hand into his pocket. "What's the damage?"

"One shilling, dat vos cut glass," said the fat man with the oily locks.

And Geldart hadn't a shilling on him. With a look of blank dismay he explained as much to his newly-found acquaintance, who, with a chuckle of supercilious good humour, threw a shilling on to the counter.

"That's all right, old chap! Here, have another, come along! It'll do you good. You won't? I know, you're afraid of it—between meals—and perhaps there's been a big stretch."

"Four days!" was upon his lips, then, reflecting that so much of the truth would not be credited unless more of it than he cared to tell were told, he said with a forced smile:

"Yes, a very long time."

"Sorry it's so bad as that," said Stanyer. "Here, let's squat at that table in the corner. Come along."

A novel sensation this, for George Geldart, of Mincing Lane and Bryanston Square, to be patronisingly given a dinner in a second-class restaurant—and to be glad of it. Somehow he found it amusing; anyway it relieved the intolerable strain of hunger and thirst which so nearly imperilled his plan.

It was by no means an elaborate repast, just a fried sole and a bit of chicken, but never in City hall or West End mansion had George Geldart ever eaten with such appetite. His companion watched him curiously.

"What changes are brought about by Time! And how differently things work out to what we anticipate. When I last met you I was—well, I was 'Seedy Stanyer,' with a vengeance, with nothing but my little screw to live on and never sure of that for much more than a week. And you? Why, you were a smart-looking swell and all the world seemed at your feet.

"I remember you and other chaps 'Tommy-dodding' for your screws at the end of the month—and now I'm worth——" He laid down his knife and fork and hooked his thumbs in the armholes of his waistcoat—"five and twenty thousand pounds!" and he uttered the last words in a tone intended to take Geldart's breath away.

"And you," he added with a sigh that was as satisfied as it was deprecatory. "Ah, well—I'm sorry—I really—am sorry!"—this in a tone of insistence, as though Geldart might be under the impression that he was extremely glad to find the acquaintance of his youth hungry and penniless.

Geldart's impulse was to blurt out, as under ordinary circumstances he would have done: "Confound you, sir, and your five and twenty thousand pounds—I'm worth five times five and twenty thousand pounds!" but the circumstances were very far from ordinary, and he held his tongue.

And Stanyer went on:

"But I've not done yet. For aught I know I'm only just beginning instead of stopping here to knock down the little pile I've raised. I'm going to pile it higher, higher."

"What brought you back then?"

"I came back to make a search, to try and find those who years ago I lost, lost of my own free will, thinking it better for their sakes, not for my own, mark you, for their sakes that they should lose one who seemed, as I did, under a spell that turned all my work, all my hopes, like Dead Sea fruit to ashes."

"Have you found them?"

"No, I've found no trace of them, and perhaps it's just as well, who knows what trouble I might bring by finding them? Anyway, I've given up the quest—let's talk of something else."

"And what may you be doing now?" Stanyer continued, not having heard of George Geldart, wealthy merchant, patron of the Arts and philanthropist, whose supposed death had caused such general and widespread regret. "I mean, what line of business are you in?"

"As a matter of fact," said Geldart hesitatingly, "just now I'm out of business altogether."

"That's very bad!" said the other man, "how long has that been?"

"Well, I haven't done any work to speak of for the last few years."

"Oh!"—severely. "But, though you don't look strong, you don't look exactly feeble, your looks have improved within the last five and twenty minutes"—and he glanced significantly at the empty plate and the wine decanter—"and you are by no means old, not so old as I am," as though that constituted juvenility. Then, in a severer tone. "I remember, even as a youngster, you weren't over partial to work."

"That's true!" said Geldart humbly.

"You weren't a plodder. Now I was a plodder. People used to call you brilliant, full of ideas and all that sort of thing, nobody ever thought me brilliant."

"That's also true," said Geldart.

"Well, I plodded and plodded, and now—see where the plodder is—and where you are!"

"True again," said Geldart in the tone of a remorseful Tom Idler interviewed by an Alderman Frank Goodchild.

"And I supposed you squandered a good deal of money?" Stanyer went on.

"Thousands," the other answered.

"Ah, well! You can't eat your cake and have it, and I suppose now you'd find it difficult to get a job, at your time of life, with so many young men crowding the market."

"I'm afraid so," said Geldart, "I suppose you couldn't put me in the way of one?"

"Well, I don't know," said Stanyer; "it just happens that possibly I might. I suppose there's nothing against you, except extravagance and indolence? You haven't disgraced yourself in any way?"

"Not that I'm aware of," answered Geldart.

"No, you never seemed likely to do that. Well, now, I'll just tell you how the matter stands. I'm not over here to stay, I came across for two reasons, the doctor suggested a voyage, and I had a quest to make, and thirdly I had an idea of establishing a kind of little agency over here in London.

"I export a lot of stuff to the United Kingdom, hides and wool mostly, and I want somebody over here to watch the markets and cable me regularly by code the fluctuations so that I can regulate my output; somebody who can make purchases or execute little commissions for me."

Geldart listening, pondered, moved almost to anger by the other's bumptiousness, almost to laughter by his assumption of Geldart's own decline and fall. Only, all at once an idea flitted across his brain, not quite across it, because it perched there and began to sing. The Scheme—the Scheme! The opportunity was come, yes! Stanyer might be made the means!

"Now," Stanyer went on, "here's a chance to climb back, to undo mistakes, to put your house in order. It's late in the day, it's a long way on in the race, but—you understand?"

Digitized by Google

"Perfectly," said Geldart, "and I'm just the man you want!"

* * * * *

A few hours later Fenner, the butler at Geldart's house in Bryanston Square, went down into the servants' hall, took off his hat and overcoat and, seating himself in the chair before the fire, wiped the perspiration from his brow, and Batt, the odd man, remarked:

"Bless my soul, Mr. Fenner, how you are perspiring! Is it mild outside?"

"No, rather cold, Batt."

"Been walking fast, sir?"

"No," answered the portly old servant, somewhat absently. Then, after a pause, he said:

"Batt, do you believe in ghosts?"

"Lor', Mr. Fenner, why?"

"Because," the butler answered slowly and impressively, "I've seen one."

The other man looked at him curiously. No, the old man was sober and stolid as ever. Then, after a pause, he asked in a low voice:

"Mr. Fenner, whose ghost was it that you saw?"

And Mr. Fenner answered: "The ghost of him who was carried from this house to-day—the ghost of our dear master."

Then came the audible thrill of an electric bell and presently Mrs. Mason, the housekeeper, entered in a tremorous fluster.

"Mr. Fenner, we've got to go upstairs into the library, Mr. Eric says the lawyer's there and they're going to read the will."

THIRD CHAPTER.

The Reading of the Will.

And so the retainers of the household trooped up to the library, a sorrowful group. They guessed what was coming; more than once they had looked forward to that moment.

They were scarcely surprised at being summoned, George Geldart had been so kind and considerate a master in his lifetime that his servants were quite prepared to learn that they were not forgotten in his will, perhaps at times had wondered as to what extent they had been remembered.

Yet, now that the crucial moment had arrived, every one of them, man, woman, boy, girl, felt a pang; the donation, perhaps at last was coming, but the generous and courteous donor was gone. Respectfully they entered the library and grouped themselves in one corner in deference to a wave of Eric Geldart's hand.

Around the room were seated a number of friends and connections of the family. In the centre the solicitor was seated before a table with, at his right hand a shiny black japanned box inscribed in brand new gold letters:

The Executors and Trustees of the Will of George Geldart, Esq., deceased.

Clare Armitage sat there, the pallor of her features intensified by her costume of unbroken black; mostly her eyes rested on the carpet, only every now and then they were raised in the direction of Eric Geldart, though whenever he chanced to meet her gaze they dropped again.

Ferdinand Geldart, M.P., sat there, his portentous air intensified, possibly in consequence of the fact that Jack Widdicombe, the failure of the family, was again at his elbow, full of his tiresome reminiscences of "Auld Lang Syne," "When we were Boys Together," and all that sentimental nonsense, so cherished by the people who don't succeed and so distasteful to those who do.

And there was Blagdon, churchwarden and pillar of his parish, type and model of solid, stolid respectability, with a character as spotless as his shiny, white shirtfront and his shiny black broadcloth coat—to all appearance.

And there was Richard Farningham, merchant, Director of the Bank of England, D.L. for the City of London, and several other things, the very type and personification of financial solidity, looking immensely bored and regretful that one more burden of trusteeship was cast upon him.

All glanced at the opening door, and Ronald Geldart entered. Crossing the room instinctively, he held out his hand towards the Member of Parliament, who, folding his own arms more tightly, turned his head away.

He was a tall, well-set lad, with dark, wavy hair and dark eyes, but lines about his face betokening a somewhat pensive cast of thought.

Unlike his brother in nature as in form and feature, studious, imaginative, it was a subject of comment in the circle of the family's acquaintance that the second son of old Geldart, commercial from his patent leather boots to the crown of his bull head, should possess a temperament so utterly opposed to his father's and brother's.

Dreamy, distrait, sensitive, Mincing Lane had for him no delights, the produce markets and the fluctuations no interest. his heart was set on things foreign to his environment; sculpture, painting, music, books, and all the time at his command in wandering through the galleries of Florence, Rome, Paris, and elsewhere, wanderings through mediæval cities, Nuremberg, Heidelberg, where he had studied, lazy jaunts and journeys to the beauty spots of Europe and beyond, while his father and brother were wrinkling their brows over the current prices of peppercorns, jute, and saffron.

He looked for a glance of recognition from Blagdon, who had professed such friendship for his father. Boanerges Blagdon dropped his eyelids and raised his fat, white, flabby hand in a gesture of deprecation. Ronald's face hardened, then softened again—he felt his hand clasped.

Cousin Jack, at all events, wasn't going to cut him. Then he crossed the room to where Clare Armitage was sitting—Clare, who once had seemed to him almost a sister, who perhaps was to be a sister yet, though Eric and she knew more than he could guess.

"Clare!" he said, almost appealingly, holding out his hand.

For a moment her eyes shifted unsteadily, then she dropped her folded hands into her lap.

"You won't shake hands, and let bygones be bygones, Clare? You won't have faith in me? You still believe all the evil, and won't credit me with any good?"

She answered coldly: "This is not the time or place to make a scene," and turned away.

"So you haven't gone yet?" Eric sneered, looking up.

"No," he answered. "I daresay you are disappointed, but I can hardly regulate my movements quite according to your wishes."

"And I suppose you want to know your share?" said Eric. "Well, you won't have long to wait."

Then Ronald, striding into the embrasure of a window, handsome and smart as ever, but the ordinary devil-may-care expression softened down in face and eyes, stared through the window blankly into space.

He leant there against the window-frame, gazing into the Square, but in reality seeing nothing.

This was the end of all his dreams, all his hopes, the hope that his father, when his anger at Ronald's refusal to go into the Mincing Lane business should have burnt itself out, would accede to his ambition and desire, and not merely allow, but enable him, to adopt a literary career, afford him means and facilities for travel in far lands, so that when the time came for him to speak his message to his fellow creatures he might have something to say worth listening to.

Eric might sneer as he liked, Ronald felt it was far better, far more worth doing, to give the world a new song to sing, a new story to remember, new creations to love and rejoice with, new themes for laughter, even for tender tears, than to have wrung from it toll of wares it was compelled to have, or by buying and sweating in the cheapest of markets and grabbing and grasping—yes, and lying in its dearest, snatch and grab, and hold out of the price one fellow creature paid for what another fellow creature had produced or fashioned, the largest share of all for oneself who had done nothing but step between.

The lawyer read the will. The testator, declaring himself of sound mind, appointed as his trustees and executors his friend Richard Farningham, his partner, Boanerges Blagdon, and his son Eric Cosmo Geldart.

Then came sundry legacies and bequests to relatives, friends, institutions, and servants, a handsome one of £5,000 to his one time ward and adopted daughter, Clare Armitage.

Digitized by Google

After that a number of annuities to late employers and servants, and finally the testator devised and bequeathed the whole of the residue of his estate, both real and personal, to his eldest son, Eric Cosmo Geldart aforesaid; absolutely, declaring that his son, Ronald Harvey Geldart, knew for what reason the testator had revoked a former testamentary instrument in his favour, and had excluded him from any benefit out of or share in his estate.

While this was being read the listeners fixed their eyes upon the brothers. Eric Geldart, for his part, seemed absorbed in contemplation of his finger nails. His brother Ronald was gazing steadily through the window, obviously undergoing a terrible struggle to master his emotion. The eyes of more than one of the old servants watched him through a mist of tears.

The lawyer's voice ceased, as, gathering up the papers, he took off his spectacles.

Ronald Geldart advanced from the window, rested his hands upon the table, and looking full into Eric's white, set face, he said:

"You've played your part well, Judas, and the stakes are yours; you've robbed me of my birthright, that I could forgive you. Thank God, there are things to me of far more value than gold and what it buys! But one thing, Judas, I never will forgive, you've robbed me of my father's blessing. Yes, you were worse to me than Jacob was to Esau, for our dead mother bade us, ever since I can remember, share and share alike, and, were she now on earth, she would cry 'Shame' on you!"

"Clare," he said, almost appealingly, holding out his hand.

Then, without another word, he strode out of the room, out of the house that had been his birthplace and his home.

* * * * * * *

Relatives, lawyer, guests were gone. The servants had returned to the hall, Clare Armitage and Eric Geldart stood face to face.

"I am going now, Eric," she was saying, "going to my new home. Oh, how strange it will all seem leaving the dear old place!"

"Yes, yes," he said impatiently. "Good-bye, good-bye!"

"Oh, Eric, how cold and hard you are!"

"Now, now, my dear Clare, don't commence a scene, and you know how I loathe tears."

"I know—I know; sentimentalism isn't one of your failings, Eric, only everyone isn't gifted with your absence of it, with your convenient forgetfulness. I can't forget that twenty years ago your father and your mother brought me here, a fatherless, motherless, friendless mite, and oh, Eric, what I've done for you weighs like a load upon my heart! If they know—if they know, if together in the Beyond they are seeing all, knowing all, what will they say of what I've done?"

"Now, what on earth are you raving about? What have you done?"

"Oh, you know—you know! And you know that for no one in the world but you would I have done as much."

"Don't talk in riddles, Clare, tell me what you mean."

"I mean the crime—our crime, or, rather, crimes—the keys I took, or rather stole for you!"

"For me, Clare?"

"Yes, yes. Oh, Eric, I felt just now as though I must at all hazards, at all costs, confess the truth, here on my knees where he stood, before them all; it seemed so wicked to sit here quite silent, it seemed like doing that awful thing again."

"Clare, are you dreaming or raving?"

"Eric, what do you mean?"

"I simply mean that if you have done what you say you have done—well, silence is prudence!"

"If I did it? You know I did it. For you, or, rather, with you, for though it was my hand that carried out the theft of your dead father's keys, it was your brain that planned it, your voice that urged it, your influence that impelled it—as you know."

"I know nothing of the kind."

"Eric!" She almost shrieked his name, and with clenched hands and stern, set, defiant face, he answered:

"I know nothing, I admit nothing, I deny everything. Good-bye!"

"Good-bye, Eric? Ah, yes, yes. I see it is wisest for us to pretend — even to each other. Yes, yes, and good-bye, Eric, or, rather, au revoir!"

"I said good-bye!"

"Yes, until to-morrow."

"After what you have said, Miss Armitage, it must be good-bye for ever!"

He touched a bell. For a moment she stood there, spell-bound and speechless. The door opened.

"A hansom for Miss Armitage!"

The page hastened to the front door, and presently his whistle sounded.

Clare remained there, her hand upon the door, her feet upon the threshold. For some moments her breath came and went, almost in gasps, then in a low, hard voice, she said:

"So, then, I see the development of your plan. I hadn't seen quite far enough ahead before. I knew you were a villain, I never guessed you were a traitor."

He affected to ignore her and to be immersed in a book he snatched from the shelf beside him. Her hansom rattled up, she buttoned her glove.

Digitized by Google

"Having finished the evil work, you fling aside the tool you need no longer. Well—we shall see!"

She was gone. Gone without the scene and storm he had expected. And somehow Eric Geldart felt that had there been more storm, there would have been less peril.

FOURTH CHAPTER.
The Gulf that Separates.

But what was it that had happened to cleave this gulf between two brothers of the same blood? Why had Ronald Geldart hurled those stern and bitter words at Eric? Why, earlier in this story, did he fling himself there upon his knees beside his father's coffin in that tempestuous agony?

Let us carry back this story in retrospect to some weeks prior to the events related in the preceding chapters.

George Geldart paced his dining-room very much in the manner and mood of an enraged tiger. His son Eric, from the depths of his arm-chair, watched his father furtively, with observant eyes that shifted from the angry, irascible old man, striding to and fro, to the young one leaning by the mantelpiece gazing thoughtfully into the fire.

"I am sick of it, dead sick of it!" the old man cried. "All these years I've toiled and moiled for two fellows who don't appear to have formed the slightest conception of the meaning of the word gratitude."

"Father!" from both.

"Don't speak to me, sir," he said, turning in a fury on the younger man, and, confound you, sir! Don't knit your brows at me, and don't stand there mooning at the fire, or else, dash it all, I shall lose my temper!"

A smile played about the well-shaped mouth of the younger man. And the elder, noting this, red and rampant with passion, exclaimed:

"Don't try me too far, or else, Ronald, I shall say something I shall be sorry for! I shall order you out of the house. I say it's monstrous, it's shameful, the ingratitude I'm experiencing from my sons!"

"I must ask you to except me, father!" said Eric in a cold, decisive voice.

"Well," growled the old man, "certainly you are not such an idiot as your brother, thank Heaven, for one quixotic fool is enough in any family!"

"A fool I may be, father, though I wouldn't allow anybody but you to speak such words to me, but an ingrate I am not. I acknowledge all your kindness, and I thank you for it from the bottom of my heart, and if you'll give me time I'll prove my gratitude."

"Oh, certainly, certainly, you're proving it excellently already. Not content with your three years at Heidelberg, where I was fool enough to send you, instead of pitchforking you straight away into my counting-house when you left school, you've been mooning and loafing about the Continent and the East for two whole years, and when at last you do condescend to return home, and I ask you when you will be prepared to enter the City house, you talk a lot of drivel about adaptability, disinclination for commercial pursuits, and you lay down the hare-brained proposition that you shall devote your days to scribbling a lot of infernal nonsense to fill a publisher's waste paper basket."

"No, no!" protested Ronald. "Everything I have written, so far, since I began to write in earnest at all, has been printed, and, really, father, it's from a sense of duty, though you don't seem able to see it, that I have decided not to go to Mincing Lane. I shall be a hindrance rather than a help. I am sure that in another walk in life I shall walk alone, and I think reach my goal!"

"Oh, then, you've decided! Very well, sir, be good enough to go to your room!" The old man had turned from red to white with passion. "And meantime I will decide what to do with a son who defies me. To your room, sir!"

"Father, you are unfair!"

"Out of my sight, I tell you!" The old man flung wide the door.

Ronald Geldart, turning upon his heel on the threshold with flashing eyes, and exerting all his will to hold himself, and remember the respect due to his father, repeated, "You are unfair!" then closed the door behind him, leaving George Geldart alone with his eldest son.

The old man threw himself into a chair, breathing heavily, wiping the perspiration from his brow.

"Well, what do you think of that?" he asked.

"Idiotic," replied Eric, lighting a cigarette.

"I should think so," said his father, "even you are not such a fool as he."

"Thanks very much. I think if you've any further compliments to scatter, I will follow his example and leave the room."

"Well, you try my patience just as much as he. He won't come into the firm, and you, though you are in it, take sides with that insensate, muddle-headed Boanerges against me on every point."

"No, sir, on one point only."

"The most crucial of all, the point on which everything else turns. Eric, you must re-consider it. I tell you, my lad, there's a fortune in it."

While he was speaking the younger man's brows and his lips tightened.

"But, my dear father, it's against the terms of partnership agreement."

"Nonsense, our next profit and loss account must show a balance of twenty thousand pounds, out of that balance we can carry ten to reserve, the other ten, instead of dividing, let us apply to the furtherance of my system, the system I've thought out for years."

"And the system which is looked up in your own mind, which is a secret to Mr. Blagdon and to me."

"And which must be one till you assent. I'm not a stranger proposing a confidence trick, I'm the pillar of the whole concern, I've made the money, I tell you I can multiply our capital tenfold, twentyfold, a hundredfold."

"By embarking in another business, quite outside the scope of our partnership agreement."

The old man, at a loss for words, recommenced his sentry-go, then suddenly making a dash at the door, flung it open and was gone, banging it behind him.

"Old fool!" the young one muttered. "But, by George, if he only knew the truth! Ha, ha, ha! If he only knew that the twenty thousand that he wants to tap for his own pet wild cat scheme has gone in another little scheme!"

There was a tap at the door. A servant entered, ushering in a portly, pompous man of some five and fifty years. He was about to effusively greet the younger man, who, however, motioned him curtly to a chair, carefully closed the door, then asked in a quiet, dry tone.

"Well, what news?"

"Well, bad news, worse even than I dreaded, it's all gone, we're face to face with this, Eric, you and I have either got to make up ten thousand between us by next Wednesday, or else make a clean breast of it to your father, our mutual partner, and tell him that we've dabbled with our balance with the result that it is non-existent."

"Phew!" the younger whistled.

"How do you think he'll take it?"

"Kicking, biting, and fighting, he's just been on at me regarding the old fad, he wants ten thousand set aside to set afloat that madcap scheme of his; he's in a fury about another matter. Ronald has refused to come into the business, which is just as well, the fat would be in the fire if he went through the books."

"Well, I don't know how it's going to end, if he calls for that balance-sheet next Wednesday it's ruin to me, bankruptcy, disgrace. What's to be done?"

"Go upstairs and see him—say nothing!" and, with scared face left the room, leaving Eric pacing to and fro, thinking. If the doctors would! Such things had been known. If he thought his son had robbed him—and he had two sons!

(Further developments in the story next week.)

Digitized by Google

The Man with the Strange Eyes.

Telling of a Hypnotist and Some Strings of Pearls.

CONTAINING THE INCIDENT DEPICTED ON THE COVER.

"Who is the girl over there?—the one in the white gown, with the strings of pearls round her neck?"

"My dear Staines, such ignorance would argue yourself unknown if you had not been trapesing about in foreign countries for so long. That 'girl in a white gown' is our newest heiress, Miss Muriel Reaside, and the pearls round her neck are part and portion of the most marvellous collection of jewels she has inherited from her father."

"Hum!" was the reply, whilst the man called Staines followed with his eyes the slim figure of the girl in question, who was at that moment standing beside the window talking animatedly to a tall, fair man of peculiarly pleasing appearance.

"Then she is an orphan?" It was the first speaker's voice again, and he turned upon his companion, John Lowe, a shrewd little man of middle age, a pair of piercingly bright dark eyes.

"Yes, an orphan, and, being just over age, an independent orphan," the shrewd little man laughed. "She would have been the prey of fortune-hunters, but fortunately she is already engaged to the man by her side, as good a fellow as ever breathed—Alan Macintyre."

Staines' eyes left Lowe's face, and once more flashed across the room in the direction of Muriel Reaside and her lover. A curious expression crept into them—an expression not good to see.

They narrowed slowly, and concentrated themselves upon the girl's face in a fixed, stony stare, whilst at the same time they retained their remarkable brilliancy.

A little smile just parted his thin, well-cut lips, but he uttered no word, and his companion was so intent upon gazing round the big drawing-room at the throng of well-dressed folk as to be unobservant of Staines' actions.

But at the other side of the room the girl upon whose face Staines' eyes were fixed suddenly shrank and shivered in the very middle of the sentence she was uttering, and with a half-frightened glance round her drew nearer to the open window, and put out her hand almost involuntarily towards her lover.

His startled face was instantly lowered towards hers.

"What is it, sweetheart?" he said anxiously, noting how the colour had faded from her cheeks. "Are you faint? Is it too hot here?"

"No—o," she whispered, looking round her again with a little shudder, "but—but, oh, Alan, I don't know what I felt all at once! Just as if some ugly, loathsome reptile had crawled over me, and were fascinating me as it might a bird."

She trembled again, and her lover drew her arm through his to lead her into the conservatory.

"What a fanciful little darling you are!" he said tenderly. "Lady Moore does not keep reptiles in her drawing-room—and in here, and——"

But before he could draw Muriel into the conservatory she had taken her hand quickly from his arm and was saying fast and nervously

"No, no, I don't want to leave the drawing-room, I would rather stay here—I must stay here!"

The colour was coming and going rapidly in her face, her eyes were unusually bright, and she turned her head from side to side with an uneasy, uncertain gesture, as though searching for someone.

At this precise moment two men approached the pair, the one a short man with a shrewd face, bald head, and pleasant smile, the other a tall, powerfully-built man, whose clean-shaven face and thin, well-cut lips evidenced considerable force of character, and whose dark and singularly piercing eyes shone with a strange brilliancy, and fastened themselves with a curious expression upon Muriel's troubled face.

"Miss Reaside," Lowe began in his hearty voice, "an old acquaintance of mine, just returned from prolonged travels in foreign parts, is anxious to be made known to you; may I introduce him?—Mr. Bertram Staines—Miss Muriel Reaside—Mr. Staines—Mr. Macintyre!"

The two men bowed stiffly to one another, Muriel also bowed, and then, with an odd, jerky motion, like some automaton, moved against its will, she held out a hand to the stranger, who took it and held it for the fraction of a second.

Another of those long shudders ran through the girl's slight frame. She lifted her eyes and looked up for a moment into the piercingly bright ones that watched her, then she said, slowly and automatically:

"I am very glad to meet you, Mr. Staines."

But the gladness was not reflected in her face, it did not regain its colour, and her eyes looked abnormally large and frightened, set in that white, still countenance, and although Staines talked to her for many minutes, she took no apparent interest in anything that he said. Indeed, there was an expression of intense relief upon her face when presently Alan touched her arm and gently asked her whether she would come and listen to the music in the next room.

She held out her hand to Staines.

"Good-bye," she said, the relief appearing now in the accents of her voice.

"I hope I may say 'au revoir,' he answered courteously; "it has been a great pleasure to meet Lowe and other old friends here to-night, it is a great pleasure also to make new friends," and his charming bow included both Muriel and Alan in its graceful politeness.

"Who is that man Staines?" Alan Macintyre asked of John Lowe a few hours later, when, having taken Muriel home after Lady Moore's reception, he sat smoking in the club.

"Staines?" Lowe puffed a cloud of smoke towards the ceiling, and looked thoughtfully at Macintyre. "Well, he is a fellow I used to know fairly well, an interesting sort of chap, clever, brilliant, and all that sort of thing. Been abroad for years, not very flush of money, but none the worse for that."

"I don't cotton to him much," Macintyre answered shortly. "I don't know why, but I don't like the fellow's eyes."

"My dear chap, what rot! Forgive my bluntness, but really, poor Staines can't help having the eyes Providence has given him."

"Very likely not, but he can help the expression he puts into them, and I don't like it. I don't fancy the fellow, and I wish he had not been introduced to my fiancée."

Almost at the identical moment when this conversation was taking place Bertram Staines stood in the tiny sitting-room of a very third-class lodging house. The same smile with which he had looked across Lady Moore's drawing-room at Muriel again curved his lips, his eyes shone brightly.

"'As a bird into the snare of the fowler,'" he quoted softly. "She is likely to be easy prey, I fancy. I shall try to—to get what I want by fair means, and if fair means fail—well! then we must try—foul!"

* * * * *

"Muriel, I do not want to be a jealous beast, or to make

Digitized by Google

exigeant demands upon you, but I do hate to see you becoming more and more friendly with that man Staines."

Muriel and Alan were walking slowly through the Park on a June evening three weeks or so after their first introduction to Bertram Staines. The girl no longer wore the old look of peace and happiness which had been her chief characteristic; she was worn, almost haggard, and her eyes had a strained, anxious expression.

She looked at her lover silently before answering his remark, then she said vehemently:

"I can't bear Mr. Staines, and you know it, Alan. Your jealousy is foolish, and most misplaced; I hate that man! I hate him! I hate him!"

"Then why is he so constantly by your side? Why do I find him at every party, at every entertainment to which you are invited? Why do I even hear your name coupled with his by some of the impertinent gossips who are always ready to take a woman's name in vain?" Alan asked irritably.

"I don't know! oh, I don't know!" Muriel cried, a sudden ring of passion in her voice, stopping dead in the deserted pathway in which they were walking. "I know I hate him; he is like a snake that repels and yet fascinates one."

"Fascinates!" Alan exclaimed scornfully, kicking a pebble from his path. "If that man fascinates you, I am sorry for you!"

"I can't explain," she said wearily, "and, oh! don't be vexed, Alan. I feel so utterly miserable, and I don't know what is the matter with me! Everything seems to have gone at sixes and sevens lately; ever since, ever since—I don't know when," and she drew her brows together in a puzzled frown, her eyes filling with tears.

"I can tell you when!" Alan replied savagely; "you have never been really the same since Lady Moore's party, when that beast Staines was first introduced to you."

A strong shudder shook Muriel from head to foot.

"I don't know what it was that night," she said faintly, "but I felt quite suddenly as though a reptile were crawling over me; it gave me the most awful feeling of fear and disgust; but I don't see what it had to do with Mr. Staines, much as I dislike him; and I hate his eyes!"

"Well, see that you have nothing to do with him or his eyes!" Alan said grimly. "Thank goodness you are going down to Beachmouth next week, and he is not likely to find you out there, or to know you are going."

"No, oh no!" the girl said breathlessly; "he will not know I am there, and I—I shall be safe with your sister, and in a big hotel. I think I am getting nervous and silly, Alan"—she looked fearfully round her—"and sea air will do me good. I feel frightened at everything nowadays, but at Beachmouth I shall be safe, and free from—Mr. Staines and his hateful eyes!"

Perhaps she would have felt less confident could she have seen a telegram that was dispatched the evening before from Bertram Staines' lodgings. It ran thus:

"Expect me on Wednesday," and it was addressed to:

"The Housekeeper,
The Den, Beachmouth."

* * * * *

Muriel Reaside, the lovely young heiress, was the admired of all beholders in the hotel at Beachmouth, where she was staying with Alan Macintyre's widowed sister.

The girl was brighter and happier than she had been for many weeks past; the colour was returning to her face, the light to her eyes. Some of the strained, haggard look was dying out of them, and on the night of the annual ball in the hotel she was among the brightest of the guests.

True, her complete happiness was marred by Alan's absence, but she was young enough to enjoy dancing for the sake of dancing, and as her lover was to join his sister and betrothed on the morrow, Muriel could afford to be happy.

Mrs. Carr (her future sister-in-law) watched her with loving eyes, rejoicing in the change a week had wrought in her, and admiring the fair beautiful face, the shapely young form, and the snowy neck, against which a treble row of costly pearls rested, when she suddenly saw a flash of some inexplicable feeling pass over Muriel's face.

The girl all at once left her partner's side, and made a quick step forward, her head a little bent, as though listening, her eyes grown fixed and anxious.

The colour died slowly from her face, and Mrs. Carr, fearing she was ill, went swiftly to her side.

"Are you faint, dear?" she asked. "Can I fetch——"

"No, thank you," Muriel interrupted her, speaking in a dreamy, sing-song voice quite unlike her own. "I am quite well, it is nothing; only I have forgotten something in my room. I will not be a moment."

Then, without another word, she turned from her puzzled partner, and from Mrs. Carr, and sped quickly from the room.

Mrs. Carr returned to her seat and her comfortable gossip with a friend, and no one saw Muriel flying upstairs with eager, hurrying steps to her own bedroom; no one was present to witness how she tore open her jewel-case to take out the articles of jewellery she had been wearing, and put them into a black bag she had snatched from the table; nobody saw her steal down the staircase again, bag in hand, and creep past the ballroom door, from which there floated the languid strains of a waltz.

On tiptoe, and with hurried, nervous steps the girl passed out into the hotel garden, but there was no trace of hesitation or delay in any of her actions; she moved straight forward as though she were perfectly well aware of what she wished to do, and with swift, unerring footsteps wound her way in and out of the garden path to the gate that led to the top of the cliff.

Opening this, she passed out upon the short grass, never pausing until she reached a broken-down shed in the shadow of which stood a man, in a slouch hat, and with a dark cloak thrown round him.

"I have come," she said, in that strange, sing-song voice; "I have brought all!"

The man stepped out of the shadow and looked down at her with keen, eager scrutiny; in the white light of the moon his eyes gleamed brightly, their steely glance as it met the girl's made her shiver.

He saw the shiver, and it seemed to enrage him. "Pshaw!" he muttered, "I said I would have you and your wealth—by fair means or foul—and if it has had to be foul, it is your own fault, and the fault of your fool of a lover. I could have won you but for him."

Muriel did not seem to grasp the meaning of the savagely-spoken words; her snowy neck and the pearls that incircled it shone white in the moonbeams as she stood there, her great eyes looking wistfully out towards the sea, that boomed softly on the rocks far below.

"You will come with me now," Staines (for it was he) said slowly, in a voice the mastery of which was well-nigh irresistible.

"Yes, I will come with you," she repeated mechanically.

"Give me your bag," he said next; and without a word of protest she handed him the bag.

"And I think there is no need for you to see the way we are going," he went on with a short laugh, and, whipping a silk handkerchief from his pocket as he spoke, "we may as well make assurance doubly sure."

So saying, he bound the handkerchief over Muriel's eyes, a process to which she submitted quietly enough, although at his touch she shuddered violently, and put her hand to her throat with a little gasping cry—grasping unconsciously at one of her gleaming rows of pearls.

The violence of her touch broke the string on which the pearls were strung, and two of the shining gems dropped to the ground unnoticed by either Staines or Muriel, whose fingers mechanically closed over the remainder of the row she held.

Staines had taken her other hand, and fixing his baleful eyes upon her, said in a deep, penetrating voice:

"Come!"

Digitized by Google

Trembling violently, and white to the very lips, she nevertheless obeyed him as meekly as a child, whilst he guided her stumbling steps away from the hotel, and out into a lane that led from the cliffs and the sea to an inland valley.

The moon shone but faintly now, and dark clouds swept the horizon; a little wind sighed amongst the trees, and the girl shivered again as it swept across her bare neck and arms, and ruffled the soft masses of her hair.

The strange couple proceeded slowly, and in perfect silence, the man with his dark face and gleaming, evil eyes fixed upon Muriel's, the girl, in her low gown, with the shining pearls at her throat, and shining pearls in her hand, blindfolded.

By the time they had left the cliffs and the moaning sea some distance behind them, the moon was totally obscured, and Staines was obliged to grope his way in utter darkness along a lane thickly shaded by trees.

Presently a twinkling light appeared ahead, and in another moment a small house loomed in front of them—a house on the door of which Staines knocked softly.

A bolt inside was instantly thrust back, and still in silence Staines drew Muriel across the threshold, hushing, by a stern glance from his eyes, the exclamation on the lips of the evil-looking woman who admitted them, and leading the girl into a room on the right, he seated her gently upon a big armchair.

Then he laughed softly—a laugh not pleasant to hear.

"I think she and her fortune are likely to be mine now," he said, and laughed again, as with deft fingers he unfastened the handkerchief round her brow.

At that moment he perceived the broken string of pearls she held in her hand, and an oath broke from his lips as he snatched it from her and examined it.

"She must have been dropping these priceless pearls like so much dirt," he exclaimed impatiently, "and I never noticed it! Well, if they're gone, they're gone—thank Heaven, she has others left," and his greedy eyes glanced at the rows still round her neck and the bag in his hand, falling last upon the girl's white, unseeing face.

She sat just where he had placed her, still as a statue, looking straight before her with eyes that plainly saw nothing.

Staines touched her arm lightly, and looked deep into her eyes with his terrible concentrated gaze.

"Wake—now," he said, and in instant obedience to his voice an understanding expression dawned once more in her eyes; she turned her head slowly, the colour suddenly swept over her face and neck in a flood, and a cry broke from her lips.

She shrank back in the chair, snatching her arm from Staines' hand, and an infinite horror was in her eyes.

"You!" she gasped, "you? When did you come? Where am I? Where is Mrs. Carr? What is it? Oh, Alan—Alan—Alan."

The cry rang out through the quiet room, but the only answer to it was a mocking laugh from Staines.

"Alan is far enough away," he said. "Screaming won't help you. You are in a little house I found here when you told me you were going to be at Beachmouth. I thought I should like to be near you."

"I told you?" The words broke from her in gasps.

"Yes, you told me. When we met at Mrs. Grant's ball, I—well—I questioned you in my own way, and you answered me. This little house—The Den—is very quiet, very remote. I do not advise you to scream or make a fuss. You are entirely in my power." The evil light in his eyes and smile made Muriel shrink further from his reach, and cower back in the armchair, panting like some poor frightened animal, her fascinated, fearful eyes never leaving his face.

"But why—but why—have you done it?" she moaned. "Let me go! Ah, let me go!"

"No, no, my pretty," he said brutally, "here you are, here you will stay, till you are my wife. We will be married very soon—very soon now—in quite a few days."

The words seemed to revive the girl's paralysed energies, she leapt to her feet, her eyes flaming.

"I will not ever marry you," she cried. "I hate you—I hate you! Why have you done this?"

She looked wildly round her, and wrung her hands. Her voice broke suddenly, and then she sobbed:

"How did I come here?"

"You came because, from the first moment I saw you, I intended to make you my wife, and I intended to enjoy your fortune," he laughed softly and wickedly. "I got you here very easily. You are susceptible to another's will, as I found out the first night we met. I have willed you to talk to me, often and often, when you were most unwilling. I have willed you to tell me what you never meant to tell me. And to-night I stood outside your hotel, and willed you with all my might to come to me, and to bring your jewels with you. That's all, and I think possibly your Alan may not care to marry a woman who follows another man in this fashion."

The eyes that watched him grew fixed with horror; the girl's face became the colour of ashes, and with a choking cry she dropped unconscious at Staines' feet.

When she was once more aware of her surroundings she found herself lying on a couch in her own sitting-room in the hotel, and Alan sitting beside her, his eyes riveted on her face, with a look of intense love and anxiety.

She put out her hand feebly and smiled.

"How—did—you—find—me?" she whispered. "When—"

"This morning," was his reply. "My sister missed you last night, and, nearly frantic, wired for me as soon as possible. I was in despair; I thought—forgive me, sweet, but at first I thought you had gone of your own free will.

"Then, when we found you must have left in your evening dress, with no wraps, no luggage, I felt sure you had been taken away; and then, it seems little short of a miracle, I saw, on the grass outside, one of your pearls! I wandered on, and found another, and yet another, till gradually I traced you to a lonely house called "The Den," and there I found you, unconscious, and talking continually of your fear of Bertram Staines. He had gone out, leaving you in his housekeeper's care, confident that we should not trace you; and we might never have found you but for the pearls!"

"And he—he—will he make me follow him again?" Muriel said, with a shudder. "I felt as if I must go, it was an irresistible force. Will he——"

"Never again, sweetheart," was the answer, "he is safely in the clutches of the law, and long before he is free again you will be my wife, and, I trust, removed for ever from the baleful influence of the 'Man with the Strange Eyes.'"

L. G. Moberly.

Digitized by Google

A Bad Beginning.

Telling of a Rough Road that Led to Happiness.

As the door shut behind the graceful figure of Marian Summers, the stern-visaged woman who had stood with her finger pointing to that door sank into a chair and kept her eyes fixed with a vacant stare on the carpet beneath her feet.

The fire of anger appeared to have been extinguished; the noise had acted on it as water does on flames. Another feeling arose within the not-easily penetrated heart of Miss Eliza Burton, and the vacant stare already mentioned was necessary to keep her eyes free from a suspicious moisture that wanted to surge into them.

"Have I done right?" she asked herself. And she answered vehemently: "Yes, yes, yes!" Yet something within her hoped that Marian would not take the injunction seriously. "She will have a good cry in her room and then she will yield and do as I wish!" continued the elderly spinster. "We shall see!"

She felt a little more cheerful after that reflection, but her cheerfulness was banished by hearing the sound of a cab stopping at the front door of the grand house in which she lived. Was Marian really taking her at her word?

She crept to the window and peered out into the street from behind the curtain. Two small trunks were being hoisted to the roof of the four-wheeler; Marian was saying "Good-bye" to the old housekeeper, who had known her since she was a child, fatherless and motherless, intrusted to the care of Aunt Eliza.

"So she thinks fit to leave me for him!" breathed Miss Burton, a hard expression creeping over her thin features. "Be it so! She must pay the penalty; and, if I am not mistaken, Roy Hamilton will also pay the penalty for marrying her and they will be glad to come back and ask for favours!"

Miss Burton was one of those persons who gain a reputation for benevolence by spending money in furtherance of parish work and relief societies and by personally participating in the work; yet, in private life, she could do hard things under the idea that it was "duty"—things which would have justified anyone in setting her down as a stony-hearted woman.

Miss Burton was not the only one of her kind in existence; such people are to be met with constantly. In the name of duty they perform many strange and paradoxical acts.

She conceived it to be her duty to prevent Marian Summers from marrying Roy Hamilton, and she was determined to do it at all costs.

Had she been asked for reasons, she would have said that Roy was not a desirable husband because she objected to her money ultimately going to the son of a man between whom and herself a feud had existed for the past twenty-five years!

As soon as Marian was fairly clear of the house, Miss Burton took another step in her plan of thwarting the marriage; taking up a pen, she scribbled a note to Dr. Hamilton:

My niece and your son wish to marry. I strongly object, and I have done what I can to stop it. I think you will object; then do your best to stop it!

She posted this abrupt epistle herself; she guessed the effect it would have upon the irascible man and she smiled grimly.

Marian Summers went straight to the humble dwelling of a woman who had been her nurse, and was welcomed with open arms. The woman's eyes were also wide open with astonishment; when she learnt what had happened she was wroth.

"Miss Burton ought to have a piece of somebody's mind!" she cried angrily. "She's an old——"

Marian placed her hand over Mrs. Porter's mouth in time to stifle the uncomplimentary epithet. When the hand was removed, Mrs. Porter vented her feelings by exclaiming: "So she is!" and leaving Marian to guess what was meant.

"If you can give me a room," said Marian, "I can earn enough to keep myself by painting lantern slides and plates and all that. I wasn't trained to do anything for a living, but I like painting and I used to do the slides for Aunt Eliza's parish work. And I have a little money!"

"The young gentleman won't let you do that for long, Miss Marian! He'll marry you!"

"Oh, not yet!"—Marian blushed divinely. "He must make headway in his profession first!"

But Mrs. Porter was right. As soon as Roy Hamilton knew what had taken place, he called at Mrs. Porter's and pressed his suit with such vehemence that Marian consented.

"I won't say one word against your wicked old aunt!" he said contradictorily in answer to Marian's exhortations. "Still, she is—— Oh, very well, my pet. I'll just forget her! But I feel so cross that——"

Once more Marian interrupted his outburst and he cooled down under the influence of a loving caress. He grew quite calm and happy as he wended his way homewards, unconscious of the bomb that was being prepared for him there.

"It has come to my knowledge that you are paying court to Miss Marian Summers," remarked his father abruptly. "That must cease!"

In the circumstances their peremptory tone was the worst which the doctor could have adopted. Coming on the top of the other injustice, it made Roy flare up like a flash-light.

"I shall not!" he declared decisively. "Who has been at work?"

"I am informed by Miss Burton, who stands in the position of guardian to Miss Summers," retorted his father unwarily. "She objects; so do I!"

"I object to both your objections!" said Roy calmly. He restrained his rising temper. "So does Marian! We shall be married as soon as the banns are published the third time!"

Neither of the two men could remember exactly what passed; Roy could not keep his wrath under control, despite his intention to remain calm; bitter words were exchanged, and they parted.

"Our married life will begin in storms, dear!" said Roy that evening, when he called to relate what had passed. "But we shall be all the happier! A bad beginning makes a good ending, although I am not sure that it is a bad beginning!"

Digitized by Google

Marian tried to dissuade him and said they must part; the breach with his father meant blighting his chances of becoming a barrister, and he must set to work to earn a sustenance for himself and her in some other direction. Yet, when he asked her point blank if she wished them to part, the tears rose to her eyes and she had again to yield to his intreaties.

Thus, under these unfavourable auspices, they were married quietly and settled down to make each other happy in humble lodgings which they had poorly, but comfortably, furnished with the money they jointly possessed.

And they were happy. Roy had secured a berth in a solicitor's office at a salary which, if very modest, was sufficient for their immediate necessities, and (like everybody else) they hoped for more in course of time. They occasionally thought with regret of the estrangement from their nearest relations, but they by no means regretted the step they had taken.

For the first few months, however, both the young people hoped that the elders might relent and hold out some peace-offering. Miss Burton's name appeared with rather monotonous regularity in subscription lists and as one of the organisers of this or that entertainment, while Dr. Hamilton's doings remained a secret.

He had not made any special mark in the medical profession, although he had worked steadily and earnestly on certain lines. He had always been rather vexed that the register contained the name of another Dr. Hamilton who had attracted some attention; for strangers sometimes mistook Roy's father for the other man, and it is not pleasant, when you are accosted as a celebrity, to be compelled to own that you are not.!

Four years passed away. They were happy years, although not void of trouble; but hitherto the troubles had been such as to draw the young couple closer together and increase the sweetness of life. But the dark side was now becoming darker, and Marian was conscious of a grief that ate into her heart slowly but surely.

The expectations of "getting on" had not been fulfilled. Roy had been compelled to leave his original situation in consequence of changes in the firm. A relative had taken a position and there was no scope for Roy. He had obtained another post, but this was not quite so good, and the prospects of promotion were very hazy. Roy tried occasionally for a better berth, but he was unlucky. There seemed to be so many men on the same mission!

Marian saw that the hard work of the office, seated on a stool and with very little recreation, was telling on Roy's health; and she had a secret feeling that he grieved at having to wear threadbare clothes instead of being able to dress well. The third-rate tailoring, too, was a shock to his sensitive nature; he had been so particular about the fit of his garments.

Her own health remained good, but Roy was clearly in need of change and more nourishing food. Marian racked her brain for some way to procure the money to give Roy what he wanted, and the thought had crossed her mind of sinking her dignity and appealing to Aunt Eliza. She dismssed this idea, however; she knew that Roy would be mortally offended.

She had once hinted to Roy that it would be a good idea for her to do some slide painting, to give her occupation, but he had misinterpreted the suggestion.

"I am sorry, dearest," he said tenderly, "that I cannot give you all that I should like you to have, and if you feel that you must have more, then I will not object to your earning the extra money which I cannot!"

"Oh, no, Roy! It isn't that, dear, indeed it isn't!" she cried, her heart stabbed by these sorrowfully-spoken words, "I wouldn't paint them for anything! I don't want the money"—she was going to add "for myself," but she stopped. It would have hurt him just as much to have told him the truth!

But there came a time when she resolved to do it and say nothing about it. She could tell him that she could do with less for the housekeeping. And, later, if he learnt what she was doing, she would be able to show him her hoardings, the result of her work, and they would take a holiday, he would have better clothes, and they would be as happy as in the first year of married life.

"He will let me go on with the painting then!" she told herself. "And it may be the commencent of better times! He said that a bad beginning made a good ending; that hasn't come about yet, but it may!"

She went to a shop in the City noted for its slides; they were

"Marian, what is it, child? Are you really blind?"

Digitized by Google

very busy in that line and glad of a fresh worker, so they gave her a chance. The artistic finish which she gave to the slides pleased the heads of the firm and they gave her regular employment at home.

The pay seemed rather poor, but many other women did the same thing for a living, and Marian did not complain. She hugged her secret and worked steadily; the knowledge that she was earning made her more joyous and Roy was pleased as well as surprised.

"I am glad to see you so merry, dear!" he told her one evening, on returning from the office. "I have been worrying about you! I fancied that you were fretting!"

"Then you mustn't harbour such foolish fancies any more!" she cried gaily. "If you come home with so sad a look as you have done lately, you will make me worry! I suppose it amounts to this; you have been thinking that I was dissatisfied, and I was feeling the same about you!"

Then they both laughed merrily and gave themselves up to the pleasure of the society of the other, and drove away the shadows for the time being.

"I am perplexed to understand how it is that you are managing with less money, Marian!" he said, a week or so later. "Now——"

"It isn't your business to trouble about the household management, you have to leave it to me. Experience does a great deal!" she replied with a laugh.

He was forced to be satisfied. Another week passed, and he made a remark which caused her to place her hand to her side, as if in pain. It confirmed a fear which had possessed her lately.

"Your eyes look weak, dear! You should bathe them with something. I'll look it up for you among my notes! My father told me the name of the lotion, but I can't remember it!"

She promised him that she would get some of the lotion and bathe her eyes night and morning; she kept her promise, for she knew that her sight was less keen, and she hoped that it might be a mere passing weakness, but her hopes were not realised.

"It is the sight; it is really failing!" she murmured in alarm. "I must go to the hospital; I cannot afford to pay an oculist!"

The sight, constitutionally weak, had been strained by the work of slide painting, and glaucoma, the dreaded forerunner of blindness, had attacked her eyes.

She went to the opthalmic hospital, and they told her that nothing much could be done; she must wait till they became very much worse, and then they would perform an operation. The result of that treatment was uncertain, but it was all that could be done. In the meantime she must keep her eyes closed as much as possible.

On hearing this terrible verdict she was constrained to tell Roy what she had done.

"Don't be angry with me, Roy, dear!" she pleaded, her poor eyes filled with tears. "It was my love for you that prompted me to do it!"

"I know it, Marian!" he replied gently as he stooped and kissed her lovingly. "We must hope for the best!"

How could he chide her? She had sacrificed herself for the love of him! He railed against the fate that made him so helpless to take her out of this poverty and raise her to the position to which she had been educated; he railed against his father and Miss Burton; but it was all useless, and, strong man as he was, he threw himself in a chair in the other room and wept with vexation.

As a rule, glaucoma takes time to develop, but Marian's case was an exception. The disease developed rapidly. There is no visible sign of the malady; the eyes look well to others, but the patient finds the sight becoming hazy, then a fog appears to be hanging before them, and all is grey. The sight is gone!

Marian's eyes were in the hazy stage, when white paper sometimes seems pinkish. The haze was increasing and reading was impossible for more than a few minutes, and even then only with great strain. In a week from the visit to the hospital she was unable to read, and could scarcely grope her way about. The disease was not ripe enough for the operation, they told her, and she had to go home and wait in mental anguish.

She was lying on the couch when a knock at the door aroused her from her unpleasant meditations.

"If you please, Mrs. Hamilton," said the kindly landlady, "there's a boy downstairs from the City, and he says that them slides is wanted, and the customer is in a fine way, and the firm wants an explanation of the shameful way you've served 'em!"

It was not clear from the landlady's outpouring whether it was the heads of the firm or the slides which had been treated shamefully. Marian started up in alarm.

"Oh, dear!" she groaned. "I had quite forgotten them! I remember that I had a special set to do, and this trouble drove it clean out of my mind! Whatever shall I do?"

The landlady suggested the simple device of returning the slides untouched, with a message to the effect that she had been ill; but Marian recollected that the slides were for a particular customer, who gave the firm a lot of work, and this might lead to the total loss of this customer. The firm had been kind to her, and she felt that some explanation was really due to them.

"I'll go to the firm and explain!" she declared. "I can get them to put me in a 'bus when I come out, and I can ride right to this corner. I'll go with the boy now!"

Mrs. Mansell protested vigorously, but Marian was firm. She went with the astonished lad, who looked at her blue glasses with curiosity, but piloted her gently down the street and into the omnibus.

"It's a lady as wants 'em, ma'am," said the boy in response to Marian's question. "She was in a hawful temper about it, and I wouldn't ha' been in the guv'ner's boots for a sovereign! She asked me how long I'd be coming to you, and said as she would be at the shop again by the time I got back!"

"Then perhaps I can mollify her and so help your master," remarked Marian. The boy did not comprehend the term "mollify," but he said nothing. "I must bear the blame," continued Marian, "as it is my fault—or my misfortune!"

Marian arrived at the shop before the return of the irate customer. The proprietor was aghast at the immensity of his trouble when he found that the slides were untouched.

"Let me stop and explain to her!" said Marian. "I can sit here, and you can tell me when she comes, as I can't see her!"

"I am extremely sorry for you!" murmured the proprietor. "I fancy you won't want me to tell you when she comes in; you'll soon know she's here!"

Marian heard the swing doors open shortly afterwards, and she waited for a torrent of abuse, addressed to the proprietor, but the new-comer said nothing, and Marian concluded that this was another customer. She heard some low talk, and then someone approached her, and the head of the firm said:

"Mrs. Hamilton, this is the lady for whom the slides were intended. I have told her that you would explain!"

"I am very sorry, madam!" began Marian, rather lamely. "I was unfortunately attacked by——" She could not go on; it was too painful to speak of her misfortune, and she broke down. She tried to get a glimpse of the woman before her, but in vain.

There was a dead silence. The customer coughed, as if to clear some obstruction from her throat.

"Marian!" said a voice, the sound of which set her brain in a whirl. "Marian, what is it, child? Are you really blind?" The last dread word was uttered in a horrified tone.

"Aunt Eliza!" gasped Marian, stretching her hands in front of her.

"Yes, child!" came the reply, and—oh, how strangely gentle it was! And the name "Marian" ended with a sound that was suspiciously like a sob.

"I'm going into your private room!" declared Miss Burton to the master, and she marched Marian to the back of the shop. "Now, sit down there, Marian, and tell me all—all!"

Digitized by Google

So Marian told her all, sobbing the while; and Miss Burton took her home in a cab and went off in that same cab for a clever man who had made that complaint a special study.

Miss Burton was gone some time. Marian lay still, hardly able to comprehend the swift course of events. What a strange meeting with Aunt Eliza, after more than four years! And how completely changed was that worthy relative's manner towards her! It was the power of misfortune which had worked this miracle, so misfortune is likely to bring some compensating advantages, and it is right that it should!

Roy would be home soon, and how surprised he would be! But Aunt Eliza returned first, accompanied by the medical gentleman.

"Now James!" she said authoritatively. "Here she is! What can you do for her?"

The stranger pulled down the blind, lighted the lamp, and did what he could to transform the apartment into a dark room, so that he could use the ophthalmoscope and examine Marian's eyes.

"H'm! Not so bad!" he said, and Marian fancied that he heaved a sigh of relief. "You want some special glasses, my dear, which I will have made for you, and in a month or so your sight will be good enough for you to get about and read a little. It will come back again in time. Don't upset yourself about what the other men told you, they are still in the dark about this disease, but I have gone farther than they, and I'll cure you without an operation! But, mind, no more slide painting! Eh, Eliza?"

Marian was too overjoyed to notice the familiar style of speech. She stammered out her thanks to both of them, but the medical gentleman cut her short, though not unkindly.

"Tut, tut! It's a pleasure to do something for a woman who will do so much for the man she loves. You are a model wife, my dear! Ah, if I had known!"

"If we had known, James!" interposed Aunt Eliza sharply. "I take my share of the blame, mind!"

"Yes, yes! But we'll soon make it all up!"

Marian was vaguely wondering what it all meant when a quick step was heard on the stairs. The stranger sprang up from his chair. Roy entered the room hurriedly.

"Marian, how are they to-day? I——"

He stopped in amazement, his arms dropped by his side, and his faltering lips framed the word, "Father!"

"Yes, Roy, your father—come to ask forgiveness for the wrong he did your wife four years ago, when he thought that she was not a worthy helpmeet for you! But I can at least do her some good, make some reparation! I have done something in those four years!"

"Are you the Dr. Hamilton who has made discoveries in eye diseases? I thought it was the other man!" gasped Roy.

Then father and son stepped towards each other and grasped hands.

Aunt Eliza placed her arm round Marian's waist.

"It was as much my fault as anyone's," she said weeping softly. "Oh, I am so sorry! James and I were cousins, and we might have been—— Ah, me! I was too hot-tempered and we fell out, and the feud lasted till this very day, when I went to him and asked his help for my niece and his daughter-in-law!"

"The good ending has come, Marian!" cried Roy.

F. Brewster.

"Do you see anything coming our way?" asked the morning star of a companion. "Not yet," was the reply, "but I see a servant below there who is about to light her kitchen fire with paraffin oil."

"I don't see why I can't keep my husband at home," said a distressed-looking little woman. "Why don't you try to make home attractive for him?" "I have. I have taken up the drawing-room carpet, sprinkled sawdust on the floor, and put a beer-keg in the room, but, somehow or other, it doesn't seem to make any difference."

CONVINCING SIGNS.

Telling of How a Girl Knew She was Going to Have a Proposal.

They happened to meet in a large draper's shop the other day, and they had a conversation which sent one of them away with floods of light illuminating her soul.

She was one of those girls who are adored by old ladies and constantly invited to tea by them to meet bachelor sons, and who count all the admirers they ever had on the fingers of one hand.

The other—well, she was different. She was one of those maddening creatures who are always mysteriously supplied with roses and bonbons, and escorted everywhere, in spite of the fact that all the other girls are agreed that "there is absolutely nothing in her."

The latter young woman was meditating over some silks when the other one greeted her.

"I suppose you are trying to decide between the old rose and the pale green?" she said.

"Well, no," replied the other girl frankly. "You see, I am getting my wedding things, and I think I'll have both." Then she looked down to blush and up to see the effect of her words.

"Is it possible? I——"

"Yes, dear, and you can't imagine how nervous I am."

"Well, do tell me how he——" began the other girl dreamily.

"Proposed? Oh, but he hasn't done it yet!"

"But I thought that you——"

"Were selecting a trousseau? So I am, goosie. You see, it is like this. He will call at eight this evening, and by nine we shall be formally engaged."

"But how do you know?" helplessly asked the other girl.

"When a man asks you in an anxious tone if you think a married man ought to give up his club, you may know that his intentions are serious, and when he follows it up a few days later by asking you if you don't think a man has a right to smoke all over his own house it is high time to decide when the wedding shall be."

"My goodness!"

"Yes, but that wasn't what convinced me."

"Oh, do tell me about it."

"No, it was simply this; I met him in the street yesterday, and he was reading a paper so intently that he didn't even see me until I spoke. Then he blushed violently, and in great confusion thrust his paper into his overcoat pocket. Well, he went home with me, and—now, you must never tell this as long as you live."

"I never, never will."

"Well, I was so curious to see what he had been reading that confused him, so that I made an excuse to slip out into the hall, where his coat was hanging, and take the paper out of his pocket, and what do you think it was?"

"Oh, I can't imagine."

"It was a ladies' paper, and the article that he had been reading was one which dealt with 'The Choice of a Home.' Now, do you see why I am selecting my trousseau?" she asked triumphantly.

"Yes, I do," meekly replied the other girl.

P. W. Lyon.

Digitized by Google

Powerful New Series.

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

EPISODE ONE.

The Trap is Baited.

"My Dear Olive,—Will you join our house party this week-end? We have several other nice people coming down, and I am sure you will like them all. The lawn is in perfect condition, so bring your favourite racquet with you. If it should rain, we shall have to fall back on music, or ping-pong, and as Mr. Dean Fisher, the famous Bridge player, will be here, we can count upon being taught the most fascinating game of the age. In any case, we will take care that you enjoy yourself immensely. Do come, there's a dear, for old time's sake. There is a train from Euston at 4.35 on Friday afternoon, and Harry will meet you at this end. All love.—Your affectionate school-friend, "Annabel Vernon."

"How lovely!" was my mental exclamation, after reading the above letter. "I'm longing for a glimpse of country life again, and nothing could please me better than to go down to Hertfordshire just now. I haven't played tennis for two years, but I shall soon get into practice again. But I wonder what made Annabel remember me just now, after losing touch with me for such a long time?"

It certainly was odd, but all the more pleasant on that account, that Annabel should renew our old friendship in this unconventional manner, and I determined to accept the invitation in as unquestioning a spirit as it had been given. To this end I immediately began my preparations, and for the next few days was happily occupied in buying various dainty but inexpensive additions to my wardrobe, for I naturally wanted to do justice to Annabel's good nature.

My choice was limited to half-mourning tints, for it was not more than six months since I had lost my only remaining near relative, the aunt with whom I had lived nearly three years, and I had no wish to show disrespect to the memory of so good a friend as she had been to me. Still, I had ample reason to be satisfied with what I thought it necessary to take down to Vernon Towers for a week-end visit, and I began my journey in the happy consciousness of being able to do credit to both my hostess and myself.

True to promise, Mr. Vernon met me at the station, and although I had never seen him before, he and I were soon chatting as merrily together as if we had known each other for ages.

As the trap turned smartly into the drive leading up to Vernon Towers, Annabel came flying to meet us, and she greeted me so rapturously that I felt less lonely than I had felt for many a long month.

"You darling!" she exclaimed, after kissing me affectionately on both cheeks. "It was so good of you to come!"

"No, the goodness was on your side. I've been very lonely, and been hardly anywhere since—since——"

"Yes, yes, I know. But we won't talk of your troubles now. You've come here to enjoy yourself. My word, how lovely you look! And what a smart frock you have on! You make me feel a regular dowdy little country mouse."

Rattling on thus inconsequently, Mrs. Vernon, herself a picture of dainty grace, led the way to a delightful room which awaited my occupation.

"There, now," she smiled. "Make yourself absolutely at home. If there is anything lacking for your comfort, don't hesitate to order it at once. You'll excuse me now, won't you, dear? I'm off to dress for dinner, and you have nice time to do the same. I'll send you a cup of tea, and will see you as soon as you come downstairs."

A second later, and my friend had hurried away to her own dressing-room, leaving me full of pleasurable anticipation concerning the enjoyment in store for me.

My dinner dress was very becoming to my fair hair and delicate complexion. It was also exceedingly smart, there being nothing about it to betray the fact that I had made it myself, and as I was known to have recently lost a relative, it would not occur to anybody that I would still have chosen black for economy's sake. To tell the truth, the whole extent of my fortune was but one hundred and fifty pounds a year, although by dint of careful management, I got as much effect out of it as some women would have got out of three times that amount.

It saves a tremendous lot when you can make and trim your own hats and dresses, as I was very fond of doing, and it was no part of my plan in life to tell everybody that my invariably stylish appearance owed nothing to either milliners or dressmakers.

'H'm! Peter Robinson, or Marshall and Snelgrove?" queried Annabel, looking very critically at me when we met in the drawing-room just after the first dinner bell had sent forth its warning peal.

"Neither," was my laughing response. "I prefer to be more exclusive."

"Lucky girl! I wish I could afford to stipulate for exclusive models. It takes me all my time to make my allowance spin out from one quarter to another."

I was about to rectify the wrong impression which my remark had apparently created, but lost my opportunity, for some of the other guests put in an appearance, and I was promptly introduced to them.

"Mrs. Grainger, here is the school-friend I told you about. Olive, this is Mrs. Grainger, a near neighbour of ours. Mr. Taskot, come over here, and let me introduce you to Miss Beresford. You ought to get on very well together, as you are both ardent tennis players. Mr. Fisher, I don't think I will give you the pleasure of an introduction."

"Oh, my dear Mrs. Vernon," protested Mr. Fisher, a spruce little man of about five-and-forty. "I shall be disconsolate if you leave me out of the running altogether. Pray, what have I done to earn banishment from Paradise?"

"You promised to give me a lesson in Bridge this afternoon, and you failed to keep your promise."

"That was my fault," interposed Mrs. Grainger. "We needed a fourth, and I wouldn't let him off till we finished. But we can do without him to-morrow, for Miss Beresford can take his place."

"She'll beat you all into fits. Nobody at school ever stood a chance against her."

It was Mrs. Vernon who volunteered this information, and I qualified it by saying, "I haven't touched a racquet for ages, so I shall be a perfect novice at the game. In fact, I don't think I shall venture to play yet awhile."

Digitized by Google

"What a pity! I quite thought tennis would be your favourite amusement. Never mind, you'll enjoy Bridge all the more. Ah, there goes the second dinner bell."

EPISODE TWO.

I Enter the Trap.

THE dinner was a merry function, and I could not help admiring the ease and ability with which Annabel did the honours of the house. The menu had been carefully thought out, the dinner itself was beautifully cooked and immaculately served, and the table decorations evidenced much artistic taste.

Looking at Harry Vernon, I thought him a most lucky individual to have secured such a clever little wife, even as I thought her most fortunate in having such a handsome, good-natured husband, and such a beautiful home, apparently accompanied by any amount of money.

The only thing that jarred upon me at all was Annabel's addiction to slang, but, where everything else was so faultless, it would have been unkind to lay too much stress upon a habit that was probably due to mere exuberance of spirits.

Besides, it would have been ungrateful to see anything wrong in the old friend who had, after years of silence, no sooner remembered my existence than she had made plans for my happiness.

When one is determined to make the best of everything, it is easy to enjoy the gifts of the gods. But if a girl who has hitherto had hardly a glimpse of Society finds herself suddenly exalted to be the centre of an admiring group of devotees, and to whom libations of compliments, admiration, and deference are poured out unstintedly, it is not surprising that she is slightly carried away by excess of delight.

It was so with me.

I had occupied a subordinate position all my life, and although my aunt had been almost a mother to me, she had naturally been first in importance in all things at home, and no one had served her more willingly than myself. After her death, I had led a quiet life, principally because my lot was cast amongst people who had neither the money nor the opportunity to be very gay. Besides, the annuity which enabled us to live in much greater luxury than any of our neighbours was no longer in existence, and the little fortune that was bequeathed to me had been saved by my aunt out of her surplus income.

Thus it was that the new atmosphere in which I moved was doubly delightful to me, and as the bachelors of the party were as deferential as if I had been some great heiress, nothing was wanting to complete my enjoyment.

I shall never forget that first evening at Vernon Towers. Neither shall I forget the awakening which followed all too soon.

After coffee, Mr. Vernon suggested that somebody should sing, and Annabel immediately pressed me to do so.

"I sing!" was my amused exclamation. "Why, I couldn't to save my life! Don't you remember, Annabel, how you all used to laugh at me whenever I raised my voice?"

"H'm! Perhaps I do. But that is years ago, and I daresay you have taken lessons since then."

"Indeed I haven't! What use would it have been to waste time on a voice like mine?"

"Well, that's a pity, for nobody else seems given to music. I'm a real stupid at it myself. What shall we do to pass the evening away?"

"I'll give you the lesson in Bridge which some of you profess to want," replied Mr. Dean Fisher, and his offer was received with a chorus of acclamation by all save myself, who said ruefully: "I'm afraid it is no use counting me even as a pupil, for I have never handled cards in my life, and know nothing whatever about them."

"You poor dear!" exclaimed Annabel. "What a lot of pleasure you have missed! But you shall soon make up for lost time, and I'll give you no end of wrinkles."

"All the same, I think you had better leave me out, for I shall only spoil fun for other people."

"Very well, dear, please yourself. You shall be looker-on for one evening."

"Then you and I and one other will have to be 'lookers-on' also," remarked Harry Vernon.

"Yes, we must have Miss Beresford, if we are to make up two sets," agreed Mr. Fisher, "unless you care to play a three-cornered game."

"Of course. There are only seven of us without Olive. Come, dear, that settles it, doesn't it? You wouldn't like to spoil sport for the lot of us, would you?"

When Annabel put it like that, I felt that it would be extremely unkind to refuse, so, though I feared lest I should look ridiculous by reason of my ignorance, I consented to sit down and go through the rudiments of Bridge, prior to playing as a Mr. Bainbrig's partner. This gentleman did not arrive till dinner was over, and I gathered that he and his sister, who came with him, had recently taken a house within a mile of the Towers.

They were both well on to forty, Miss Bainbrig being rather younger than her brother. But they were both very handsome, and were still in the first pleasurable flush of succeeding to a big inheritance, which had been none the less welcome because it was unexpected. In fact, everybody here, except myself, seemed to be rich, and I could not help wishing that I was rich too, for I had not then quite realised how much a person has to be thankful for who can count upon a certain £150 per annum.

"I hear you haven't played cards before," observed Miss Bainbrig, "so I shall have somebody to keep me company, if I play as badly as usual."

"Don't you know anything about Bridge either?" I asked, and received for answer: "My dear young lady, I never had time to think of mere amusement until I was suddenly transformed from a poor governess into an heiress. That is where you have the advantage of me. You have always been well off, and heiress-ship sits easily upon you in consequence."

"You surely don't imagine——"

"Olive," interrupted Annabel, "you are wasting everybody's time. Do sit down."

Thus admonished, I took my seat at the table, and tried my hardest to understand all I was told, without appearing stupid.

"We'll just have a preliminary canter, by way of showing Miss Bainbrig and Miss Beresford how to handle the cards, and then we will have a rubber," quoth Mr. Fisher, sitting down as Miss Bainbrig's partner.

Very much interested, we spent a quarter of an hour in grasping the elementaries of card playing, and Mr. Dean Fisher was good enough to say that both Miss Bainbrig and I were likely to prove extraordinarily apt pupils.

"I think we may just as well shape our first game

Digitized by Google

now," he said smilingly. "Practice is much the best way of teaching anything. What shall the points be?"

"The points?" I asked, feeling very dense, but at the same time being resolved to learn all there was to learn, so that when I began to try a real game, I might be more on a footing with those who could already boast a knowledge of Bridge.

"Well, you see, Miss Beresford," I was told, "one must play for at least a trifle, however small. Otherwise there is not sufficient stimulus to do your best. But the stakes shall be merely nominal. What do you say to a penny a point?"

Even I, with my small margin for extravagances, thought there could be little harm in this, and we all agreed without hesitation, although I did wonder just for a second what my dear aunt would have thought, if she could have seen me playing for money. "Still," I reflected, "to lose or win a penny on a game cannot amount to more than a few coppers either way during the course of an evening, and now that I intend to go out more than I have done before, it will be useful for me to have learnt the great Society accomplishment."

"I will deal, choose trumps, and play Dummy, and will explain my methods as I go on," said Mr. Fisher, who was evidently anxious to make his lessons thorough. "Then the ladies will know what to do when their turn for dealing comes."

Mr. Bainbrig had no objection, and we began.

"Hearts are trumps," said the dealer. "Play your lead, Miss Beresford. That's right. You should draw the ace with that card. Now then, Miss Bainbrig, turn your cards up."

All Miss Bainbrig's cards were now exposed on the table, and it seemed funny that she should not be allowed to play one of them herself, but await her partner's direction each time. I was relieved to see that 'Dummy,' as the exposed cards were called, only had two trumps, the knave and the ten, for I was already keenly excited at the idea of possibly proving as skilful or as lucky as my antagonists.

It transpired presently that Mr. Fisher held the three other face cards of the trump suit, thus giving him and his partner all the five honours. But Mr. Bainbrig and I won the odd trick, and scored eight below the Bridge, and in the next hand we were luckier still, for, diamonds being chosen as trumps by me, we won four tricks, and scored twenty-four below the Bridge.

"Thirty-two," counted Mr. Fisher. "That's one game to you."

I could hardly contain my delight at this announcement, and Mr. Bainbrig, who was almost as great a novice as we two lady pupils, beamed just as happily as I did.

Perhaps we should not have been quite so elated if we had fully grasped the fact that Mr. Fisher having scored twelve above the Bridge for having no trumps, and his partner forty-eight, because the four trumps she had were all honours, they were in infinitely better case than the players who had won the game.

The next game was won right off by our opponents, who scored forty above the Bridge for Grand Slam, and, as hearts were again trumps, they made fifty-six below the Bridge, our score being absolutely nil.

"That's one game each—very good indeed," smiled Mr. Fisher. "Now for the conquering game."

Perhaps Mr. Bainbrig made a clever calculation, and perhaps he imagined himself to be extra cautious. Anyhow, when he dealt, he declared sans atout, or "no trumps," and we won the game with one trick, scoring twelve plus a hundred for winning the rubber; while our opponents marked thirty for three aces in Mr. Fisher's hand.

"Splendid!" he exclaimed. "Miss Beresford, the rubber is yours, and I must actually acknowledge you my victor. Don't tell me that you knew nothing about cards."

EPISODE THREE.

A Morning Meeting.

We played two or three more rubbers, and as my partner and I always seemed to be getting the best of it, I was as eager to continue playing as anybody else. Rendered cautious, Miss Bainbrig almost invariably chose black trumps, which counted much less than red ones. But Mr. Fisher seemed to become suddenly imbued with a mania for "doubling," while the games followed quickly upon each other's heels.

"You are a rubber to the good," he said to me, after we had been playing some hours. "But I don't quite know how we stand. I'll reckon up the score above the Bridge afterwards. It's such a bother to stop and do it now."

"But we've won the most games, haven't we?" I asked eagerly, and was both proud and pleased when he answered ruefully: "Oh, yes, you have beaten us in that respect. Miss Bainbrig, I can't understand how it is we've been so unlucky."

"Neither can I," was the rather cross response. "I thought you were a most wonderful player."

"Well, of course," was the deprecating answer, "luck goes a long way, and perhaps it will change for us to-morrow. I'm sure our opponents will give us our revenge."

"Yes, to-morrow," I said. "To-morrow is Saturday. And on Monday I should like to have still another lesson."

"Very well then," agreed Mr. Bainbrig, "we will say to-morrow. There is nothing to prevent us from coming to-morrow evening, is there, Edith?"

"No, I think not," replied Miss Bainbrig. "We can come, and we shall get to know exactly how many pennies we have won or lost to-night."

"Yes, I'll have the scoring block added up by then. Mind you bring a few pennies with you, so that we may square accounts."

We all laughed merrily at this, and I added to the fun by pretending that I meant to buy something very extravagant with my pennies.

I had been too much engrossed in what was going on at our table to notice how the others were amusing themselves. But I gathered afterwards that Mr. and Mrs. Vernon had been opponents, and that they had been playing for shilling points. Mrs. Grainger and Mr. Taskot owned to being comparative novices at Bridge, and I thought it very nice of the Vernons to spend their time teaching a game of which they were so fond, when they might just as well have invited some clever people to amuse themselves with.

On the Saturday morning I rose more languidly than usual, for late hours were quite an innovation with me, and the excitement of the previous evening had helped to fatigue me. But I no sooner looked out of my window at the lovely scenery which surrounded Vernon Towers than my languor vanished like magic, and I hastened my toilet, so that I might enjoy a brisk walk in the fresh air before breakfast.

I made my way to a woody eminence about half a mile from the Towers, and was revelling in the joy of gathering a huge handful of fragrant bluebells, when I heard advancing footsteps, and, looking up from my pleasant occupation, I saw Mr. Taskot approaching me.

Digitized by Google

"By Jove, this is lucky!" he exclaimed. "I never expected to find you out of doors at this time of day. How do you feel after last night's dissipation?"

"Dissipation?" I laughed. "It surely isn't dissipation to learn a game of cards?"

"No, of course not," was the prompt admission. "You ladies retired quite early."

"Much later than I usually do, though. I am generally in bed by ten or half-past."

"Then you must live in Sleepy Hollow when you are at home, and I pity you."

At this remark I felt myself colour hotly, for I fancied it was intended as a kind of hint that Mr. Taskot knew all about my modest circumstances, and my new surroundings had already imbued me with a desire to appear quite as smart as my fresh associates.

"It all depends upon what you call 'Sleepy Hollow,'" I retorted. "Personally, I don't think it matters which end of the day you choose for enjoyment, so long as you get it."

"I beg your pardon, Miss Beresford. I really meant to hint my envy of the idyllic life you lead."

"How do you know that my life is idyllic?"

"The fact is patent to the most simple observer. You are as fresh as a mountain daisy, and as sweet as one of those bluebells."

At this highly-exaggerated compliment I drew myself up to my most imposing height, and coldly bade Mr. Taskot "good morning." His familiarity jarred upon me, and I had an instinctive feeling that it had its origin in something that had conduced to lessen the respect which I considered to be my due, and which had hitherto always been conceded to me by any men with whom I was acquainted.

Apparently realising that I meant to maintain my dignity, Mr. Taskot hastened to apologise, and his profuse explanations succeeded in removing the unpleasant impression he had created.

"The fact is," he said, as we walked slowly back towards the house together—"the fact is, Miss Beresford, I'm the most awful ass imaginable. I always say the most tactless things one could think of, and I've the silliest way of forgetting that ladies don't like to be talked to as if they were dairy-maids."

"You find yourself so used to paying flattery to dairy-maids that you forget when you are talking to a lady? Is that what you mean to imply?"

"Miss Beresford, I had a suspicion yesterday that I was a very slow person, compared with you. I am sure of it to-day."

"I don't think I follow you."

"Oh, it's easy enough. You look as amiable as a Derby winner. But you can sting like a wasp when you like."

"Thank you. I'm afraid I do not appreciate the compliment."

"All the same, it is a compliment. if you will only accept it in the spirit in which it is offered. Let me try again to show you what I mean. I started by saying that I was slow, compared with you. You grant that much?"

"Certainly."

"Very well, then, I will prove it. When I came down here yesterday morning, I bragged of being a first-rate tennis player and a crack Bridge player, whereas I'm a very poor hand at both. You, on the other hand, played the dark horse, and vowed that you had never handled a card in your life. Result—you win a few rubbers, and I lose a pot of money after you imagine we have all shut up for the night."

"You lost a lot of money?"

"Heaps."

"But why risk it? Unless you don't mind losing?"

"If you come down to a country house where Bridge is the ruling deity, how are you to help yourself? Besides, a novice is always fool enough to think his luck will come uppermost directly, and I suppose I'm like all the rest in believing that when I tackle the cards this forenoon I shall leave Vernon hopelessly in the shade. Besides, I don't mind losing a pony or two."

By this time we had reached the house, and as it was close upon breakfast time, I hurried up to my own room, to freshen my toilet before going to the dining-room. I put my blue-bells in water, but felt somehow that I had been cheated of my full enjoyment in bringing them.

What was there in Mr. Taskot that jarred upon me every time he spoke? I gave him credit for not wanting to be anything but courteous and complimentary to me. And I certainly had no reason to suppose that the Vernons would invite an undesirable guest to their house. Nevertheless, his mode of expressing himself did not strike me as infallibly well-bred, and many of his phrases were, as he himself owned, quite out of place when speaking with a lady.

"I'll avoid another early morning encounter with Mr. Taskot," I told myself. "It will not do to create the impression that I am going out of my way to cultivate the society of the bachelor visitors at the Towers. Dear me, it's pouring with rain! What a blessing I got in before it came on."

At breakfast everybody lamented the sudden change in the weather, which would effectually prevent an adjournment to the tennis lawn, but there was no danger of our being troubled with ennui, for Annabel suggested that Mrs. Grainger, Mr. Vernon, Mr. Fisher, and I should play a rubber.

"No, I'll give place to Taskot," was Harry's magnanimous concession. "I have a few things to attend to, and if I don't turn up at lunch, I shall see you all then."

"Very well, then, I'll be Miss Beresford's partner," agreed Mr. Taskot. "But do you think the ladies will like to go shilling points?"

"No," drawled Mr. Fisher. "Miss Beresford played penny points last night, and I'm going to take my revenge on the same terms."

I was glad to hear this, for though I was eager to continue my lessons in Bridge, I would not risk losing more than a few coppers. At least, that was my idea, and so long as my partner and I won a fair proportion of games, I felt not the slightest premonition of coming mischief, although the persistent rain formed the excuse for spending nearly the whole day at the card-tables.

In the evening the Bainbrigs returned, and the programme of last night was practically repeated. I made rapid strides in knowledge, and the more insight I had in the game, the more fascinated did I become with it, and I felt positively sorry when the Bainbrigs rose to take their departure, after playing for a few hours against Mr. and Mrs. Vernon.

"Now, then, Mr. Fisher, how do we stand?" inquired Mr. Bainbrig. "We want to square up before we go home."

In the light of after knowledge, I feel convinced that Mr. Fisher, to whom Annabel handed her scoring block for final addition, wilfully delayed adding up the honours scores, knowing very well that none of the people to whom he professed to be giving a few good-natured lessons would have gone on playing if they had guessed how matters really stood at the beginning. Indeed, even Miss Bainbrig, who had spoken so complacently of the joys of heiress-ship, looked astounded when she received a little slip of paper, on which her indebtedness to her various opponents was marked.

Digitized by Google

But neither she nor her brother kept my attention long just then, for Annabel beckoned to me to join her at the other end of the room, and I hastened to hear what she had to say to me.

"How have you enjoyed your Bridge lessons?" she inquired, with a smile. "I hope you have found the time pass pleasantly, in spite of to-day's rain."

"It's been just lovely!" was my enthusiastic reply. "I never enjoyed anything so much in my life."

"I can quite believe that. For you must have been very much interested, or you couldn't have picked the game up as quickly as you have done. Mr. Fisher says that, for a novice, you are simply marvellous. You've played hours and hours, and only lost £11 7s. 10d."

"£11 7s. 10d.!" I almost screamed. "Annabel, you are making a frightful mistake! It isn't possible! I've only played for a penny a game!"

"Penny points, dear. That means a penny for every point, and sometimes you have been hundreds of points below your opponents in one rubber."

"But I've helped to win several rubbers, so I must have cleared on those games what I lost on the others."

"On the contrary, even where you won the rubber, your opponents had big scores above the Bridge, which left your score nowhere. But, as I said before, you have lost remarkably little for a novice, and £11 7s. 10d. means very little to you."

"Very little!" I groaned, sinking into the nearest chair, for my limbs were trembling under me, and I felt as if I should faint, so great was my surprise and horror at the information just given me. "Very little. Why, it means ruin!"

(In next week's instalment Mr. Taskot comes to my assistance.)

Gent: "What sort of a crop did you get from that field? Has it made good hay?" Farmer: "Hay? Why, bless yer, zur, Oi doan't trouble much 'bout it; a crop o' them 'vertisement boards pays Oi better!"

Miss de Fashion: "Mother, what shall we send Miss de Style for her wedding present?" Mrs. de Fashion: "Will the list be published in the paper?" "No; she says that's vulgar." "Send her a plated saltspoon."

Beggar (at a lonely crossing): "Please, sir, won't yer give me sixpence?" Gentleman: "Why should a big, strong, able-bodied man like you take to begging?" Beggar: "Because I'm big, an' strong, an' able-bodied enough to enforce my demands. See?"

"Yesterday," said Jabson, "I refused a poor woman a request for a small sum of money, and in consequence of my act I passed a sleepless night. The tones of her voice were ringing in my ears the whole time." "Your softness of heart does you credit," said Mabson; "who was the woman?" "My wife."

Your Editor Chats.

Before you read this you will probably have perused the first instalment of our new serial which starts on the front page. It is the story of what a man did for greed of gold and desire for power. Many thrilling incidents are related, and I am sure that the story will hold your interest from start to finish. I shall be glad to know what readers think of "The Snare of Gold."

Another feature of this issue is the first of a series of Confessions of a Girl Gambler, which are related under the title of "The 'Bridge' of Ruin." These confessions will give you an insight into what goes on at Society card parties and how friends dupe friends in order that they may extract large sums of money from them. Only recently some correspondence was published in the daily papers regarding the large amounts of money lost and won nightly at Bridge among the upper classes. Many of you may, perhaps, have thought it impossible for so much to have changed hands in a single night, but after reading these articles you will quite understand how it could happen.

The tenth list in the Juggled Letters Competition appears, as you will see, on the next page. In two weeks' time the last list will appear.

I am sorry not yet to be able to announce the result of the Buried Stations Competition. The checking of the attempts is being proceeded with as rapidly as possible, and as soon as it is completed the result will be published.

The most popular story in the issue of Short Stories dated July 18th was The Sisters; the others came in the following order:

A Woman Hater, Hilda's Hero, A Weir-Mitchell Victim, George Chester's Mistake, Playing with Fire, A Matter of Spelling, The Bottle of Cement.

The only competitor whose list gave the titles in their correct order was Mr. J. Roden, 239 Newcombe Road, Handsworth, Birmingham, and to him the gold-plated pencil-case has been awarded.

This is our Holiday Number, and I hope that everyone who reads it will think of the little slum children who are pining for a day in the country. Not only should they think of them, however, but send a contribution towards giving them a day of pleasure. Ninepence pays for a whole day's outing for one child, inclusive of a good supply of wholesome food.

This day means so much to these poor little mites, that if they do not get the opportunity of having it their disappointment is very great. Let everyone who reads this appeal send along ninepence—or more—and then the number of happy faces will be increased. All contributions should be addressed to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and they will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

COMPLETE IN TWELVE LISTS.

Letter Juggling Competition.

CASH DOWN. FIRST PRIZE, £25.	CASH DOWN. SECOND PRIZE, £10.	CASH DOWN. THIRD PRIZE, £5.

TWO BILLIARD TABLES (measuring 4 ft. 10 inches by 2 ft. 8½ inches), together with cues, balls, marking board, and spirit level,
And TWENTY-FIVE GRAMOPHONES, each one fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, and accompanied by two records.

• • • • • • •

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct. Only one name must be written on each line.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES." Two more lists will appear.

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

EXAMPLE:
ABGHIIMMNR... Birmingham.

TENTH LIST.

109. AEHILLMOWY	115. BCEIIKMNOOR .....
110. CEGHIINNRSV	116. AAEGHORRT .....
111. ACDEELNOPS	117. ACDEEFGNORSV .....
112. ABEKLORTY	118. AACEFLORSTTYY .....
113. EEHMNORSTT	119. ACEFHNORRSW .....
114. AAFHLMOSTW	120. ACEENNPZ .....

Name..... Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

Cupid at the Helm.

Telling of the Winning of a "New Woman."

"ARE you determined to enter the race, Marion, in spite of the wishes of your friends?"

The season was drawing to a close at the popular seaside watering place, and the contest of the year for small sailing boats was to be sailed that day. The test was not only to decide the speed of the boats but to prove the skill of the sailors as well, and interest was greatly increased by the fact that one of the contestants was a woman.

A crowd of fashionable young men and women thronged the pier, chatting gaily among themselves and calling challenges and good wishes to the owners of the pretty craft.

Marion Dare had been the belle of the season. Her bright, happy nature and dauntless spirit had won the devotion of all who knew her; her slightest wish was anticipated by her many admirers, and she ruled her little court by the magic of her laughing eyes.

She had accepted the wager that "a woman's greatest possible skill could not stand the test of man's superior strength and muscle," and had avowed her determination to win the trophy from any man who wished to compete for it.

Startled by the familiar voice, she looked up quickly from the coil of rope she was untangling, surprised to find the speaker so near.

"I am quite resolved, Tom, so please say no more about it. I shall prove to you that the 'new woman' is not to be despised as a rival."

The man flushed at the thrust. He hated himself for his well-known opinion of the up-to-date girl.

A summer spent almost entirely in the society of a charming example of that type of young womanhood had altered his views very materially, and he had discovered many proofs of tender, womanly sweetness beneath the good-fellowship of this athletic girl's manner.

There was a note of tenderness in the earnest voice which a less determined listener would have found hard to resist.

"But, Marion, it is dangerous, foolhardy, for a woman to go out in a boat alone; you yourself can see a storm is threatening. Will nothing I can say induce you to remain on shore?"

She smiled brightly at his troubled face. "How dare you question my skill, sir? You who taught me all I know. I challenge you to combat. The race lies between our boats, and I warn you I shall lose no trick to win."

She waved her hand to him as the wind filled her sail and the little craft glided out into the bay.

With a gesture of impatience the skipper of the Lurline followed quickly in the wake of his pretty antagonist, and at a signal from the judges' boat the race started, amid loud cheers from friends on shore.

Marion showed her superior seamanship by crossing the line first by a clever manœuvre. Other boats followed in close pursuit, their sails outspread like the wings of white doves. There was a piping breeze from the north-west, and the boats flashed merrily through the waves, leaving billows of white foam behind them.

The young skipper of the Lurline soon outsailed the other craft, and came within speaking distance of the leading boat.

He called gaily across the water, "Shall it be gloves against a new pennant?"

The wind was steadily increasing, and now a squall struck the boats and laid them so low that their keels showed to windward. When they righted Marion screamed back, "Twelve buttons, if I win!"

The other boats were far behind and the race lay between these two. Marion stood bravely to her helm, never giving way an inch in her course, even though the squalls threatened to wreck her little craft. The Lurline was steadily gaining on her lead and the thought of defeat put her on her mettle.

About half the course was covered now, and a cheer went up from the shore as the Lurline came abreast the rival craft to windward. The boats tore madly through the water side by side; the excitement was at its height and each sailor watched eagerly for some point of advantage.

Suddenly a great puff of wind swept over the bay and struck the mainsail of the Lurline squarely, tearing it into ribbons. As the boom swept round it hit the skipper in the back and knocked him into the sea.

Obliged to exert every effort to keep her boat in its course, Marion was oblivious to all else until startled by the horrified cries of the watchers on land. Looking back to ascertain the cause she was shocked to discover the poor disabled Lurline drifting helplessly out to sea, without a skipper.

She brought her boat quickly about, gazing eagerly across the waves for some sign of the shipwrecked man. Finally, with a little moan of joy, she steered towards a black speck on the surface of the water.

It was the work of an instant to bring her boat alongside the drowning man, but the girl who held the tiller endured the agony of hours in that short race with death.

Wild shouts of joy greeted the pair as the young girl assisted her dripping companion over the side of the boat. Shaking the water from his eyes, the rescued man turned eagerly to his pretty opponent.

"I tell you, Marion, if you had been less prompt to act you would have had no rival sailor in these waters."

The woman asserted herself over the skipper, and now that the danger was past Marion burst into tears. Two dripping arms went round her, and she rested her head on a very broad but damp shoulder.

"Poor little girl, the strain has been too much!"

Marion cried softly to herself, and made no effort to leave the moist embrace. The guiding hand on the tiller almost relaxed its hold and the boat was kept to its own course, while Cupid took the helm. At last the sobbing ceased, and from somewhere in the vicinity of the lapel of his coat a saucy voice murmured:

"You were saved by a 'new woman,' Tom."

The arms tightened their embrace, as he pressed his cheek lovingly against the dark hair.

"Yes, God bless her! I adore the 'new woman.'"

She lifted her head—her glorious eyes shining with happiness.

"But I love you in the old-fashioned way, dear," she whispered.

Eric Canthorpe.

Digitized by Google

Splendid Serial Story.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

NAMES TO REMEMBER.

SIR TREVOR MAITLAND, of Maitland Manor, Melton.
LADY MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's second wife. Before her marriage with him she passed as a widow named Mrs. Vernon.
JACK MAITLAND, Sir Trevor's son by his first wife.
AGNES MAITLAND } Jack's sisters.
MURIEL MAITLAND }
WOOLF MAITLAND, the present Lady Maitland's only child.
IVY STRANGE, a foundling with whom Jack is in love.
HERIOT NORTH, a friend of Sir Trevor.
MIKE HOLLAND, an ex-convict and burglar who blackmails Lady Maitland, he having been in prison with her first husband.
DIGBY SCARLETT, an explorer and acquaintance of Jack. It was through him that Lady Maitland's first husband was imprisoned.
GILBERT CHASE, a detective employed by Jack to discover the mystery of Ivy's birth.
VERNON GRANT, Lady Maitland's first husband.
NURSE BEAUMONT, who knew Lady Maitland previous to her second marriage.

THIRTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.

"My Life Upon Her Faith."

"I'm more glad than I can say, sir, to see you something like your old self," Gilbert Chase said, as he stood in Jack Maitland's den the day following his departure from St. Pancras Station.

"And I to see you, Chase," replied Sir Trevor's son and heir, holding out his hand, which was still somewhat thin and delicate-looking, while his frank, handsome face had lost a little of its careless good-humour, and gained instead an expression of determination and sadness. He had been out of bed only a few days, and was still weak, though he was practically well enough to go about.

Gilbert Chase looked at him keenly as he seated himself in a chair facing his young host, to whom his usually blunted sympathies had been attracted.

"Yes," he said thoughtfully, "it's a long time, Mr. Maitland, since we parted, and much has happened in it, putting your accident on one side. By the way, I wish to ask you, sir," he went on, scanning the weary face of the boy who had employed him to solve the mystery of the missing girl's parentage some months ago, "whether on the night of the ball you did meet Mr. Digby Scarlett? You will remember, sir, you mentioned to me that you had an appointment with him?"

Jack flushed; the reason that occasioned the appointment recurring in a bitter flash of mockery, as he thought how the girl for whom he had desired to fight, had capitulated irrevocably, and was now out of his reach for ever!

"I remember the appointment I made with Mr. Scarlett very well," he said, after a pause, speaking calmly, "but did not meet him, and was about to retrace my steps, when I suddenly seemed to come to an end of everything."

"Humph!" murmured the detective in a disappointed tone. "Have you any idea as to the extent of your stroll before you turned back?"

Jack frowned. "Oh, no great distance," he answered carelessly; "this side of the spinny."

Gilbert Chase started. This side of the spinny! Then how was it that the stump of the Havana he had since treasured so carefully had lain on the far side of the spinny?

According to Digby Scarlett he had missed his adversary and returned to the Manor. "How then," the detective wondered, with a quickening of his breath, "had he managed to fling his half-finished cigar so close to the old oak in the place he professed ignorance of?"

He looked at the boy, who seemed to have grown so strangely and suddenly into a pre-occupied man, and wondered whether he had learnt of the weaving of Fate round the lovely foundling for whose sake he had so narrowly escaped death.

"Are you inclined to let me tell you some news, sir?" he began gravely, leaning forward, "some news that may distress you, yet which I feel it my duty to tell you?"

The thoughts of the boy flew to his sweetheart—she who was now the wife of another! Even the detective wished to sympathise with the man she had jilted, he thought bitterly, his young pride hurt that others should see his desolation.

"I know it," he answered curtly, "my step-mother acquainted me with the fact some days ago. If you don't mind, we will drop the subject, Chase."

Gilbert Chase swallowed a surprised gurgle.

He had been prepared for horror, dismay, even passionate protestations of denial, but this cool acknowledgment and desire to turn to other topics was an unexpected reception of his news. Had he, after all, he asked himself, made a mistake in thinking that the love of the boy was stronger than it really had been?

Surely, if his love were worth a straw, he would have shown more feeling than that on hearing of his sweetheart being wanted by the police!

Gilbert Chase felt that he had been wrong in his estimate of the strength of affection of which Jack Maitland was capable. After all, youth had not the tenacity of purpose in affairs of the heart that more mature age possessed. Yet, somehow, he felt sorry that the love idyll could be so lightly cast aside.

"Then you are no longer interested in the parentage of that poor young lady, Mr. Maitland?" he asked, after a pause.

"I don't consider now that I have a right to interfere with her private affairs," Jack returned bitterly. "She has someone else to unravel the mystery—should she wish it!"

The detective rose slowly to his feet. He felt disappointed at the half-hearted interest Sir Trevor Maitland's son and heir took in the whirligig of time! He wanted to say something that would rouse him from his lethargy—something to stir the dormant fire and spirit that had been there on the night of the ball.

"Well, perhaps you are right, Mr. Maitland," he replied drily, "the mystery will be solved in a way that will, I fancy, startle us when it is. The veil of the past will not rest long on the shoulders of Ivy Strange when she stands in the dock to answer to the charge of murder! The police have a knack of getting at the root of these matters, you know!"

While he had been speaking the face of the boy in the chair had undergone a strange medley of expressions, ranging from perplexity, wonder, horror, and finally rage.

He started to his feet, trembling with the force of the new passion within him, upsetting the chair behind him with a noisy clatter.

Digitized by Google

"Good Heavens, man!" he gasped, "what do you mean? Have you gone mad, or have I?"

Gilbert Chase shook his head.

"No, we are neither of us mad, Mr. Maitland; in fact you are now more in possession of your faculties than you ever were—you were asleep before, you are awake now—and so am I."

"Then—then——" Jack spoke slowly, choosing his words with painful precision—"you were in earnest when you connected the name of that most pure and innocent of girls with that of a murderess?"

"I was," the other replied; "and I understood, Mr. Maitland, that you had heard from your step-mother that Ivy Strange was wanted by the police for complicity in the murder of a tramp who was shot in the spinny, the same night you were—the night of the bal masqué."

Jack drew his hand across his eyes, as though to sweep away all lingering doubts of dreaming from his mind. The detective's words did not appear to be spoken in jest; a certain gleam in his eyes indicated that he was in deadly earnest.

"A tramp in the spinny!" he said. "I don't understand. Why should she, a girl, ignorant of the very existence of such crimes, commit one, and why a tramp?"

"Why?" the detective echoed softly. "For no reason, Mr. Maitland, unless that tramp turned out to be an undesirable encumbrance, such as a father, for instance!"

"Father! Father!" he muttered. "But I thought——" He stopped suddenly, a memory from those long distant days confronting him with a sinister significance. The face of the girl he had loved so passionately, wide-eyed and terror-stricken, telling him to cease seeking to find out the past.

He had attached no reason to her words then, but that of an over-strained mind! But now he shuddered as he recalled little gestures and half-uttered sentences, that fitted, mosaic-like, into the empty crevices of his mind, filling them with a fearful dread of something he could not understand.

He raised his hand to his brow; it was wet with a chilly dampness, that made him feel suddenly weak and helpless.

"How was she to find out such a relationship?" he said harshly. "She would have mentioned it to me immediately; she knew of my efforts to trace her parents."

"How she knew, Mr. Maitland," Chase replied gravely, "I am not quite sure—yet. But I happened to overhear the man—an ex-convict called Mike Holland—declare himself as her father in the spinny some days before the murder took place. And also, on the night you were shot, I myself met a woman in the wood, heavily cloaked, coming from the direction of the spinny.

"I caught her wrist, but she bit my hand suddenly, and I let go, not without leaving a bruise on her wrist though. Afterwards I recognised that same bruise on the wrist of Ivy Strange!"

Jack was silent; the words that kept dancing in his brain were those that had slipped from the detective so glibly, but to him were writ in letters of flame—"an ex-convict, called Mike Holland!"

Then that mark, that fearful stigma of shame on the brow of the innocent girl he had loved so dearly, had its cruel origin in the broad-arrow that the convict had worn, and whose crime—according to the Scriptures — must be visited upon the helpless, guiltless, third and fourth generations!

Oh, the cruelty! The mocking cruelty of Fate, that should have allowed so fair a flower to spring from such a stagnant root!

He looked at Gilbert Chase, to see whether he connected the mark on the girl's brow, about which he himself had told him, with the murdered convict, but apparently he had forgotten the conversation, for the detective's face was impassive, and his eyes mildly vacant, as he returned his host's gaze.

"Surely you must be making some mistake, Chase?" Jack said eagerly. "Just think—a low tramp, a gaol-bird—to be the father of a girl as beautiful and refined-looking as—as her ladyship herself! It is incredible."

Gilbert Chase raised his eyebrows the slightest shade higher. "Ah—yes—that may be so, Mr. Maitland," he said slowly; "but Ivy Strange was the only person likely to profit by the death of such a disreputable parent as Mike Holland, and in spite of her looking as refined as her ladyship, I'm afraid that would only prove that she had a strong motive for suppressing the ex-convict!"

"Tell me what time the man was murdered?" Jack asked again, after a pause, in which he had been thinking swiftly and connecting loose ideas that had floated away from their moorings during the time he had lain ill.

"About ten minutes after you had been shot," the detective replied, wondering what thoughts were evolving behind the once alert brain of Sir Trevor's son and heir.

"Ten minutes," Jack murmured. "That was the night of the ball, Chase? Ah, I'm beginning to understand now," he cried, his voice quickening with a subdued excitement. "Nurse Beaumont warned me to get well and strong for Ivy's sake, as she was in danger, and needed my help sorely. I did not know then what she meant; but now I do! I can prove that Ivy was in the Manor when I saw you outside and afterwards left you to meet Digby Scarlett."

Gilbert Chase blinked his eyelids—a nervous trick of his when surprised.

"Softly—softly, Mr. Maitland," he murmured; "let me understand. How do you know that the young lady was in the Manor then?"

Jack hesitated, and a sudden flush mantled on his cheek as he remembered how, acting on the spur of the moment, he had carried his fainting sweetheart into his step-mother's dressing-room, where he knew she would be able to rest in peace.

Then outside he had met his father and, afraid lest his anger should be roused against the girl, he had, for the first time in his life, parried his parent's questioning with a prevarication. He wished he had not, now that he saw what it would mean to the girl whose life was in jeopardy.

The slightly cynical smile that was curving the thin lips of the detective deepened the colour in his face, but at the same time decided his answer.

"I hesitated to tell you," he said, with a quiet dignity, "not because I was afraid to, but at first I was uncertain whether it would be wise, since I knew my father objected to the engagement that existed between us, and I desired to spare her. But I will tell you how I know that Ivy Strange was in the Manor when I left it.

"She had fainted, and I took her to my step-mother's dressing-room; then, meeting my father in the corridor, I shielded her from his possible anger by saying I had taken Lady Maitland into her room. I am sorry now," he said simply, "that I made an excuse; but it was with the best of intentions. You believe my word, I hope?"

Gilbert Chase smiled. "In my calling, Mr. Maitland," he said quietly, "we are trained never to accept biassed statements of any description; but I may say that I should like to see Sir Trevor for a moment before I go. Did any of the servants see you with her?" he went on. "It will be as well to prove an alibi. They are sure to have noticed that it was not her ladyship."

Jack frowned thoughtfully. "One of the maids saw me carrying her," he said; "I don't remember which one. Besides, Ivy was wearing a blue domino, and was masked, so wouldn't be recognised."

"Ah! And who is Nurse Beaumont?" queried the detective, scribbling in his notebook as he spoke.

"The woman who was engaged to nurse me," Jack replied. "She left rather suddenly the other day. My step-mother told me that she had wished to go. But, hang it all, Chase!" he went on impetuously, "don't cross-examine me like this. Tell me—is—is Ivy Strange found yet?"

Digitized by Google

"Not yet; but she will be very soon," replied the other shortly. "We suspect she is in London; all criminals fly there, and have been heard to swear that it is the best hiding-place on earth!"

Jack winced, and a momentary desire seized him to fling the smooth-faced detective out of the room. Then he remembered that the man was only doing his duty, and that he had first sought him out to take up the inquiry into his poor little love's parentage.

A sudden thought seized him, filling him with a new spring of life.

If she were hiding, then she could not possibly be married to his enemy; for he knew Digby Scarlett sufficiently to be sure he would not try to marry a girl under a cloud, even had she the beauty of a Venus!

Yet that letter, purporting to be from Digby Scarlett, which his step-mother had shown him, said deliberately that they were to be married the next day! He dare not mention that letter to the detective lest he should demand to see it, and so obtain Ivy's address through Digby Scarlett. But one question he could not resist, in the hope of knowing the worst—or the best.

"Are you searching for her under her own name or another?" he asked, turning to light his cigarette.

"Her own name," replied the detective drily, "as another would hardly do—since she hasn't one. But her description is in every police-station in the United Kingdom; it is only a matter of time now!"

Jack went up to him quickly, and grasped his arms.

"Chase, look here; found or not, Ivy Strange is as innocent of that murder as I am—or you! Good Heavens! man, that girl could no more handle a weapon than a fly! I tell you that there is some diabolical agency working at the bottom of all this, and I mean to find out what it is! Don't, because you are helping to hound her down," he exclaimed passionately, "refuse to assist me in finding out the real truth about her past; for I will stake my life on her not being the child of the convict, in spite——" He stopped suddenly.

"In spite," the detective finished, "of her being marked by a broad arrow! I understand, Mr. Maitland," he went on; "and have not neglected any of my inquiries regarding Miss Strange; though things look very black just now against her—the fact of her running away, for instance! But now, if I may, Mr. Maitland, I should like the opportunity of a few words with Sir Trevor."

Jack touched the electric button on the wall.

"Lawson, ask Sir Trevor whether Mr. Chase may have a few moments' conversation with him," he said, when the man appeared in answer to his ring.

"You see, Mr. Maitland," said the detective, "if Sir Trevor tells me that he saw you coming out of her ladyship's dressing-room, and her ladyship also owns to having been elsewhere at the time, then, of course, that raises a strong point in Miss Strange's favour."

Jack nodded. He was painfully keen that his father should see Gilbert Chase, and know how imperative it was that his evidence should save the life of the girl he had wished to adopt.

Suddenly Lawson returned—his face white and frightened.

"If you please, Mr. Jack," he said, gazing from one to the other hesitatingly, "the squire is ill in her ladyship's boudoir."

"Ill!" Jack and the detective exclaimed simultaneously.

"Why, he was quite well this afternoon," the boy continued. "What has happened?"

Before the man could make any reply, there was a sound of shuffling feet, and, flinging the door wide open, Jack Maitland and Gilbert Chase saw a sight that froze the words on their tongues.

Lifted on either side by Heriot North and Digby Scarlett came Sir Trevor, grimacing and mumbling to himself, a withered, shapeless mass of humanity, the skeleton of what he had been at lunch; while the faces of the two men who assisted him were also strangely white and livid—a dark red stain being on Digby Scarlett's chin.

Jack's eyes shot over their heads to the woman who followed the tragic trio, with a pale face and set, gleaming eyes, hard and tearless like diamonds.

He went forward quickly, and touched her on the arm.

"Mater! Tell me, in pity's name, what is the matter with—my father?"

The detective, watching keenly this domestic tragedy, saw her large eyes flicker with a strange light, and her mouth twitched as she replied coldly:

"Sir Trevor has had a sudden stroke—or mental collapse—while talking to—to Mr. North and Mr. Scarlett in my boudoir. They are taking him to his room."

Her eyes travelled to his companion, and when they met the steady gaze of the detective standing beside him, she bit her lip with a sudden spasm, then raising her head with a haughty gesture, she followed the procession of death.

"My father! a stroke!" Jack muttered; "then——"

His eyes met those of the detective, who finished the sentence for him—"then he will not be able to prove an alibi for you, Mr. Maitland. I am sorry!"

When he was alone, Gilbert Chase strolled across the spinny to the "Rest," and waited outside the gates for the coming of the master.

THIRTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.

A Ray of Light.

As he stood under the shadow of the large tree facing the gates, and smoking a cigarette bestowed upon him by Jack Maitland, Gilbert Chase speculated upon the sudden breakdown of the hale and hearty squire of Melton. What could have brought about the collapse in her ladyship's boudoir?

The faces of the two men who had upheld the Squire had worn peculiar expressions, Digby Scarlett's, indeed, having resembled that of a fiend, while Heriot North had been almost as grey as the stricken man.

Even the beautiful woman, at whom he had glanced with new interest, had also seemed deeply stirred by some emotion which she had concealed beneath her frozen exterior—an emotion that appeared apart from the trouble that had fallen upon her.

What, he wondered, had taken place in the boudoir between those four souls—the lips of one, indeed, sealed perhaps for ever.

Suddenly he roused himself. A woman was coming along the path, a dirty-looking creature, whose draggled and scanty attire pointed to a long tramp through all sorts of weather. But it was not her wardrobe that attracted the professional acumen of Gilbert Chase, but her face—the usual low-bred type, that suggested a partially stunted growth of the mental faculties.

He moved forward swiftly as she drew nearer, and waited with a grim smile of satisfaction for her to speak to him, feeling pretty certain that she would do so; and he was right, for, seeing him in the gathering twilight, the woman began her customary plea for alms.

"Please, kind sir, a copper," she wailed; then started back, as the detective grasped her by the arm, and said sternly:

"I thought you would come back in time! Now, answer me a few questions, or I will take you to the 'lock-up' for begging!"

The woman's face paled under the layers of dirt that had accumulated on it, and into her shifty eyes there flashed a look of abject terror, as she tried to pull her arm from the strong hand that held her.

"Lemme go!" she cried; "I ain't doin' nothin'—only arstin' fur a copper! An' wot can I tell yer that yer don't knows on, as I s'pose yer one o' them 'splits'!"

Gilbert Chase smiled grimly. He had already learnt something from the woman's phraseology; a term he had been quick to classify as thieves' slang, and only used by those mem bers of the fraternity who, periodically, became guests of His Majesty! It was the word "splits," by which detectives in criminology were known in the conversations of the submerged tenth!

Digitized by Google

"This is what I wish to ask you, my good madam," he said sarcastically. "What were you doing in the 'New Age' bar some few weeks ago, and why did you call a certain lady who was there 'Polly'? I've been waiting for you to return. I knew it wouldn't be long, and," he went on sternly, "if you tell me any lies, it will be the worse for you! You may find yourself behind a locked door again!"

It was a chance shot, but it did its work, for the woman's loose, coarse mouth quivered as she replied fearfully:

"Please, sir, I was a-doin' no 'arm; s'elp me if I was! I 'ad come to Melton to find my 'usbin', pore Mike 'Olland!"

Gilbert Chase's hand tightened unconsciously on the woman's arm. This was an unexpected denouement that appealed to his sense of the dramatic, and he blessed the sudden impulse that had led him to the gate of the "Rest," and enabled him to kill two birds with one stone.

"Why didn't you come forward at the inquest?" he said sternly.

She hesitated, and shifted uneasily under the detective's eyes.

"Becos I only come out o' quod a week or two ago!" she muttered sullenly. "As soon as I knew, I come 'ere; tramped all the way, too."

He looked at her thoughtfully. In spite of his vast experience with the men and women of her class, he could detect the truth when it was spoken even by such outcasts as the woman before him.

"Then if you came to Melton as soon as you knew of your husband's murder," he said slowly, "why, since you were afraid to visit the police-station and learn about him, did you visit the place at all—unless you wished to see someone who was not dead?"

The woman gazed restlessly round, as though meditating an attempt at an escape. Then seeing the futility of it, she said sullenly:

"I came to see no one! Jest to look abaht! I didn't even know as 'ow Polly were in Melton. W'en I saw 'er I thort as 'ow she 'ad come up to find out abaht Mike too."

"What is Polly's surname?" demanded the detective sharply—"and is she related to you?"

"She's called Polly Martin—down wi' our lot," the woman answered unwillingly; "but 'er real nime is Polly 'Olland; she were Mike's twin-sister."

Gilbert Chase stifled an exclamation, and his pale blue eyes glittered with suppressed excitement. So "Mary Mason" was unrobed of her respectability. He would deal summarily with her when they met again. In the meantime he must not lose sight of this woman.

If he let her go, he knew her slippery nature well enough to guess that she would not come back once she was free. Yet, on the other hand, if he left his post to take her to the station, he might miss a still more important quarry.

As he was speculating on his next move, the heavy tramp of steps came out of the gloom, with the measured tread that has become a policeman's peculiarity.

"Ah, Robert," he said, beckoning the man to him. "I want you to keep this woman at the station until I come. She is the wife of the murdered Mike Holland, and I have some inquiries to make before she goes. There's no charge against her," he added, in answer to the policeman's look of inquiry; "I only wish to satisfy a few doubts."

No sooner had the woman disappeared with her custodian, than another figure approached the gates of the "Rest."

Gilbert Chase drew a long breath of relief.

"I was just in time," he muttered. "I might have missed him in another minute."

The master of the "Rest" was looking pleased, and a smile of triumph on his lips accentuated the hate lying dormant in his dark eyes. But the smile faded as a slim, alert man stepped quickly up to him.

"I've been waiting on the off-chance of seeing you, sir," he said pleasantly.

Digby Scarlett looked at him scowlingly, and a black cloud crossed his face as he recognised his interlocutor.

"I'm afraid I'm engaged this evening," he said brusquely. "You had better call again, my man."

The detective's face flushed, and his mouth grew set, as he replied suavely:

"I also shall be engaged later, Mr. Scarlett. And if it is at all convenient to you, I think, if I may suggest it, that it would be advisable were you to see me now. I fancy what I have to say may interest you."

Digby Scarlett looked at him sharply, but could infer nothing from the smooth face and soft voice of the detective. He shrugged his shoulders carelessly with an assumption of amused good humour.

"Very well, Chase, since you will see me, I suppose I must submit with a good grace! The reason I did not wish to be disturbed to-night was because I have not yet recovered from the dreadful shock of seeing poor Sir Trevor Maitland struck down so suddenly."

He led the way into the library, and switched on the electric light, then turned to his companion with a gesture towards the spirit carafe on the side-table.

The detective shook his head. "No, thank you, sir. I never drink between meals," a speech not strictly true, but Gilbert Chase had work before him that required a clear head.

"Well," said Scarlett, flinging himself into a deep, leather-chair, "what is this news, Chase, that you prophesied would interest me?"

The detective fixed his expressionless, blue eyes upon the saturnine face of the man in the chair. He wondered how his next speech would affect his self-possession.

"I particularly wished to see you, sir," he began slowly, "because, firstly, I happen to be in possession of something belonging to you—a telegram."

Digby Scarlett looked at him with a startled glance, and the artificial smile with which he had listened to his visitor's opening words gave way under the momentary stiffening of the muscles round his mouth.

"How's that?" he queried, after a pause. "I do not remember expecting a telegram; and even if I did, I fail to understand how it could have fallen into your hands. 'Chase' and 'Scarlett' are not names easily confused, are they?"

"No," rejoined Gilbert Chase genially. "It happened like this. I was leaving St. Pancras by the same train as yourself, the other day, and though you did not see me, I noticed you some time before the train left. Then a telegraph boy ran up to me with a telegram, and as I expected one from a colleague, I never thought of asking the boy to repeat the name, which I did not catch in the bustle of starting; and so it was not till afterwards that I saw I had made a mistake and read something certainly not intended for my eyes," and he laughed softly.

Digby Scarlett put out his hand peremptorily. It was trembling, and the sharp eyes of Gilbert Chase noticed that his upper lip was quivering, in spite of the sheltering moustache.

"Give it to me then, since you say it was mine," Scarlett said curtly.

After a moment's search through all his pockets with minute care, under the increasing impatience of his host, the detective shook his head.

"There, now," he said, in a vexed tone, "after taking great care of it, I have left it at the 'New Age' with my things. But," he added hastily, "I can remember every word, Mr. Scarlett. It was not an ordinary message. It was dated from Rotherhithe, and ran like this:

Digitized by Google

"Plant successful. 'V' accidentally drowned; send money.—LAMPITT."

A red gleam flickered in Digby Scarlett's eyes, and he fell back in his chair with a hoarse laugh.

"No wonder you were astonished at such a telegram, Chase. 'V' is the name of a mad dog I wanted disposed of—it stands for Vixen, and great caution had to be used before she could be brought near the river."

"I quite believe it," said the detective gravely; but whether in irony or not, Digby Scarlett could not decide.

He rose from the chair, and taking a cigar from his case, said:

"Then you will leave that telegram here when you are passing, Chase? I will say 'good night' now; I am dog-tired."

"Not so tired as the dog that was—drowned, sir," replied the detective simply, playing with the brim of his hat, with an absent look in his eyes.

Digby Scarlett bit his lip. "I am tired enough to wish for no other society to-night than my own," he retorted grimly. "So, good evening to you, Mr. Chase."

"One moment, sir," interrupted the other suavely, as his host touched the bell.

"Well"—impatiently—"what is it now?"

"Only that I had a long chat with Mrs. Phillpott when in London," began Gilbert Chase quietly, "and took away with me the photograph of a lady whom I believe is your sister—so Mrs. Phillpott told me. I did not know that the wife of the man you prosecuted eighteen years ago was your sister, Mr. Scarlett!"

Digby Scarlett raised his eyes, and after a long, swift scrutiny, dropped them under the steady gaze of the mild blue ones of the man who was concealing more than he revealed.

"Well," he said harshly, "what of it? And why should I not inquire about a woman without your interference, Mr. Chase? I am not 'wanted' by the police, you know."

"I am sure, sir, you are not to blame for that," murmured the man from Scotland Yard respectfully. Then he added, "The picture of Mrs. Grant is very lovely. She reminded me strongly of another face which both you and I have seen recently. You will know whom I mean, Mr. Scarlett—names are not necessary."

Digby Scarlett turned savagely upon him. "You really leave a great deal to my imagination, Mr. Chase! I have no idea as to the lady you mean. You police-court chaps have a way of wrapping a mystery round a lamp-post!"

Gilbert Chase smiled at him thoughtfully. "Perhaps so, sir, I am afraid we are very dense—sometimes; then we chance upon a ray of light, and follow it up—and follow it up," he repeated softly.

At the door he paused and said suddenly: "Can you remember what conversation you and Mr. North were having with her ladyship when Sir Trevor overheard you, sir?"

The master of the "Rest" grew ashen under the tan of his skin, and his lips parted in a cruel sneer.

"No, I can't!" he retorted roughly. "You had better curb your impatience till Sir Trevor recovers—if he ever does!"

"If he ever does," the detective repeated; then added: "I will call on Mr. North to-morrow—his memory may be better than yours."

When he was alone, Digby Scarlett flung himself in a chair, and laughed long and loudly.

"You are very clever, Mr. Chase; but you will not gain much by hanging round me! Confound that telegram!" he muttered—the laugh dying on his lips; "it might have been

(Continued overleaf.)

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS | THE FAMOUS HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

THE PILLS

have gained their wonderful reputation by sheer force of merit, because every person who uses them recommends them to others. They have positively no equal for thoroughly cleansing the system and putting the liver and kidneys in functional order, without pain or griping. They are the best known remedy for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, and the common condition of ill-health, known as "run-down" or "out of sorts." Females of every age find Holloway's Pills an invaluable remedy and aid.

THE OINTMENT

is known throughout the world as positively the best and quickest remedy for Bad Legs, Old Wounds and Sores, and Skin Eruptions of every kind, and should be used in conjunction with the Pills. It is also the speediest remedy for Rheumatism, Lumbago, Pains and Stiffness in the Limbs and Joints, Backache, &c. For pains and Soreness at the Chest, and for Throat and Lung Complaints arising from Cold or Weakness, Holloway's Ointment affords most welcome relief in a very short time.

A COMPLETE DISPENSARY IN THEMSELVES. | AND OINTMENT

THE BOND BETWEEN.

awkward! But he must not see that fool North to-morrow; the hysterical 'man of honour' will bleat everything out, then there will be an end to my little plans. No; I must prevent him from killing the goose that lays my golden eggs! Once the police tumble to my plot it will be U.P. with me!"

He rose, and dug the poker so savagely into the fire that a piece of wood fell out upon the fur rug, and a tiny blaze sprang up. He ground it with his heel, then smiled evilly.

"My question is answered; I no longer am in doubt as to the method of silencing Mr. Heriot North—and at the same time wiping out my debt with him!"

When the night grew darker, a figure heavily cloaked and with a soft slouch hat on, slipped out of the hall door of the "Rest," and vanished into the gloom.

THIRTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.
The Flame in the Sky.

When Gilbert Chase left the "Rest," he walked quickly towards the village, in the direction of the police-station. He was satisfied with his interview with the master of the "Rest," and chuckled grimly once or twice. "I don't fancy we got much change out of each other; but at the same time, I made Mr. Digby Scarlett feel very uncomfortable! He was a bit of a juggins to think that I would be such a simpleton as to have given him that telegram! No; it is safely locked up with my other little documents."

Arriving at the police-station, he was told that the woman claiming to be the wife of the murdered man, Mike Holland had been detained in one of the cells on suspicion of having stolen half-a-sovereign that dropped on the floor from her pocket. The inspector on duty had waited for the dectetive to question her, as he was last with her.

When the woman was brought into the charge-room she piteously cried out at the sight of Gilbert Chase.

"Don't let 'em lock me up, mister! I swear I didn't steal it! If I was to drop dead this very instant, I'm as innercent as a babe unborn!"

"Oh, we know all about that 'babe,'" said the inspector humorously; "you're all babes till you're convicted. Come, now; tell us how a woman in your poor condition came to have half-a-sovereign in your pocket?"

"It was give me by a young lidy in the Park in London, sir;" wailed the woman; "I told 'er I was walkin' to Melton to see my 'usbin's grave, an' she took such a interest in it that she gave it to me, sayin' as I was to keep it in memory of my little gal as was lost years ago. She was a lovely young lidy, sir," the woman panted; "tall an' with fair 'air and large sad eyes—like a pictur'!"

Gilbert Chase started, and whispered something to the inspector who showed him the half-sovereign. It was a Jubilee one; and the professional instinct of the detective was aroused as he remembered that the missing girl, Ivy Strange, had gone away with a present from Sir Trevor of ten Jubilee half-sovereigns.

The inspector looked at her doubtfully, then said slowly: "Well, as there's no one to charge you with theft I must let you go—though I don't credit you with telling the truth—you are discharged!"

Gilbert Chase put his hand on the woman's arm. "Tell me; was the lady who gave you that money anything like this picture, or that?"

He pointed to the placards that are pasted on the walls of police-stations, with photos of the people "wanted," then showed her a picture he had taken from his pocket.

The woman gazed round the walls until she saw the likeness he pointed out, then gazed at the piece of cardboard in his hand. As she did so, she uttered a hoarse cry.

"The lidy!—the lidy!" she whispered under her breath.

"Well," said the detective, "do you recognise this lady?"

The woman raised her head. All the cunning of her kind had returned to her, and she guessed instinctively that the lady whose face she was asked to recognise was in some trouble, and she was not the one to "round on a pal."

"No," she said boldly. "I never seed 'er afore. The lidy who give me the 'arf quid was red-haired, and 'er 'usbin' give 'er the money for me."

Gilbert Chase glanced at her sharply. Her dense face revealed nothing, and she looked at him with an expression of fatuous innocence.

"Where are you living?" he said abruptly.

"Fourteen Dorset Street, Whitechapel," she replied glibly. "If yer wants me, I'll be glad to come, mister."

He let her go reluctantly. After all, she was not of much use, now that he knew her relation to Mary Mason; and she would probably hang about the village for a day or two.

Once free of the police-station, the woman glanced back with a grin.

"Thort yer was goin' to make me split on 'er, did yer?" she muttered. "Not much; I may be a wrong 'un, but I ain't a-goin' to round on 'er! Now, I'll try to find Polly, she must be in service abaht 'ere!"

* * * * *

That night, when the village of Melton was wrapped in slumber and the inhabitants dreamt of a land where all was sunny and warm, a tiny tongue of fire curled above the roof of a house not far from the Manor. The tongue grew into a flame, and the flame into a vivid sheet of crimson fire that lit the sky with a brilliant radiance far and wide; and in that house lay Heriot North, the man who held a secret.

(To be concluded shortly.)

Little Sister: "Most of the articles in your paper this month is awful poor." Little brother (editor of an amateur monthly): "I know it, but the boys that wrote 'em sent stamps for their return, an' I wanted the stamps."

"My wife has been studying geology, and the house is so full of rocks I can't find a place to sit down." "What will you do about it?" "I've induced her to take up astronomy." "Is that any better?" "Of course; she can't collect specimens."

A dog was advertised to play on a piano in a circus. When the time came for the dog to perform, he got on a seat and began playing. Suddenly someone in the crowd shouted "Rats!" Upon which the dog bounded off the seat. The piano kept on playing.

HOW SHALL I WORD IT?

A Complete Letter-Writer for Men and Women on all Subjects.

By ONE OF THE ARISTOCRACY.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

Among the numerous letters contained in the book are the following:

LETTERS and REPLIES to Application for a Situation as Butler, Clerk, Companion, Cook, Governess, Groom, Housekeeper, Lady's Maid, Secretary, Shop Assistant, Typist—Asking for Characters of a Cook, Housemaid, Nurse—"At Home" Invitations—Breaking of Engagement—Bride's Thanks for Wedding Present—Dance and Dinner Invitations—From a Workman to his Sweetheart—From Gentleman or Lady Announcing his or her Engagement, etc., etc.

ORDER FORM. S.S. To the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "How Shall I Word It," for which I inclose the sum of 1s. 2d.

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google

FAT AND ITS FOE.

Stoutness Fatal to Health and Beauty.

Apart from its detracting from beauty or even ordinary comeliness, the tendency to "put on flesh" is detrimental to general health, and extreme obesity is positively a mortal danger. When the internal organs are clogged and hampered with large deposits of fat, it cannot, of course, be expected that they can do their allotted work in an adequate, natural way. Hence, if by means of proper treatment, those fatty deposits be not removed from the system, fatty degeneration of the heart or liver frequently ensues, with fatal results.

What is the proper treatment to follow? Why, the famous "Russell" treatment for the cure of obesity, which destroys, root and branch, the unwholesome accumulations of subcutaneous fat, and expels them from the system; and this it effects permanently, for if reasonable hygienic and dietary rules be observed, no return of the fatty matter need be feared.

Meanwhile the general health is vastly improved by the preparation forming the basis of the "Russell" treatment, because it is tonic and vitalising; it gives an unaccustomed edge to the appetite, tones up the digestive apparatus, and assists assimilation and nutrition. Thus, new rich blood is formed, muscular tissue replaces effete fatty matter, and brain and nerve power is increased.

Stoutness is as fatal to beauty as to health. In extreme corpulency the whole system is in a morbid, flaccid condition, the pores of the skin are clogged, the complexion is sometimes very sallow, at others very red, while the mental condition is often depressed and melancholy.

The "Russell" treatment, by the tonic effect of its chief agent, as explained above, and by its rapid reductive results, speedily remedies this state of things, and brings back beauty as well as health and strength.

Within twenty-four hours of beginning the "Russell" treatment there is a reductive effect, the scales marking a decrease of from ½ to 2lb., and even more than that in excessive cases of corpulency. Reduction steadily goes on day by day until the wished-for proportions and the brighter state of general health are accomplished facts, when the treatment may be laid aside.

All these things and many other interesting facts are set forth at great length and with considerable lucidity of style by Mr. F. Cecil Russell (originator of the treatment which bears his name), in a little book called "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), now in its nineteenth edition. Mr. Russell explains pretty well everything that has been written on the subject of the causes and the cure of corpulency, and goes deeply into the various so-called "cures" which have been from time to time foisted upon the world, only to expire after a short life.

Readers will be interested to know that "Corpulency and the Cure" contains the recipe of the anti-corpulency mixture which Mr. Russell prescribes. This is to prove the harmless character of the compound, which is purely herbal.

Stout people wishing to get a copy of "Corpulency and the Cure" should send three penny stamps (for private postage) to Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.

Woman's Ideal: A Faultless Figure.

Ladies who have undergone the easy and pleasant course of cure known as the "Russell" treatment for the permanent cure of corpulency are enthusiastic in their praise of this wonderful and unfailing system, and with special reason. For the reduction of fat is not only abdominal, but is proportionate over the entire body. The uncomely accumulation of adipose in cheeks, chin and neck, in wrists and fingers, gradually subsides, giving place to normal proportions and perfect elegance. The waist becomes slim without need of tight lacing. Nor is this all: the dangerous deposits of internal fat that impede the free action of the vital organs, and frequently give rise to what is known as fatty degeneration of the heart and liver, are destroyed and eliminated, with lasting benefit to the general health. The "Russell" treatment is tonic, in so far as the principal curative compound employed. This is a harmless liquid preparation of a vegetable character, not unpleasant to the taste, and neither laxative nor the opposite. The reduction assured is prompt: within the first twenty-four hours from ½ lb. to 2 lb. is thrown off—in very severe cases as much as 3 or 4 lb. The decrease then continues persistently until natural proportions are regained. The cure is then permanent if the person uses ordinary prudence. No violent exercises or dietary restrictions are necessary. The appetite is increased, and the digestive organs are strengthened. The patient, after a course of "Russell," feels ten years younger in energy, vitality, and muscular strength.

Our readers who are troubled with too much embonpoint would do well to study "Corpulency and the Cure," an authentic treatise by the discoverer of the "Russell" treatment. In its 256 pages the book contains everything that a stout person could wish to know; inter alia, the recipe of the above-mentioned compound is given. Our fair friends have but to enclose three penny stamps (for postage under private cover) to Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., and they will receive a copy of this standard work by return of post.

Digitized by Google

A Way of Getting Even.

Medicus: "I wish I knew how to get even with that undertaker." She: "Why not retire from practice?"

Not the Only One.

He: "Remember that you have promised solemnly to be a sister to me." She: "Yes, but you mustn't behave as though you were the only relative of that kind I have in the world."

Cows-Milk; Calves-Jelly.

Nellie: "Oh! do look at those pretty little cows." Maud: "They are not cows, they are calves." Nellie: "But what is the difference?" Maud: "Why, cows give milk, and calves give jelly."

Breaking It Gently.

Quarryman: "Shure, an' it's sad news I've got to tell ye, Missis Murphy; your husband has broken his new watch." Mrs. Murphy: "How did he do it?" Quarryman: "A ten-ton rock fell on him."

Money Made by Pen.

Wealthy Stranger: "Yes; and I made my money, every farthing of it, by my pen." Tompkins: "Ah! a novelist, or a dramatist, maybe?" Wealthy Stranger: "Not me. I used to keep a sheep farm in New Zealand."

Definition of Genteel.

A servant who prided herself on being employed in a "genteel family" was asked what she meant by a "genteel family." "Where they have two or three kinds of wine, and the gentleman uses bad language," was the reply.

No Sympathy Given.

He (after pulling against tide for a couple of hours under a broiling sun): "Don't you think it would be rather a good idea to pull up for a while under the shade of one of those jolly old trees?" She: "And break the spell of this delicious motion? Not for worlds."

Misunderstood.

Ugly Customer: "What price did you say this cape was?" Pretty Milliner: "Seven guineas, madam." Ugly Customer (after a pause): "Don't you think that rather a dreadful figure?" Pretty Milliner: "Well, madam, since you say so, it is not the best I have seen—but I think you will find the cape will hide it."

All But.

"Dear Mabel, do you love me?" "O-h, George!" "Don't you, Mabel? Just a little tiny bit?" "W-e-ll, y-e-s, George." "And if I married you, would your father furnish us a house?" "Yes, George." "And take me into partnership?" "Yes, George." "And would your mother keep away from us, except when I invited her?" "She would, George." "And your brothers and sisters, too?" "Why, certainly, George." "And of course the old gentleman would settle my debts?" "Of course, George." "Darling, will you marry me?" "No, George."

Broken, but Mended.

He: "So the engagement is at an end?" She: "Yes." He: "Who broke it?" She: "The minister who married us."

One was Enough.

He (in an argument): "Well, thank goodness, I'm not two-faced." She: "You ought to be thankful. One face like yours is enough."

Doesn't Always Follow.

She: "Do you believe the howling of a dog is always followed by a death?" He: "No; not always; sometimes the man who shoots at the dog is a poor marksman."

The Roots are Deep.

Nelly: "I don't see how getting one's feet wet causes toothache." Jack: "You don't? If you had ever had a tooth pulled you would know that the roots run down to your toes."

To Show His Bravery.

Mrs. Frailty: "Before we were married you often wished there was some brave deed you could do to show your love." Mr. Frailty: "Yes, dear, and I would do it now." Mrs. Frailty: "Then, love, go down into the kitchen and discharge Bridget."

At a Travelling Show.

Irate Visitor: "I call this a downright fraud! You advertise on your bills 'The Most Remarkable Dwarf in the World,' and he turns out to be five feet five inches high!" Bland Showman: "Exactly so, sir. That's just what's so remarkable about him. He's the tallest dwarf on record!"

Prompted by Kindness.

Lady of the House: "I should think a big, strong fellow like you would rather work than go round begging." Sloppy Sim: "I would if it wasn't for one thing." Lady: "What's that?" Sloppy Sim: "I ain't got no fambly meself, and I'm afraid if I went to work I might crowd out some poor chap who has little ones to support."

Near Freezing Point.

"Perhaps it is best after all," remarked the rejected suitor as he lingered in the hall. "A man of twenty-five would soon tire of a wife who hovered round the thirty-two mark." "Why, Mr. Ardent," said the woman in the case, "how very ungallant of you to insinuate that I am thirty-two." "Well, perhaps you are not," he replied, "but it certainly struck me that you were somewhere near the freezing point."

His Narrow Escape.

Emma: "No, George, it cannot be. We must part." (Bitterly.) "My purse-proud father will not accept a poor man for his son-in-law." George (frantically): "Say not so. I cannot give thee up. My heart will break. I——" Purse-proud father enters the room without observing them. Throws himself into a chair and groans aloud: "Bankruptcy! Ruin! Every penny swept away!" George (sweeping himself away at these words): "Farewell, then, Emma, since you discard me." But he says to himself, "Wonderfully narrow escape that."

A New Way of Doing it.

"Alberta," began the young man, somewhat huskily, "are your folks all well?" "Quite well, Mr. Watkins, thank you." "I have come this evening, Alberta," he resumed, heroically, "to—to—bring back this volume of Dante you lent me last evening——" "Why, you haven't finished it already, Mr. Watkins?" "And to say that I—that I—like—that I like Dante first rate." "Dante is so soulful," said Alberta softly. "He's immense," assented Watkins, heartily; "and speaking of Dante, I—er——" "Yes." "There isn't a poet of modern times, in my opinion, that comes up to Dante." "Except Tennyson." "And, speaking of Tennyson, Alberta—I—er—" "Yes." "Will you let me make you a present one day of a volume of Tennyson, with the inscription on the fly-leaf, 'To my——'" "Well?" "'To my wife, Alberta?'"

Digitized by Google

Plain Women Become Beautiful.

Beautiful Women Intensify Their Beauty.

A Wonderful Book Free.

The Peralia Perfumery Co., of 73 Camden Street, North Shields, will send to every reader of SHORT STORIES mentioning this paper, and enclosing a penny stamp with their application, a wonderful booklet, entitled "Beauty's Boudoir." This book, which reveals many astounding secrets of immense importance to every woman, will be sent strictly under cover. Amongst the many items of information it tells how to remove in one night all Wrinkles, Crow's-feet, Blackheads, Facial Defects, &c. How to make the pimply, freckled face as fair as the lily. If the bust is undeveloped, you can learn how to develop it. If you are too short, how to increase your height. This marvellous book also deals with the hair and informs you how you can curl the hair and permanently keep it in curl without the use of curling irons; in fact, if you are interested in your personal appearance at all, we advise you to send 1d. stamp and your address in full, at once and the Peralia Perfumery Co. will forward you per return this charming book, which deals in a clear and explicit manner with many matters in which women of all ages are interested. There are some wonderful proposals in this book, and no lady reader of this paper can afford to miss this chance of gaining the valuable information contained therein. Address:—The Peralia Perfumery Co., Dept. 14, 73 Camden Street, North Shields.

THE EAR, NOSE, AND THROAT.

The close relation of Catarrh of the Nose and Throat to defective hearing is described in

THE REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE, AND THROAT DISEASES.

Anyone interested in the subject can obtain a free copy of this Medical Journal by addressing The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

If you wish to SLEEP WELL

—TAKE—

BEECHAM'S PILLS

You will SLEEP WELL, because BEECHAM'S PILLS gently calm irritation of the Nervous system, while by their stimulative and cleansing action upon the Liver and Kidneys, Digestion proceeds with normal regularity, so that at night the tranquillised mind and body are prepared for "Nature's sweet restorer"— peaceful slumber. Should one feel restless after an exciting or convivial evening a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS will quickly induce refreshing sleep.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills), and 2/9 (168 Pills).

A good housekeeper knows

The "pink" of Jams is PINK'S.

PINK'S JAMS

ARE THE

PUREST & NICEST.

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19

or by Deferred Payment System.

"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."

CATALOGUES GRATIS.

TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

30 Deansgate Arcade, Manchester. 4 King Edward St, Leeds

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheel, Bowden Brake or New Departure, Back Pedal Hub Brake, all Fittings. For Cash or 12 mo. payments

Carr. Paid.

£8 8 0 ,, 15/10 each.
£9 0 0 ,, 16/8 ,,
£9 10 0 ,, 17/6 ,,
£10 5 0 ,, 19/3 ,,

All a Cyclist needs at lowest prices.

Trailers from £5 5 0, or 10/6 monthly. Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 600 illustrations, sent post free. — METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. ("S.S." Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

Tins, 3d. 6d. & 1/-

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Matrimonial Difficulty.

"MATER" is worried about the marriage of her daughter. The latter is a very pretty girl, and has recently become engaged. "MATER," however, is a widow, and her husband has only recently died. Since that event they have had no fixed abode, but have lived mostly at seaside boarding-houses. "MATER" wishes her daughter's wedding to be a good one, and one which will show her off favourably before her husband's relations. How can she best arrange about the place of ceremony?

* * * * *

It is quite often, "MATER," that houses are lent for the purposes of wedding festivities. As you have no fixed abode, I presume it is not very important at which church or chapel the ceremony takes place. Why not, then, persuade some relation or friend of yours—and you must have some—to allow the entertaining to take place at their house, and the marriage at their place of worship?

* * * * *

If this is not possible, perhaps you can take rooms for a week at which you could entertain your guests, or, failing that, why not arrange your spread at a hotel? I quite see that you wish your daughter to appear favourably before her husband's friends, and you should try to arrange something of the kind I suggest.

The Sweetheart as Critic.

"GEORGE" is an actor, and engaged to a girl. For a long time she has been true to him; and has spoken very highly of his acting—a thing "GEORGE" is very sensitive about. The other day, however, somebody told "GEORGE" that he had heard that his girl often spoke very disparagingly about the way he played parts, and in the presence of people likely to be useful to him. Do I think he has a right to be offended with her, and to break off the match?

* * * * *

It certainly is a little hard to hear that one's own sweetheart has spoken unkindly about one's abilities. Criticism is all right, but it depends on the critic. If your sweetheart does not really think you act well, it was very wrong of her to speak to you in flattering terms about it. In any case, a loyal sweetheart ought to try to further her lover's interests behind his back by saying nice things about him.

* * * * *

To do otherwise is unkind. Whatever she may have said about your acting, however, should not alter your determination to do your best, and if other people really think you act well, I should not be discouraged by her opinions. If you can get any distinct case of her having spoken unkindly about you, bring it to her notice, and get her explanation. Don't go by hearsay.

Is She Flirting?

"FRED" is worried about his sweetheart. She is, he believes, very true to him, but often talks to other men, and in a very intimate way. He does not want to appear too jealous, but do I not think it wrong of her to act as she is doing?

* * * * *

If she assures you of her love for you, you ought to trust her. The other men may be old friends, whom she cannot drop just because she is engaged to you. You cannot expect her to give up all other society.

The Time for Second Marriage.

"I AM a widow, and my husband has been dead ten months," writes "TRIXY." "I am desperately in love with a widower, who is very kind and has offered to marry me. I should be very happy with him, but my friends object to my marrying again so soon. Do you think it is advisable to accept his offer?"

* * * * *

If you are so very much in love with him, you would be foolish to refuse his offer out of a consideration for your late husband's memory, which evidently you do not feel. Marry the widower, if you love him, but it would be in better taste to postpone the ceremony for a year, if he is willing to do so.

The Absent Friend's Girl.

"A FRIEND of mine," writes "IN DOUBT," "is a sailor, and has gone away for three years. A few weeks before he went he became attached to a girl. Since he has gone, she has stopped me in the street, and spoken to me very often. Is it right for me, a single young man, to stop and talk to her or pass her by? I like her very well, and wish she were mine She writes to her sweetheart every other week."

* * * * *

There is no harm in your speaking to her at all, but beware of making your meetings too frequent. You say you wish she were yours. Well, depend on it if you see too much of her, that feeling will increase, and you will be stealing your friend's sweetheart, which would be a cruel thing to do. The poor fellow would be thinking all the time she was true to him, only to realise that he had been betrayed by his friend. No, I should have as little as possible to do with the absent man's sweetheart, and the sooner you cease meetings with her the better.

Reading to Children.

"E. M. P." is in charge of several young children, and is expected to read stories to them. She herself dislikes children's stories as they are namby-pamby and old-fashioned. Can I recommend her a style of book which is an improvement on those she has in mind?

* * * * *

The books "E. M. P." has mentioned to me in her list are certainly old-fashioned, and as I look back to reading them as a child, they do seem to be a little "namby-pamby." But "E. M. P." should remember that children do not think that at the time. They love in their little hearts to find the good child getting the best of things, and the bad one the worst, which is generally the case in old-fashioned children's stories.

* * * * *

"E. M. P." should keep her reading to such stories, as a great deal depends on the way a young child is taught to look at good and evil from the very first. Whether they are boys or girls they will find out sooner or later what a bold, bad world it is, but it is better it should be later.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

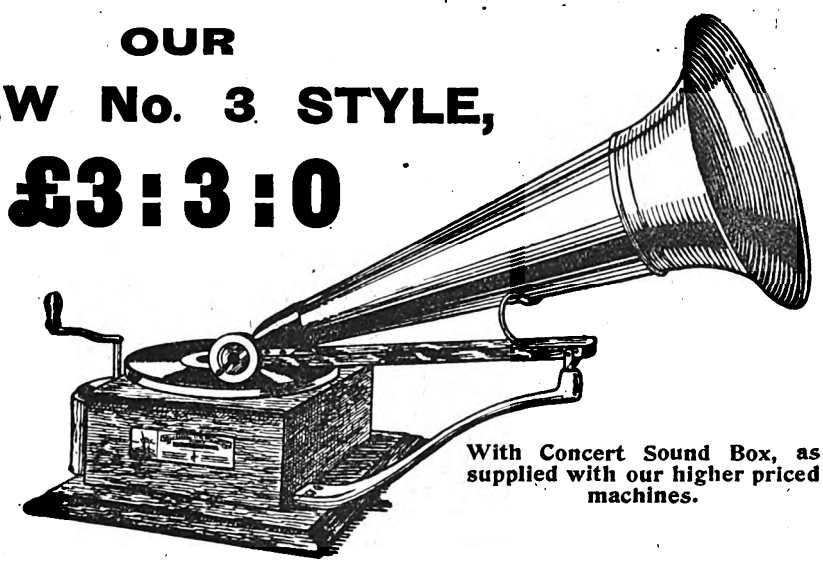
Digitized by Google

THE GRAMOPHONE IS A COMPANION

who will always please and never weary you. If you feel dull, by its means DAN LENO will sing you his funniest songs and patter, HERBERT CAMPBELL and GEO. ROBEY will also liven you up. If you feel inclined for Operatic Music, Mme. CALVÉ, SUZANNE ADAMS or KIRKBY LUNN, CARUSO, PLANÇON, Van ROOY, &c., will sing you the choicest excerpts. Or if you would rather hear the best Ballads and Songs, SANTLEY, BEN DAVIES, ANDREW BLACK, WILLIAM GREEN, ALICE GOMEZ, PERCEVAL ALLEN, ROSA OLITZKA will sing them to you.

You can vary the entertainment by hearing KUBELIK play the Violin, Mme. CHAMINADE the Piano, Mr. SQUIRE the 'Cello, or Mr. OLLEY OAKLEY the Banjo. The Gramophone charms and livens all and dull care is driven away.

OUR NEW No. 3 STYLE, £3:3:0



With Concert Sound Box, as supplied with our higher priced machines.

Brings the Gramophone within the reach of all.

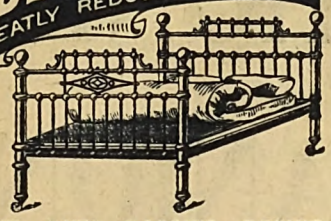
PRICES FROM £3 : 3 : 0 TO £26.

We have over 10,000 Records, and on receipt of a post-card we will send Catalogues and name and address of nearest dealer in our Goods.

THE GRAMOPHONE & TYPEWRITER LTD.,
21 CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

BEDS & BEDDING
AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.



SPECIAL CHEAP SERVANTS' SPRING BEDSTEADS, COMPLETE WITH BEDDING, AT VERY LOW PRICES.

ALSO

PATENT ANTI-SAGGING SPRING MATTRESSES, TO FIT IRON OR WOODEN BEDSTEAD.

Before purchasing elsewhere, send post-card and state requirements.

J. NESBIT, EVANS & CO., 38 JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM

73,368 PAIRS
Represents the Increase in the Sale of
"OCEANIC" BOOTS
During the Last Six Months.

Half-a-Guinea Everywhere. TRY THEM!

"MATCHLESS"

"ALWAYS BRIGHT AND CHEERFUL"

METAL POLISH

GUARANTEED FREE FROM ACID.
PRODUCES QUICKLY A LASTING BRILLIANCY.

Manufacturers:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 763.] Week ending August 15th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

A PANEL OF THE DOOR WAS DASHED IN AND A HAND INSERTED.

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "The Power of the Past." See page 199.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine is not a single dangerous drug, such as has been condemned by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The medical paper "Health," recommends

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache,

Toothache & Neuralgia.

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Safely, surely and without bad after effects.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1 ; Samples 1d. each

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free. Kindly mention this paper.

"Let's Talk of Graves" System

On J. G. Graves' System you are absolutely certain of what you are buying before you pay for it.

You only send 5/- to start with ...

THE "EXPRESS" 50/-

ENGLISH LEVER, (Regd.) 50/-

is then forwarded to you. You examine and test it, and, if satisfied, you complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of 5/-; or, if you prefer to pay the balance in one payment of 45/- within seven days from receipt of goods, a HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT (which you choose yourself) will be sent you. If you are not satisfied, return the watch, and your deposit is instantly refunded.

SPECIFICATION.

First-grade English Lever Movement, Capped & Jewelled, Safety Winding Pinion, Chronometer Balance, Massive Sterling Silver (Hall Marked) Cases. Warranted Seven Years.

Guaranteed BRITISH Manufacture throughout.

THE LARGEST WATCH-SALES FIRM IN THE WORLD.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms. Good Commission. No Risk.

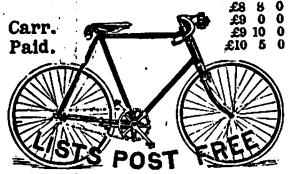
J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheel, Bowden Brake or New Departure Back Pedal Hub Brake; all Fittings.

For Cash or 12 mo. payments
£8 8 0 „	15/10 each.
£9 0 0 „	16/8 „
£9 10 0 „	17/6 „
£10 5 0 „	19 3 „

Carr. Paid.



All a Cyclist needs at lowest prices.

Trailers from £5 5 0, or 10/6 monthly. Write for New Season List, 136 pages and 600 illustrations, sent post free. — METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' Co. Ltd. (S.S. Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

KEATING'S POWDER

KILLS BUGS FLEAS MOTHS BEETLES

Tins, 3d. 6d. & 1/-

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made "Cleo" and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

SHORT STORIES

No. 763.] Week Ending August 15th, 1903. [One Penny.

NEW SERIAL STORY. START TO-DAY.

The Snare of Gold

A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

By

Henry T. Johnson.

START READING HERE.

George Geldart, the rich City merchant, awakens to find that he is lying in a coffin, wrapped in grave clothes. Fearful lest he may lose consciousness again before he properly realises his surroundings, he clambers out of the sexagon.

There are voices!—those of a man and woman. Moving by instinct, he flings aside a wardrobe door and hides within. It is his son Eric, and his adopted daughter Clare talking. From their conversation he learns that his younger son, Ronald, has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

A tap at the door! Geldart hears the frou-frou of the girl's skirt as she goes from the room, and presently he hears another voice, the voice of Boanerges Blagdon, his business partner, whom he has so often befriended.

It then transpires that Eric Geldart and Blagdon have conspired to end the life of the former's father. Eric demands a price from Blagdon for recovering some of the latter's promissory notes from his father's possession—old Geldart had noticed their disappearance, and thought that he had been robbed of them by Ronald. Blagdon promises that Eric shall have his price, then they leave the room.

Geldart slips swiftly out of the wardrobe, and, taking with him various articles, deposits them in the coffin, putting the lid back in its place. Then the undertaker's men come in and screw it down.

No sooner is this done than Ronald enters the room, and his father hears him bemoaning the fact that the body is out of sight, and his heart goes out to the son he has so cruelly wronged.

Click! Once again the door is closed. Ronald is gone!

And then George Geldart leaves his hiding-place again, dons a suit and hat of tweeds, an overcoat, and a pair of boots; then, watching his opportunity, he slips downstairs and out of the great house which can never more be his home.

George Geldart is penniless! He determines to go to Ronald, but on reaching the hotel where his son was staying, he is informed that the boy has gone no one knows where. He strolls out into the streets and there sees what is supposed to be his own funeral, pass, attended with much pomp and show. Then he feels his unutterable loneliness, and is wondering in what direction to turn his steps, when he is greeted in a hearty manner by a man called Stanyer, whom Geldart had known in his youth.

For four days Geldart has had nothing to eat or drink, and he accepts with alacrity Stanyer's invitation to dine with him. Stanyer has made a fortune in business in Australia, and wants someone to look after things in England for him. He offers the position to Geldart, and the latter, telling him nothing of what has transpired, agrees to act for him. He thinks that at last he sees an opportunity of working a pet scheme over which he had fallen out with his son Eric and Boanerges Blagdon.

After the funeral of what are supposed to be the remains of George Geldart, the great man's will is read. With the exception of a few bequests to servants and friends, everything is left to Eric. Ronald is present at the reading of the will, and there is a scene between him and Eric, the latter being accused of foul play regarding the father's dealings with the younger brother and the reason that he is disinherited.

George Geldart was offended with his second son because he did not wish to enter the City business. Eric, whose one desire is to obtain gold and power, fosters his father's ill-feeling towards Ronald. Shortly after a stormy interview with his father, Eric is visited by Blagdon, who tells him that things are going wrong, and wants to know what is to be done in the matter of telling George Geldart.

"Go upstairs and see him—say nothing," replies Eric, and with scared face Blagdon goes out of the room, leaving Eric pacing to and fro, thinking. If the doctors would! Such things had been known. If he thought his son had robbed him—and he had two sons!

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT.

FOURTH CHAPTER.

The Gulf that Separates.

"Eric!"

The door opened, a girl with a pale face and sad eyes glided into the room.

"Well, Clare?" he asked impatiently.

"Eric, dear, how your face hardens, how your voice hardens when I speak to you now. Ah, me, ah, me! Haven't you a smile for me, a kind word, how grudging you men are of those things when a woman has been all ungrudging."

An impatient exclamation was on his lips, and then, as if struck by a sudden thought, he suppressed it, and said:

"Clare, I am on the brink of a volcano."

"I know—I know, the deficit. Only a week from Wednesday when your father must know. Why not anticipate his discovering it and make a clean breast of it?"

"Bah, he'd turn me out of the firm, out of his house, cut me out of his will, you know he would."

"But what's the alternative?" the girl asked.

"Only one desperate step. Look here, Clare, you know he hoards money in thousands, in tens of thousands."

"Yes, it's part of the pet scheme he's been evolving for years, the system he talks about, but never tells about."

"Yes," said Eric with a bitter sneer, and he tapped his forehead. "He wants the firm to forsake its legitimate business for his harum-scarum, mad-brained folly, wants Blagdon and me to pledge ourselves to adopt it in sheer reliance on his testimony to its merits."

"But, Eric, he's very wise, a genius in these matters. Why do you thwart him?"

"You know what genius is allied to? Our concern is sound. Though Blagdon and I have gone a bit wrong in outside operations that doesn't affect the soundness of the firm; if we let the house involve itself in speculation foreign to its purpose then our sheet anchor's gone. No, no, you'll help, you must. You have access to the keys of his private safe, you must get me those keys."

"But Eric, that is treachery!"

"Clare, what is a wife's first duty, to love, honour, and obey!"

"But I am not your wife—despite your promises!"

"You have my promises, and I will keep them. If you give earnest of your willingness to obey, get me those keys."

His will was her law. That night, when all the house was fast asleep, Clare Armitage, its adopted daughter, the confidant and amanuensis of its master, took to Eric Geldart the key of the private safe in the library towards which apartment, with cat-like tread, the pair descended. The safe duly opened, from within an inner drawer Eric lifted a roll of crisp, flimsy paper.

"The old man's hoard!" he whispered, and with eager, trembling fingers he flicked over and counted the notes.

"Eric," said Clare, "you won't keep them—all?"

"No, not all," he answered sententiously, but even as he spoke he pushed back and closed the empty drawer.

"You've taken all," she whispered, her heart reproaching her for her ingratitude towards the head of the house, impelled by her love for the elder son of it.

"As well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb," he answered under his breath. "It was the only way!"

"But, Eric, you are closing the safe. Why not leave it open? Can't we leave marks for forcing and wrenching, as though it had been broken open? It would be better for him to think that thieves, I mean real thieves—— Oh, God, but that's what we are—strange thieves had robbed him!"

"No, no," he answered curtly, "I have a better plan than that!" He placed a selected few in another pocket, then made his way like a thief in the night to his brother's empty room, and from the smaller batch he took certain of the notes, placing them in his brother's pocket-book, others in the drawer of a small cabinet, then he withdrew.

And Clare, following him like a shadow, just as close and just as silently, and watching every movement with horror dilated eyes, when they had left the room, whispered in anguish:

"Oh, Eric, Eric, this is too bad, too bad! I shall never look Ronald in the face again! Eric, we must undo what we have done. Oh, for the love of Heaven! While there is time!"

"No, no!" he answered. "It is too late, there is no time." For even as he spoke they heard the click of a pass key in the front door, and his brother's footstep in the hall, and on tip-toe the scoundrel and his myrmidon went their respective ways.

On the evening of the following day, George Geldart, after applying himself in his library to the abstruse calculations which had for some time past seemed to possess him, went to the safe muttering:

"Ten thousand pounds! Why, we could start it with a thousand, a hundred—the fools!"

He flung open the safe, pulled back the door, and gasped:

"Why—why—why, what's this?" Quickly he opened and shut drawer after drawer, then sank into a chair, gripping his head in his hands, and muttering, "Robbed, robbed, robbed!"

But how—by whom? He scanned the safe narrowly. There was no trace of violence, no mark of tool or implement. He reflected on whom could suspicion with any semblance of reason fall? His servants were faithful, tried and trusted. Clare, Eric, Ronald? He dismissed impatiently the thought of coupling them with the affair, even for a moment. But he was a man swift of idea, prompt of action. In the interests of the innocent themselves it was best that those least suspected should be subjected to investigation as rigid and as searching as those who haply might have been tempted.

And Eric Geldart, noting his father's preoccupation, and his strange questions, boldly challenged him, so boldly indeed that the old man blurted out the truth.

"Then," replied Eric, "it is only fitting that search should be made from the highest to the lowest. I am the eldest son of the house, I insist the search begins with me," and, despite his father's protestation of absolute reliance in his innocence, he insisted then and there, leading his father to his room, and going through every desk, trunk, drawer, and article of clothing.

And Clare, too, professing wonder at their quest, and informed as to its nature, insisted on the like inquisition. As to Ronald, "Oh, well," Eric urged, "Ronald is absent on one of his jaunts, it would hardly be fair to make a search in his absence," and his father answered, "True."

Only later on, when old Geldart, noting a book absent from the library shelves, a breach of his inexorable law, had demanded who had taken it, and had been told that Ronald once again in this respect had sinned, his father, fuming with rage, strode upstairs to his room, searching high and low for the missing book.

And in his quest, lifting the flap of Ronald's writing-desk, discovered with a cry of horror, not the missing book, but that which for a thousand-fold its value he would not have discovered there.

A moment later Ronald entered and turned a look of inquiry on his father.

"I came here," said George Geldart, "to search for a missing book, little thinking I should find here the missing money."

"Father, what do you mean?" demanded Ronald sternly.

"I mean what I say, what I see," and he pointed to the incriminating note. "Now, sir, where are the rest? Now that you are here I insist upon your room being subject to the same rigid investigation as Clare's and Eric's, with their assent, even at their own request."

"But, sir," said Ronald, "you must tell me first that you are certain. Good Heavens! Is it possible that you, my father—But there, search if you will!"

And George Geldart searched, with the result that in a drawer he found two other notes, each for a hundred pounds, in the pocket of a jacket another still, with the result that after a violent scene, which cost both father and son more agony than either had experienced before, the younger man went from his father's house, vowing never to look upon his father's face again until he called him back to ask his pardon.

Digitized by Google

Next day George Geldart sent for his solicitor to recast his will.

So far Eric Geldart's evil scheme was working as smoothly as could be expected. But even yet they were not all complete. A viler, crueller design he had conceived was still unaccomplished.

Another surreptitious visit, not this time to the safe, but to a cash-box in his father's escritoire, and he possessed himself of yet another roll of notes, part of that strange hoard his father had been for long accumulating.

And amongst them found, to his surprise, a slip of blue paper bearing a brick-red bill stamp.

"Hullo!" he chuckled, "Boney's been tapping the old man for fifteen hundred, I must make him redeem this at a discount."

* * * * *

George Geldart waxed enthusiastic. That was his way on one particular subject, the subject Blagdon had broached, strangely enough the very one that as a rule he shunted.

"Look here, sir," he said, rapping the table. "This is where the Americans get ahead of us. They're not so tied down by conventions. Why, in America there's scarcely a man of any eminence who hasn't been half a dozen things.

"Look at old Abe Lincoln, Stonewall Jackson, Garfield, McKinley, look at Roosevelt, writer, soldier, politician. Men out there try their hands at as many implements as come along, till they find the one that suits them best. Over here a man mustn't take a certain step because he's too young, another because he is too old; over there a man jumps just when he thinks he will, and that's when he thinks the right time has come.

"The old man's hoard!" he whispered, fingering the notes with eager, trembling fingers.

"But over here"—then scorn possessed him—"I suggest to my son and my other partner a new idea in the way of business—Bah, I've no patience with them, 'It isn't in our line!' 'It's out of our groove!' and so on.

"That's the British way, we go jogging and jogging along in a circle, and then we wonder why people who are living in their own era, their own day, their own hour, leave us behind, and when I express my determination to go my own road, my son, who of course knows more than his father, hints more or less politely, that I am too old."

And so they shepherded him to the track they had in mind.

"Of course you have your own ideas," said the doctor, "you think even at your time of life you could do better in a new line than that you've worked a lifetime in?"

"I don't think at all, I know that with co-operation I could make in one year more money than I've made in all my life in produce in Mincing Lane. I have a secret, a secret so valuable that the fabled Philosopher's Stone would, if it existed, be as dross to it. I can't work it alone, or else I'd venture.

"I'd take the plunge without a moment's hesitation, and while they were toiling and moiling and scraping and screwing and grinding their tens and their hundreds out of beggarly microscopic margins, I'd glean it in, gather it in!" And the old man opened his arms as though enfolding to his heart his sheaves of golden grain.

"And your system's infallible?"

"Absolutely."

"But neither Mr. Blagdon nor your son Eric is quite insensible to commercial advantages, although your second boy is a bit of a visionary. Do they indorse your system?"

The old man hesitated. "They want to test it, but it requires no test. They want to know the secret before they buy it."

"Is that unnatural in business?"

"Not as between strangers, but between men who know each other, who trust each other——"

Suddenly he paused. Why was he launching into confidences with this man, whom, somehow, he never liked, and why was this man so inquisitive? He took up a newspaper. Blagdon and MacQuoich exchanged glances, then the latter, rising, said:

"I'll rejoin Miss Clare in the drawing-room, perhaps in my absence you will be able to bring your partner to your way of thinking."

Pushing aside the portière he opened the door, walked through and closed it, then opened it ajar and stood there, listening.

"I wish you wouldn't bring up business matters before third parties," said Geldart testily; "I don't care for that man, anyway, can't think why on earth he called."

"Well, I like that," said Blagdon, "seeing that you've been monopolising the conversation for the last half hour as you generally do. By Jove, Geldart, when you're in the stirrups on your Rosinante, tilting at your windmills, you're as oblivious to the rest of the world as the other Don Quixote!"

"Blagdon!" said the other, "be foolish if you must, but don't be rude."

"I was about to make the same remark."

"Mr. Blagdon, if you forget you are my guest I am bound to bear in mind I am your host."

"Yes," said the other, looking at his watch, "for a few minutes longer. Why did you send for me?"

"You know very well, I told you in my letter."

"I don't."

"I told you in my letter."

"You said, come over to my place on Sunday afternoon."

"Yes, and I added 'to arrange about your note of hand.'"

"My what?"

"Your note of hand that I mentioned in my letter."

"You didn't mention any note of hand, and I don't know what you're driving at."

Geldart passed his hand across his forehead, and Blagdon went on:

Digitized by Google

"Look here, my friend, take my advice, break yourself of your habit of launching out about your wonderful system, because it leads you to dream."

"Now, what the dickens do you mean? You know very well that your promissory note, days of grace and all, ran out yesterday, and I sent for you to learn what further time you wanted."

"My promissory note?"

"Yes, for fifteen hundred pounds."

"Geldart, what on earth are you dreaming about, raving about, I never gave a promissory note to any man in my life!"

"I think you're right so far, one of us is indeed raving."

He took from his pocket a bunch of keys, then crossing the room to an escritoire, unlocked and flung open a drawer, saying: "I'll show you your own handwriting, perhaps that will convince you better than your partner's word."

"Show me my note of hand for fifteen hundred pounds or any other sum given to you or any other man, and I'll redeem it within twenty-four hours and pay an equal sum to any charity you like to name."

George Geldart looked his partner for a moment in the eyes, withdrew from an open draw an envelope, tore it apart—it was empty! Snatching out the drawer he threw its contents on the desk, rummaged amongst them with trembling hands, then clenching those hands, he faced his partner.

"Gone! gone! gone! and you—you——"

"Ha! ha! ha!" the other laughed, "come, Don Quixote, once again it's only a windmill you are tilting at."

"The note you gave me isn't there, but it's been stolen as the other notes were stolen—and you know by whom—and you're in league with him—I see it all; I've been suspecting all along, but now I know."

"You know what? What do you dare to say?"

"I say that you—the man I've trusted and befriended, are a liar, a traitor, a swindler, and a thief! Ah!"

A cry bubbled up in his swelling throat, the veins stood out upon his forehead like tangled wires. He staggered, threw up his arms, spun round and with a crash fell at the feet of the false friend who had betrayed him.

"My God!" exclaimed the doctor, gliding into the room and looking in Blagdon's hang-dog face, and instantly he knelt beside the prostrate man.

"What is it? Apoplexy?" gasped the other.

"No! no! Fling up that window, stand back, give him air!" cried the doctor, swiftly unbuttoning his clothes and opening his shirt and vest, he placed his hand within that vest; then after a few seconds, with the other's help, he lifted the huge grey head a little. It fell back heavily.

"I didn't mean this," whispered Blagdon, "I didn't think I should bring on a fit."

"You haven't!" said the doctor in a low tone, looking up into the face distraught and distorted with terror, "He is dead—and you have killed him!"

FIFTH CHAPTER.

The Face in the Crowd.

Eric Geldart's chance had come.

For years he had aspired to Parliamentary honours, had figured prominently in political controversies, losing no opportunity of appearing before the public, whether in the columns of a newspaper or on the planks of a platform.

And now at last he was invited to contest the constituency of Little Claverton in the interests of the Progressive-Conservative Party, a new, small, but by no means insignificant section, composed mainly of malcontents recruited from either of the great divisions and who had by their activity and generalship recently forced themselves into prominence.

Neither side particularly liked the new party, but both were remarkably civil to it, as it was numerically strong enough to be dangerous in the event of a close division.

That was its strength, the strength it knew and unceasingly exerted, concealing its purpose until the last possible moment, and, like the guerilla band it was, harassing hosts immeasurably superior.

Outside the house the members of the new party were all things to all men, assuring the Conservative elector that the ancient institutions he prized were the especial objects of their solicitude, and the most advanced Radical that the "Pro-Con" Party, as the band of political guerillas had been dubbed, was going all the way with him, only a trifle ahead.

Principles so elastic suited Eric Geldart admirably, and having for some considerable time attached himself to the party in its operations outside St. Stephen's, he had finally been selected to contest Little Claverton in its behalf, that borough specially commending itself to the party as a likely one on account of the equality of its ultra-Tory and advanced Radical sections, as evidenced by its poll at the two previous elections.

So to Little Claverton he went, canvassed it, flooded it with addresses, stumped it, fly-posted all its available space with placards in blue and red as distinguished from the Tory candidates's which were blue, and the Radical's which were red only, and in all these and yet other ways warning the Conservative elector of the recklessness of its Radical candidate's programme, and the Radical elector of the dangerously retrograde tendencies of the Tory candidate's avowed policy.

And then he won Lord Lynton to his side. This was his master-stroke, his ace of trumps.

By a convenient fiction peers of the realm are forbidden to influence Parliamentary elections, but Lupus, fifteenth Baron Lynton, Lord of the Manor of Little Claverton, tenant in tail of Lynton Court and the magnificent estates surrounding it, and freeholder of nine-tenths of the little market town of Little Claverton, usually made his fiat and sent a good round Tory politician of crusted port wine principles to St. Stephens, and his opponent about his business.

But it had happened that Lord Lynton had quarrelled with his party. Another peer had been appointed Lord Lieutenant of the county, a position Lynton had coveted, and to express his indignation, his lordship was prepared, if necessary, to recommend his tenants to vote for the most rampant Radical whoever denounced lords and landlords.

But here was a middle course! By supporting with his influence the Progressive-Conservative candidate, he was able to deliver "a nasty one" at his whilom friends, without conferring any benefit upon his old opponents. And so it came to pass that Eric Geldart, his programme and his policy, were made right welcome at Lynton Court.

And thus it came to pass that Eric Geldart met Madeleine Lorraine. And, having met her, made a vow that he would spare no means, fair or unfair, to win her for his own.

For she was fair, and fresh, and sweet; tender as April, bright as June, so fair that she need not have despaired of a coronet, had she not been heiress to a peerage in her own right, albeit, that title was all but a barren one—her father being as poor as proud.

And Eric Geldart, who loved glitter in general and, above all, the glitter of a coronet, and the be-all and end-all of whose existence was his own advantage, said to himself, when first spell-bound he gazed on her, "If I can but win her, I must win all the rest."

And so he set to work to win his double prize; courted his electors as assiduously as he courted Madeleine, hampered in neither suits by a slavish regard for fact.

Once or twice her father prevailed upon her to occupy a seat beside the candidate whirling through the streets of the quaint old town on a motor-car gay with colours.

Impelled by the same influence she occupied with other ladies a seat upon Eric Geldart's platform, and he was glad to reflect that on that particular occasion he made his ablest speech, fenced most successfully with his hecklers, and undoubtedly made the strongest impression he had succeeded in effecting on the constituents. That meeting over, he conducted her to her carriage.

Digitized by Google

"You excelled yourself to-night," she said, extending him her dainty hand.

He pressed it a moment in a lingering hold, and answered in a whisper, looking straight into her wonderful violet eyes, "I had such inspiration."

"Of course," she said, "the enthusiasm of the meeting."

"No," he answered, "your presence. I think, Miss Madeleine, with you to cheer me, I could win life's battle all along the line."

She paled for a moment, her fair brow knitted with a puzzled expression; then without a word, she gathered up her train, entered the carriage, and was gone.

At last the polling day arrived. Little Claverton was ablaze with bunting and excitement. Eric Geldart and his committee were here, there, and everywhere, rallying undecided voters, marshalling the faithful, rallying the wavering.

Uneasiness began to reign in the camps of the Reds and the Blues, who noted their respective colours combined too ubiquitously for their satisfaction, and then, at last, candidates, committee-men, counters, officials, and all were assembled in Little Claverton Town Hall, which was surrounded by a multitude, alternately cheering and groaning, singing party songs, yelling party cries.

At last upon that crowd there fell a hush when out on the balcony stepped Mr. Mayor, to announce that Mr. Eric Cosmo Geldart was returned Member of Parliament for Little Claverton.

A great shout went up, greater yet when the numbers were announced, the victorious candidate having polled 5,215 votes, and a greater babel than ever arose when the remaining numbers were declared, and it was found that the Progressive-Conservative majority was only a matter of fifty over that of the Radical candidate, between whom and his Conservative opponent the difference was only twenty-five.

Whirling his overcoat round he flung it full at the heads of the maddened horses.

When at last that clamour had somewhat subsided, Eric Geldart, M.P., stepped out upon the balcony to thank his supporters, to shake hands with his opponents, and to propose a vote of thanks to the returning officer.

Exultant with victory, he stood there looking down upon the sea of faces, drinking in its roar of clamour, like an intoxicating draught. Then, his gaze roving over that wide sea, there upon its fringe they rested upon a face looking up at him, as it were, out of the gloom, with a gaze of stern reproach.

And there, in the view of all, he clapped one hand on his heart, waved the other in the air, and fell back heavily in the arms of those around him, exclaiming:

"Father—father—mercy!"

SIXTH CHAPTER.

Ronald Plays the Hero.

Ronald Geldart left the house that he had once called home with his heart overflowing with gall and wormwood.

Life itself, the world around him, seemed to be all bitterness, with rampant falsehood crushing with tyrant heel the helpless truth. Yes! Bitterness filled his heart even against the father he had loved.

Up to a point there had been in his heart no bitterness, even at the end. Beside his father's coffin he had thrown himself in a tempest of tears, but that posthumous voice delivering its unjust sentence in the hard, cold phrasing of the law, had deadened all remorse, all regret, awakening anger and resentment.

His father had died unforgiving and unjust, had left him disinherited—so let it be, he had chosen not only to deprive him of his patrimony, but to leave it on record that he had done so deliberately, therefore he owed him nothing save his being—an unasked gift—owed his memory no gratitude.

He had shaken from his shoes the dust of his father's house. A sudden bitter resolve swelled in his heart, he would divest himself even of his father's name. Yes, of the name borne by Eric, Eric, who had always hated him, conspired against him, whose lifelong dread had been lest he should not gain the larger half. He had the whole now, let him keep it—all—all, he, Ronald, would not share with him even the abstract advantage of a name.

His heart was sore as well as bitter, for a man is cut to the quick when his own kith wound him, the winter wind of ingratitude is never more keen than when it blows from homeward.

No, not even the name, the only thing his father had left him, and even as to that had left him not of choice. That father had stripped him of his patrimony, the empty name he would divest himself of, his brother grudged him even that—as he grudged him a brother's share—let him take that too!

Absorbed in his meditations he strode moodily along.

"Hallo, Geldart!" a cheery acquaintance hailed him in passing. With his head bent, his hands clasped behind him, he strode along, shut his ears, his heart, to the sound of the name he had determined to abandon.

"What a black-looking brute!" said his friend's friend. "By Jove, if a chap cut me like that I should remember, and I should remember to forget him."

"You bet your life I shall," said Geldart's friend, or rather his friend no longer, "he's no loss, there are one or two very queer stories about concerning him."

"Was that his governor who died the other day?"

"Yes, and they say the cause was connected with the shock of finding that that surly brute had mixed the old man's money with his own, and yet Ronnie Geldart was once as bright and breezy as Brighton."

Meanwhile the object of the above remarks went on his way, feeling a strange, morbid satisfaction in having disowned the name of those who had disowned him. And, all of a sudden, he was awakened from his abstracted gloom by a sound of excited shouting.

"Hi! Hi! Hi!" and another sound, the clatter of galloping hoofs. Looking up he noticed everyone gazing in the same direction, many people with paling faces.

Digitized by Google

Then he noted the cabs and carriages, carts and other vehicles in the roadway pulling in sharply to either side, and away down along the vista of the street there came, careering at a mad gallop, two carriage horses, their ears back, their heads down, stretched out like the steeds of a Roman chariot in a mad stampede. They had got their bits, they were bolting!

In vain the hatless man, with a white face, leaning back on his box, strained at the reins till they were tense as wire, looking ahead with the fear of death in his white face; this time the brute beasts and not the man were masters.

And in the smart brougham there sat a slender girl, her face set and white, but rather with the dignity of a marble statue than with the pallor of a craven terror. One hand she had upon each side of the carriage, but there was nothing to be done, to leap would have been to seek not safety but certain death, and so she sat there impassive to rigidity as one who, face to face with the Grim Monster, seemed to say, "Well, then, so be it, I am ready!"

There was no time to think, barely time to act. Ronald Geldart wildly bounded into the centre of the road, threw up both his arms, but the maddened horses came on, straight at him. Swiftly he slipped his arms out of his overcoat, whirled it round, then flung it full at the heads of the bolting horses. For a moment, blinded, they swerved, that was his chance! With a wild leap he seized the offside bridle, wrenched the plunging horse aside, checked him.

The brute reared up on his hind legs, taking Ronald off his feet; there was a desperate struggle between horse and man, and the odds were on the horse. Only just at that moment one of those prosaic heroes, who, enrolled beneath the banner of Peace, aid her to win her victories no less glorious than those of War, rushed to Ronald's aid.

"Hold on, sir," shouted the constable, as he seized the nearside horse's rein and ear, "I've got this one!"

And Ronald held on. Just at that moment the brute with whom he wrestled, rearing once more on his hind legs, lost them, slipped and fell heavily with a crash, and Ronald went down under him, while a groan arose from all who saw. "Poor, brave fellow, he's killed!"

But by this time the coachman had slipped off from the box, the traces were cut, the plunging beasts secured, the one that had fallen on Ronald raised and led away. They lifted the unconscious man and carried him to an adjacent surgery.

Half an hour or so later he emerged from his swoon feeling he had been concerned in a combined earthquake and volcanic eruption, his head was bandaged, his right wrist was in splints, and he was dimly conscious of numbness and pain all over.

A fair face was bending over him—a face lighted by the most wonderful eyes into which he had ever looked, a pair of dreamy, drowning eyes, that seemed to him like sapphire lamps veiled by sweeping lashes. She who gazed upon him bent her stately, shapely little head, crowned with its wealth of red-gold hair, that framed it like a halo.

Then she rose and turned to go.

"Poor fellow," she said, "I am afraid it will be some time before he is conscious.

"Let every care be taken of him, and when he recovers ask him to send his name and address to, or call at Lorraine House. I am sure my father, Lord Lynton, would like to add his thanks to mine."

She glided from the room, attended by the doctor, who, returning, said to his assistant:

"I think he's asleep now, best leave him for a quarter of an hour or so, Nature's sweet restorer will do more for him than we can do. Wonder who he is, I don't like to ransack his pockets for papers, seems mean, we'll find out when he wakes."

The baize door closed behind them. A few minutes later Ronald Geldart rose with difficulty, resumed his overcoat, took his hat, and limped out of the room down the stairs, and out into the street.

He meant to bury his identity, he was not going to have his name bandied about in this paper and that, so that she of those sapphire eyes should learn that the man who had gone to her aid was the Ronald Geldart who rested under the shadow of an unjust ban and an unmerited suspicion.

Nevertheless, an instinct within him whispered that though a lapse of days, perhaps of hours, might efface him from her memory, her sweet presence, her graciousness, her loveliness, would be with him a happy recollection far longer.

SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Sampson Scrimshaw, Company Promoter.

There were times when to George Geldart it seemed that his mortal life in that identity had really ceased, and that the doctrine of transmigration of consciousness of soul was being furnished with proof and instance in himself.

It was a strange, uncanny experience to be meeting in the City and elsewhere people he had known familiarly, and be passed unrecognised.

True he had to some extent disguised himself by covering his round double chin with a peaked beard, but he felt, not without a cold thrill, that even had he not done this, it was unnecessary, that even had he appeared to these people "in his habit as he lived," he would have remained unrecognised.

George Geldart to them was dead and buried.

A strange experience it was too, when taking up the City Press after luncheon he read an account of his funeral, together with a synopsis of his "career of usefulness and philanthropy," setting out the position he had occupied on the boards of City companies and benevolent institutions.

There was a beggar man to whom he had been good in the way of alms, cast-off clothes, and so on, and it was to George Geldart a study to observe the different expression on that man's face as he now passed him; the absence of the air of expectancy, the beaming cordiality, the effusive gratitude. To a certain extent it was healthier, for now the coppers, the only coins he could afford, were received with a condescending toleration, none the less because the truer.

One reflection consoled and sustained him. He was no longer George Geldart; in the centre of the swim, folks could not say that he owed everything of the present to his past and to the name he bore; the commercial instinct and faculty were strong within him, all the stronger and the more invigorated by virtue of his circumstances.

He had set himself to work practising with small means on a small scale the operations he had formerly carried on on a large one, and it pleased him to prove how true were the rules of the game, how irresistible the sterling qualities which in the main go to make a successful man, and to recognise that, given time and average opportunity, he was competent to achieve, from his new standpoint, a fortune and a position quite equal to that he had left behind him in that other life.

His business arrangement with Stanyer worked without a hitch. Every week day from ten to five and till two on Saturdays, Geldart repaired to the little office on the second floor of Crosby Square, E.C., as punctually as his employer could have expected or desired had he been present to check his time.

But he was not there. By the mail after that chance interview with the friend of his youth, he had returned to Australia, leaving Geldart with little more to do than to mark the fluctuations of the Share Market, to report such occurrences as were noteworthy in connection with the same, and every now and then to attend Stanyer's brokers and give instructions as to the carrying out of various transactions.

(Another instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

The Power of the Past.

A Little Romance of Love and a Bygone Crime.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

PART THE FIRST.

The Past is Unveiled.

"You won't do as I wish? You won't even ask her?"

"I—I can't, dad."

The answer was given gently yet firmly. If the words were broken by a slight stammer, it was that of pity rather than indecision. The speaker—a vigorous, youthful figure, in light summer garments and a Panama hat—looked gravely at his questioner, a man short, square, middle-aged, and florid. The latter was striding erratically about a small though lofty room, whose many and regular angles, and opposing, diamond-paned windows, showed that it was one of the apartments contained in a tower of octagonal shape.

The room was handsomely decorated but somewhat bare of furniture. A big pedestal-desk, a Turkish carpet, a lounge chair or two, a smoker's table, an oaken cabinet of narrow drawers, and a heap of novels, were all that diversified the polished floor.

On the mantelpiece, under a glass shade, was a gilt and plaster model of a huge nugget, flanked by other cases with specimens of gold-bearing ore. Outside the tall, deeply-set windows blazed the hot noon of an August day, brooding over a pleasant English landscape.

The elder man halted suddenly, plunging his hands into his coat-pockets, and setting a strong jaw under a grey moustache. His eyes were hard, and his whole expression desperate and bitter in the extreme.

"Dick," he exclaimed fiercely, "you don't know what this marriage means to me, you can't. But you do know, you have known for years, that I have set my heart on you and Evelyn Hatton being man and wife. Why should you back out now, why should you set up your will against mine?"

He paused, obviously seeking to moderate his anger.

"Evelyn is pretty enough," he went on, "isn't she, and good enough, and well-educated enough? I've seen to that. I'm a rough diamond myself, but I know that a young fellow of your position and breeding wants a real, slap-up lady for a wife. Well, Evie's all that. And you like her, you've always let me see that."

"Y-yes," faltered the other, tracing the pattern of the carpet with a boot-toe.

"Then," said his father, with a return of angry desperation, "I'm not going to let you play old Harry with my plans at this time of day. You hear me, my lad? I've struggled and fought and starved—and—and other things that needn't concern you—to make my boy rich and a gentleman. I've given you your fling; you've had your college and your university and your travels. And now you've got to come to heel for once in your life and do what I tell you. And that is, ask Evelyn Hatton to marry you. You shall, as sure as my name is John Jardine."

He stepped up to his son and laid a hand on the younger man's shoulder. A nervous anxiety showed itself in his keen, masterful visage.

"Dick," he added, "you'll do it—you'll give your old dad his way for once, won't you?"

Richard Jardine turned his hat about in his fingers. "Dad," he said, "she—she doesn't love me."

His father started back.

"Pshaw!" he cried, "absurd! Of course she loves you. What girl wouldn't? You're young, good-looking, good-tempered, well-bred, and you've a rich dad—any girl is going to snap at Dick Jardine. Ask her, my boy, ask her—I'll bet you a thousand pounds to a penny she says, 'Dick, I'm yours.'"

Dick winced.

"I believe she would say 'Yes,' dad," he owned; "but it wouldn't be out of love, because—because I know she doesn't love me. Yet she would say 'Yes,' and why? Think of the obligations you have placed her under. Without their having the least claim upon you, unless being the wife and child of an old acquaintance be a claim, you rescued her and her mother from poverty, you brought them to Lazonby, you have given them for years an ample income and a home almost at your own gates. It was noble of you, dad, it was princely, but how now can she refuse to give herself to me—your son?"

"Refuse, of course she can't," said John Jardine sharply.

"I would rather she refused me," answered his son steadily, "than that she said 'Yes' out of gratitude. If she were a blood-relation of yours, like—like Hector Fane—she—she need not feel so bound by your kindness. But she does, she must feel bound, and as I know she does not love me, I cannot ask her to marry me. I am sorry, dad, but I cannot, I—I will not."

John Jardine bit his lip—so savagely that a crimson drop or two stained his large, even teeth, and his eyes flashed.

"You won't," he said, "then I have done with you. You have dealt me the deadliest blow it was in the power of any living soul to deal me. You have denied me the realisation of the one ambition for which I have lived, you have turned the happiness of my old age into dust and ashes—you, my only son! May everything you do in the future be fraught with sorrow for you; may your life be bitter and hateful to you, as you have made mine to me."

Richard Jardine shivered.

"Dad, dad, for Heaven's sake!" he cried, "you don't comprehend what you are saying. I would give my life to please you, and you know it. But I will not marry a woman who does not love me; that would be to do her a hideous and irreparable wrong, which would bring other and worse wrongs in its train."

His father took a hasty step to the door of the room and flung it wide.

"Go!" he said, and his florid face twitched as he uttered the word—"go, and never, so long as you live, let me set eyes on you again."

Digitized by Google

The young man at whom this abrupt command was hurled, remained, as though transfixed by astonishment. Slowly a certain proud self-confidence kindled in his bearing, and, with a mute inclination of his head, he moved from the apartment.

John Jardine stood gazing after him, then, with a motion like that of a despairing woman, he wrung his hands, and an involuntary moan of uncontrollable anguish escaped him.

Covering his face with his palms, he sat down at his desk. There was something pitiable about the absolute collapse of the burly form, the quiver of the large and sinewy fingers, and the droop of the masterful grey head. Finally he drew a sibilant breath and looked up; his tanned countenance had grown strangely pale.

"My one chance," he muttered—"my one chance of happiness and peace of mind. And it is Dick who robs me of it. If I forgive him may——"

He left the sentence unfinished. The murmur of voices had reached his ears; one of them was soft yet brightly musical, the other harsher and masculine. John Jardine rose and passed out into the hall.

At the sunlit opening of the great doors a couple of horses were waiting, and the dismounted riders, a man and a woman, were crossing towards him. The woman, in her dark and trailing habit, was unmistakably young and charming, with generous brown eyes, smooth braids of brown hair, and a delicate, proud little profile.

Her companion was fair—almost colourlessly fair; his moustache and hair were ashen in their fairness. Pale blue eyes, dazzling teeth, and a secretive, half-cynical smile, it was of these that anyone who saw Hector Fane carried away an abiding recollection. On the whole, he was a handsome, if a selfish type, and his smart riding-clothes showed a well-knit, indolent frame.

John Jardine's glance went past him to the figure in the sweeping black gown.

"So you have had your ride, Evelyn," he said awkwardly.

"Yes, thank you, Mr. Jardine," he was told; "but we—we missed you and Dick. Have you quite finished talking this wonderful 'business'?"

She spoke with a gay simplicity that yet had a vague embarrassment in it.

John Jardine avoided her gaze.

"Quite," he said, "with Dick. But now I want a word with you. Hector will excuse us, I am sure."

Hector Fane assented politely. "Oh, certainly," he declared, and turned away with easy nonchalance as Evelyn Hatton passed into the curiously-shaped room on whose threshold John Jardine had been standing. The latter followed her, and the door closed.

A low whistle stole from Hector Fane's lips, and he shrugged his shoulders.

"What does that mean?" he demanded, under his breath. "Dick stays in all morning to talk 'business,' and then my precious uncle wants a word with her. We—we must make certain."

His slow, cynical smile flickered over his features, and he strolled off. His destination was a large, book-lined room, that opened from the hall a few yards away.

Hector Fane entered it loungingly, shut himself in, drew a chair to the great writing-table, and took a sheet of paper and a pen. He trifled with them for a minute, then laid them down, and springing up, went to a heavy door on the further side of the library. Massive as it seemed, it gave access to nothing more than a deep cupboard.

Hector Fane stepped into it; it—like the library—was lined with books, but smaller and more valuable ones. A gleam of light was visible at the back. There was a second door to it. Hector Fane pressed close to this and leant down.

Only the thickness of a few painted planks separated him from the octagonal room that was John Jardine's "den." Thanks to that fact and a favouring keyhole, he could see and hear almost all that was passing. The quickness with which he took up his position of vantage suggested that he was not occupying it for the first time.

John Jardine, he perceived, was standing at the oaken cabinet of drawers. Hard by, in the lounge-chair, her hands—in their leather riding-gauntlets—trifling with her whip, sat Evelyn Hatton. While the unsuspected eavesdropper peered and listened, John Jardine turned and came across the room, a folded document of some sort in his grasp.

"Evie," he said, and his voice shook a little, "I must call you that once more, as I hoped, in the end, to have the right to call you. But when you have heard what I am going to tell you, you will hate to think that I ever called you by a pet name, that I ever touched your hand."

Evelyn Hatton looked up at him astonished and startled. John Jardine motioned to the paper in his fingers.

"It's all written down here," he continued; "it was signed and witnessed years ago. And yet I hoped that no eyes but mine would ever see it; I hoped to be able to burn it on your wedding-day. I have lived in that hope, and now the hope is taken from me."

He unfolded the paper, and refolded it again.

"I'd rather tell it you," he said. "Listen! Ten years ago I, John Jardine, became famous, as everybody knows, by reason of having discovered the great Pike Hill gold mine. It's a lie, I didn't discover it, your father, David Hatton, did."

John Jardine made a quick gesture; an expression of horror had blanched Evelyn Hatton's face.

"Don't, my lass, don't," he begged, "it's not as bad as that. I did him no bodily harm, thank Heaven. He was dying when I found him. Oh, yes, I told you and your mother the truth when I said I had known your father, and when I told you that he must be dead, I was telling you what, alas, I knew to be true."

He paused. Hector Fane, crouching in his recess, had displaced an unsteadily poised book; the volume made a muffled sound in falling. John Jardine hesitated an instant at the noise, then, satisfied of its unimportance, went on.

"Your father was a clever geologist. He had found the Pike Hill Reef, worked out the main dip of it, and bought up, in a false name, a lot of shallow claims above it. On his way to the coast to raise capital for sinking his shafts he was attacked, robbed, and badly wounded. He died in my arms, died of his injuries, blessing me for having promised to secure to you your rights in his discovery, which he had confided to me, after binding me to fidelity with a terrible oath."

Evelyn Hatton rose involuntarily. John Jardine fumbled with the document he held.

"That oath I broke," he pursued, wretchedly, "I—I had had shocking bad luck myself up till then, and—and I wanted to be rich for Dick's sake. I stole your father's claims—your claims—and worked them as my own. It was in getting down on to the reef I found the famous Jardine nugget."

He pointed to the plaster model on the mantelpiece.

"That's all there is to say," he added. "I am rich with your money. I am a low, mean thief, a thief who has stolen from the widow and the orphan. I have hated myself for it always. If I could have persuaded Dick to marry you you need never have known, that's what I've lived in hopes of."

The unseen listener, kneeling in the dark with an ear and an eye alternately to the keyhole of the double-doored cupboard, frowned thoughtfully. Evelyn Hatton had bowed her head and was blushing a tremulous rosy-red.

"But it wasn't to be," said John Jardine. "I laid my commands on the lad, and he defies me—his own father!—to my face; won't ask you at any price, because you love someone else, and he knows it. So my plan's busted, and I can't make things right as I had counted on being able to do, without betraying myself. That's why I've turned to and told you the truth."

Evelyn Hatton's brown head drooped lower and lower.

"Does—does Dick know?" she asked.

"No," answered John Jardine drily, "not why I wanted him to marry you."

The gauntleted hands plucked at the lash of the riding-switch.

Digitized by Google

"I'm—I'm so glad," faltered its owner nervously. She looked up quickly. "Mr. Jardine," she said, "I—I suppose you did very wrong. But you—you were thinking about Dick, weren't you, and you really gave us all we needed, mother and I. And you—you were kind to father when he was dying. So please keep the money, and don't say a word to Dick."

John Jardine gasped. "I couldn't do that," he told her. "You've got to have the money back, and as Dick won't carry out my plan of getting it back to you and keeping it for himself at the same time, we'll have to take the straight road. There were only those two ways for it."

Evelyn made an imperious little gesture.

"Please," she said, "I won't let you speak another word about it. Let everything be as it is at present. I'm sure it's best; it—it would be very, very, very, cruel to tell mother after all these years. I wish you'd never told me."

She checked herself on the point of holding out her hand. Somehow she could not quite be with him as of old, not all at once.

"Mr. Fane will be waiting to ride home with me," she remarked, "please let me run away and forget that you ever said what you have said."

John Jardine stood silent, irresolute. She studied him, lingering.

"I'm so glad Dick doesn't know," she said, "so glad and thankful—remember, you mustn't tell him, ever."

John Jardine did not answer, he had turned to put back the "confession" in the drawer of the oaken cabinet. Hector Fane could see his every motion—the drawer was the third one down, and he was locking it with a key that hung on the free end of his watchchain, where it was thrust into his right-hand vest-pocket.

"You will promise not to tell Dick," said Evelyn, still lingering. "He—he loves you so much it would nearly kill him."

John Jardine seemed to fail suddenly where he stood. He did not answer, but Evelyn thought that he shook his head slightly.

"There, that's sensible!" she exclaimed, "and now I must run away. Mr. Fane will be getting impatient. Good-bye for this morning." And she went towards the door, but glanced back to say, "Oh, I do wish you hadn't told me."

Hector Fane saw and heard no more; he had risen from his crouching position, emerged from the recess, and was already gliding out of the library. His uncle saw him meet Evelyn Hatton in the hall; another moment and there came to his ear the sound of their horses' feet as they rode off together. Then he rang the bell.

"Ask Mr. Richard to be kind enough to come here," he ordered the servant gruffly. The footman went on the indicated errand.

"Mr. Richard is not in the house, sir," he returned to report. "His man is busy packing some things. He is to meet Mr. Richard at Lazonby in time for the noon express."

His master leant heavily on the desk. John Jardine hesitated, alternate waves of anger and alarm flitting across his florid features. Finally he consulted his watch.

"Oh, very well!" he said. "Have me Deerfoot saddled—at once." The footman bowed and hurried off, puzzled by his master's demeanour. John Jardine covered his face for an instant.

"Heaven forgive me," he muttered, "my own boy!" He shivered and set his teeth. "I must tell him all," he said, "and then—then we will go away together and begin life again."

With another glance at his watch, he hastened out to the stables to mount his favourite horse and ride sharply down the avenue from Lazonby Court, the fine country seat where he had spent so many guilty years.

There was plenty of time to meet the noon express at Lazonby station, and he drew rein as he passed out of the avenue on to the high road. He had almost overtaken Evelyn and her cavalier, they were riding in front of him, their horses close together, the riders almost knee to knee, John Jardine started and a groan burst from his lips. Evelyn had leant over still closer to her companion.

"The lad's right," he said; "it is not he she loves. Blind, blind, not to see what he meant. Hector! Great Heaven, that—that puppy to cut out my brave, my gallant lad!"

He sat on his horse, staring at the two till they rounded a bend. If he could only have known that, earlier in the morning, as they walked their horses under the shade of the chestnuts which bordered the long high road, Hector Fane had proposed to Evelyn Hatton and had been—rejected.

PART THE SECOND.

The Past is Defeated.

"You—you're not angry with me, Hector?"

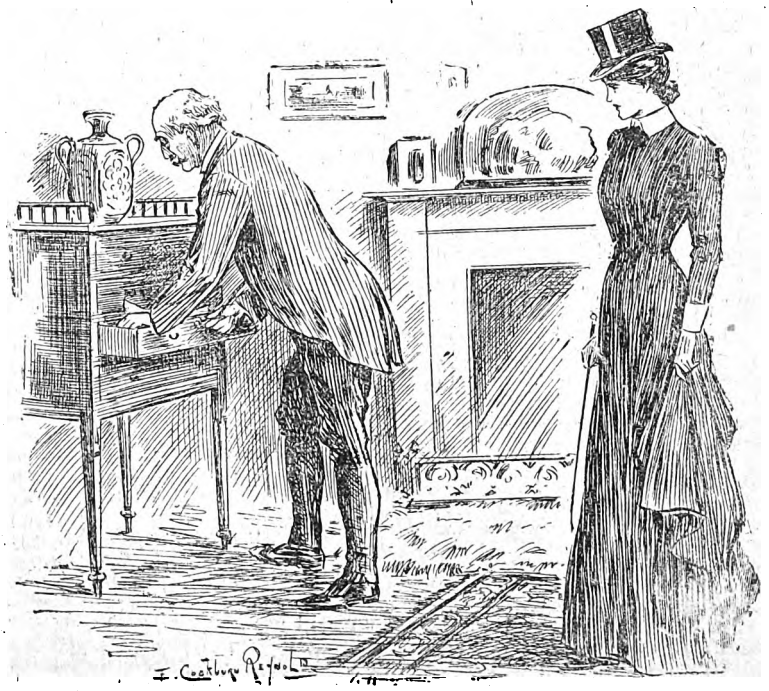
Unconscious of the eyes that, from the foot of the avenue they had just left, watched her graceful gesture, Evelyn Hatton bent over in her saddle to look into the face of Hector Fane. He had scarcely spoken since they left the Court. Nor did he answer now.

"Hector," added his companion gently, "we have grown up together, you and I—and Dick. You won't let my having had to say 'No' make any difference? You will still let us be good friends?"

Hector Fane roused himself from his own thoughts.

"Of course, since you wish it," he replied, and turned his head as if to conceal a spasm of emotion. But his blue eyes were cold and thoughtful.

In reality he was wondering what move he should take in the strange game of living chess that lay before him. Hector



He was locking the drawer with the key that hung on his watch-chain.

Digitized by Google

Fane was very shrewd and selfish, he had been pondering the problem coolly.

Some hour or so before, he had proposed to the woman at his side—because—because she was beautiful and his uncle's protégée, sure, he knew, of a handsome dowry. Now he had learnt that she was rich in her own right, and that John Jardine, his own kinsman, was a criminal.

To Hector Fane himself, John Jardine had been a veritable fairy god-father. He had gone through a great university with Richard Jardine, and John Jardine had footed the bills. And his pay as a subaltern in the fine regiment to which he belonged was supplemented by a generous allowance from his uncle, who entertained his nephew and that person's regimental friends sumptuously and often.

But of late Hector had displayed a preference for coming to Lazonby Court alone, and no little of his time had been spent at the Hermitage, the pretty modern bungalow residence in which, almost at the gates of the Court, John Jardine had installed Evelyn Hatton and her mother.

These visits had culminated in a proposal and—a refusal, a refusal that had piqued Hector's pride and self-interest more than it had hurt his heart. To that pique the powerful instinct of cupidity had now been added, for Hector Fane was both poor and extravagant.

Eavesdropping is not common among officers and gentlemen, but for years Hector Fane had cherished the idea of supplanting Richard Jardine in the affection of his choleric father, and had shrunk from nothing to keep himself intimately acquainted with the state of affairs between them. Hence his familiarity with the recess in the library that formed a kind of "ear" to his uncle's "den."

And now, in the light of his extraordinary discovery, he had been asking himself what was his best—that is to say, his most profitable line of action. At the moment when Evelyn, rousing from her own reverie, addressed him so pleadingly, he had come to a decision. He turned and met her glance with an admirable assumption of deep feeling.

"I know you care for me more than I deserve," he added, "and I cannot bear to lose whatever of love you choose to give me. Some day, perhaps——"

He had begun upon a diplomatic sentence, intended to suggest that he had not quite abandoned the hope of winning a further portion of her love. But the remark was interrupted, and by the teuf-teuf of a motor-horn. A huge yellow motor-car shot past them as they drew sharply to the near side of the road. A second later, a riderless horse dashed by at the headlong gallop of uncontrollable terror.

Evelyn cried out. "That was Deerfoot, Mr. Jardine's hunter," she said, "and saddled. What can have happened? We left Mr. Jardine in his room. Who can have been riding the horse—not—not Dick?"

White to the lips, she turned her mare and started back along the road at a gallop. Hector followed her, a terrible hope in his heart that the thrown rider might prove to be his cousin injured, dying. For he had read the meaning of Evelyn's blanched cheeks and trembling lips, he knew now why she had rejected him. She loved Richard Jardine.

The mare was fleeter than his cob—by the time he had caught up with his companion, Evelyn had dismounted and was kneeling at the wayside, by a frightfully still and crumpled figure. He sprang down, and, as he did so, recognised in the stalwart form, and grey head his uncle, John Jardine.

While they bent over him, seeking in vain to evoke some sign of life, the horn of the motor-car was heard again. Its occupants had caught the frightened horse and were returning. They alighted, horrified at the catastrophe.

"A doctor! Go for a doctor!" Evelyn adjured them. The leather-clad chauffeur leapt into the car and went off like the wind. His passengers, anxious and pitiful, gathered round the prostrate man.

For five minutes John Jardine neither moved nor spoke. Then his eyes opened and his right hand, stealing to the free end of his watch-chain, pulled out the little key.

"Evie," he murmured.

Evelyn bent over him.

"Yes, yes," she said.

John Jardine pushed the key into her hand.

"Take it—it off," he faltered.

She obeyed. Hector Fane, standing by, watched, coldly and keenly.

"The—the old horse has—has done for me," gasped the injured man. "I can feel it. But you'll—the paper—it will right you. The third drawer in my cabinet."

"Hush, please, please, hush!" she whispered.

He moved his head restlessly.

"Dick," he said, "my—my boy—forgive—for——" He drifted into unconsciousness again. Evelyn's tears fell fast.

"Will the doctor never come?" she sobbed. The motor-horn answered her, and the car sped up. Someone sat by the chauffeur—a clever young Lazonby surgeon, picked up as he was entering his own gate. Quietly he came and knelt down by the injured man.

When he looked up his face was grave. But he said nothing, only ordered a gate to be taken from its hinges and himself helped to lift his patient on to it. When the bearers of the rough ambulance moved off the young surgeon walked by it.

Hector Fane drew level with him. "I am his nephew," he said; "is there any—any danger?"

The young surgeon answered him with an ominous directness. "I cannot," he was told gravely, "say that there is any hope."

Hector bent his head assentingly and stepped back. He put Evelyn on her mare and led his own cob. Nor did it escape him that Evelyn's now ungloved fingers were closed upon some object other than her reins—the key that John Jardine had given her.

The surgeon was piloting his ambulance-bearers past the avenue which led to the Court.

"I am taking him to my house," he said to Hector Fane; "it is nearer and better. He may not recover consciousness, if there is anyone who ought to see him——"

The warning was left significantly unfinished. Evelyn drew rein.

"Dick!" she exclaimed, a world of pity in her tones. "I will go and bring him." And she shook her mare into a gallop and darted up the avenue.

Hector Fane's eyes flashed, and, as the surgeon moved on with the sad little procession, he himself sprang to his saddle and galloped after her. She was going to his rival, and, moreover, she held a tiny key—the key of the dying man's past.

Fast as he rode, she was there before him—she had hurled her mare across fence and lawn.

"Mr. Richard was leaving for London by the noon express," the footman told her, when she had leapt down and hurried into the hall, "his man has gone over to the station with his bag. We understand that Mr. Jardine has gone over to the station too."

Evelyn looked at her watch, it was past noon already, but she turned back to her mare. A thought crossed her mind—the key in her hand. John Jardine was dying, and his honour—his and Dick's—lay in a drawer in the octagonal room.

"I—I will write a telegram," she said, "your master has met with a bad accident." And cutting short the footman's ejaculations, she went into John Jardine's "den."

She pushed the door to, to shield her movements. It had a spring lock and clicked smartly as she stepped across the room to open the third drawer in the oaken cabinet. A sheet of paper lay on the top of its other contents; she recognised it in an instant, and snatched it up. She was about to pocket it, then recollected that there was no pocket in her habit, and that besides, the paper was dangerous in the extreme. It could only be rendered harmless by destruction.

A box of matches—on the smoker's table by the desk—caught her eye. She seized it, struck one, and lit a corner of the paper. As it blazed she heard Hector Fane's voice at the door, and knew that he must have followed her. She thrust the drawer to and stood irresolute, yet bent upon the burning of the paper.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly, to her amazement, a panel of the door was dashed in, a hand was inserted, the spring latch withdrawn, and Hector Fane, with an oath, flung himself upon her. The paper, half consumed, fluttered to her feet.

She wrenched herself free from the grasp in which he held her, for he was beside himself with futile rage; the footman, incredulous and stupefied, peered in at the shattered door.

"Hector!" she cried, "how dare you—are you mad?"

"Mad!" he repeated, snatching up the paper and beating out the flame, "not I—let them laugh that win. I knew what you wanted to come back here for with the key he gave you. I knew—I know everything."

Evelyn clutched at the charred yet still dangerous document, but he flung her off. Then suddenly he too was gripped—by the neck—the paper he held was taken from him and delivered to Evelyn, and he himself was pitched ignominiously into a corner of the room. Richard Jardine had entered unperceived.

Ill news travels fast. He had heard at the station of his father's accident, and by a natural misapprehension had returned at breakneck speed to the home he had believed left behind him for ever. Nor could he have made his appearance at a more opportune moment.

The rest of the paper was burnt after all, for Evelyn completed that process at her leisure. But Dick had to learn its purport; for the wretched Hector blurted out so much of the truth—though not, luckily, before Richard Jardine had hustled from the room the interested footman and several more of the Court domestics—that the secret could not be hidden from him.

Yet good came out of evil, for Dick was not so dense as not to perceive the significance of Evelyn's ardent self-sacrifice. Moreover, her attitude towards Hector Fane was effectual in removing from Richard's mind a fixed, though quite unwarranted idea that she was in love with that unpleasant person.

John Jardine did not die—the young surgeon, though of a pessimistic disposition, performed an important operation of the first magnitude, and, to his great professional advancement, it proved successful. But Evelyn will have it that his patient's recovery was really due to the fact that one night, in the temporary absence of the nurse, she whispered to him that Dick and she were engaged.

As for Mr. Hector Fane's knowledge of a certain secret, a smart lawyer took him in hand and bullied him into a withdrawal and an apology. And John Jardine still treats him generously, though he will never consent to see him. Even now no one is quite sure how he found out the secret in question.

R. Norman Silver.

DEAR LOVE.

The Tale of a Misunderstanding.

It was entirely Alan Rothbury's own fault that he was, as he put it, a wanderer on the face of the earth. In confidential moments he would add that it was "a woman's doing." As a matter of fact, it was his temper that was to blame.

Alan had what his nurse used to call a "nasty" temper, a jealous, passionate, utterly unreasonable temper.

In nursery days he had been known to throw his bread and milk at his sister, because their nurse had put an extra spoonful of sugar into the basin of that chubby and much-enduring little person.

And after the little sister grew up and had a husband and children and a house out Hampstead way, Alan continued to throw things at her, figuratively speaking, if she did not make enough of him when he came to visit her, or if the children were not sufficiently enthusiastic in their welcome of Uncle Alan.

"How I wish Alan were married!" sighed Mrs. Harwood one evening, as her brother bounced out of the room in a temper.

"Yes," agreed her husband. "Then he'd stay at home and not come bothering us with his temper."

"Alan has a good heart, dear," said Alan's sister reproachfully.

"And a beastly temper. Oh, yes, I know he's a good fellow, Winnie, dear, but he's so jealous and unreasonable, and has such wonderful ideas of what Mrs. Rothbury must be, that he'll never find a girl to suit him."

"Carmela Gordon might," observed Winnie. "I shall ask her to dinner to-morrow."

Alan was great on the attributes of woman in all relations of life, but especially as wife, and more especially as his wife.

Most men fall in love first, and think of suitability afterwards, but Alan first carefully considered Carmela Gordon's fitness for the post of Mrs. Rothbury, and then, being satisfied, fell in—no, majestically walked into love with her.

There were many things in women to which Alan objected, but Carmela emerged, triumphantly from every test. Bicycling, Alan considered unwomanly, and Carmela did not cycle; golf was unwomanly, and Carmela played no out-of-door games. Sewing, music, and gardening were womanly pursuits, and Carmela was an exquisite needlewoman, a brilliant pianiste, and an enthusiastic gardener.

Her personal appearance was exactly what Alan most admired. She was tall; Alan was rather under medium height. She was dark; Alan's hair and moustache were auburn—in boyhood's sunny hours he had been known to his schoolfellows as Ginger or Carrots.

Carmela was stately, dignified, and reserved; Alan quick, talkative, and demonstrative.

Carmela's voice was charming, her enunciation unusually clear and somewhat measured. Alan was genuinely attached to this stately lady, and admired her dignity and reserve, though it fretted him that she did not unbend to him, even after they were formally engaged.

Carmela was motherless, and lived with her father, whose only child she was, in a large, old-fashioned house, standing in its own grounds, not far from where the Harwoods lived. She was generally to be found among her flowers when Alan came to see her on the long, sweet, summer evenings during their engagement.

The wedding day was still some six weeks off, when one evening, after having written to postpone his visit to his betrothed, he changed his mind, and went on the wings of love and in a hansom to The Elms, the not very uncommon name of Carmela's home.

Learning that she was, as usual, in the rose garden, Alan went quickly down the broad walk, and was turning into the garden when voices from the summer-house on his right arrested him. It was a man who was speaking as Alan paused, but the next moment Carmela's musical voice rang out, clear and distinct.

"Oh, you must not desert me. I could not do without you, dear love."

Alan stood rooted to the spot. Was this his Carmela, his proud, undemonstrative Carmela? She had never called him dear love, never even dear Alan.

The man's voice came again, but it was too low pitched for Alan to distinguish the words.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, of course, but my marriage will make no difference," came Carmela's slow, sweet tones, each word distinct. "Indeed it will give me more freedom. You know there have been many difficulties here, but when I am in my own house I can arrange matters as I like. You must promise me to come—do, dear love."

Rigid with horror, Alan turned away. He would not reproach the traitress, he would have no scene; he would simply go away. So without a word of explanation to anyone, and leaving an address with his solicitors, coupled with instructions to give it to no one else, and to forward none but business letters, Alan disappeared.

For five years he roamed about, shooting big game, and telling casual acquaintances that he was a lone exile, a wanderer on the face of the earth, and that it was all a woman's doing.

But at the end of five years he got tired of this amusement, and resolved to go home to see what changes had taken place there. Perhaps Carmela might be a widow, and he would rejoice in her sorrow.

Very much astonished, but very pleased, was little Mrs. Harwood when her erratic brother walked in just in time for dinner one lovely June evening, five years almost to a day after his disappearance.

Not a question was put as to his reasons for his eccentric behaviour, for Winnie and her husband knew Alan's temper too well to venture on unpleasant topics, and it was not until dinner was over, and they were sitting out on the verandah, that Carmela Gordon was mentioned.

"And how is Carmela?" asked Alan, quite coolly, but busy over his cigar, which wouldn't draw.

"I'm surprised at you, Alan," said Winnie, with sudden stiffness. "After the way you treated Carmela you ought to be ashamed to speak of her."

"Ah, you don't know the reason of my conduct," said Alan grimly.

"Nor does Carmela," retorted his sister.

"She does. Her conscience must have told her."

"Well, it hasn't. I don't care what you say, Alan, or what excuse you have, but you behaved like a brute and a cad to that poor girl. And Ralph thinks the same. Don't you, Ralph?"

Harwood nodded an emphatic assent.

"You don't understand," said Alan, getting up and beginning to march up and down, "and I can't explain. She's married, I suppose?"

"Who?"

"Carmela."

"Married? Why, of course not."

"Not married. Then why isn't she?" demanded Alan, indignantly.

"Probably because the only man she ever loved ran away from her a few weeks before the wedding. And now she's too busy earning her living to think of marriage."

Alan sat down suddenly.

"Working for a living? Carmela? Winnie, what do you mean?"

"Why, Mr. Gordon died two years ago, leaving nothing but the house, which was his own property, and a few hundreds in ready money. Carmela let the house to a lady who takes boarders, and boards there herself, but she kept the grounds, and has started a nursery garden, which is just beginning to pay."

"She was always fond of gardening," put in Ralph Harwood.

"Yes," went on his wife. "She and that old gardener of hers were two enthusiasts. Her father used to object to their experiments, and she used to tell me she'd try new ones at Rothbury Hall after her marriage, if only she could persuade Dearlove to leave Hampstead and go with her."

"Persuade who?" almost screamed Alan.

"Why, Dearlove, the gardener. What's the matter, Alan?"

"I didn't know that was his name," murmured Alan, faintly.

"Didn't you? You might have heard it often enough, I should think. It's not a very uncommon name, but it's ludicrously inappropriate to that funny old man. How pale you are, Alan!"

"I don't feel well," stammered her brother. "I'll have a turn in the open air. No, don't come, Ralph. I'd rather be alone."

Without conscious volition he found himself presently hastening along the road towards Carmela's house.

"Fool, fool that I was," he muttered to himself, "to rush off in a fury without asking an explanation. Why, of course the poor darling was only trying to persuade the crusty old fellow to follow her to Rothbury Hall.

"Oh, why, why has he such an idiotic name? It was that which drove me mad. Her coaxing voice, the endearing names she never used to me. Oh, how it cut me to the heart to hear them lavished, as I thought, on another fellow."

He had reached the gates of "The Elms" now, and stood looking wistfully in, like the Peri at the gates of Paradise. All was unchanged, so far as he could see, except for the board announcing the sale of fruit, flowers, and vegetables within.

Alan could not resist the impulse to enter, and did so just as Carmela turned out of the path by the summer-house, and paused there, talking to the old gardener who followed her. As Alan advanced, she saw him, and her face froze. White to the lips, but dignified as ever, she stood awaiting his approach.

"Dearlove," she said to the gardener, "attend to this gentleman, and learn his business."

With a little frigid bow she turned to go, but Alan caught her hand.

"Carmela, I intreat you, let me speak. I only ask five minutes alone with you. In mercy, in justice, hear me."

Silently she led the way into the summer-house, where, five years ago, she had held that fateful interview with her gardener. Without a word she stood waiting for Alan to speak.

"Carmela, I thought you had betrayed me," he began. "I thought you were unfaithful to me, that is why I deserted you. Five years ago I came down unexpectedly, and heard you talking in this very summer-house with a man whom you were imploring not to desert you, as your marriage would only give you more freedom, and whom you were calling dear love. I thought he was your lover."

"And how have you been undeceived?" she asked, disdainfully, frozen pride on every feature.

"To-night my sister chanced to mention your gardener's name, and it all flashed on me. I know now you were trying to persuade him to follow you to Rothbury Hall, but the words were open to another interpretation, and I was misled by that fatal name."

"And treated me so cruelly that I shall never forgive you," said Carmela, icily.

"I know you can't. But I was mad. I had so often tried to get you to respond to my endearments, to call me "love" or dearest," and you never would. I put it down to reserve, and loved you the more, but now I thought the true explanation was that you did not love me, and had a secret lover."

"You might at least have asked an explanation. I shall never forgive you," the girl repeated.

"I know. I behaved atrociously. I don't expect you to forgive me. I can't forgive myself. But I've suffered, Carmela, I've suffered terribly. I went away loving you; I spent five years loving and longing for you; I've come back loving you more than ever, and knowing that my own hand has shut the gates of Paradise upon me.

"I'll go now, but I had to tell you that I know what a fool and brute I've been, and that—that I love you more than ever now I've lost you, and you hate—hate and despise me. But, oh, Carmela, Carmela——" his voice broke, and he stopped with something very like a sob.

Carmela came a step nearer. The pride and coldness melted out of her face. Her soft crimson lips parted with a smile of exquisite tenderness, her great dark eyes brimmed with tears of loving pity; her hands went out to him in sudden surrender, and as he snatched her to his heart, she murmured, "Alan, dear love!"

Vera Serkoff.

Digitized by Google

"An' Go to Yer Gawd Like a Soldier."

—Kipling.

The Story of a Man's Self-Sacrifice and a Woman's Love.

THE little frontier town of San Carlos was simmering with excitement, for the threatened invasion of Mexico was to become an accomplished fact. From every township in Texas the hardy adventurers rolled up to the gathering place, until four hundred of the best fighters in the world were waiting the word "advance."

Scallywags and desperados, good men and bad men, all were equally fired by the Wanderlust and by the thoughts of the lovely Eldorado away beyond. Only the women repined, as they have always done when fathers and lovers, husbands and brothers, ride away into the unknown.

To Grace Thatcher, the belle of San Carlos, the expedition was a hateful thing. Far and wide the rough frontiersmen owed her allegiance for her beauty and courage, and not a man but would have laid down his life for her. And now, just when she had narrowed her choice of admirers down to two, it was cruelly hard to have to rush a decision upon which so much depended.

William Wallace was the most suitable, of that there was no doubt; but he was forty, and already in his black hair silver streaks showed thick traces of early hardships. Money was his and much cattle, but—his rival was young. All the world loved Len Hurst, a lad of barely twenty, and from whose face the down of boyhood had scarcely passed. They loved him for his pluck and for his merry laugh, which rang out like an inspiriting bugle in the strangest of places.

It was the night before the start of the invaders, and Grace was feeding her chickens just as she had done since she was a child. There was a soft flush on her cheek and a smile of happiness on her face which ought to have warned Wallace, as from the gate he devoured her with his eyes.

Of love hitherto he had been ignorant with the ignorance of the hardy mountaineers, whose life is full from morning until evening, and now every fibre of his body thrilled with passion. He hardly dared to breathe lest she should be startled by his sudden appearance, but her instinct warned her, and she turned and saw him.

A lovely colour stole over her face, a blush the man in his folly thought was for him, and his speech became thick and his tongue dry as he stammered out the burning words. As she listened she grew pale and her eyes filled with tears, for she knew now what mischief she had done, but it was too late!

"Tell me, Grace—I'm a plain man, my dear one—tell me when I come back from this expedition you will be my wife."

He looked down at her from his lofty height, and judged her shrinking demeanour to be but maidenly timidity. His tones were almost triumphant as he exclaimed:

"I won't press you, little girl, for an answer now, but I'm going a happy man."

"Listen," she cried desperately, "it's all a mistake. I'm sorry, but——"

She hesitated, with a half fearful upward glance at his face which grew set and stern.

"But what?" he insisted.

"I'm engaged to another man!"

Her voice could scarcely be heard, for she was sore afraid. She could see the strong man tremble and the sweat stand on his forehead, as he heard his sentence and tried to keep down the storm of fury which ran in his veins like molten lead.

"Who is it?" he muttered.

"Len Hurst," he heard whispered, "and I love him. William Wallace, if anything befalls him I'll never marry anyone—you hear?" she cried, fearful lest his anger, now so sternly repressed, should fall on her young lover. "Why did you love me? Would God I could make you happy, but I can't," she wailed.

Wallace said never a word, but he wrung her hand until she could have screamed, and then turned and tramped off to his hut. All that is bad in man's nature tormented him that night, until with the bugle call came a temporary peace. In the hurry and bustle of that reveillé his brain was at rest, and it was not until the straggling column had moved off and was trailing down the road that his anguish returned.

Secure in their dreams of victory the men of Texas marched along without one military precaution, each man in the position that seemed best to him. Day by day Wallace's temptation to put a bullet through his rival became stronger and stronger until it grew insupportable. Now the column had crossed the ill-defined frontier, and no enemy had yet appeared.

Not one of the devoted band realised that along the heights above the crafty Mexican soldiers were stalking their prey, waiting until the ground made their success certain. Had Wallace been himself he would have remedied all this, but his one hope now was revenge.

One night Hurst, who found that his old friend was avoiding him, plucked up courage to make the first advance.

"Will," he said, holding out his hand, "it was the fortune of war that I won her. Don't bear me malice."

"I hate you," said the elder man. "I never loved but her, and now my life is empty. You'll have to fight me for her, though, for by the Eternal I'll not stand by and see you marry her. You must take your rifle directly we come to the camping ground, and at a hundred paces let the best man win. What, are you a coward, too?"

Before the lad could speak a pattering rifle-fire began to search out the unwieldly string of men. They had penetrated into a long defile, and were slouching along at its foot, without an advanced guard or one precaution to prevent a surprise. Nothing but a few puffs of smoke to the right, left, and front betrayed the presence of anything unusual, but the rapidly falling men showed how straight was the aim of the hidden enemy.

The column broke into helpless disorder, for with its head checked and the rear crowding in, the task of defence became absolutely impossible. Firing wildly in every direction, the tried hunters, the trained frontiersmen, yielded to ungovernable panic, and became quite unmanageable. Then, as his comrades fell thick around him, Wallace, who alone kept some control over himself, took out his handkerchief, and tying it to his ramrod waved it high above his head. The others saw it and copied his action, at the same time laying down their guns and shouting wildly.

Digitized by Google

Then from behind every rock and shrub appeared the Mexican troops, and swarmed down amongst the invaders. Helpless and still sick with panic the men allowed their hands to be tied and their weapons removed, whilst with every taunting cry and speech the Mexicans heaped opprobrium upon them.

Sullenly the prisoners were driven from the defile and the dead and dying left to their fate. Wallace, by the accident of chance, followed close behind Hurst, and a grim smile curled his lip as he realised that in all probability the question of right to the girl they both loved had been solved for them.

After a weary tramp of eight miles the dispirited men reached the Mexican camp, and were driven like cattle into a small corral having a low adobe wall, some five feet high, round it.

"Well, Wallace, won't you forgive me now?" said Hurst. "After all, we both love her as true men, don't we?"

The elder tried to turn away, but his heart failed him, and half furtively and wholly ashamed at his weakness, he took the proffered hand.

"I fear, lad, that we'll never leave this pen alive," he said after a bit; "these brutes have no pity. Hullo, what's that?"

As he was speaking a squad of Mexican officers came into the corral, preceded by a soldier carrying an earthen jar, which he deposited upon the wall.

"Now, my friends," said the senior officer, a vicious-looking half-breed, in a shrill, penetrating voice, "you came into our country uninvited, and every fourth man of you must stay in it for ever. I have here in this carafe enough white beans for three out of every four of you, and enough black ones for the others. The men that draw black beans will fall in on the right end of the corral, those that have the luck to draw white ones will go to the left. You understand, dearest friends, that the black bean means death in ten minutes."

A low hum sounded from the crowd, the only sign they gave of tension or of fear. The momentary panic had passed away, and each man was ready to look death in the face without a tremor.

"Fall in!" roared the officer, and silently the invaders fell in, for what was for many their last parade on earth.

Then with fiendish slowness the beans were covered with a cloth, and one or two of the Mexicans tried the fatal lottery, laughing heartily when they drew one of the symbols of death.

"Attention!"

Everyone drew his breath and nerved himself for the ordeal. One by one the men advanced and thrust their hands into the vessel, whilst the officers jeered at any sign of hesitation.

"Take your time, my child; don't hurry yourself, for it really is important," laughed the senior officer whenever he thought he saw any of them showing fear. But the natural dread of the drawing once overcome, no tremor disgraced the Texans, and even their enemies grunted their approval. The march to the right was as steady as the march to the left, although Death waited on the one side and Hope on the other.

By a freak of fortune Hurst and Wallace were the last to draw, and it was the youth's turn before his senior. As the man before him took his hand out with a bean of the fatal colour in it he looked stupidly up as though hardly conscious of what he was saying, and cried:

"You brutes, you might have told us that the black bean was bigger than the white."

His words were heard all over the corral, and a lump rose in many a man's throat as he looked over at Hurst's sunny face and head as he stood waiting his turn. Everyone knew that Jake Bennet loved the boy, and had warned him at risk of instant death. They were sorry for Wallace, but his taciturn manner had repelled most of the warm-hearted frontiersmen.

"Strike the cur to the ground!" shouted the officer. "But, no, stop, this is as good as a play," he added, smiling sourly. "See, gentlemen, there are but two beans left, and as my friend who is about to die remarks, the black one is the bigger. Now, my dear friends, choose. It is your turn first, my son; pray come and choose."

A low hiss sounded, but the Mexican took no notice, but watched Hurst's face with a cruel smile. All caught their breath, for they saw the lad's cruel dilemma when it was too late. To draw blindly was but the fate of everyone, but to draw knowingly would be sheer murder, and they waited.

Paler and paler grew the youth's face.

"Suppose I do not draw?" he asked.

"Then you both die," was the terse reply.

"Draw my lad!" said Wallace, all his soul up in arms against this treachery. "I freely forgive you. Remember the girl we both love, and draw!"

"Forgive me, Will, but I cannot. I'd rather die with you."

"And Grace?" Wallace whispered.

"Better to die with you than in dishonour after you," Hurst whispered back, and then, without another word, he took his friend by the arm and walked to the right.

No one broke the silence, for even the human wolf in command felt some trace of admiration.

"Clear the corral of the prisoners on the left, and secure them on the other side of the camp!"

The order given was quickly obeyed, and in a few minutes only those doomed to die were left.

Then the shuddering men tethered like sheep away in the Mexican camp heard the sound of volley after volley ringing up from the corral, and they tried in vain to stop their ears to keep out the sound. One thing they knew which was some comfort, however slight, that not a man begged for mercy, but that each one died fronting his foe like a soldier should.

* * * * *

The other day an aged woman, whose calm, peaceful face had brought comfort to many an aching heart, was laid in her grave in San Carlos, and the legend that they carved upon her headstone was a quaint, albeit a sad one.

"Here lies Grace Thatcher, spinster.

"Born—1824. Died Oct. 3rd, 1902.

"She was the affianced wife of Leonard Hurst and the affectionate friend of William Wallace, who were both murdered by the Mexican troops on August 15th, 1842."

Frederick G. Engelbach.

Digitized by Google

LAST LIST NEXT WEEK.

Letter Juggling Competition.

CASH DOWN. FIRST PRIZE, £25.	CASH DOWN. SECOND PRIZE, £10.	CASH DOWN. THIRD PRIZE, £5.

TWO BILLIARD TABLES (measuring 4 ft. 10 inches by 2 ft. 8½ inches), together with cues, balls, marking board, and spirit level,

And TWENTY-FIVE GRAMOPHONES, each one fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, and accompanied by two records.

• • • • • • •

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct. Only one name must be written on each line.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES." One more list will appear.

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

EXAMPLE:
ABGHIIMMNR... Birmingham.

ELEVENTH LIST.

121. AABDLLNORST .....
122. AADEELLNPRSW .....
123. EGHINNOORSST .....
124. ABCDEELLNOP .....
125. AAAEIMNPRSST .....
126. ACEEHNNOOSTW .....
127. ADEFLMORST .....
128. BEEIGLLLLSTU .....
129. BCEEGILOPRS .....
130. AEHHLOSTTWY .....
131. ACEEFGKLNOR .....
132. ADEFIMNOORRU .....

Name..... Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

Powerful New Series.

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

EPISODES ONE, TWO, & THREE.

Though my real name is not Olive Beresford, I am calling myself that for the purpose of these confessions. An aunt had left me an income of £150 a year, and just as I was wondering how I should occupy my time, I received a letter from Annabel Vernon, an old school-friend, who was now married, to come and spend the week at Vernon Towers.

I was delighted to accept the invitation, and arrived on the Friday evening, being met by Mr. Vernon at the station. The house party consisted of a Mrs. Grainger, Mr. Taskot and Mr. Dean Fisher, who was an expert Bridge player.

After dinner, a Mr. Bainbrig and his sister, near neighbours of the Vernons, arrived, and Bridge was proposed. Miss Bainbrig and I were novices at the game, and Mr. Fisher undertook to teach us how to play, Mr. Taskot making the fourth at our table. We played for a penny a game—at least, that was what I understood penny points to mean—and I congratulated myself that my partner and I were doing very well. The scores were not added up that evening, so I did not know exactly how matters stood.

On the Saturday morning I got up early and went for a walk, during which I met Mr. Taskot, who told me that he had lost heavily the previous night after the ladies had retired.

That same evening we played Bridge again, and when the scores were added up Annabel told me that my losses amounted to £11 7s. 10d., and that I was fortunate to have come off so well.

"£11 7s. 10d.!" I almost screamed. "Annabel, you are making a frightful mistake! It isn't possible! I've only played for a penny a game!"

"Penny points, dear. That means a penny for every point, and sometimes you have been hundreds of points below your opponents in one rubber."

"But I've helped to win several rubbers, so I must have cleared on those games what I lost on the others."

"On the contrary, even when you won the rubber, your opponents had big scores above the bridge, which left your score nowhere. But, as I said before, you have lost remarkably little for a novice, and £11 7s. 10d. means very little to you."

"Very little!" I groaned, sinking into the nearest chair, for my limbs were trembling under me, and I felt as if I should faint, so great was my surprise and horror at the information just given me. "Very little. Why, it means ruin!"

EPISODE FOUR.
In an Awkward Fix.

It was astoundingly incredible that I should have gambled and lost to such an extent, and I might well feel overwhelmed at the information which Annabel had given me so smilingly. But my discomfiture only seemed to amaze my friend, who burst into a merry laugh, and exclaimed:

"Good gracious, Olive, one would think a great misfortune had befallen you! Fancy taking a trifling loss like that so much to heart! But I suppose you are not quite used to having plenty of money of your own, or you wouldn't be so afraid of parting with it."

These remarks struck me as being both coarse and unfeeling, and as I felt incapable of bandying words with anybody just then, I turned swiftly away, and ran up to my own room.

There I threw myself on the bed, and gave way to a flood of tears, these being none the less bitter because of the dawning conviction that I had been deliberately deceived concerning the real possibilities of the game I had learnt with such delight.

That there was a vast difference between playing for a penny a game and penny points, I was not too stupid to grasp. But I still could not understand how it was that I could be such a heavy loser when I had been congratulated more than once upon my phenomenal luck in winning so many games, and it suddenly occurred to me that Annabel must have accidentally mixed up my score with somebody else's.

Fired with this idea I looked at my watch and concluded that it was not too late to go downstairs again, and interview Mr. Fisher, whose duty it had been to add up the scores. So in a few minutes, I had bathed my face to remove the traces of tears, smoothed my ruffled hair, and was speeding down to the drawing-room when I met Mr. Taskot.

I must have been terribly upset, for I no sooner saw the look of concern he bent upon me than I was completely overcome, and, bowing my head on my hands, wept in sheer despair.

"My dear Miss Beresford," exclaimed Mr. Taskot. "Whatever is the matter? Have you fallen and sprained your ankle? Or are you ill?"

Hastily brushing the tears from my face, and rising from the stair on which I had sunk in my childish abandon of grief, I tried to summon self-possession to my aid again.

"No, no!" I cried hurriedly. "It is nothing but foolishness on my part."

"And you are not hurt?"

"No."

"Then that is all right. Anything else can be remedied very quickly, I hope. You won't think me impertinent if I ask you to favour me with your confidence?"

This was said so kindly, and with such an entire freedom from the familiarity which I had resented before, that I forgot my previous displeasure and blurted out the truth.

"I am in a serious dilemma," I sobbed. "Those dreadful games of Bridge! I've lost ever so much money over them, and I don't know how I shall pay it."

"Is that all? If I understand aright, your losses only amount to a few pounds, which will really be of no consequence to a young lady of means. But, of course, it is rather annoying to make such a poor show at the game."

"But that isn't it. I am not a young lady of means. I am quite poor, and if anybody has thought differently, it is not my fault. So it is a serious calamity for me."

"And you are not an heiress, as the Vernons have announced? H'm! That alters things a little, and I, for one feel ashamed of myself for doing my best to add to your losses. But, look here, won't you let me lend you the money, Miss Beresford? It would mean nothing out of my pocket."

Digitized by Google

But this apparently simple way out of the difficulty did not appeal to me, after all, for it did not seem nice to put myself under such a great obligation to a man whom I had only known for such a short time, and I stammered out something to that effect, but without disconcerting Mr. Taskot.

"Of course, it wouldn't do," he said, "and it was stupid of me to mention it. But I've a fine plan which will settle the whole affair beautifully, without putting you under an obligation to anybody. In fact, it's as simple as A.B.C."

At this assurance I brightened up considerably, and was thanking Mr. Taskot for his friendliness, when we heard sounds of laughter and closing doors.

"I say," whispered Mr. Taskot, "the others are breaking up for the night, and they might think it odd if they saw us talking together yet. I'll tell you all about my little plan in the morning at half-past seven, where the bluebells grow. Meanwhile, rest comfortably in the conviction that you have been making a mountain out of a molehill, and that the molehill will soon be cleared away."

With these words Mr. Taskot disappeared, and I hastened to reach my own room, before anybody else should see me.

EPISODE FIVE.

A Dangerous Remedy.

In spite of Mr. Taskot's optimistic assurances, I spent an almost sleepless night, and it was a very heavy-eyed girl who took an early matutinal ramble towards the coppice in which the bluebells were still growing, although the season was now late for them.

Half a dozen times had I almost resolved not to risk this meeting. And half a dozen times had I told myself that Mr. Taskot's offer of help was prompted by sheer generosity of heart which would not involve any compromise of principle on my part. But, whatever my variability of mood and opinions had been, the net result was that my hopes rose high as I neared the rendezvous, and I was very glad to see that Mr. Taskot was there before me.

He approached me with an air of deference which he did not show yesterday morning, and all remnants of incipient distrust left me when I looked at the pleasant face he bent towards me.

"It is kind of you to be so punctual," he said smilingly. "I was afraid I had mentioned much too early an hour for you."

"Nay," was my tremulous reply, "it is you who are kind. For is it not to free me from a dilemma that you are out so early yourself?"

"That is only partly true, Miss Beresford, for I am always a sort of hybrid early bird. Sometimes I get up with the lark. Sometimes I go to bed when he rises. Anyhow, he and I see a good deal of each other."

A laugh concluded the sentence, and, somewhat to my own surprise, I found myself laughing merrily in unison.

"And now for the great business which brings us hither," he went on. "Suppose you sit down on this tree stump while you tell me all there is to tell?"

Obedient to the invitation, I used the tree stump for a seat, and, noticing that Mr. Taskot held his cigarette-case in his hand, I suggested that he should indulge in a smoke. He promptly availed himself of the permission to smoke in my company, and now that we were both at our ease, there was no more beating about the bush.

"Now then, Miss Beresford, for the exact amount, please."

"Eleven pounds, seven shillings, and tenpence."

I looked nervously at my interrogator when I answered his question, for, after all, my misfortune might seem ridiculously small considered from his point of view. But, if he thought me stupidly fussy over an insignificant sum, he was very clever at hiding his real feelings, for his demeanour was the essence of respectful sympathy.

"And you don't see your way clear to pay just yet?"

"Not at present, certainly. This debt represents about one third of a quarter's income for me, and I have already nearly exhausted the current quarter's in preparing for this visit, which I thought ——"

"You fancied it was dictated by pure friendship, and you find that your old school-friend merely wanted to fleece you."

"Oh, Mr. Taskot! Surely that is speaking rather too strongly?"

"Not a bit! These people thought you were an heiress, and they actually plume themselves on having let you down lightly, for fear you would run away too soon. Never mind how I know this. Suffice it that it is absolutely true. But they will be hoist by their own petard, and you and I will pay them back in their own coin."

"How?"

"Easily. Last night, after you retired, I was persuaded to try another rubber. Of course I lost, and I believe I am altogether about four hundred pounds out of pocket so far. That, however, does not matter. What I am concerned about is to punish this gang of swindlers. I had already heard something about their methods, and was not prepared to think too highly of any of Mrs. Vernon's bosom friends."

"Then that explains your manner to me yesterday morning."

"If there was anything exceptional in it, perhaps it does. However, to continue. Having, as I have already hinted, some inkling of what to expect, I have been unceasingly on the alert, and I made an important discovery last night."

"Do you mean that the Vernons are not quite honest?"

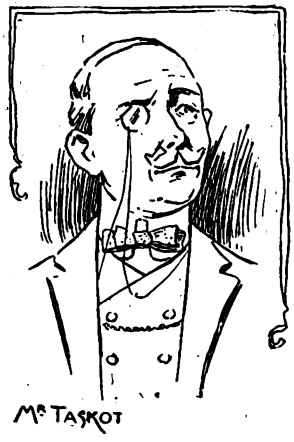
"Don't ask me to particularise too closely. Suffice it that I know how to circumvent them, provided I am assisted by a partner who will second my exertions. I have some loss to make good. So have you. And we are both to be victimised still further, if our hosts can manage it."

"The only safe way to avoid that is to refuse to play again with them."

"On the contrary, the best way to do is to recover our money by using the same tactics that they use, in which case it is fair game either way."

"I cannot in any case risk losing more, when I have not even paid what I have already lost."

"No. You must allow me to disburse the amount for you. You will win it back to-morrow, and will be able to repay me without having to draw upon your own resources."



I demurred to this proposal at first, but eventually, seeing no other immediate way out of my difficulty, I accepted the loan. Then Mr. Taskot confided to me an elaborate series of signals which were to be exchanged between us when next we played against Mr. and Mrs. Vernon, or their friend, Mr. Fisher.

"Of course it is only against those three persons that we will thus defend ourselves," concluded my newly-constituted adviser. "Anybody else who may visit the Towers will no doubt play fairly, but nobody would blame us for doing to our opponents exactly what they are doing to us."

Digitized by Google

When the matter was put like that, it seemed to me that Mr. Taskot's contention was quite right, and that there could be no harm in playing at "Diamond cut Diamond."

Besides, I bore no little resentment towards the woman who had only invited me here to fleece me, and I determined to let her discover that I was not quite so simple as she imagined me to be.

By the time I had arrived at this conclusion the morning was much further advanced, and we began to retrace our steps towards the Towers. I had gathered a few bluebells, partly because I never could resist wild flowers, and partly because they would serve as an excuse for my early ramble if I should chance to meet anybody I knew.

Nevertheless, I had forgotten the likelihood of being seen in Mr. Taskot's company while still so far from the Towers, and I felt my face flush scarlet when we came face to face with Mrs. Grainger, whom I had not credited with energy enough to be out so soon.

"Good morning, both!" she said, and I fancied there was more than the suspicion of a sneer in her voice. "Good morning! Fancy being out before me! I am going to early service, but I suppose it is of no use hoping for company?"

I blushed with mortification at the meaning glance with which Mrs. Grainger pointed the last remark. She meant to imply that Mr. Taskot was an admirer of mine—a favoured one too—whereas it was purely a business matter which had brought us together this morning.

I had intended to traverse the latter half of the homeward way alone. But of course this precaution against gossip was now useless, for Mrs. Grainger was certain to mention the meeting, and I was by no means reassured by the complacent smile with which Mr. Taskot met the situation.

However, the mischief was done now, and I had ample time during the remainder of the day to wonder whether or not I had acted wisely in accepting the help of a comparative stranger.

The Vernons made a great point of going to church in the forenoon. But, later in the day, they did not hesitate to amuse themselves in their usual manner. I was invited a few times to join in a game, but was not to be persuaded to so far forget my training as to gamble on a Sunday.

EPISODE SIX.
The Deed of a Hero.

I was greatly excited at the prospect of the revenge which Mr. Taskot had planned. It seemed such a fair way of recovering our losses, when it was quite evident that what we were going to do was merely a repetition of what our unscrupulous hosts were doing, and I no longer doubted that by the time my visit was ended I should be altogether out of debt. This in itself, to one brought up as I had been, was an enormous consideration. But I had another reason for being glad that I was to have another chance of playing.

The game fascinated me, and if I had been as rich as the other guests at the Towers, I should have wanted to play Bridge all day long, for I still did not realise that Bridge can be a ruinous game even for a millionaire. A run of bad luck, on heavy points, will make an inroad upon any income.

"I wish they were not playing to-day," was my discontented reflection. "It is rightfully tantalising to watch one exciting game after another. I know what I will do; I will go out for a walk, away from it all."

"Too goody-goody to enjoy a harmless game of cards," laughed Annabel, when she saw me dressed ready for outdoors; "but not too goody-goody to have walks with gentlemen on a Sunday! Ah, well! everyone to his own taste! For my own part, give me a quiet rubber, in preference to a promenade in the blazing sun."

I was vexed, horribly vexed at this vulgar sneer. But I did not choose to make matters worse by arguing the point. So I ran hastily through the hall and down the front steps, followed by a merry peal of laughter from the victorious Annabel.

"That hateful Mrs. Grainger has been making the most of what she saw this morning," I told myself. "But I don't care; to-morrow shall see things on a different footing, and when I go home to-morrow night, or Tuesday morning, Annabel shall find that I am the one who can most afford to laugh over this business."

I had no inclination to go gathering bluebells again, for, somehow, the neighbourhood in which they grew seemed to be inseparably connected with Mr. Taskot, and I mechanically walked towards a picturesque village which nestled on the hillside to the left of Vernon Towers.

But, somehow, the beauty of Nature had lost its glamour for me, and I could do little else but ponder over Annabel's duplicity, and upon the code of signals which was to help Mr. Taskot and myself to baffle the swindlers.

How long I sauntered aimlessly I cannot say. But my thoughts were suddenly attracted to my surroundings by a most frightful turmoil, which grew louder every moment.

Shouts and shrieks, and the running of many feet, seemed to be the principal elements of the commotion, though I could not see what caused it, for the shady lane which I had entered took a sharp turn a little distance ahead, which completely hid from my view anything that was happening further away.

But I could discern that the disturbance was rapidly coming my way, and it was all so wildly out of keeping with the calmness of a Sabbath afternoon in the heart of the country that I paused in quickly growing alarm.

"Whatever can it be?" was my affrighted thought. "Only something dreadful can account for all that shrieking; and it is coming nearer every second!"

In a perfect panic I looked for a way of escape from the approaching danger, but could see none. The lane was bordered by high banks on either side, both of which were topped by thick thorn fences, and overgrown by prickly furze. The banks were too steep for me to scale quickly. If I ran forward, I should meet the horror; if I tried to run away from it, it would overtake me in two seconds!

The result was that I was stupefied and stood stock still in the middle of the road, being too paralysed with dread to move even when a huge, rabid dog, with bloodshot eyes and lolling tongue, came galloping straight towards me, hounded on by a foolish mob of villagers, armed with sticks, stones, scythes, and anything else that they could use for their own defence if the tortured animal should turn upon them.

But he did not offer to turn upon them. Instead of that he came rushing like the wind to where I stood, unable to move or scream, and I had shut my fainting eyes upon the awful spectacle when I felt myself suddenly grasped by the shoulder from above, and somebody gifted with herculean strength lifted me right up into the midst of the furze bushes, just as the mad dog was within a foot of me.

Digitized by Google

"Thank Heaven!" was the exclamation I heard, and, looking up at my preserver, I saw the handsomest young man I had ever seen in my life.

"Oh, however shall I thank you!" I said. "You have saved me from an awful death!"

Both the dog and the crowd were soon out of sight, leaving me shuddering convulsively, and even my preserver was still shaking with excitement. But composure soon returned to him, and after helping me down into the lane again, he suggested that I should permit him to see me home.

"My name is Maurice Ray," he said. "I am staying a short time in the neighbourhood. May I know to whom I have the pleasure of speaking?"

"My name is Olive Beresford, and I am staying at Vernon Towers just now."

"Vernon Towers? Oh!"

I felt my face flush scarlet at the emphasis which Mr. Ray put into this exclamation. The Vernons must have a very bad reputation indeed if Mr. Ray's attitude was anything to go by, and I was glad when we reached the Towers, for it was very humiliating to feel that I was being treated to a share of the contempt which was felt for my hosts.

I did not invite Mr. Ray to enter the house with me, for I hardly felt myself justified in doing that. Nor did I think he would have accepted such an invitation. So we parted at the big gates without any prospect of seeing each other again.

Fate, however, had ordained that Maurice Ray was to be a great factor in the moulding of my future destiny, though when I re-entered the house I studiously avoided mentioning him or my adventure, for I guessed that either of them would have afforded food for amusement to Annabel, and I did not want her to have more amusement at my expense than I could help.

On the Monday morning I felt no worse for my exciting adventure, and sat down very cheerfully to take my "revenge," as per Mr. Taskot's arrangement.

Perhaps Annabel, quite pleased, and thoroughly deceived by the readiness and cheerfulnes with which I paid my "debts of honour," would not have smiled so complacently as she did, if she had known of the compact that had been made between my partner and myself.

Yet her awakening was nothing to what lay in store for me. Misled by the specious arguments of an unscrupulous man, and fascinated by the attractions of an exciting game, I had allowed myself to be placed in an equivocal position, and was even now tottering on the brink of moral, physical, and social ruin.

Alas! shall I ever forget the dire results of the play that was to have recovered the money I had already lost!

(A very dramatic situation is described in next Tuesday's instalment.)

CONSULT THE ORACLE;

Or, How to Read the Future.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s.

Some of the subjects dwelt upon in this excellent book are:

Cupid at work all the year round—Beckoning to ships, unlucky—Getting out of bed backwards, unlucky—What we may learn from bees—Lucky days of birth—Married life begun as it should be—Bleeding at the nose—Unlucky breakages—How to obtain a good breeze—How to have money plentiful in everyone's pocket—Hints to bridegrooms and bridesmaids—The sneeze of a black cat—Feathered prophets of good and evil—Children on board ship—Proper days for putting on new clothes—Lucky coins—Rocking the cradle—How to cure cramp—Fortunes read in the palm of the hand—Sign of the cross—Witchcraft in the dairy—Deaths of great men—Notes on dogs—Singing in the ears—The influence of the evil eye—What to do with egg-shells, etc., etc.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Consult the Oracle," for which I inclose 1/3.

Name .....

Address .....

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

Your Editor Chats.

New readers will be able to pick up the thread of our new serial story, "The Snare of Gold," from the comprehensive summary of the first instalment, which is published on the first page of the paper. I hope that everyone who did not commence this story last week will do so now. The working out of the destiny of a man who is supposed to be dead is an especially attractive subject, and this is the most striking feature of the plot of Mr. Johnson's story.

A further long instalment of "The Bridge of Ruin," or the Confessions of a Girl Gambler, begins on page 208. The writer of the Confessions relates a very thrilling experience this week—an adventure with a mad dog, from which she is rescued just in time. Further developments in the gambling episode also take place, making the instalment one of more than ordinary interest. For the benefit of those readers who did not read last week's instalment a summary containing its most important features is published on page 208.

Next week the twelfth and last list in the Juggled Letters Competition will appear, together with the date by which all the attempts must reach this office.

The following is the order of popularity in which readers regard the stories published in the issue of Short Stories dated July 25th: "Red Poppies," "The Face at the Window," "The Making of a Match," "A Horrible Honeymoon," "Nearly a Tragedy," "Barbara's Choice," "A Breach of Confidence," "In the Whispering Gallery," "Metcalf's Boomerang." No reader managed to get the order exactly correct, but the postcard containing the list in the order most nearly approaching the correct one was sent by Mr. W. G. Potter, 57 St. Mary Street, Woolwich, to whom the gold-plated pencil-case offered in this competition has been awarded.

August is hastening on apace, and with it the summer weather is going. There must be many readers who have not yet sent along their contributions to the Fresh Air Fund, and these I would ask to delay no longer before remitting what they can afford.

In case anyone has omitted to read what I have previously written about the good work this fund does, I would say for their benefit that the object of the Fund is to give as many poor children as possible one day in the country every year.

Ninepence is all it costs to give one child a full day's enjoyment, together with a plentiful supply of wholesome food, and I am sure that anyone who realises the good derived from just this one day's outing will waste no more time before sending his or her contribution. Amounts of all sizes will be gratefully accepted, and should be sent to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. They will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

The Cooling.

Telling of How a Blunder Awakened Love.

He was late, as usual. Their appointment was thirty-five minutes overdue when from her look-out at the parlour window she espied him turning into the street from the main road.

She looked in vain for the least sign of hurry on him. Calmly and leisurely, he sauntered up the street, reading the evening paper; with the air of a man who would as lief his destination were farther, and she felt his feet trampling on her heart.

As he neared the door she slipped up to her room, and left the rest of the family, who were taking a rather indignant interest in him just now, to answer his knock. Twenty minutes after she dried her eyes and came down. He was lounging on the sofa, reading his paper.

He looked up casually.

She said: "Oh, don't let me disturb you. I'm sorry to intrude."

He looked at his watch and smiled drily.

"Rather a good job I was a little late."

"Were you? How time flies! I was late home from business, and I've been busy since."

"I've been waiting twenty minutes and a half, and I was thirty-five minutes behind," he said off-handedly.

Not by a second would he add to his waiting, or lessen his dalliance. She had lied that he might lie, but he did not care enough to take the chance. Her hand trembled as she stood at the mirror pinning up a stray lock that she had left loose so that she might seem unready.

"I could have waited until you had finished your toilet," he said.

"I forgot. Of course you want to get on with your reading. But perhaps one paper won't last you the night." She went out and returned with an armful of newspapers, which she slammed down on the table at his elbow. "There!" she said, and vanished.

He read on for five minutes or so, then he put his paper into his pocket and sat thinking in the gathering dusk. He had known Amy Minton four years. In this familiar little room, with her by his side, the happiest hours of his life had been spent. And now—it had come to this.

He did not altogether understand it. She was still young and pretty; men admired her in the street, and he knew she loved him. He supposed the cause was in himself.

He was twenty-three when he fell in love with her. He had changed a good deal in these four years. Many things that interested him then did not interest him now.

A year ago he would have quarrelled with anyone who had told him he would ever break an appointment with her. He had been doing that for months. The press of her fingers, the touch of her lips, thrilled him no more. He came to her with lagging feet; he left her with a sigh of relief. Some day—he would not come. But he did not understand it.

It was almost dark when she came back. She paused for a moment on the threshold of the room, hoping he would call her to him; then she sat down at the piano.

Time was when the commonest barrel organ melody played by her could set his heart throbbing. Now, he observed that her choice of airs was conventional, her playing mechanical and colourless. His indifference choked her. She got up suddenly in the middle of a tune.

"You'd better go," she said.

He went.

Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays were the nights he visited her. The following Wednesday he did not come. The family made a fuss about it.

"It all comes of leaving you girls to yourselves," said her mother. "In my young days, when parents had a say in their children's affairs, the man was brought to his senses after a year or two's courtship, and the girl was safely married to him before he had time to get tired of her. If my mother hadn't taken your father in hand he'd have hung on till I married someone else out of spite, and left him to die of landladies' cooking."

"If that's what Amy's up to," said Maggie, her elder and plainer sister, "she might let us know, and the fellow too. Save us wasting suppers on him and him useless journeys."

"Don't you make any error," said Samuel Minton, aged eleven. "Our Amy hasn't got any other chap. She's just dotty on Walter. You should see the face on her when he's late getting here. You'd think she was going to be executed."

"If I have no one else," said Amy, for she knew that Maggie knew she had no other sweetheart, "it's because I want no one else, and not for lack of chances."

"Chances are little use when there's no sense to make use of them," returned Maggie, who, after three months' skilful courtship, was about to marry a middle-aged greengrocer.

"There's sense and sense," said Amy quietly.

"Something must certainly be done," decided Mrs. Minton. "Walter's been coming after you four years; you're no nearer the holy altar now than ever you were, and he's backing out."

"He's backing out, is he?" cried sturdy Jack, just home after five years' sailoring and wandering over the earth. "He's throwing over my little Amy, is he? We'll have to show him the way to back in again!" He squared his shoulders and performed significant manœuvres with his fists.

Amy's eyes flashed. "If you dare!" she threatened; for Jack was half as heavy again as her dilatory lover and twice as muscular.

Jack caught his despondent sister round the waist and gave her a smacking kiss.

"There then, naughty Jack sha'n't harm a hair of her darling's head," he assured her, adding, when she had gone up to bed, "But naughty Jack will make a picture of his face!"

"If you take my advice," put in Sam, "you'll let him go, and good riddance to him. He's got dreadfully stingy lately. I haven't seen the colour of his money for three weeks. I wish Amy would hook on to Benny Bingo, the bookmaker. I had it from him personally that he's clean gone on her. There's the fellow for a brother-in-law."

Mrs. Minton cut short a catalogue of Benny Bingo's liberalities by taking Sam by the collar and carrying him off to bed, to his intense indignation.

"You don't mean," she said, coming back and fastening the kitchen door, so that her words would not reach Amy's room, "you don't mean you're going to fight Walter?"

"You've guessed it, mother."

"But, my dear boy, suppose he fights you too?"

Digitized by Google

"Him fight!" said Maggie contemptuously.

"All the more fun," laughed Jack.

"Leave this little job to me," said Mr. Minton, waking up out of a doze. "I'll reason with the young man. I'll point out to him the injudiciousness of his behaviour. Reason brought me up to the scratch. Why shouldn't it bring him too?"

"Because men are different nowadays," answered Maggie feelingly.

"Mag's right," said Jack. "It takes the young to deal with the young these times. You leave him to me, dad. It isn't reasoning he's in need of. He wants waking up; he's taking us too casually. Next time he calls get Amy out of the way and leave me to settle with him. Seems to me I've just come home in time."

"What if he doesn't mean to come again?" suggested Maggie.

"Oh, then I'll begin calling on him."

The next night, Walter, strolling homewards, found himself in the neighbourhood of the Minton's house. He loitered awhile at the end of the street considering. He had sometimes found more pleasure in visiting Amy on surprise occasions than on the evenings when he was expected. The uncertainty of finding her in had sharpened the edge of anticipation. Without any definite intention he turned his steps towards her door.

The parlour was alight, and the blinds drawn. The piano was tinkling; a voice—her voice—was singing "Annie Laurie." The moving strains beat appealingly against Walter's heart, but it was closed against them.

The embers of his romance, which anticipation had warmed for a moment, grew cold again in her presence. The certainty that he had only to knock at the door to meet the same tentative smile with which she always greeted his unannounced visits, only to remain silent for a minute in her company to see the smile give way to the usual pout, oppressed him with the burden of disillusionment.

In there she sat, her arms ready for his embrace, her lips pleading for his kisses; and he stayed outside. But he was not happy.

He was turning away when a man's voice joined in the song. A heavy baritone, not without a musical ring, but in its bounding, unmodulated strength more suited to a rollicking sea-song than a pathetic ballad.

Walter paused, wondering who the man could be. Evidently a friend of some intimacy to be shut up in the parlour with her. And why not? She was young and good-looking, he was cooling; what more likely than that she should seek a livelier companion?

He grew hot at the question. Then he laughed with a sense of relief. Of course the Mintons were holding one of their frequent parties. Amy was singing with one of the company for the entertainment of the rest. Presently there would be applause.

The singing ceased, but there was no applause. Listening at the window, Walter noticed a gap in the venetian blind, through which a narrow space of the lamp-lit room was visible. This narrow space was occupied by part of the keyboard of the piano, a book of music standing above, Amy's profile and a large brown hand resting on her shoulder.

As Walter peered in the brown hand moved forward to turn the leaves of the music book, met Amy's white one outstretched on the same errand, and squeezed it; and the next moment a man's brown face came into view and kissed her full on the mouth.

Walter stared hard, but a mist blotted the scene from his gaze.

When it cleared away the man's head had disappeared, though his hand still remained on Amy's shoulder, and the loving pair were singing the opening bars of "Tom Bowling."

A blind rage took hold of Walter. Passionate jealousy, to which he had long been a stranger, swept over his heart as a flood, reminding him in a flash of the old days before he was sure of her favour, when he cherished black hate for every man her wayward lips smiled on.

The harmony of the blending voices maddened his nerves. He wrenched his eyes from the window, strode awkwardly to the step, and had taken the knocker in his hand, when the door, which was slightly ajar, swung wide at his touch.

He rushed along the passage and into the parlour, and seizing Amy's companion by the collar, struck him a sounding blow on the cheek-bone.

Jack Minton—for the unknown rival was he—jerked his neck free and returned the blow with interest. With loud breathings and flaming faces the two men closed in combat and went lurching about the room, hitting now at each other, now the unsatisfactory air, and all in deadly silence.

Amy shrank trembling into a corner as they stumbled towards her, then indignation against her brother got the better of her. She sprang between them.

"Jack, for shame! Come away this minute. How dare you strike him!"

The men fell apart, glaring.

"Why shouldn't I?" growled Jack. "He hit me first."

She looked wonderingly at Walter.

"You hit him first?"

"Yes," he said.

"Why?"

"He—he kissed you."

"He kissed me! Of course he kissed me." Then her heart leapt at the blunder; the dear, delightful blunder that had shown her he would fight for her, dawned on her. "I

"Jack, for shame. How dare you strike him!"

Digitized by Google

forgot," she said, smiling on them both, "you have never met Jack, this is Walter; Walter, this is my brother Jack."

"Your brother!" said Walter slowly, thinking it out. He offered his hand to Jack. "Then I apologise."

"I'm dashed if I do!" said Jack. "So you're Walter, are you? You're the gentleman who's been having a game with my sister?" He advanced threateningly. "We've finished too soon. I've been saving up a licking for you. Better get the job over."

"Yes, we'd better get the job over," said Walter, putting up his fists.

Amy gave Jack a push towards the door. "Go and find room in the kitchen, you great silly," she said, kissing him. "And if ever you lay a finger on Walter again, I'll fall out with you."

Walter followed Jack, and held out his hand again. "Shake hands, old chap. You owed me a licking, and you've given me one, I owe you—well, never mind what I owe you. Shake hands, anyway."

Jack, slower than his sister to grasp the meaning of Walter's "He kissed you!" took his hand dubiously. "Well," he said, "I don't mind telling you that this just about gets over me. Here I come home from the other side of the world, find you two at loggerheads, and promise myself I'm going to show you how to appreciate a girl like Amy with the business end of my knuckles.

"I do so"—he inspected Walter's black eye with critical satisfaction, then felt his own bruised cheek tenderly—"we both do so. And now you're old-chapping me, Amy's chucking me out, and the pair of you seem to have become as big friends as ever without giving me the wink as to how you've managed it."

Walter shook his hand warmly. "Perhaps some other time I'll give you—the wink."

"Walter," said Amy, when her brother had gone, "what is it you owe Jack?"

He took her in his arms and kissed her in the old sweet way.

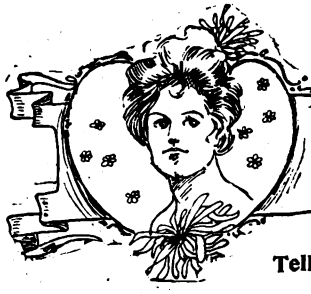
"I owe him you," he said. "I was losing you, my darling, letting you go, wilfully; though I was miserable, and did not want to. I was too sure of you, took you too much for granted. I had forgotten that I loved you. Something had to happen to remind me. Jack happened."

"But," she protested slyly, "it was only Jack after all. Are you sure you won't be sorry you put yourself to the inconvenience of calling, and—er—got your eye blacked, for a mere brother?"

"Sorry!" he cried. "Dear old Jack has been the salvation of me; but for him I would have driven you to warmer arms. My love for you had gone asleep; he awakened it. When I left you last night I did not intend to come back. Now I have come back for ever; I mean, for as long as I am welcome."

"It's all the same," she said, laying her head on his shoulder.

William James.



A LUCKY BLUNDER.

Telling of How the Mixing of Two Letters Won a Man his Wife.

The postman tossed a half dozen letters on Russell Webster's desk and passed along. Russell dropped the morning paper and picked up the letters. He hurried through the inclosures until he reached the last one. Then he raised the heavy white envelope and looked hard at the dainty address.

He was still staring at it as he ripped off the end of the envelope and drew out the sheet within. Half a moment later he softly whistled. The letter began—

"Sir,—Your extraordinary communication is to hand. I can think of no reason that could possibly prompt the declaration you have made. I do not look upon you even as a friend. What you ask is simply impossible, and I beg you will never allude to the matter again. Yours very truly,

"Cicely Hammond."

A smile suddenly spread across the attractive face of the reader.

"Well," he murmured, "that's a decidedly peculiar way in which to answer a simple offer for a piece of property. Hanged if it isn't serious enough to be the refusal of a proposal of marriage. By Jove, that's exactly what it is! Is anything the matter with me? Have I been proposing to some indignant maiden unawares? Where's my letter-book?" He found the volume and turned back the flimsy pages. "Here it is," he murmured, and read the copy aloud—

"Miss Cicely Hammond.

"Dear Madam,—I am authorised to offer you two thousand pounds for your lot at corner of Hayes Avenue and Milburn Street, cash payment in full to be made at time of transfer. An early reply will oblige yours very truly,

"Russell Webster."

He held the book away from him and stared hard at the copy. Then he laughed.

"The most anxious old maid that ever longed to change her name couldn't mistake that for a proposal," he chuckled. "No, there's some blunder, but it isn't mine. I'll go up there at once and see the lady and tell her about it. It's the gentlemanly thing to do. I can easily see that it's no joke from her point of view."

A little later, as he sat back in a forward corner of the electric car, he tried to recall all he had heard about the lady. She had very lately taken up her residence in one of the fashionable suburbs. She had come into possession of the property of a deceased citizen, and was reputed very wealthy.

He pictured her as a woman of mature age, of presumable intelligence and refinement, and with a distaste for the demands of active society. And while he was still busy with his imaginary portrait, he reached the street where the lady resided.

His ring at the door was answered by a young woman—a young woman who wore a light stuff gown and a neat white apron. Russell looked at this sudden vision admiringly.

"Is Miss Hammond at home?" he asked.

"Have you an appointment?" inquired the young woman, and Russell was much pleased with the mellow resonance of her tones. He had a theory that the feminine voice was an excellent guide to the feminine character.

"No," replied Russell, "but my business is of a somewhat urgent as well as personal nature."

The young woman looked at him a little doubtfully.

"Come in," she said, and ushered him into a handsome apartment that seemed to combine the purposes of both office and library. She motioned Russell to a chair and paused beside the large writing-table in the centre of the roomy apartment, as if waiting for the caller to announce his business.

Digitized by Google

"My card," said Russell.

The young woman glanced at the pasteboard.

"The answer," said Russell, with a little catch in his voice, "was not entirely satisfactory, and I felt it would be better for all concerned to ask for a—a clearer reply from Miss Hammond herself."

The young woman opened her eyes.

"I can't see how it could be made any clearer," she said.

"It depends on the point of view," said Russell. He looked about him as if for possible listeners, and lowered his voice. "Are you Miss Hammond's secretary?" he asked.

"I do her writing," replied the young woman.

"Then," said Russell, "I think it would be fair to show you this extraordinary letter before Miss Hammond sees it." And he placed the document in her hand.

"Thank you for your consideration," she said, and unfolded the letter.

Suddenly a pink flush stole across her rounded cheek. Then she smiled. Then both flush and smile deepened and she suddenly sank into the desk chair, and dropping her head on the table laughed and laughed.

"I am glad you find it amusing," said Russell. "Do you think Miss Hammond will consider it equally funny?"

The young woman looked up at him with swimming eyes.

"Sir," she said, "I must ask you to pardon me, but if I were certain I would receive my discharge the next minute I couldn't help laughing." And she laughed again.

"As I have said," remarked Russell, "I am very glad you can take it this way. It struck me as having an amusing side. Yet at the same time I can't help feeling a little anxious about the other fellow."

At this the young woman suddenly stopped laughing and opened her eyes very wide indeed. Then she hastily hurried to the most distant window and stared out for several moments. And Russell felt sure she was laughing again. When she looked round her eyes were still wet.

"I beg your pardon for being so hysterical," she said. "But you see I really couldn't help it. That last remark of yours quite capped the climax."

"Then am I to understand that Miss Hammond's answer to my offer was also in the nature of a refusal?" said Russell.

"It was," the young woman replied with a quick catch in her voice.

"Would it be asking too much if I requested to know the exact wording of Miss Hammond's letter to me?" Russell asked.

The young woman hesitated.

"Circumstances have somewhat altered the situation," she said, "and yet I think it is your right to receive what was originally intended for you."

"I agree with you," said Russell. "But of course the original cannot be recalled. It may be possible, however, that the receiver will come here just as I have done to find out what it all means."

The girl shook her head.

"No," she said, "he will do nothing of the sort. I think you will understand why when you see a copy of the letter that was intended for you. Here it is."

She opened a book lying on the table and turned back a few pages. Russell came forward.

"It is just the pencilled draft," she said, "but it was copied word for word."

Russell read it aloud.

"Your communication with offer is at hand. At present I have no intention of letting any of my property pass out of my hands. Very truly yours."

Russell looked round at the young woman.

"Can you blame me for laughing?" she said. "Isn't that about the curtest thing you ever saw in the way of a refusal of a marriage offer?"

Russell nodded.

"And—and, does it fit the case?" he asked.

"Exactly," replied the young woman. "And it fits all the closer because it was done unconsciously."

"And the man will not suspect that a mistake has been made?"

"Not for a moment."

Russell shook his head ruefully.

"I'd awfully hate to deserve a reply like that," he said. "I don't believe I could." He looked at the young woman sharply. "I beg your pardon," he added, "but it appears to me that you are on extremely confidential terms with Miss Hammond."

"That is true," said the young woman.

"I wasn't aware that answers to offers of marriage were usually left in the hands of secretaries," Russell went on.

The young woman laughed.

"There is no sentiment about offers of this sort," she said. "They are simply unimportant business details."

Russell laughed as much at the way in which the young woman said this as he did at the idea.

"Then if I made a proposal of marriage to Miss Hammond," he went on, "I could expect that you would answer it?"

"Most assuredly," replied the young woman. "That is, unless it went by mistake to some puzzled dealer in property."

"Well, there is no immediate danger," said Russell. "But this brings me back to business. Of course I am to understand that my offer for the lot is rejected?"

"Of course," said the young woman. "You know the lot is worth much more," she said.

"Yes," he replied, "it is worth more. You understand that I was simply the agent of other parties."

"No doubt you thought that here was a chance to obtain a bargain from a simple and quite unsophisticated woman, who might be glad to jump at the chance of securing such a sum it cash."

"No," said Russell, "I didn't think anything of the kind. I simply tried to execute the commission that was given me. I would do the same if you intrusted me with a similar piece of business."

"Very well," said the young woman. "As a proof of your good faith you may take that same lot of land and let us see how good a price you can get for it."

"Does Miss Hammond authorise this?" Russell inquired.

"If the price is right," said the young woman, "she can be persuaded."

Russell took his hat.

"I will report in a few days," he said. He hesitated. "As I am, apparently, to transact this business with you, would it be a presumption to ask your name?"

"Not at all," replied the young woman. "I am Miss Vane."

"Good morning, Miss Vane," said Russell, and was gone.

He smiled over his singular adventure all the way back to the office. What a bright and charming girl that Miss Vane was. He wasn't quite sure that he had ever heard a woman's unrestrained laughter that was at all pleasant before. She must be a delightful companion, no matter how crotchety her old maid employer might be. He would show her what he could do with that corner lot. He would convince her of his honesty and energy.

Digitized by Google

Four days later he again greeted Miss Vane. He fancied she seemed pleased to see him.

"I have been quite fortunate," he said; "I found an out-of-town purchaser for the lot."

"And the price?"

"Three thousand pounds, cash down, and it is a very good price, too."

"I trust," said Miss Vane, "that you have used no irregular means."

"What do you mean?"

"You didn't work on his sympathies, did you? You didn't tell him that Miss Hammond sorely needed the money? You didn't add she was a crochety old maid and as stubborn as an army mule, did you?"

She said this with such an innocent air that Russell couldn't feel offended.

"Sentiment would be of no earthly use with this man," he said. "He's as hard as nails. He knew all about the lot. He wants it and he's willing to give a fancy price for it. As for using Miss Hammond's personal peculiarities as an aid in the transaction, I couldn't well do that, because I never saw her."

"Very true," said Miss Vane. She hesitated a moment. "The price is satisfactory," she said. "Miss Hammond would have taken nothing less. Here are her deed and the abstract. Will you kindly prepare the papers and arrange all the details?"

The transfer was completed a few days later when Russell handed Miss Vane a cheque for the amount.

"And how much does Miss Hammond owe you for your services?" she asked.

"The regular commission charged is two per cent.," he replied.

She unlocked a drawer of the table and drew out a package of bank notes and counted off the amount.

"There is sixty pounds, I think," she said. "Please run it over."

Russell deftly ran through the pile and nodded, and then he counted off a certain amount and placed it on the table before the young woman.

"What's this?" she demanded.

"That's your share," he said. "Half and half, you know. I am perfectly well aware that without your aid I couldn't have touched a penny of this sum. Don't look like that. You've earned it all right."

"B—but I can't take it," protested Miss Vane.

"Of course you can take it," said Russell. "You must take it. This isn't a gift. It's a cold-blooded business transaction. I fancy you'll know what to do with it. I'm quite sure that little windfalls of this sort never come amiss to me."

Miss Vane was about to speak, but Russell looked so determined that she changed her mind and gathered up the notes.

"Thank you," she said. "I'm quite sure I never earned so much money at one time before—if I earned it."

"You did," laughed Russell, as he rose.

"One moment," said Miss Vane. "Miss Hammond has been making inquiries about you. They are quite satisfactory. She wants a man of business. Someone who can attend to the details of the management of her estate. She favours you. It will not take all your time at present. Later on she may require more from you. If you take the place you will report to me here twice a week. The salary can be arranged later when the duties of the place are fully determined, but I think you will find Miss Hammond a person of liberal views on this point. What do you say?"

Russell looked at her with an air of indecision.

"What would you advise?" he asked. "I certainly would want to earn my money."

"There'll be no fear about that," laughed Miss Vane, and her smile was very attractive.

"Convey my thanks to Miss Hammond," he said, "and tell her I am pleased to accept her offer."

The oftener Russell met Miss Vane the more charmed he was with her. At the seventh meeting he was convinced he had loved her from the very start. At the eighth meeting he was fully satisfied that life would be a dismal wilderness without her.

At the ninth meeting he had the courage to say:

"I suppose Miss Hammond would miss you greatly if you left her?"

"She couldn't do without me," said Miss Vane.

"Who could blame her?" murmured Russell, and then was instantly convinced that he had said something inexcusably bold. But he quickly rallied and remarked that it was strange he hadn't met Miss Hammond yet.

"Not at all," said Miss Vane, "she does not care to meet strangers."

"But I am not exactly a stranger," said Russell.

"You will see her some day," said Miss Vane. "At present she is interested in settling her affairs and superintending certain improvements. When she returns from the Continent she will open up her house and try to become acquainted with her new neighbours."

"The Continent?" repeated Russell. "And do you go, too?"

"Yes," replied Miss Vane.

"And how long do you—I mean Miss Hammond, intend to stay?"

"Six months, I believe."

Russell went back to his office with a heavy heart. Could he endure it to forego seeing that charming face for six months?

He didn't think he could.

Then he plucked up his courage and sat down and wrote Miss Vane a love letter that was also an offer of marriage. It was a long letter. He told her about himself, his plans, his hopes, his present standing. He told her how she had come into his life like a ray of sunshine, and how his admiration and respect and gratitude had all merged into love. Theirs was a brief acquaintance, he admitted, but they were both free and independent, and had but themselves to please.

It was a nice letter, a tender, earnest letter, yet Russell dropped it in the letter-box with fear and trembling, and how eagerly he seized his post the next morning and ran through the letters.

There was just the briefest note in the familiar handwriting—

"To avoid any possibility of further mistakes, will Mr. Webster call in person for a reply to his proposition?"

There was no name signed to this and Russell turned it over blankly. Then he took his hat and started out to learn his fate.

Miss Vane received him with grave courtesy, which was quite unlike her usual manner. He noticed that her cheeks were a little flushed and that there was a rose in her pretty hair.

"Sit down, Mr. Webster," she said, and fixed her gentle eyes upon him. "Miss Hammond," she began with a little hesitation, "was much pleased with your letter."

"Miss Hammond?"

"She liked its manly ring, and, of course, was highly gratified by the compliment it paid her."

"Miss Hammond, did you say?"

Miss Vane took no notice of the interruption but went on speaking.

"She was even inclined to look upon your offer with favour, but wanted first to secure a personal interview."

Russell looked about him in an agony of apprehension.

"Miss Hammond!" he murmured. "Heavens, has there been another blunder?"

His troubled glance fell upon Miss Vane. She was silently laughing, and her eyes were moist as they met Russell's.

"No," she softly said, "there is no mistake this time, dear friend. Cicely Vane Hammond—Cicely Vane, until, at her uncle's last request, she took the name of Hammond—approves in person of your latest and best effort to advance her dearest interest."

And with a tender smile she extended both her hands.

W. R. Rose.

Digitized by Google

On One Condition.

Poet: "I have here, sir, my last effusion." Editor: "If I were quite sure of that, I'd buy it."

Her Feet Weren't Small.

Mattie: "I want you to know I don't stand on trifles." Helen (glancing at her feet): "No, dear, I see you don't."

He Couldn't Do It.

She: "I don't understand you quite." He: "Well, I can't supply you with intelligence." She: "No; you have none to spare."

He Took the Hint.

He: "May I kiss your hand?" She: "Certainly. But if you had intimated that you preferred hands I would not have removed my veil."

Jack Liked Laps.

Jack: "Madge, I think you would make an excellent pedestrian." Madge: "Why, Jack?" Jack: "Because you can cover so many laps in so short a time."

Not Very Complimentary.

He: "What lovely flowers. Do you know, they remind me of you?" She: "They are artificial flowers." He: "Yes, I know; but it requires close examination to detect it."

Laughter Turned to Tears.

"Did you ever laugh until you cried, Tommy? "Yes, only this morning." "What at?" "Well, pa stepped on a tack and I laughed; then pa caught me laughing and I cried."

Taking Him Down.

Jack (fond of putting it on a bit): "I dined at my friend, the Duchess of Pudboro's, last week, and, would you believe it, we had no fish." Nellie: "Ah, well, I suppose they ate it all upstairs."

An Early Rise Guaranteed.

Applicant: "Of course I don't ask for a partnership yet, but give me a position in which I will be sure of an early rise." Employer: "All right; I'll make you caretaker of the building. You will open the doors at 4 a.m."

Better Value for Money.

Mr. Newrich (to artist): "I think, on the whole, I won't take the picture. I prefer spending my cash in statues rather than in pictures; because you see more than one side of a statue, and get your money's worth better."

The Old Lady Didn't Approve.

A Scottish preacher once said: "But, my brethren, I will not dwell longer on this subject," only to hear a shrill voice from the gallery, from a woman who did not approve of written sermons: "Ye canna, for your paper's rin out."

Used for the Proper Purpose.

Mrs. Billus (after the company had gone): "Johnny, you shouldn't have eaten those preserved fruits. They are not intended to be eaten. They were put on the table to fill up." Johnny Billus: "Well, that's what I used 'em for, mamma."

Very Particular.

"Your friend, Miss Blank, seems a very strict teetotaler," said a man, commenting on a girl who had refused to eat plum-pudding with brandy sauce. "Strict doesn't express it," replied the girl's friend. "Why, don't you know she's so particular she won't heat her curling-tongs over a spirit lamp."

He was Too Flippant.

Mr. Lawhead: "Why do you treat me so coldly? Why didn't you answer the note I wrote you last Thursday?" Miss Brushley: "Sir, I don't wish to have anything more to say to you. You began your note by saying you 'thought you would drop me a line.' I want you to understand that I'm not a fish."

Couldn't Say the Right Thing.

"It's no use!" exclaimed Willie Wishington, "I never can learn to say the right thing at the right time. I told Miss Slimmins that her eyes shone on me like the stars above." "That's old, but pretty," answered Miss Cayenne. "Yes. But she is one of those remarkably tall girls who resent any references to their height."

Only Wanted the Hand.

Old Crusty: "You ask for my daughter? Why, young man, at your present salary you couldn't even dress her." Suitor: "Oh, yes, sir! I could keep her in gloves." Old Crusty: "Gloves! Do you mean to insinuate that my daughter would wear only gloves?" Suitor: "Pardon me, sir; I only asked for her hand."

Glad She Refused Him.

"Clara—Miss Simpkins," he murmured, as he reached for his hat after her disinclination, "when you think of a little road where we used to wander in the happy month of July, beneath the branches of the green trees, I pray you think of me. For I am like that little road—a lover slain;" and so he passed out of sight. And then she was glad she had answered him no.

Gave it to the Calves.

He was a cyclist, and called at a farmhouse for a glass of water, but the farmer's pretty daughter offered him a glass of milk instead. "Won't you have another glass?" she asked, as he drained the tumbler. "You are very good," he said, "but I am afraid I shall rob you." "Oh, no! We have so much more than we can use ourselves that we always give it to the calves."

It Couldn't be Becoming.

Mrs. Fashionplate: "Now, John, I want you to leave this bonnet at the milliner's, and tell her that it is not at all becoming to me, and I don't want it." Mr. Fashionplate: "Why, I thought I heard Mrs. Gadabout tell you yesterday that you looked charming in it?" Mrs. Fashionplate: "Yes, that's the reason I'm returning it. I'm sure now it must be a perfect fright."

A Tongue-Twister.

"George!" she screamed, "my neck!" "What's the matter?" "There's a pillacatter——" "A what?" "A taperkiller——" "What in the world do you mean?" "Oh, dear!" she moaned, as she clutched him frantically, "A kitterpaller! You know, George! A patterkiller!" "Oh!" said George, with evident relief, and he proceeded to brush the caterpillar away.

Healthy for the Brother.

"Wilfred is a perfect dear," cried a gushing young lady to a cynical friend. "He's going to learn to smoke straight away, just to please me." "How clever of you to persuade him," sneered the cynical friend. "A fiancé who doesn't smoke, I suppose, is too effeminate to be worth having?" "You mistake my motive, dear. You see Wilfred has a birthday once a year." "You don't say so!" "And he has the masculine weakness for receiving presents on that auspicious occasion." "Yes?" "And my good, kind-hearted, generous brother Jack has just opened a tobacco shop!"

Digitized by Google

Splendid Serial Story.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

THIRTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.

His Crown of Sorrow.

"Miss Lodge, tell me! Why am I kept here; and why do you walk so softly about the room? I have been wondering for a long time what that shadow was that passed and repassed before my eyes, like a memory of long ago."

"Dear Mr. Vivyan, please don't excite yourself! The doctor told me to keep you very quiet, and not to let you talk," said the low, gentle voice of the girl who was known in the "Retreat" as Mr. Vivyan's secretary, but who for a week had also been his devoted nurse.

The man moved his head restlessly upon his pillows. It was the first time since he had left the "Retreat" that night to meet the unknown friend who was to have given him the tokens of his dead wife and child, that he had opened his eyes; and, as he gazed languidly round the room at the familiar landmarks, he wondered whether, after all, he had not been dreaming that he had lain a long time in a place where he had listened to the rush and roar of many waters! Perhaps they had been the waves of the waters of death that had lapped his brow with cold, damp fingers.

He beckoned the girl to him—the girl with the face and voice of one who rose before him ever as a ghost from the past, that cruel past that had closed the doors of joy on him for ever!

"Tell me, child," he said. "I have forgotten something. I went out—but how did I return?"

Ivy bent over him with a troubled face. She knew that he ought not to talk, yet she hardly liked to refuse to answer his question, for to do so might bring on the fever again, and she dreaded those long hours again, listening to the incoherent ramblings of a man in delirium—a man who seemed to have suffered in some strange way, almost more than she had herself.

"I will answer you just that one question," she replied gently; "then will leave you unless you try to go to sleep."

He nodded. "Just this one question, 'Nurse Lodge,'" he said, with a faint smile; "then I will be good."

"Well," she murmured softly; "you were brought back to the 'Retreat' the next evening. I had been, oh, so fearfully anxious about you, and Mrs. Riley also; we sat up all night. The men who came with you in a cab said they had rescued you from drowning. They picked you up off—Rotherhithe—I think was the name of the place.

"You had been struck on the head and were unconscious when they took you from the cold river on to their barge. Then"—she started, as a sudden gleam of memory flickered into the eyes of the man on the bed. "Then they looked in your coat, and found a card with your name on it, in an inner pocket; so they brought you back to the 'Retreat' ill, unconscious, but safe!" and her eyes welled with a flood of tears.

"Ah!" he breathed deeply; "was it Providence, I wonder, that intervened for me? An unusual courtesy on my behalf! I begin to think that I must be changing the luck that has been so long against me!" He started up in bed and seized her arm. "Miss Lodge! they deceived me. I remember now; I went to get the photo they promised me of my wife—my dear Margaret. It was a lie—a foul plot to get rid of me; but I don't know who it was."

"But you will know when you are better," she murmured soothingly; "for then you will be able to trace your enemies, or whoever it was who threw you into the river."

He looked at her dully. "Tell me, when shall I be out of this bed? My work keeps calling me, and I shall go mad if I am kept here much longer. There is so much to do—so little time to do it in!"

Her hand touched the burning one of the man on the bed. Her tender, sympathetic heart had gone out to the weary, tempest-tossed soul who had depended upon her nursing to bring him back to life.

"In a few days now," she murmured softly, "you will be able to move about the house; then into the garden for a short stroll; and, lastly, into our workroom! But you must not worry or think too much about these cowardly ruffians who flung you into the river! They will be punished soon enough!"

His fingers closed on hers for a second, and the keen desire for revenge that had seized him passed out of his eyes.

"I am afraid I am a bad patient," he said with a faint smile; "but you will forgive me, Miss Lodge, when I tell you that I have a mission to accomplish before I die; and I am fearful that I may go without fulfilling it!"

Her eyes filled with a sudden mist. "Don't talk about dying, dear Mr. Vivyan! It hurts me to hear you speak so sadly! Leave your mission to a higher vengeance than you can bestow, and just think of nothing but getting better! Remember, I want you, too!"

"You want me, too?" he murmured dreamily. "How lovely it is to hear those words, Miss Lodge! It is many years since anyone wanted me! Many years!"

"Indeed, I need you very much," she replied softly. "For I should be homeless and penniless should you not require me at the dear old 'Retreat'! So get better, for my sake!"

"For your sake," he murmured; "yes, Miss Lodge, I will get better, and we will finish 'Canker' together! Then, perhaps, we will go abroad for a change!"

She held a cup of beef tea to his lips, and after seeing him fall into a natural slumber, left the room.

Outside, Mrs. Riley, the kind, motherly housekeeper, met her, and took her into the breakfast-room where lunch was laid.

"Now you must eat, my dear," said the motherly old woman, "or what will the master do if his nurse falls ill? And you are growing thinner every day. There'll be nothing left of you soon but a shadow!"

The girl smiled, wearily. "A very substantial shadow, Mrs. Riley! In fact, I never felt stronger."

The woman smiled. "Anyway, I'm not going to let you go wearing yourself out, Miss Lodge. It isn't fair that you should do all the hard work; and that's why I'm particularly glad that a friend of mine—a trained nurse—is coming to see me, and will be able to let you have a rest sometimes. She has just left her case up in the country."

Ivy smiled silently. She was glad that there would be a woman of experience on the spot, for she felt that her knowledge was inadequate to compete with Mr. Vivyan's nervous temperament when he was convalescent. He required someone stronger of will than herself and less interested. Once during lunch she crept inside the room where the patient lay and caught him sitting up in bed.

"I only want to read, or look at pictures," he said, in answer to her protestation; "I can't sleep; and turning over the leaves of something may keep me from thinking."

Digitized by Google

Putting some periodicals on a table beside him, she gazed at him wistfully.

"Don't look too long, then. You will grow very weary, and your brains will, perhaps, be too much excited to sleep. Promise me, dear Mr. Vivyan, that you will stop when you feel tired!"

He smiled at her pale, flower-like face and soft, earnest eyes.

"You seem almost concerned about me, dear little girl!" he murmured. "It is long, long years since I heard a woman's voice so tenderly pleading! I am provoked to be disobedient, just to hear you scold me again. But run away now," he went on kindly; "you need a rest more than I; you should have a trained nurse to help you."

"Mrs. Riley has a friend who has been a nurse coming to see her to-day," she replied; "so I shall have the benefit of her knowledge. But I have been so glad to have been of some use to you," she went on softly. "You came into my life when it was at a very low ebb, and saved me from something worse than death!"

Before he could question her she had slipped from the room, and Vernon Vivyan turned over the leaves of the books with thoughtful eyes. Presently he tired of the sameness of the magazines, with their highly-coloured pictures, and gazed round the room in search of something else. On a table near the side of the bed there was a little leather case, with the word "Photographs" written across it in gold letters.

"I suppose that belongs to my little secretary and nurse!" he mused thoughtfully; "a photo. of her sweetheart, and the dead mother, and all the usual links that a fair, beautiful creature like that should possess, though she appears to be strangely lonely now. A lover's quarrel, perhaps," he sighed. "God grant it may only be a quarrel!"

He looked at the case again. It fascinated him peculiarly, and he felt a longing to see the face of the boy who had won the love of the girl who reminded him so poignantly of the past.

He stretched out his hand to the table, and drew the book towards him.

Innocent Ivy! She had not acquired the cunning of the criminal, and burnt or done away with the photographs that would most assuredly have betrayed her had they been seen by anyone from Melton. She had not been able to resist bringing her few prized treasures with her—the faces of those who had become so closely knit by links of memory, both dear and painful.

One by one the man in the bed gazed at them, smiling at the frank, boyish face of Jack Maitland that flashed with a gleam of youth into his own from the cardboard. He knew that it was the sweetheart of the girl who had nursed him so devotedly back to life; and, gazing with interest upon the spoilt, petulant child, Woolf, standing with his hand on the collar of a Great Dane; the roguish, laughing face of Muriel warmed his heart with a glow of youth.

"I wonder who they are?" he murmured. "Brothers and sisters, I suppose; with the exception of the photo. that has the inscription, 'Yours ever, Jack,' on it. He is no brother! Ah!"—turning over another—"this is the dead father. Looks like an old squire; and this"—taking up the last in the case with idle fingers—"this, of course, is the once mother of the family."

He looked at the photo. indifferently at first; he was beginning to feel sleepy; but, as his eyes fell upon the radiant, audacious beauty of the woman who gazed up at him with a laugh lurking in the depths of her great eyes, and a mocking smile of bewildering charm on her parted lips, the ex-convict and famous author uttered a low cry of fear and startled wonder.

"No, no!" he said aloud, speaking in a low, tense voice; "this woman is rich, the jewels on her neck, hair, and arms prove that! She can have nothing to do with the ghost of my poor lost Margaret. Yet it is the image of her, or what she would have been had Fate allowed her to grow into mature womanhood! He told me she was dead," he went on with increasing excitement, and sitting straight up in the bed; "he said she had died—with the child!"

A curious expression stole into his burning eyes, a bright hectic spot flamed on either cheek, as a thought sprang forward to sicken and horrify him in sheer terror of a worse calamity than death having befallen the one star in the blackness of his firmament.

"I believed him!" he laughed bitterly; "I took what the liar and perjurer flung at me in mockery as gospel truth! How do I know that he spoke the truth? How do I know that Fate has not dealt more cruelly by her in letting her believe me dead? My Margaret! My Pearl of great price, if this picture is not that of a double, then God help us both! It were better that I had indeed perished at the hands of my enemies than you should learn the awful truth!"

He scanned the photo. again, and something in the laughing, joyous face told him that here was no woman living in durance vile, whose heart was buried in the grave of a dead child, but a woman who took all that life had to offer, with open hands, and gave little in return.

"She looks happy!" he muttered. "If memory lingers behind that smooth, low brow, it does so callously. She is radiant and contented; time has only touched her to enhance her beauty; while I——" he struck the photo. with a sudden rage—"while I have had the burden of a life's wrong to whiten my hair and sear my face!"

He hastily put the photos into the case, then fell back upon the pillows with a harsh laugh.

"I will know the worst! And when I know—when my doubts are convinced of the truth—I will get back a little of what that black-hearted villain has dealt me! Our score will be a heavy one to settle!"

He laughed again, and flung his arms above his head in a paroxysm of helpless rage.

"Oh, God! grant that she is dead! Better to mourn her dead than revile her living!"

THIRTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.

Father and Daughter.

Immediately after lunch Ivy went to her room for a few seconds before returning to her charge. She had listened at the door of the sick room on her way upstairs, and as everything was still quiet, had breathed a sigh of relief and passed on.

Since that night when her hands had suddenly been so full with the master of the house, she had not been able to dwell much upon the events of the past. She had insisted on keeping within the "Retreat" in spite of Mrs. Riley's attempts to make her go for a walk.

As each day dawned and set, she knew that for one day more she was safe from those who were searching for the runaway from Melton—the girl whom they imagined had been concerned in the death of a man! If they only knew the relationship between herself and the tramp in the spinny they would not have suspected her of such a cruel deed!

But now she felt that she had successfully evaded all those that searched for her, even to her arch-enemy, Digby Scarlett, whom she had feared even more than the police!

She sighed wearily as she compared her present secret existence with that of the year before. Then, she had been happy in the love of the man for whom she had cared above all others; and now, a hunted, desperate creature, she had only the memory of a past happiness to console her for the loss of her lover and her peace of mind. She wondered what was happening at Maitland Manor, and whether her ladyship ever gave her a thought, now that she was gone.

She roused herself with a sigh, and shook off the memories of the past, as she rose from the chair into which she had flung herself, and brushed her ruffled hair before the glass. At least there was one person to whom she was of some use; one human soul who was as lonely as herself!

As she stood before the window, a cab drew up at the gate of the "Retreat," and she looked curiously to see the friend of whom Mrs. Riley had spoken earlier in the day.

A dark, insignificant-looking woman stepped from the cab, but she was wrapped in shawls, and the gloom of the late afternoon concealed her face from the wistful eyes of the girl gazing through the window. Later, when she slipped from her room, she met Mrs. Riley on the stairs.

Digitized by Google

"Now, my dear," that kindly woman said, "I am going into the master, to sit with him while you talk to my friend the trained nurse. I have told her all about you, Miss—if you will excuse the liberty—and she is only too glad to be of any use to you that she can. If you will go into my sitting-room you will find her there, Miss, having a cup of tea. I will give master the beef tea and all, until you, or my friend, come upstairs."

Ivy, smiling slightly, passed on, glad that the nurse had taken over the responsibility of her highly-strung charge, and yet regretting a little the loss of her supremacy in the sick room.

As she turned the handle of the door, a woman rose from a chair with its back to the light, and she could only distinguish the faint outline of a black bonnet and draped figure.

"Mrs. Riley told me you would assist me in nursing Mr. Vivyan," Ivy began courteously. "I shall be very glad of your experience, Mrs.—" She paused politely, waiting for the silent woman to speak.

Slowly and deliberately the nurse moved forward, gazing with wide, terror-stricken eyes at the white, fragile face of Mr. Vivyan's secretary.

"Don't you know me, Miss?" she whispered cautiously.

Ivy took a step back, her suspicions aroused by the woman's agitation, and a strange feeling that she had heard that voice somewhere else, making her dread discovery at the eleventh hour!

"Who—who are you?" she answered, with trembling lips. "I don't remember you. My name is Lodge!"

She flung her head back defiantly, and waited for the stranger to speak.

The nurse put her hands out intreatingly, and the words that fell from her lips were like unto a cry of pain.

"Miss! Miss! Don't deny who you are! I know your secret better than you do yourself. You are the runaway wanted by the police, and the daughter of——"

"Stop!" The girl's desperate, hunted eyes flashed into those of the woman who had torn her disguise from her. "I remember you! You are nurse Beaumont—his nurse! You won't betray me, will you? I admit that I am Ivy Strange, but no more. I did not commit that—that crime! Let me stay here in peace; I am doing no harm, no wrong; only trying to be of some use in the world, now that he is dead!"—and her voice broke into a storm of tears, as she clutched the cloak of the nurse to whom she prayed for mercy.

"Hush, dearie! Hush!" said the older woman, tenderly, her own eyes welling with sympathy, as her fingers caught those of the girl; "I'd sooner die than let them know where you are; and I don't believe for one moment that you did it, in spite of your running away so strange, Miss," then, correcting herself, she added, tentatively: "I should say ma'am now, I suppose?"

Ivy looked up in surprise. "Why, ma'am?" she said, puzzled.

The woman glanced at the third finger of her left hand. It was ringless, and she uttered an exclamation of relief.

"I was afraid, dearie," she answered, "that you had been led into marrying that—that Mr. Scarlett. And if you had done so"—she shivered—"you would have regretted it all the days of your life!"

Ivy glanced at her in astonishment. "You know that he met me, and tried to make me promise to marry him?" she said slowly. "I—I—nearly did so, when he told me that my darling Jack was dead!" And her lip quivered painfully.

"What did you say, Miss?" Nurse Beaumont grasped her quickly. "Did that villain tell you such a cruel lie as that? Why, Mr. Maitland is alive, and, what's more, he's going to help you, and fight for you! The first thing he called for was 'Ivy,' as soon as he grew better!"

"Jack alive!" Ivy cried—the great spirit of hope once more springing into her heart—"then I'm willing to face anything so long as he believes in me!"

She buried her face in her hands, and for a moment the tears of the woman and the girl mingled.

Suddenly Ivy rose; her face had clouded, and her eyes had again become troubled.

"I forgot, nurse," she said slowly. "Though I am thankful and rejoice in his not being dead, there is a barrier between him and myself that is even greater than death. It can never be bridged over but must always stand between us!"

Nurse Beaumont looked at her strangely. "A barrier stronger than death, child! Why, you have nothing to be ashamed of, I'll swear!" She stopped abruptly, and, leaning forward, said impressively: "Has the barrier anything to do with—a broad arrow?"

The effect of her words was not unexpected. The girl flushed deeply, and, recoiling from her questioner, said hoarsely: "What do you mean? What do you know?"

Nurse Beaumont hesitated, then answered quickly: "I will tell you another time, miss. Only bear up, and try to forget that broad arrow. The dead should be forgiven their sins!"

"Forgiven!" said the girl bitterly. "I forgive the dead freely, but—but I cannot forget that he had no mercy on me when alive!"

The woman was about to answer her when the door opened, and Mrs. Riley came in. She looked worried and pale.

"Is Mr. Vivyan asleep?" Ivy said quickly; her truant thoughts flying back to the kind man whose house had been a refuge to her in her hour of need.

"No," the housekeeper answered slowly; "I can't make it out at all. He was doing so nicely this morning, and now the fever seems to be returning, and he's muttering and going on something awful! I shall be glad when the doctor comes again."

Nurse Beaumont hastily removed her cloak and bonnet.

"I'll go up and attend to him," she said calmly. "It is better for as few people as possible to be in a sick room; and if I want anything, Miss—Miss Lodge," she said quickly, "I will ask you to help me."

She went into the room where the master of the "Retreat" lay, with his eyes turned to the ceiling, and the long, nervous hands plucking at the bedclothes. Approaching softly, she leant over him and gazed with a long, intent look into his face. Something—the contour of the finely-chiselled features, and the fixed intensity of the dark eyes—reminded her vaguely of a man whose face she had remembered after long years.

"What a silly I am!" she murmured, "to let that man haunt me, now, when the poor chap's been dead this many a year!"

She turned softly from his bed, when suddenly the man lying there, spoke. "Is that you, Margaret! My little Margaret? How I love you; and now you are dead, dear one, and I have no time to tell you that I was innocent! The charge was false—false as the blackguard who invented it!

"Margaret! I dreamt last night that you had married again! It is not true, my love? Tell me that during all the years I have languished you have not spent them with another! Do you hear? Margaret! Speak!"

He raised himself in the bed with an effort, and stared before him with unseeing eyes.

Nurse Beaumont was seized with one of those flashes of inspiration that come but rarely into a life's experience.

"She will be here soon, sir!" she whispered soothingly, while her breath fluttered to her lips in unequal pants; "don't fret—Mr. Grant—she is not far off now!"

He moved his head restlessly. "Grant! Grant! It is a long time since I heard that name with the prefix! Not since the day they took me away from you, Margaret!" He sat up stiffly in the bed, and clinging to the counterpane as though gripping the rail of the dock, said loudly and in a clear, ringing voice:

"Not guilty, my lord! Not—guilty!" Then his voice broke into a wail that made the blood of the listening woman run cold in her veins.

"You haven't come yet, Margaret! Be quick, dear one, and we'll go together—together"—he laughed softly—"and they tell me there was a baby, Margaret! Bring it with you, too—our baby!"

Digitized by Google

Hot, blinding tears ran down the face of the woman who saw for a second time the tragedy of a life enacted by the unconscious victim whom she had long since counted among the dead!

What was the end to be now? Nurse Beaumont thought, with a shiver. How was the secret to be kept?

A noise at the door disturbed her, and at the same time roused the patient from his momentary lethargy.

"Can I help you?" Ivy asked, softly, coming forward into the light.

Vernon Vivyan laughed harshly. "So you have come back at last, Margaret! You have not changed since the day we married! Come here; I want to look at you! To see the woman who deserted me in my extremity! Come here!"

She went forward quickly; his delirious words raising no resentment in her tender heart, only a great pity for the strong man in his weakness.

"Yes," she said gently, touching one hot hand with her own cool one; "I have come at last!"

He clutched her hand savagely in his; Nurse Beaumont, watching with suspended breath the faces of the man and girl, each, though neither knew it, knit by ties of blood!

"So you have left him!" he went on. "He has sent you to laugh over my downfall, perhaps, to tell him what I suffer!"

"Ask him whom he means, Miss," whispered the nurse in her ear; and, obeying blindly, Ivy said softly:

"Whom is it you think I have left?"

"My enemy!" went on the thick voice of the unconscious man; "the man who crushed me!"

"His name—ask the name, Miss," panted the woman by her side; and, wonderingly the girl murmured:

"Won't you tell me the name of this enemy?"

"Yes—yes—his name!" he muttered wildly. "It is written across my heart in blood! His name is Digby Scarlett!"

Ivy sprang back with a cry of horror. "Digby Scarlett!" she exclaimed; "he wronged you too!"

"Ah!" he said exultingly; "so you remember him, do you? The man you forgot me for! But now I will wipe out one at least of my wrongs!"

He snatched suddenly at her throat, and drew her down to him, his hand tightening round it like a fine cord.

As one roused from a dreadful nightmare, Nurse Beaumont sprang forward and caught his arm.

"Sir! sir!" she panted, drawing the half-unconscious girl towards her; "for the love of Heaven, stop! You are killing your own daughter!"

THIRTY-NINTH CHAPTER.
A Duel of Wits.

"It is only a question of days! He may live longer, but if he does, it will only be to end his life in a madhouse!"

The doctor had spoken plainly, almost brutally, to the beautiful woman who questioned him, standing with a white face and great violet eyes, waiting to hear the verdict the consultation had brought forth.

"A question of days?" she murmured with a shiver. "You mean he may die?"

Dr. Grey shrugged his shoulders. It had struck him that this perfect type of woman had not been sufficiently upset at the sudden collapse of his old friend, Sir Trevor Maitland, and he resented as a personal affront the calm, ice-like manner she had of repeating his words.

"Yes, Lady Maitland," he said brusquely, "I mean what I say; Sir Trevor has had a shock that has struck at the very root of his being. This paralysis is only the beginning of the end."

When the doctor had left and the nurse was in possession of the sick room, Lady Maitland went to her boudoir—the room where the tragedy of her life had taken place.

But it was not of those things that she was thinking now.

Of the man upstairs she only thought once, and that was that it was his awkward entrance into the room that had flung

(Continued overleaf.)

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS
THE FAMOUS HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

THE PILLS

have gained their wonderful reputation by sheer force of merit, because every person who uses them recommends them to others. They have positively no equal for thoroughly cleansing the system and putting the liver and kidneys in functional order, without pain or griping. They are the best known remedy for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, and the common condition of ill-health, known as "run-down" or "out of sorts." Females of every age find Holloway's Pills an invaluable remedy and aid.

THE OINTMENT

is known throughout the world as positively the best and quickest remedy for Bad Legs, Old Wounds and Sores, and Skin Eruptions of every kind, and should be used in conjunction with the Pills. It is also the speediest remedy for Rheumatism, Lumbago, Pains and Stiffness in the Limbs and Joints, Backache, &c. For pains and Soreness at the Chest, and for Throat and Lung Complaints arising from Cold or Weakness, Holloway's Ointment affords most welcome relief in a very short time.

A COMPLETE DISPENSARY IN THEMSELVES.

AND OINTMENT

Digitized by Google

her into her present unenviable position. She had never loved Sir Trevor, but he had always been kind to her, and, above everything, he was the father of her boy, Woolf. She feared that he might die before she knew precisely the wording of the will, and the position of the child she loved.

Of the contempt and loathing Heriot North must have felt for her at the exposure of her double lying to him, by Digby Scarlett, she cared but little. All was swamped in the one desire to known how her boy stood in his father's will—the boy for whose sake she had jeopardised her future!

"If I could find out!" she murmured. "He might perhaps imply in some way that Woolf had been properly provided for. His other children are already in possession of their mother's money; but I will not stand by and see my boy neglected."

She opened the window and let the room fill with the soft, mild air. Suddenly, a low murmur of voices reached her, and the words fell on her ear before she realised their import:

"Yes," said the voice of Agnes Maitland; "the strange illness of my father had sent every other thought out of my mind, and I quite forgot to write and ask you to postpone your visit. But since you are here, and have come all this way, you will stay to lunch, and meet my step-mother? She is almost as anxious to meet you as you were to meet her!"

"It's very good of you, Miss Maitland," said a masculine voice; "I ought really to have notified when I was coming, but I took your invitation to be a general one, and postponed coming up until I remembered that I had work in London that needed my attention almost immediately, so I left Brighton, where I had been with a friend for some days, and came straight on here."

They moved on, and the woman in the room turned away with a set mouth and cold eyes. She was glad she had overheard the conversation. It had served as a preventive to surprise. And at lunch she would be prepared to meet her guest, Ernest Heath, outwardly calm, at least.

As her maid assisted her into a black, clinging robe, a whimsical fancy seized her to slightly powder her hair, and brush it in straight lines back from her forehead, giving her a wearied, almost middle-aged appearance that completely changed her from the brilliant, radiant woman of a few days ago.

On the stairs she met Woolf, looking excited and frightened.

"Oh, mummie!" he cried, clinging to her, "what do you think? 'The Hollies' has been burnt to the ground, and they say that poor Mr. North has been burnt too!"

Lady Maitland caught her breath with a sudden gasp!

"Let us hope it is not so bad as that, dear," she said soothingly. "Now you must be quiet and come down to lunch with me!"

When she and her son entered the dining-room, the man standing by the fireplace with Agnes Maitland, saw a tall, grave-looking woman with severely-dressed hair slightly grey, and a motherly smile on her face as she brought forward her boy.

"How do you do, Mr. Heath?" she said calmly, holding her hand out to the middle-aged, kindly-looking man who eyed her with scarcely concealed astonishment in his humorous blue eyes; "I have heard so much about you from Agnes, that I seem to know you already!"

"Is my step-mother at all like your cousin, Margaret Heath?" said Agnes sharply.

She saw the change in her father's wife, and knew that she had done it purposely. But how could she have guessed that Mr. Heath was coming to-day?

"No! Lady Maitland is not like my cousin, or even the photo. you showed me," he replied with emphasis.

Lady Maitland laughed. "I fear I always disappoint people who expect to find me like my photograph. I am really such a placid, ordinary person."

"I should hardly say that!" he replied courteously. "But I did see in London a girl the living image of my cousin."

"How strange!" said Agnes, watching her step-mother's flush, and the sparkle of satisfaction in her eyes.

"Yes," he continued, "she is secretary to the author, Vernon Vivyan, a great friend of mine. Her name is Ivy Lodge."

"How odd!" exclaimed Agnes, while her step-mother bit her lip with a sudden spasm. "Ivy is the name of the missing girl who is wanted by the police—Ivy Strange! What is she like?"

"Slim, with a perfect oval face," said Ernest Heath slowly; "large sad violet eyes; an aquiline nose; a beautiful brow, with a mass of copper-coloured hair growing low on it, and a red, tender mouth."

"That must be the same girl!" cried Agnes in delight. "Now she will be in the hands of the police very soon!"

"I hope not," murmured Heath.

"Excuse me, sir," said a stern, official voice in the open doorway; "I must ask you for the address of that young lady!"

"What do you mean?" exclaimed Ernest Heath hotly, as they sprang to their feet, Lady Maitland only remaining seated, with a white face.

"We have the warrant for her arrest, sir," replied Gilbert Chase, respectfully; "you are compelled to give it in the name of the law!"

"Don't!" breathed a low, intense voice at his elbow; and the guest saw her ladyship rise with quiet dignity, as she said to the detective:

"Mr. Chase, this is not a fit occasion for an argument of this nature to take place. If you go to the library, Mr. Heath will follow you with me, and there supply you with the address of the girl you think the missing Ivy Strange."

The detective bowed coldly. An unaccountable aversion had crept over him towards her ladyship.

He went to the library, and immediately the dining-room was emptied of its curious crowd, Lady Maitland turned to the man at her side.

"Mr. Heath! For my sake—for the sake of my poor husband! Go now, without giving the detective the address of that—girl! There is a train leaving Melton in ten minutes for London. The carriage is at the door for me, you take it and drive to the station."

"Why do you ask me? And if I go, what excuse will you make?"

She smiled. "I ask you in the name of mercy to leave! I will know how to deal with the detective!"

A few moments later, Gilbert Chase, pacing the library impatiently, saw the neat closed brougham going at a smart rate down the drive. "The doctor, I suppose," he muttered Then the handle of the door turned, and he raised his eyes expectantly. "Now to get that address and snare my bird!"

Lady Maitland smiled apologetically as she came forward. "So sorry, Mr. Chase, but Mr. Heath was obliged to go without seeing you!"

An ugly look crossed the detective's face as he realised how the beautiful woman facing him had, for her own purposes, outwitted him.

"Gone!" he said slowly. "It occurs to me, madam, that you sent him away because you were afraid! But I heard the name of the author, Mr. Vivyan, so only a little time is lost!"

She turned to go, but the detective with a swift gesture, put his hand on the door.

"One word, your ladyship," he said coolly; "I want to ask you a few questions."

She drew herself up haughtily. "You forget yourself, my man! You heard all I could tell you long ago. Let me pass!"

He smiled. "I am afraid it is another subject, your ladyship. Do you remember a photograph about eighteen years ago being left at a Mrs. Phillpot's, in Ennismore Gardens, London, by a Mrs. Margaret Grant, the wife of the convicted felon, Vernon Grant?"

Watching her keenly, he saw her eyes dilate suddenly, while her short upper lip quivered. She opened her mouth to speak, but a momentary dryness of her throat tied her tongue. Then, above the beating of her heart, the triumphant voice of Agnes Maitland rang out clearly:

"Ask her to explain the existence of the paper informing her that 'V.G. died a year after his release!'"

(To be concluded shortly.)

Digitized by Google

TO AVOID INDIGESTION.

That distressed feeling is simply a poorly-working stomach—it needs a little help—but no matter how bad it may be, a dose of will speedily give relief. Take Beecham's Pills for a few days, and the trouble will disappear.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

THE DAILY EXPRESS. HALF-PENNY.

Beauty.

Icilma Fluor Cream is unrivalled for the Complexion and the Hands. Redness, roughness, sunburn, disappear immediately, and the blue veins show clear in a transparent rose-white skin. Deliciously scented. Price 1/-. Send 2d. for two sample tubes (different scents). ICILMA (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

HAVE YOU SEEN IT?

The Magazine with the Japanese Cover.

IT'S THE BRIGHTEST AND BEST OF THE LADIES' MAGAZINES.

. . IT IS THE . .

Lady's Magazine

August Issue Now on Sale.

SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Agreed to Differ.

"I have been very intimate with a young man for two years," writes "S. E.," "but we have lately quarrelled. We decided that each of us got on better with somebody else. Accordingly he has taken up with another girl, I with another man. Now in my heart of hearts, I miss him very much, and am quite sure I really love him better than the other. I believe, too, that he feels the same. But how are we to explain matters to our new lovers?"

* * * * *

By all means go back to each other, if you feel as you say. Be quite candid about it to your new lovers. Any deception will be fatal to all parties.

Outside or Inside a 'Bus?

"Edie" travels by omnibus a great deal. The other day she learnt that there was only one remaining seat outside, and a gentleman had boarded the 'bus directly after her. Should she take the seat or surrender it to him?

* * * * *

I think it would be graceful for you to allow the man to take the outside seat, and go inside yourself. It would be a return courtesy for that he would show you were it a wet day and you struggling against him for the seat inside. Besides, it is not really warmer inside a 'bus than outside in summer, from a girl's point of view. The scorching sun is far worse for the complexion and general comfort in town than the stuffiness of the inside. I believe that a girl should get as much open air and sun as possible, but not by clambering in front of men on to the tops of omnibuses.

Tracking a Vanished Lover.

"Helen" writes: "A few months ago I was suddenly taken ill, and had to be removed for change of air. While away a friend called to see me and my mother told him she could not give my new address as I was to be kept quiet. Since I have returned I have made inquiries and find that my visitor—of whom I am really very fond—has opened a business as a dairyman, I believe somewhere in the Blackfriars district. Now I want to find him, but how am I do so? At present I have no clue."

* * * * *

Well, "Helen," if he is fond of you, he will no doubt take another opportunity of finding you. Do you not know his late address, from which you could get his present whereabouts? As he has only just moved, the directory would not give his address, but I think you might find out by inquiries at the district post office, which would have been notified of the new arrival. As a new tradesman, he would be more easily found than a private residence. No doubt in a week or two you will be able to trace him. If not, as a last resort, try the personal columns of one of the dailies.

Speaking of "The Wife."

"In speaking of my wife," writes "V. B." "to strangers or guests, how should I designate her—Mrs. Dash, or by her Christian name?"

* * * * *

To strangers or guests you do not know very well, certainly use your surname and "Mrs." To people with whom you are very intimate, you could use the Christian name.

Accepting Theatre Invitations.

"Is it right for a girl to go to the theatre with a man to whom she is not engaged?" asks "G. S." "I am constantly being invited to do so by certain young men, but have always refused so far."

* * * * *

These things are decided largely by the parties themselves. If a girl is used to going about, and is able to meet men without compromising herself with neighbours and kind friends, she can accept a theatre invitation without fear. A great many girls in London Society go out unchaperoned nowadays; that is to say, girls who are not very young.

* * * * *

However, if a girl lives in a very quiet place, and is not in the habit of going to places of amusement, and has neighbours and friends likely to be shocked by such things, she might best consult her interests by refusing invitations unless accompanied by a parent or relation.

Reading a Love Letter.

"Flora's" lover was staying at her home recently, and in putting his room straight, "Flora" picked up a letter addressed to him, and signed "yours always." She could not help reading it, and discovered that it was from another girl, and quite recently written. Was she wrong to read it, and if so, how can she act?

* * * * *

It was, of course, wrong to read it, but I am afraid not one girl in a hundred would have done other than you have. I should hand it back to him, and warn him against leaving letters about which might be read by others. You need not say you have read it, but leave it to him to offer any explanations. His future actions will show you whether you are to continue trusting him, or whether he is deceiving you. For all you know, the letter may be written in a strain which is distasteful to him. That is for him to explain. Above all, don't be too suspicious.

The First Wedding Ring Question.

"A Reader" is kind enough to give his opinion on the question of disposing of the first wedding-ring, dealt with by me recently. "I am in a similar position to 'One in Doubt,'" he says; "my wife wears an engagement ring given her by her first lover, who died suddenly, and could not redeem his pledge. Though I am only too glad to have taken his place, I do not object to this.

* * * * *

"I think your correspondent who is about to be married for the second time, and does not know how to dispose of her first wedding-ring, should lay the matter before her fiancé. If he really loves her, he would not insist on anything which would hurt her feelings. If she loved her dead husband then she ought to keep this memory of him. However, she might have a small stone inserted in the ring, which would change the nature of the article to the outside world. If, of course, she did not think pleasantly of her late husband, the ring could be removed."

Cynthia.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

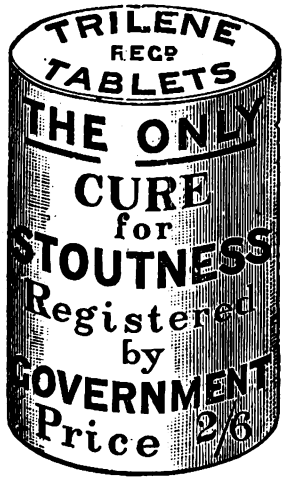
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION
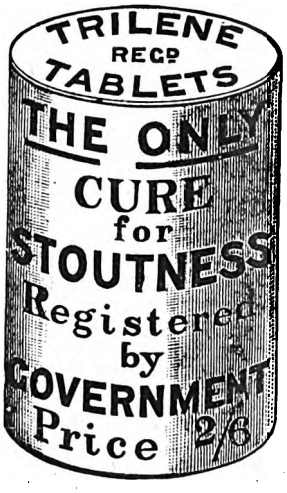
66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

MRS. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

MISS NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

MR. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Listorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

MR. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

MRS. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

MRS. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, write Nov. 22nd, 1896: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MRS. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st. and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone fro[illegible] taking your Tablets."

MRS. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have don world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

MRS. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 39 inches. I hope soon to be 38. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 5lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

MISS JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

MR. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

MISS F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

MISS PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

Anæmia

INDIGESTION, HEADACHE, AND LOSS OF APPETITE CURED.

"I ALMOST USED TO FEEL THAT I SHOULD LIKE TO DIE, so awful were my sufferings,' said Mrs. John Smith, 1 Village, Lelley, Preston, Holderness, to a reporter of the "Hull News." "I was tortured for nearly seven years by Anæmia and Indigestion. I seemed to have no blood in me. My fingers were 'dead' and they trembled so violently that it was an impossibility for me to pick up a plate without letting it drop. My feet were always cold, and they used to swell to such an extent that I did not know how to walk. Work was not possible, on account of agonising pains, and a severe burning sensation in my head. My appetite failed me completely, and I was always troubled by dizziness.

"Go out and enjoy my cycle rides."

"I consulted no fewer than five doctors, and attended the Dispensary at Hull. I consumed large quantities of medicine, which only made my teeth rot, and my gums very soft. The last doctor I consulted advised me to get a bicycle. I did so, but I had not the strength and energy to ride it. He also told me to go and reside in the country (at this time I was living in Hull) away from the smoke and dust, for if I did not I should be dead in a few weeks. I followed out his advice, but no benefit resulted from the change.

"I was in this helpless and terrible condition when a lady friend of mine residing in Buckingham Street, Hull, brought to my notice Bile Beans for Biliousness, as they had cured her of Bilious Bouts. I saw an advertisement in a paper and sent for a sample box. I took the contents and felt somewhat better, as all my dizziness completely disappeared. I persevered with the use of the Beans, and the result has been marvellous. My head was cleared. I have now a keen appetite, can do my work with pleasure, and go out and enjoy my cycle rides. I am completely cured, and restored to perfect health. I firmly believe that but for Bile Beans for Biliousness I should now have been in my grave."

BILE BEANS are the product of modern scientific research. They are not a mere purgative, like the old-fashioned so-called remedies of forty or fifty years ago. They act directly on the liver and digestive organs, strengthening and stimulating those organs to perform their natural duties. They produce a gentle action on the bowels, curing or preventing constipation, cleansing the stomach and ridding the system of all impurities. Do not be misled by claims of half-a-hundred pills in the box, where probably four to six constitute a dose, and the doses cannot be discontinued. ONE BILE BEAN IS ONE DOSE. They can be discontinued after the cure is effected; they are purely vegetable; they contain no harmful drugs, and they are the SAFEST FAMILY MEDICINE.

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS are a speedy and permanent cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Indigestion, Flatulence, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Pimples, "Bilious Loss of Tone," Debility, Lassitude, "That Tired Feeling," Summer Fag, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. OF ALL MEDICINE VENDORS, 1/1½ and 2/9 per box.

SAMPLE BOX FREE.

For a Free Sample Box of Bile Beans, send the accompanying Coupon, your name and address, and a 1d. stamp (to cover return postage) to the Bile Beans Co., Greek Street, Leeds,

FREE SAMPLE COUPON.

Short Stories. Aug. 15, 1903.

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 764. WEEK ENDING
AUGUST 22nd 1903.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

SEE STORY INSIDE.

THREE GRAND

KODAK

AMATEUR

PHOTOGRAPHIC COMPETITIONS.

£1,000

(ONE THOUSAND POUNDS)

in CASH Prizes.

£500 for Pictures on N.C. Film (non-curling and orthochromatic).

£300 for Pictures on KODOID Plates (thin, flat, and unbreakable).

£200 for roll-films developed in KODAK DEVELOPING MACHINE.

Ask your Dealer for full particulars, or write direct to DEPT. 35,

KODAK LTD., 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, LIVERPOOL; and 72-74 Buchanan Street, GLASGOW.

Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, W., 171-173 Regent Street, W.; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

If you wish to EAT WELL

— TAKE —

BEECHAM'S

PILLS.

You will EAT WELL,

because by their specific action on the digestive organs Beecham's Pills remove the sensation of fulness and oppression commonly experienced, give the appetite "edge," and restore the stomach to healthy and natural function.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

Free Wheel, Bowden Brake or New Departure, Back Pedal Hub Brake, all Fittings. For Cash or 12 monthly payments

£8 8 0 ,, 15/10 each.
£9 0 0 ,, 16/8 ,,
£9 10 0 ,, 17/6 ,,
£10 5 0 ,, 19/3 ,,

All a Cyclist needs at lowest prices.

Trailers from £5 5 0, or 10/6 monthly. Write for New Season List, 130 pages and 300 illustrations, sent post free. — METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd. ("S.S." Dept.), 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C. West End Showrooms: Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

PINK'S

MARMALADE

IS PURE.

TRY IT.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 764.] Week Ending August 22nd, 1903. [One Penny.

NEW SERIAL STORY. START TO-DAY.

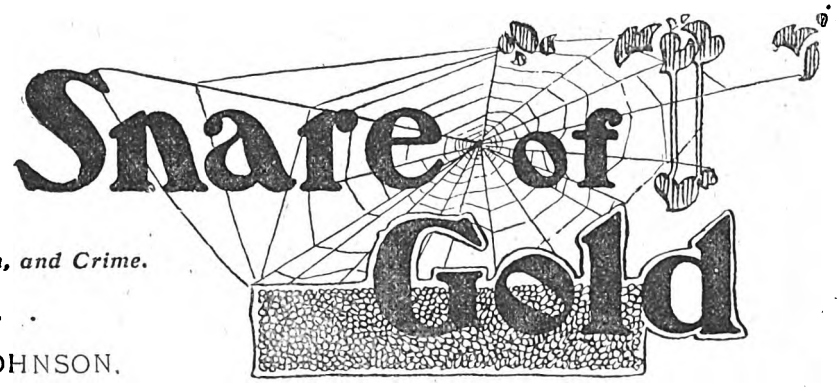
The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

By

Henry T. Johnson.

BEGIN READING HERE.

George Geldart, the rich City merchant, awakens to find that he is lying in a coffin, wrapped in grave clothes. Fearful lest he may lose consciousness again before he properly realises his surroundings, he clambers out of the sexagon.

There are voices!—those of a man and woman. Moving by instinct, he flings aside a wardrobe door and hides within. It is his son Eric, and his adopted daughter Clare talking. From their conversation he learns that his younger son, Ronald, has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

A tap at the door! Geldart hears the frou-frou of the girl's skirt as she goes from the room, and presently he hears another voice, the voice of Boanerges Blagdon, his business partner, whom he has so often befriended.

It then transpires that Eric Geldart and Blagdon have conspired to end the life of the former's father. Eric demands a price from Blagdon for recovering some of the latter's promissory notes from his father's possession—old Geldart had noticed their disappearance, and thought that he had been robbed of them by Ronald. Blagdon promises that Eric shall have his price, then they leave the room.

Geldart slips swiftly out of the wardrobe, and, taking with him various articles, deposits them in the coffin, putting the lid back in its place. Then the undertaker's men come in and screw it down.

No sooner is this done than Ronald enters the room, and his father hears him bemoaning the fact that the body is out of sight, and his heart goes out to the son he has so cruelly wronged.

Click! Once again the door is closed. Ronald is gone!

And then George Geldart leaves his hiding-place again, dons a suit and hat of tweeds, an overcoat, and a pair of boots; then, watching his opportunity, he slips downstairs and out of the great house which can never more be his home.

George Geldart is penniless! He determines to go to Ronald, but on reaching the hotel where his son was staying, he is informed that the boy has gone no one knows where. He strolls out into the streets and there sees, what is supposed to be his own funeral, pass, attended with much pomp and show. Then he feels his unutterable loneliness, and is wondering in what direction to turn his steps, when he is greeted in a hearty manner by a man called Stanyer, whom Geldart had known in his youth.

In his will George Geldart disinherits Ronald, and leaves practically everything to Eric, who, with the help of Lord Lynton, puts up for Parliament as Pro-Con. (Progressive-Conservative) candidate for Little Claverton, and is duly elected. He falls in love with Madeleine Lorraine, Lord Lynton's daughter, though he is pledged to marry Clare Armitage, his adopted sister.

After the reading of the will Ronald leaves the house and wanders aimlessly along the streets, feeling very bitter with everyone.

The sound of galloping horses reaches his ears—they are runaways dragging a brougham after them. As they near him, Ronald, quick as thought, tears off his overcoat and flings it full at the heads of the maddened steeds. They swerve and Ronald seizes the bridle of one of them, only to be trampled underfoot; but the momentary check has given others an opportunity of coming to his assistance, and the horses are stopped.

Ronald is borne to a doctor's, and there learns that he has saved the life of Madeleine Lorraine, who was in the carriage.

Stanyer has made a fortune in business in Australia, and wants someone to look after things in England for him. He offers the position to Geldart, and the latter, telling him nothing of what has transpired, agrees to act for him, and sets up an office in Crosby Square.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT.

SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Sampson Scrimshaw, Company Promoter.

The premises Geldart occupied consisted of one barely-furnished room on the second floor of 14a Crosby Square, with the Taga-Taga Wool and Hide Agency unassumingly lettered on the unassuming door.

The floor beneath was occupied, indeed monopolised by, the offices of the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange Limited, whose title was displayed as frequently as possible on many glass doors and several brass-plates upon the landing and the staircase, with an extra special announcement on an extra imposing plate on each of the lintels of the portals of the house.

To several of such announcements there was appended in italics within brackets the name, Mr. Sampson Scrimshaw, Managing Director.

The office of the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange, Ltd., was as abundant of bustle as the one on the floor above it was destitute. Between its plate-glass swing doors footsteps were hurrying to and fro from ten till five, and the air within its partitions resounded and vibrated with the thrill of electric bells, telephonic conversations, the click-click of tape machines, and the "clackitty-clack" of typewriters.

And every morning punctually at 10.30 Mr. Sampson Scrimshaw, descending from his smart dog-cart, handed the reins to his immaculate tiger, and bustling through the central gorgeous plate-glass swing-door, infused galvanic influence into the whole.

For Mr. Sampson Scrimshaw, as a matter of fact, was the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange, Ltd., what Mr. Scrimshaw was not was a more difficult matter to decide.

Some twelve years previously he had made his debut in the City as a very short youth, perched on a very high stool, in a stockbroker's office.

At an age when most boys in the intervals of football and marbles were making their heads ache working out the complications of imaginary accounts in respect of imaginary goods between imaginary customers, little Sampson was figuring out real transactions between real people, and acquiring real knowledge and experience, with the trifling difference that whereas the mental fagging of the other boys was entailing considerable expense upon their parents, little Sampson's acquisition of knowledge, instead of entailing expense, paid his expenses.

Mid-day in his teens he commenced to speculate in a small way on his own account, displaying even in those petty transactions, which were his beginnings, the shrewdness and foresight which later in life distinguished larger ones.

Even in those days many of those around him, with the gambling taint in their blood, noting the success of his ventures more than the qualities insuring their successes, looked upon him as a mascotte, so that when the word went round the office that little Sampson was doing a flutter in this stock or that, his colleagues, his superiors, even his employers, on the ground that he was such a lucky little chap, went for his particular fancy stock with the result of sometimes hedging a bad speculation, and at others even bringing off a coup.

They called it Sampson's luck, but Sampson never gambled; he formed his opinions carefully, then went for them strenuously, winning his way by what many called happy chance, but which he knew to be sound judgment.

By-and-bye his operations expanded. Before he was out of his teens he was lending money at interest, finding capital for big concerns, earning thereby snug commissions, forming syndicates that bought patents, stock, plant, and good wills for songs and sold them to trustees for companies about to form for fortunes.

A firm believer in the power of the press, at twenty-one he was the proprietor of a newspaper devoted to finance and the drama, and particularly the booming of his investments and ventures, financial and theatrical, for amongst other things he ran a theatre in London and several touring companies. For although Sampson had little leaning to literature, he recognised its commercial value, though scarcely himself a man of soul he trafficked advantageously with such as were.

To Sampson Scrimshaw the old gentleman on the floor above was a problem. There was a mystery about the man, and Mr. Scrimshaw had an aversion to mysteries.

Had he known the nature of the taciturn, solitary old man's business, the man and his business would have ceased to interest him, but as he could learn nothing about either, he began to wonder a deal, and wondering led to worrying.

What if the man were a spy? Mr. Scrimshaw's own transactions were of so varied and peculiar a character as to render that theory uncomfortably plausible.

So Mr. Scrimshaw endeavoured to gather from Frederick Stanyer's post the nature of Mr. Frederick Stanyer's business, but, unfortunately for the success of this idea, Mr. Stanyer had no post to be inspected.

He then took to wishing Old Mystery good morning, as he toiled up the stairs, and to volunteering remarks upon the weather, courtesies and remarks to which Old Mystery responded as tersely as possible.

There were occasions when Scrimshaw worked late, remaining in his office long after his smart clerks and smarter typewriters had bustled away from it, and there were other occasions when he returned to it, unattended, at strangely unofficial hours, even when midnight reigned over the City, and the asphalted streets gleamed bare and destitute of traffic, vehicular or pedestrian.

At such times letting himself, often in evening dress, in with a pass key and switching on the electric light, he would remain in his own room poring over the contents of his private safe, at others flitting around his offices, peering into this pigeon-hole and that, this or that desk or drawer. For it was Scrimshaw's principle to take nothing for granted.

One night, seated alone poring over the contents of a cash-box crammed with crisp bank notes, cheques, drafts, and coupons of many shapes and colours, he all of a sudden startled—at a sound.

Convulsively, with one hand he crammed a crisp heap back into the box, slid the other hand inside an open drawer beside him, and gripped a glittering deadly toy lying there.

Again he heard the sound, the sound of a footstep, quietly closed the box, clicked the key in its lock, placed it in the open drawer, taking therefrom in exchange a silver-mounted revolver, and threaded his way on tiptoe towards the main door of his offices.

Pat-a-pat—closer came the descending footsteps, and suddenly switching on the electric light, he shoved outwards and stood there on the landing face to face with—Old Mystery. And the two men, the old and the young, facing each other, with every nerve strained to utmost tension, exclaimed, swiftly and simultaneously:

"What are you doing here?"

Old Mystery answered brusquely:

"I'm minding my business."

"But what is your business? To mind other people's? By the Lord Harry, old man, if you're spying on mine you're playing a dangerous game!" And he withdrew from his dress jacket pocket his right hand, clenching the deadly toy.

"Put that thing away," said Old Mystery, for George Geldart was in no hurry to return towards that brink he had just in time returned from, "whatever your business may be, straight or crooked, it is nothing to me."

"You're sure of that? Then what are you doing here in the heart of the city in the heart of the night?"

"What's that to you? Suppose I ask you the same question?"

The other, muttering, returned within his swinging plate-glass door and Old Mystery was about to continue his downstair journey when suddenly he paused, his eye attracted by something which had fallen from Scrimshaw's pocket as he withdrew that revolver.

Digitized by Google

Picking it up, he tapped the swing door, but there was no response. He tapped again with a like result, he pushed it and, Scrimshaw in his excitement, having omitted to fasten it, Old Mystery entered, peeped along the corridor at the end of which there gleamed the ground-glass door panel of a lighted room.

With an exclamation of impatience he walked down the corridor. As he did so, Scrimshaw, listening to the advancing footsteps, rose from his chair, muttering, "The old liar! He is spying! I'll watch his little game," and, withdrawing within the shadow of the safe, he waited.

There was a tap-tap at the door and, there being no answer, Old Mystery softly entered. With an annoyed glance around he exclaimed:

"Confound the fellow! he's not here!"

And Scrimshaw, emerging from behind the safe and covering him with his revolver, said, in a hard, deliberate voice:

"You're wrong, my friend, he is here, and before you leave this room he means to know your little game." And suddenly his pistol hand was seized, gripped as in a vice and twisted.

"Drop that fool of a toy or else I'll knock you down!" exclaimed Old Mystery, and the revolver rattled on to the floor.

"You old ruffian!" said the younger man, "I don't want to struggle with a man of your years, let go my wrist or I'll call the police and give you into custody, and before you leave this room I will know what brought you here."

"If you weren't such a nervous, excitable idiot I was going to tell you at once," exclaimed old Mystery. "You let this fall from your pocket on the landing," and he laid upon the desk writing-table the £1,000 Bank of England note.

"Bless my soul!" cried Scrimshaw, clapping his hand in his breast pocket, "so I did, I say! I'm awfully sorry. The fact is, I'm a bit excited, I've been dining out to-night, and I've one or two very worrying things on my mind. Will you accept my apology?"

"Yes," grunted Old Mystery, "on condition that you keep those things out of sight when you meet me on the stairs in future."

"Oh, yes," said Scrimshaw hastily, "only somehow it gave me an awful turn—made me feel a bit creepy, you know, you loafing about the place at this time of night, like a ghost."

"It is as late for you as for me," said the other.

"Oh, yes, I know, only you see you're a bit of a mystery. Anyway, you're evidently a very honest man, and, look here, the man who voluntarily restores a thousand pounds deserves a substantial reward. As a matter of fact, I shouldn't have missed this for months, thinking I'd put it in this cash box. Now suppose I give you a ten pound note for yourself?"

"No, thanks," the other snapped out, "I don't want a reward for not being a thief."

Scrimshaw stared at him curiously.

"One moment, my friend," he said, "you're not pressed for time; will you smoke a cigar and drink a drop of whisky? I'd like to have a chat with you."

"I certainly wouldn't mind a drop of whisky and I'm partial to a good cigar," said the strange visitor, taking one from the open box and eyeing and handling it with the method of a connoisseur.

"Look here," said Scrimshaw, "you've interested me, first because you're a bit of a mystery, secondly, because it's pretty clear you're straight. Now, Mr——" He paused.

"Perhaps you had better call me Old Mystery."

Scrimshaw keenly scanned his visitor.

"Yes, you are a bit of a mystery, and I suppose you've got a bit of a life story: seen better days, eh?"

The other nodded.

Scrimshaw laughed contentedly.

"I haven't, but I'm hoping to, that's the difference between us."

"Quite so, your present times are the best you've ever had and you've the prospect of better, if you play your cards carefully."

"How do you know?" asked the other sharply.

"That doesn't matter. I do know, perhaps I know more than you think."

"Oh, lots of people know more than I do," laughed Scrimshaw, "at the clubs and houses I frequent I find no end of people who know more than I shall ever learn or ever want to about any number of things, except one, money-making, and, like you, they'll give me best at that."

"If they're like me, they won't."

"What!" exclaimed Scrimshaw, sitting up, "you haven't done much in that line?"

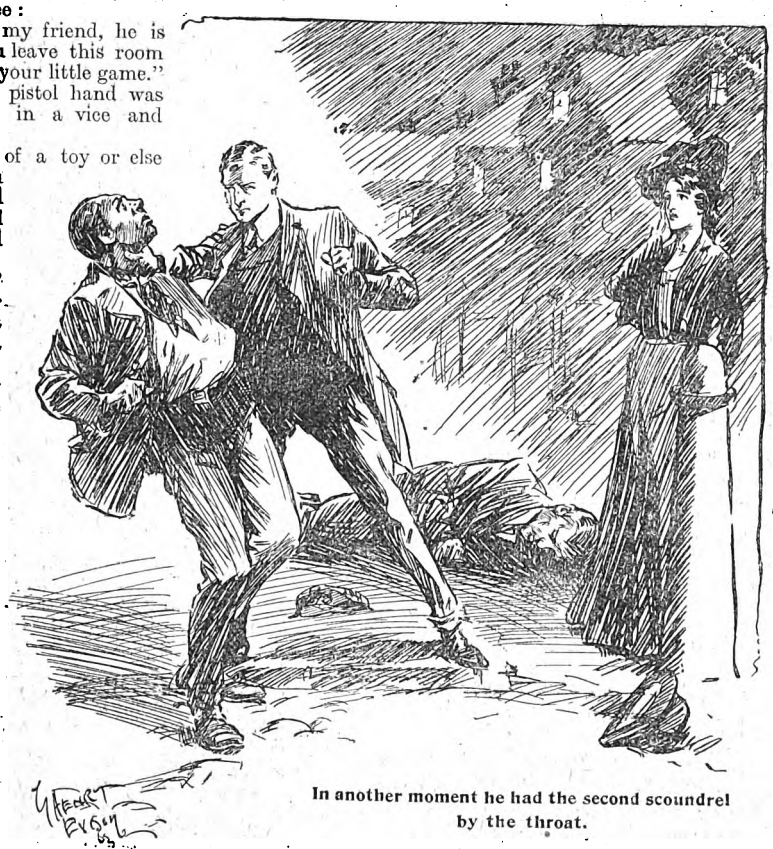
"That's more than you know."

"Well, yes, when I come to think of it, I should think you are a man who's capable of making money, the man who could hand over a thousand pounds that wouldn't have been missed must have a mind capable of dealing with big figures, and if it's true that every man has his price, and it seems to be, your price must be a very respectable one. And, tell me, after making money, how did you come to lose it?"

"Who said I did lose it?"

"But you haven't got much, eh? Excuse me being so personal, I'm getting more and more interested in you, Mr. Mystery. You know I'm a bit of a student of human nature, that is incidentally, my chief study is building a pile and I think I'm a bit of an honest man in that branch."

"Yes," said Old Mystery, "my friend, you think you know



In another moment he had the second scoundrel by the throat.

Digitized by Google

all that is to be learnt, whereas, you've only just grasped the rudiments."

"I've done better than,you apparently."

"Apparently, perhaps, but smart men don't judge by smart appearances."

Scrimshaw for a moment mused, then in the most off-handed, casual manner he gave a Masonic sign. A mutual smile flitted over the faces of the men as it was returned.

"Now, look here, Mr. Mystery," said Scrimshaw sharply. "What do you know of business?"

"Not much! but ten times more than you do."

"Tut! tut! you've had your innings, what you've done has been done on the old methods, I'm the pioneer of the new."

"That's quite true, I've never worked on the new methods, though I've studied them. I did too well by the old, but I often felt inclined to try them, only the chains of environment held me down."

"And they don't now?"

"No, these chains are broken."

Scrimshaw rose from his chair, plunged his hands in his pockets, and paced his office in his favourite manner, that of a caged tiger, glancing ever and anon, furtively, at the visitor to his den.

"I can't make you out," he said, "though I've half a dozen theories about you. You've been a gentleman, you've held a good position, you may have made mistakes, don't be offended, you may have done time, no! I don't think that," for he noted that Old Mystery never blanched at that shot, and again he observed the smoothness of the fingertips of the white hand.

"You may have plunged and got out of your depth and found it better to drop out, or, perhaps, there was a lady in the case, you're just about at the susceptible age. Anyway, it's clear that for some reason or other you have chosen to efface an interesting individuality, and to lie low.

"Now a man who is clever, who is absolutely straight and who is content to lie low is worth to me—oh, a regiment of the crowd I see out there"—and he pointed to the untenanted desks and stools of his general office. "People who don't understand me would say that what I'm saying now isn't like me, but that's just because it doesn't suit me for everybody to understand me. You see, I'm a financier, and a financier's got to be a bit of a philosopher."

"I think you're a bit of a poet as well," said the other; "certainly your whisky and cigars are worthy of one. Only one more word, I can't work in a small way, I can't do small things."

"That's because," said Scrimshaw, "you're not a small man—and that's where you and I shall hit it."

Then they came to terms.

EIGHTH CHAPTER.

Ronald to the Rescue.

It was hardly to be supposed that a young fellow in Ronald's position could move to and fro in the Metropolis without occasionally encountering friends of former days, although he did his best to avoid such encounters, they being invariably calculated to revive unpleasant memories; but having been for the most part educated in Heidelberg, and having spent most of his vacations and leisure time in continental wanderings he had few acquaintances and fewer friends in England, scarcely any in London.

One morning it was Jim Redfern, newly called to the Bar, who, meeting him in the Strand, returned Ronald's instinctive nod of greeting with the most frigid of "How do you do's," and an immediate stare in an opposite direction. Evidently he had heard Eric's version of the story.

And on another occasion it was Tom Lorrimer, his old school fellow, who accosted him with a hearty:

"Hallo, Geldart, old chap, how are you bucking up? How goes it? I say, I hear you've lost your governor, read synopsis of his probate in the Illustrated London News. By Jove, old chap cut up pretty well, but what thundering hard lines to leave you entirely out of it. What on earth was the old boy's reason?"

Evidently Tom had not heard Eric's version.

"Well, what are you doing, old chap? Trying to get literary work, eh?" with a drop of the countenance. "Well, wish you luck, old man! I say, of course we're old pals, and if a fiver's any use to you—What? No thanks! Well, anyway, here's my card, and if I can do any good, don't forget. Good-bye, so long!"

But Ronald had made up his mind neither to beg nor borrow. He had set his mind upon his course, he knew the one walk in life he was fitted to tread, knew that once in the swim he could get his living honourably, fairly easily. He would do his best and strongest.

If that walk were shut to him, very well, then he was young and strong, he would work with his hands, there was the dock quay, there was the forge, and last—and, perhaps, best of all—there was the barrack square.

He had packed his traps, paid his bill, giving up his rooms at that expensive hotel. And now he was walking the streets of London—homeless, where the few people who knew him believed him to be a thief, the people he never wanted to meet again until his name was cleared, as cleared he swore it should be.

Till then he would avoid them. How best to do that? Should he leave London? He thought things over, and that his thoughts might be undisturbed by the roar of the traffic he turned into a narrow, quiet street.

A girl hurried past him, crossing over the road. He was so absorbed in his reflections that he noticed neither that she was trimly built, neatly and tastefully dressed and extremely pretty, nor that she was hurrying along, casting every now and then apprehensive glances behind her.

Neither did he observe that some ten seconds later she was followed by a couple of low-browed, evil-looking men. The shades of evening were falling, dusk was deepening into a premature darkness accelerated by a heavy, drizzling mist. And Ronald's thoughts were concentrated upon one question. Where was he to sleep that night?

Suddenly he was startled by the sound of a scream, from around a corner ahead across the road, the scream of a frightened girl. He quickened his steps. Again the scream arose on the murky, moistened air. He broke into a run, dashed across the road and round the opposite corner.

"Oh, don't—don't! You are choking me!" a girl's wailing voice, and in answer a hoarse, guttural oath followed by, "Let go the chain, then, or I'll choke you!"

"Now then, Mickey, land her a thick 'un and stop her screeching!"

"Can't! Ugh!" and the ruffian went down in a muddled heap, stunned by a crashing left-hander from Ronald, who, in another moment had the second scoundrel by the throat and dragging him away from the trembling, half-fainting girl, flung him across the dark and narrow slum, then snatching from the ground at her feet a watch and broken neck-chain, and with the other arm supporting the almost swooning girl, Ronald said hastily:

"Here, take your watch and chain! Don't move away, but scream for the police while I collar these villains!" And as the second man came for him again, with a swift, swinging right-hander full between the eyes, he felled him.

"Jimmy, got your knife? Slip it into 'im!" the brute rolling over and scrambling up shouted. But the other in a hoarse whisper exclaimed:

"No, no, he's too thick, cheese it and cut, the slops are comin'!" And taking to their heels they disappeared in the darkness, leaving Ronald supporting in his arms the sobbing, trembling girl.

"Stay here while I follow and catch them!" he exclaimed. But clinging to him she cried:

"Oh, no, no! Please don't leave me, sir, or I shall die of terror. They followed me for ever so far. I knew it, and I guessed they were in league, though they pretended to be apart, this neighbourhood's infested with them, please don't leave me!"

Digitized by Google

"Very well," said Ronald, who was the soul of good temper and tenderness to women, young or old, "only, leave off crying, it's all right now, and your watch is safe. Have they taking anything else?"

"No, sir, I slipped my purse in my bosom."

"Have they hurt you?"

"They've bruised my neck and twisted my arm. Oh, if you hadn't come to my rescue! How can I thank you?"

"I haven't done much, except, I am happy to say, given a couple of rascals two of the heaviest blows I ever hit in my life. Now, shall I walk a little way home with you, or shall we find the police and describe these Thugs?"

"I think I'll get home if you don't mind walking a little way with me; I couldn't describe them, I am in such a nervous state."

"Well, anyway, one of them will have two black eyes," said Ronald complacently. "Come along, then, I'll walk with you. Take my arm."

"Thank you a thousand times," said the girl, and as she walked along clinging to her protector's arm she thought what different types of men seemed to make up even the little world in which she lived her humble life.

They passed along into wider, cleaner, better lighted streets, then, stopping at one door, she said, "I live here, sir, let me thank you once again."

"Oh, that's all right!" said Ronald. "You're heartily welcome, my only regret is that I hadn't the satisfaction of handing these Mohocks over to the police. Good night!"

"Good night, sir," said the girl, "and thanks again. My name's Phyllis Daventry," and she paused inquiringly.

"What a pretty name, very suitable to so charming a young lady! Good night!" Raising his hat he was gone, leaving her standing at her door, her question not answered.

But she murmured as she watched his disappearing form:

"Whatever his name may be, and whatever his station, he's a thorough gentleman, and a dear good fellow."

* * * * *

Ronald, strolling along, carefully wiping with his handkerchief from his knuckles the traces of his encounter, suddenly paused before the railings of a clean-looking, almost drearily respectable and sober-looking house, his eye caught by a placard in the front window, "Paying Guests Received."

Ascending the steps he complied with the request upon the brass plate to knock and ring, and a diminutive servant wearing a white cap, and bib apron, and a black smudge at the end of a tip-tilted nose, more or less like the petals of a flower, inquired, "Who might he want?"

He explained a desire to interview the lady of the house, whereupon the diminutive domestic disappeared, leaving him in the hall after a momentary undecided look at an array of coats, hats, and umbrellas, and a reassuring survey of the caller.

A few moments later a portly lady of somewhat severe aspect, her hands folded across her ample bosom, sailed into the hall remarking:

"I am the lady of the house, but I think you have the advantage of me."

"I observe," said Ronald smiling, "that you take in paying guests."

"I receive paying guests," the lady replied somewhat frigidly, as though suspecting an aspersion in the challenge, "and my name is Mrs. Skimper. May I ask yours?"

For a moment he reflected. He had cast off the old life, had decided to let the old name go. What name henceforth should he bear? He thought of his second Christian name and of the third that had been the dear dead mother's maiden name and he answered, "My name is Harvey Bligh," whereupon he was requested to step into the drawing-room.

And so it happened that when next morning Mrs. Skimper took her accustomed seat at the head of the breakfast-table her paying guests were morally convinced that something unexpected and as pleasant as unexpected had happened.

As to the nature of the event they were not quite certain. Perhaps Mr. Springle had ceased to unsettle their hostess and had settled her bill. Possibly Arethusa, the slave of the myriad bells, had risen at the third, even the second, but no, not the first time of asking, that required too great a stretch of imagination.

Could it be—oh, joyful thought, that the drawing-room piano had been seized for over-due instalments, and that Miss Amaranth's performances thereon were to be numbered with the terrors of the past? Or possibly Mr. Grimmage, whose incessant sneers and growls were the bane of Mrs. Skimper's existence, had carried out at last his daily threat and definitely given notice, a consummation devoutly to be wished.

For Mrs. Skimper beamed on all and sundry, even including Mr. Springle in the radiance of her smile. But speculation was put at rest by the worthy lady's own announcement that the circle for whom she provided home comforts was about to be enlarged by a new arrival.

"A Mr. Harvey Bligh," she added, whereat the radiance of her own features communicated itself to those of Miss Amaranth, a young lady who made eyes at every new male arrival from a time whereof the memory of Mrs. Skimper's paying guests ran not to the contrary. "Isn't it charming?"

"Don't see where the charm comes in," said Mr. Grimmage, "it simply means so far as we are concerned the increase of the divisor of the sum total of the commissariat, and the reduction of the fraction." And Mrs. Skimper, while not comprehending Mr. Grimmage's meaning, realised thas his intention was to be nasty from the callous laughter it evoked, and as usual revenged herself upon the hapless Springle for the vengeful thrust of the more unpleasant, but infinitely more, punctually paying guest.

That evening Miss Amaranth came down to dinner in a new blouse, Mr. Grimmage trotted out a new grievance, and Mr. Horace Springle brought to Bloomsbury Square a new excuse for the non-payment of his bill.

Miss Amaranth, it should be mentioned, represented music in the Skimperian temple, and punished the strings of Mrs. Skimper's piano, and the nerves of Mrs. Skimper's paying guests from early morn to dewy eve.

She was a little dot of a body with a romantic disposition

"I'm told her Royal Highness is most domesticated—makes steak and kidney puddings with her own hands."

Digitized by Google

and an aggravatingly red nose, entirely out of harmony with the poetical aspirations of her nature. But she was a good little soul, and once away from the piano as harmless as a child, indeed considerably more so.

Mr. Grimmage was understood to be connected with the Civil Service, a circumstance which perhaps accounted for the incivility of his manner; he passed his days in bullying solicitors' office boys across a brass wire grating, and his evenings in more or less withering Mrs. Skimper and her paying guests with sarcasm, which, if not particularly original, was at all events invested with the dignity of labour.

Mr. Springle's leading features were a loud manner and louder waistcoats, an abnormally high collar and low breeding. He was understood to be something in the City; no one knew quite what, but the consensus of opinion was that it was not much.

He was generally understood to be in the offices of the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange Limited, but in what capacity no one at Mrs. Skimper's was perfectly sure, the guesses ranging from managing director to messenger. His ideals were the leading comedians of the variety stage and the Hebes of the bars.

Miss Amaranth was in the seventh heaven, for she found herself seated beside a good-looking, good-tempered youngster with the manners of a gentleman—a somewhat novel experience at Mrs. Skimper's—and one who extended the little courtesies of the dinner-table so gracefully that she longed for more condiments to be asked for.

Even with the soup stage Ronald had unconsciously made an impression; before the exit of the fish and the advent of the roast it had deepened into a conquest, greatly to the indignation of both Messrs. Grimmage and Springle, who were so accustomed to snubbing the harmless, amiable and lonely little old maid, that they conceived a resentment against the newcomer who so presumptuously set them an example of gentlemanly behaviour.

There was also present a Mrs. Marwell, who wore a black lace cap with ribbons, and regaled the company from time to time with scraps of information from the Court Circular regarding the movements of their Majesties and the Royal Family, and, seated opposite her a Mr. Dodgerson, a portly, florid-faced elderly gentleman, whose principal characteristic was being at times aggravatingly hard of hearing, and at other times still more aggravatingly acute in that faculty, both the times and the other times being generally inconvenient.

"Oh, thank you so much," said Miss Amaranth, taking the pepper from Ronald's hand with a contact with her own intended to be thrilling, and a glance designed to be more so. "Do you believe in the occult?"

"I can't say I'm very much interested in it," he replied.

"Aren't you? I think it delightful; I think everything delightful that you don't understand; things that one understands are generally so uninteresting. Do you know, I'm a palmist; I wish you'd let me read your hand."

"I see the King has brought a new motor-car," said Mrs. Marwell, "and the Duchess of Argyle is going to open a soup kitchen at Poplar."

"Rot!" said Mr. Dodgerson.

"Sir!" exclaimed Mrs. Marwell, with a glare.

"Allow me to tell you, madam, that such sentiments are very unbecoming."

"What do you mean, sir?"

"Sauce tureen? Certainly. Madam, allow me to remark when you declare his gracious Majesty to be unpopular you're talking nonsense!"

"I never said anything of the kind," remarked Mrs. Marwell.

"Oh, never mind him, he's a deaf old josser!" observed Mr. Springle reassuringly.

"I'll tell you what, sir," said Mr. Dodgerson, "if you don't apologise for that remark, as soon as the ladies have gone through that door I'll send you through that window," and while Mr. Springle was hastily explaining that he had said nothing of the kind, Miss Amaranth went on, scanning Ronald's hand.

"Ah, this is a most interesting line of life; when you were very young you had an illness."

"Yes—measles at five, I've been told."

"I knew it!" she went on triumphantly; "your path was rosy till you reached sixteen and then," she sighed, "a great calamity befell you."

"Really!" he exclaimed, anxious for information.

"Yes, you conceived a romantic but, alas! a hopeless attachment."

"I'm afraid you're a little wrong in the dates," said Ronald, conscious of at that age cherishing two objects in life, cricket and "footer," to the exclusion of any heart affection.

"But," she went on, "consolation awaits you, soon, ah! sooner perhaps than you anticipate you will meet with one who will console you for the blighting of your boyhood's dream."

"I'm told her Royal Highness is most domesticated, makes steak and kidney puddings with her own hands."

"Perhaps that accounts for the rumours of a separation," said Mr. Grimmage.

"Ha! ha! that ain't half bad!" laughed Springle; "that reminds me of Billy Blarer's new song:

"'To be my lawful missus
I did Jemima take;
What broke our happy home up
Was Jemima's home-made cake.'"

"What did you say, sir?" cried Mr. Dodgerson wrathfully, "I'm a bit of a rake; how dare——"

In the course of the repudiation and explanation the ladies rose, and Miss Amaranth whispered: "When you come into the drawing-room I'll sing; mind, I shall be singing it for you, my new song, 'For Years I've Yearned for Thee.'"

"I say, you are a-going it!" exclaimed Mr. Springle, addressing Ronald after exchanging a wink with Mr. Grimmage.

Ronald, uncertain whether the impertinence was meant for him, went on lighting a cigarette; and Springle, imagining he had found a smart butt, went on, "I told her lots of times she'd only got to wait long enough for a flat to come along; but, I say! if you're after the shekels she's only got £75 a year, and it dies with her, and she can't touch it."

"Have you been addressing me all this time?" asked Ronald, and Mr. Springle replied:

"Of course I have; what do you think?"

"I think," said Ronald, "you're an impertinent young puppy!"

"What!" exclaimed Mr. Springle, endeavouring to work up an explosion.

"I also think," said Ronald, leisurely walking round to Mr. Springle's side of the table, "that I shall pull your nose!" Whereupon seizing Mr. Springle's collar with his left hand, with his right he suited the action to the word. He then quietly walked out of the room amid a dead silence, for even Mr. Grimmage felt that on the new arrival sarcasm was thrown away.

Forgetting, perhaps oblivious of Miss Amaranth's promise, he went to his room and occupied himself till bed-time with the advertisement-sheet of a daily paper answering the likeliest of the innumerable "Wanted's" crowding its columns.

For although he had confidently determined to fight and win life's battle under the banner of Captain Pen he recognised that inclination was not the only qualification for enlistment in those ranks; knew that while the grass was growing Pegasus might starve if no other fodder were forthcoming, therefore he set out in quest of a "work by the way."

The next evening he was similarly employed, and the next, and then ensued a period of weary waiting in vain, watching every post that came his hopes raised to a height of expectancy that made the fall all the more crushing.

Many of the advertisements invited personal application, and Ronald spent his days in answering these, taking his place at the end of a weary, dreary queue of applicants, only to find that he had passed the best years of his youth acquiring a deal of knowledge but apparently nothing that would enable him to get his bread.

Digitized by Google

And Ronald by degrees arrived at the conclusion that a man requires to work harder and know a great deal more to earn seventy-five pounds a year than seven hundred, and that it is far easier for labouring men, hewers of wood and drawers of water, to obtain employment at from twenty-five to thirty shillings a week than for the possessor of a classical education and a couple of modern languages.

He thought of the stage and made sundry calls at sundry stage-doors, inquiring of stage-door keepers, invariably grumpy and invariably engaged in meals, for managers who were invariably out or busily engaged, while ladies of abnormally yellow hair measured him with supercilious glances up and down, and blue-shaven gentlemen scowled at him suspiciously.

On such rare occasions as Ronald managed to catch the ear of some deputy-assistant acting manager, or other official, he was impressively and emphatically assured that of all the overcrowded professions and callings in overcrowded London town, the profession was the most overcrowded; it occurring to Ronald that possibly the reason of so much talent being crowded out lay in so much incompetency being crowded in.

He had rather fancied himself as an amateur actor, and as such had been greatly in request, but he reluctantly came to the conclusion that theatrical London had no need of him, and so he resumed the dreary task of seeking in the advertisements some "wanted" that he could supply.

And it was while waiting for his turn at one of these heart-sickening levees that Ronald was recognised by Mr. Springle, who still deeply resented his fellow-guest having not only put his nose out of joint metaphorically, but having literally pulled it.

Accordingly Mr. Springle took the earliest opportunity on the evening following his meeting Mr. Harvey Bligh, to give Ronald the name he had adopted, of publishing that circumstance at Mrs. Skimper's dinner-table.

"Get the berth, Mr. Bligh?" he inquired in a strident tone; and "Mr. Bligh" coloured to his temples, as, with a curt negative, he engaged in conversation with Miss Amaranth on his left.

But Mr. Springle was not to be baffled.

"Thought you wouldn't," he went on, "it was five-and-twenty against you in numbers, and some of them chaps carried more guns than you, not that you lost much; I've heard that firm sweats their invoice clerks horrid, and the billet was only five-and-twenty bob a week."

Mrs. Skimper pricked up her ears. Could it be possible that this Mr. Bligh was a mere invoice clerk and out of employment at that?

Why, she angrily reflected, he had been obtaining, if not goods, politeness under false pretences, and while she remembered with thankfulness that Mr. Bligh had paid her first week's bill without querying a single extra, she began to tremble for her second.

Mr. Grimmage audibly sniggered, and launched into a dissertation on the competition in the cheap clerk market, seizing on the opportunity of retaliating on the newcomer, who had dared a few minutes earlier to severely snub him for studied rudeness to Miss Amaranth.

That evening Ronald found himself distinctly left in the cold by Mrs. Skimper and her paying-guests, and he was conscious of, and to some extent amused by, under the cover of Miss Amaranth's piano-playing, a running fire of undertoned comment, the import of which he gathered more by instinct than hearing.

"I thought he was a real swell!" chuckled Mr. Springle, "from the way he's togged out, and the airs he gave himself—I tell you you could have knocked me down with a feather when I saw him standing in line with that down-at-heel lot. As Charlie Cheesit says in his latest:

"'It ain't the sealskin coat as makes the lady,
It ain't the clobber makes the millionaire,
A chap who's broke may wear a shiny cadey;
You should never judge your pals by what they wear.'"

Partly amused, partly nettled by the frigidity of his social atmosphere, Ronald, throwing himself into a chair carelessly took up the first periodical that came to hand and for a while turned over its leaves.

It happened to be the current week's M.A.P., and at last his eyes rested upon an autographical article under the heading "In the Days of My Youth," contributed by an author whose works had always interested him, and Ronald, who was somewhat of a voracious reader, speedily found himself interested in his reading matter, and oblivious to not only the manner, but the very existence of those around him.

It was the story of a strenuous battle, for not only fame and fortune, but, in its earlier stages, the very means of livelihood, and Ronald, with a keen and sympathetic interest, read how the man whose works were read throughout the civilised world, whose editions were snapped up by a clamouring and insensate public as fast as they appeared, had in earlier years, footsore and disheartened, tramped Fleet Street and the Strand, with his heart as heavy as his pockets were light, and his unsaleable scripts beneath his arm.

And now it made a man's mouth water to read how fortune deluged him with her favours, the prices he received per page, per column, per line! Why to that man every blank sheet of paper, given a pen and ink, was a bank note. The work, by the way, was not for him. He would press forward to his desired goal blind to all byways.

Among his traps there was a trunk filled with a medley of manuscripts, product of idle hours, and that night before retiring, he rummaged through the collection, selecting such wares as he deemed fittest for the market, and on the morrow he set out upon his mission. It was his forlorn hope, but it is the forlorn hope that wins the Victoria Cross!

(Another long instalment of this story will appear next week.)

£2,000
INSURANCE CLAIM PAID.

As the result of the FATAL RAILWAY ACCIDENT at ST. ENOCH'S STATION, GLASGOW, the Proprietors of

PEARSON'S WEEKLY

AND THE

OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CORPORATION LTD.

have paid a claim of £2,000 to the next of kin of G. E. DARROCH, 97 Byres Road, Glasgow.

This occasion is the first on which has been paid by any periodical in the world in respect of an insurance claim.

The Sum of £2,000

Every copy of PEARSON'S WEEKLY contains an INSURANCE COUPON entitling the holder's nearest relation to £2,000 in the event of a fatal railway accident.

Digitized by Google

An Evil Benefactor.

Telling of a Jealous Man's Scheme of Revenge.

. . Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover. .

MONA BARRON lay back in the comfortable deck-chair of the Salva, Mr. David Gretton's yacht, and closed her eyes dreamily. The air on shore was hot and stifling; it would be quite a delight to have a run in the open for a few miles, catching the breezes which flecked the waves half a mile out!

How good Mr. Gretton had been, and still was, to her and her mother. He had been an artist friend of her father, whose career was commercial.

The friendship appeared to have originated just before Mr. Barron met his future wife; it ripened as time went on, although Mrs. Barron had had an idea that Gretton became more distant in his manner for a time just prior to the marriage. When Mr. Barron met with his misfortune in business and died, leaving his wife and child in very poor circumstances, Gretton had delicately assisted them.

"He must have been much attached to father!" thought the girl, unconscious that Gretton was watching her keenly. "Perhaps father did him a good turn, saved his life or something. I declare that I have never once thought of asking mamma! His guardianship, if I may call it so, was self-constituted, and I have grown up to regard it as the most natural thing in the world. But, of course, these things do not happen of their own sweet will. He might have been my father!"

Mona was awaking to a better knowledge of certain facts, evidently, for the last thought made her open her eyes and look about for Gretton; he was at that moment standing with his back to her. The yacht was just getting clear of the shallow water, and the gentle rolling soothed the girl and made her close her eyes again. She was a good sailor.

"Now, that's strange," she mused. "I have always looked upon him as old, and it never occurred to me till this minute that he is not. I am twenty-one, and I don't believe that he is over forty! Anyhow, in looks he doesn't seem to be more than thirty-five. He was younger than father; I should say that he is mother's age. It really appears out-of-place to regard him as old, now I think of it."

Mona enjoyed the rocking of the yacht; it lulled her almost into a doze. Her thoughts ran on lazily.

"He paid for my schooling and he helped ever so much, for the sake of old times, he says; he is a lonely man without others to think about, so he thinks of us. I am sorry that mamma could not come with us on this trip—and I hope that we shall be back by the time Cyril arrives. Still, foolish boy, he couldn't be jealous of Mr. Gretton."

The idea of her lover, Cyril Thornton, being jealous of David Gretton, amused her; she allowed a ripple of laughter to escape from the rosy lips. At that instant something came between her and the refreshing breeze, and she looked up to see Gretton gazing at her with an expression of mingled gravity and enjoyment.

"Mr. Gretton," said Mona idly, "you really shouldn't. It isn't fair to stop the free passage of the cooling breeze."

"I beg your pardon, Mona," he said quickly, moving aside. He had called her Mona since childhood. "Do you like it? You ought to get up and walk about now; we are getting nicely outside, and you will like it all the better."

"I am just a little doubtful of that," she replied nonchalantly. "At any rate, I shall stay here for a while. Don't you think it would be a charitable thing to do, to sit down here and tell me—oh, anything you like by way of killing time?"

There was an attractiveness in the girl's manner that most men found to be irresistible. To absolute strangers, meeting her for the first time, it might have seemed flippant, but to those who knew Mona it was quite otherwise. It was simple trustfulness; she was free from worldliness, and imputed nothing but good intentions to other people.

David Gretton drew a chair close to hers and seated himself with suppressed eagerness. "It is good to be near you!" he said significantly.

Mona was surprised and just a trifle confused, as a slight flush testified. Those were the very words used by Cyril, on the occasion of their last meeting—the never-to-be-forgotten occasion when he asked her if she would wear a ring for his sake. Why had Mr. Gretton said the same? She felt an inward agitation and she refrained from looking at him. Yet it was absurd to connect the two things!

"It is very good to be where there is some air to breathe," she replied lightly, with a desire to turn the conversation. "How far do you propose to run out?"

"I do not know," was the evasive answer. "Are you anxious to get back by a certain time?"

"Yes," said Mona, without reflection. "That is," she added quickly, "I wish to be on shore when—I mean, I ought not to leave mamma alone too long, ought I?"

There was no answer to her question, which disturbed Mona; she turned her head just enough to enable her to see David Gretton from the corner of her eye, and she was startled by the eager, yearning expression; and, included in that expression was a something indefinable, a something wolfish. The situation was mystifying.

"I think I will take your advice now and walk up and down," she remarked, with pretended ease, as she sprang lightly to her feet. "Will you not be wanted to help in sailing the yacht?"

"Not for a few moments. Are you anxious to get rid of me?"

"Oh, no," cried Mona in distress. She did not wish to hurt his feelings, but she was sorry that his assistance was not needed.

"What is it?" she thought. "I—almost wish—that I hadn't come. He has never been like this before; I wonder—— It is so strange; I might be inclined to think that he was going to make love to me, but that seems absurd."

The yacht was going along steadily. The man at the wheel had an easy time, but he kept casting anxious glances at the sky. Gretton went over to him, leaving Mona for a couple of minutes, during which time he exchanged some earnest words with his subordinate.

Digitized by Google

"Let us go below," said Gretton, a few minutes later. "the breeze is stiffening, and we shall be blown about up here. It will be cool enough in the cabin, and I have something to tell you."

With a vague misgiving, Mona acceded silently to the proposal; Gretton led the way, and, on reaching the small but comfortably-furnished cabin, he placed her on the lounge and took a seat by her side.

She dared not look at his face. She heard his deep and laboured breathing, which indicated that he was at that moment a prey to strong emotion, and she felt herself trembling.

The ring on the third finger of her left hand seemed to be burning her, as if to remind her that she had plighted her troth to a good man and true, and that she must be faithful to him. "Never fear, Cyril," the thought flashed through her mind; "I will be as true to you as the sun is to the heavenly bodies which depend upon it."

"Mona, I want you."

The words were full of suppressed passion. Mona's trembling ceased; the hour of trial was at hand, and her courage increased with the demand made upon it.

"I do not quite understand you, Mr. Gretton," she said slowly, turning her beautiful eyes upon him and repressing the start which his appearance engendered. "What do you mean?"

There was really no need to ask that question; his sentence, the fierce light in his eyes, the quivering of his whole frame indicated that he was madly in love with her.

"You do not quite understand?" he cried, echoing her words. "Then you do understand. But I will tell you plainly what I mean. It is pleasing to a woman to hear a man say that he loves her, and why should I ask you, whom I adore and who are dearer to me than all else—why should I ask you to forego the sweetness of that blissful experience by assuming that you know what I am about to say?

"Mona, I love you," he seized her hand; his fingers tightened in a nervous grip about her fingers and pressed Cyril's ring against the flesh till her imagination made it feel as if it were burning her, and she longed to shriek aloud with the pain. "Mona, I love you, wholly, passionately! My love is consuming me, and you must promise to be my wife before we go ashore again."

He sank on his knees before her; he poured out his soul to her in burning words, which at first appeared to scorch her ears and her brain, but afterwards fell dully, unintelligibly upon her because she was dazed by them.

She felt powerless to stem the flood of barely coherent outpourings, but as he raised himself to draw her nearer to him, that he might kiss the pallid cheek—so strangely unlike his own flushed face—she shook herself free from his grasp and stood erect.

"Mr. Gretton," she cried haughtily. "You forget. Even if you had not known that Cyril Thornton and I were affianced, this ring"—pointing to the golden circlet—"should have commanded your respect."

He also had risen to his feet. He laughed mockingly as she held her left hand slightly raised in order to make the ring more visible.

"That!" he sneered. "A boy's gift! What does he know of love? And you—you think you love him, but it is nothing. I will teach you what love is, and you will be happy above all others."

"You are mistaken, Mr. Gretton," she replied coldly. "I am sorry for this, but we can forget it. I wish to go back at once. Please have the yacht's course altered and let us go back to shore."

The quiet determination in her tone could not be mistaken; Gretton noticed it, and it evidently came as a shock to him. He seated himself on the couch and gazed steadily at the girl, whose haughtiness of manner made her more beautiful.

"You refuse me?" he asked in a tone that indicated that he was not able to realise the fact. "Have I heard aright? Have you fully considered?"

"Yes," she said more gently. She felt sorry for him. "I regret that this incident has taken place; I am sorry that you have made a mistake. I love Cyril Thornton!"

All doubt on his part was swept aside by the manner in which she made that last statement.

As she watched him, she saw a peculiar change come over his features. His cheeks lost their flush, the expression of the eyes altered from one of passionate longing to that of a man who is bent on calmly crushing some victim of his hatred, while the lips parted in an evil smile.

"I see that I may take your decision as final!" he said with a bow. "Good! Then I fall back on my original scheme, the one which I have cherished and worked for during all these years! Sit here and listen to the story I have to tell you, and then I will show you some pictures with the drawing and painting of which I have amused myself on and off for the last two years!"

Fascinated by the cold glitter of his eyes, Mona obeyed him mechanically. She sat down at the head of the couch; he took a sketch-book from a drawer and placed it on his knees, ready to be opened at the right moment.

He spoke in measured tones, without a trace of emotion; it was a striking contrast to his outburst of a few minutes previous, yet the very coldness of his voice and manner impressed her more than his fiery declaration of love had done.

"I have been good to your mother and you ever since you were a baby; you both say so, and it is true!" he began. "People say that I was your father's friend, hence my benevolence. They speak falsely! I was your father's enemy!

"Ha! It surprises you? Yet it is true! He upset a scheme on which I had staked a good deal! He knew what he was doing and he thought it right to do it, but he did not know that I was the prime mover in it."

"I know what that was!" the girl burst forth. "He upset a villainous plot for the promotion of a company and he saved the small fortunes and the savings of thousands. They never realised how much they owed to him, and so they did not help him in his own trouble, but I am proud of his memory!"

"Just so!" said Gretton sarcastically. "Well, I was the prime mover in the plot and I vowed a fearful revenge! I was the man in the background, so your father did not suspect me, and it was easy for me to make his acquaintance and become friendly with him in the execution of my plan of revenge. Your father also did me a wrong in another way; I had fallen secretly in love with a woman, and—he proposed to her and was accepted! That is your mother!"

"A wrong!" cried the girl scornfully.

"That is what I call it!" replied Gretton coolly, "and it is on that assumption that I have worked. I have won, so far! But listen!

"I brought ruin on your father! Ha, my story is beginning to have an effect! I saw him die in anguish at the thought that he was leaving his wife and child to the mercies of a cruel, ungrateful world, and I did nothing to ease him."

"Fiend!" gasped the girl, a pain contracting her heart.

"You may call me names if it pleases you!" retorted Gretton. "After his death, I became benevolent!" He laughed in his enjoyment. "I took care of both of you; I helped you. But all the while, now and then, I have (through the agency of friends) made your mother feel the disgrace which has rested on your father's name by reason of his failure. She does not believe the rumour which others accepted so readily, that the failure was a disgraceful one, but she has to bear the stigma, and I take care that she shall feel it from time to time! Of course it was I who originated the rumour!"

Nothing could equal the callous cruelty of the man who was thus torturing the girl to whom he had made violent love only a few short minutes ago. It was one of those freaks of human nature which, unhappily, are not so rare as one would be glad to think!

"Well," he continued, "I cherished the hope of one day dealing her a crushing blow. I made up my mind that, when you were old enough to have an idea of what life is and when she was doting upon you, I would kill you!" Mona was too horrified to utter even an exclamation of dismay. "I have drawn and painted scenes of various ways in which I would kill you!" continued the wretch. "You must look at them! They are all well executed, and you form the central figure in all! The last one is the method I have chosen!"

Digitized by Google

Was this man mad? No, Mona could not say that he was, terrible as it was to suppose that he was deliberately saying this with the full knowledge of what he was doing!

She saw the pictures as he turned them over, one by one; she was obliged to look at them, she could not take her eyes from them. They were masterly paintings. In each one she saw herself suffering death in some form or other. The last one she recognised as that appropriate to the circumstances of the moment.

"There!" he cried, shutting up the book. "When I had finally decided, a strange thing happened; I fell in love with my victim! My love increased; I tried to fight against it, but it mastered me. Then I heard of your engagement, but I said to myself that I should conquer! If you had said 'Yes!' you would have saved your life and spared your mother the agony that awaits her! Will you change your mind?"

"I cannot!" cried Mona, springing up. "Help! Help! The two men will assist me!"

"They are in my pay!" hissed Gretton, grasping her wrists. We can easily arrange to save ourselves! A storm is arising; the yacht will sink, but we shall not pull out the plugs from the holes made in the bottom till we are near a vessel. It will be an ordinary wreck, and no suspicion will fall upon us!"

She struggled to wrench herself free, but he held her tightly while he told her of the grief of mother and lover. Then he forced her back suddenly and placed something against her nostrils, and all was blank.

A dash of something cold on her face was her next sensation. Mona had no need to open her eyes in order to comprehend her position. She had seen it in the picture which, with incredible refinement of cruelty, Gretton had painted and shown to her.

She was tied to a piece of timber which she had seen on the deck of the yacht, the cords were passed round her body and ankles, her arms hanging loosely, her hair was flowing in the wind.

She was being tossed about on the water, the sport of the waves, first on the crest of a billow and then in the trough of the sea. She could tell that the wind had risen and was blowing half a gale; the sky was overcast, a storm was imminent. No friendly vessel was near; alone on the wide sea her fate was a matter of merely a brief space of time!

Her own fate did not trouble her; the terror of it had passed away in the thought of the agony of her lover and mother when her lifeless and bruised body should be found and carried to them!

The words of Gretton came back to her with fearful vividness, he had intended that they should! He had given her a word-picture of the scene that would follow, and Mona cried aloud in bitterness of spirit that the dear ones might be spared this blow!

Suddenly a great squall of wind swept over the sea and for a moment she was submerged. It came just as she was asking aloud why the perpetrators of this crime should escape. Mona knew it not, but that squall caught the yacht unprepared for a sudden veering of the wind, and it heeled her over like a toy, without warning.

One man was below and he was drowned in the vessel; Gretton and the other man found themselves in the water, clinging to a plank. They held on to their frail raft like grim death, but presently, as a wave took them, they saw a heavy piece of timber, with a white-robed figure bound to it, being hurled towards them in the choppy sea.

With a cry of dismay they tried to push their plank out of its course, but it struck them violently, and when it had passed over them and they rose to the surface they were incapable of further mischief! It was a just and appropriate punishment; they had been sent to their long account by the intermediary of the instrument which had been utilised for the sacrifice of Mona!

The squall subsided as suddenly as it had arisen and the sea became calm; it reminded old sailors of the time when the ill-fated training ship Eurydice went down in the Channel. Mona's beam rested on the surface and the water rippled against it almost playfully.

The coastguard had noted the disappearance of the yacht, and a lifeboat was sent out to save the crew if they were floating on the waves. To their intense astonishment, they found Mona, and, cutting her free, they took her into the boat and brought her unconscious to shore.

The home-coming of Mona was sad, but not the misfortune that Gretton had designed. Mrs. Barron was unaware of what had happened till two hours later, by which time Mona had been restored to life. Cyril Thornton, having been delayed, did not arrive till evening and was spared much of the pain that would otherwise have fallen to his lot.

Mona did not relate all the details of the short cruise in the Salva, but she had to explain that Gretton had tied her to the timber and sent her adrift out of revenge.

The statement was disbelieved at first, but it was so evident that the yacht was overturned too suddenly to give anyone time to do such a thing merely as a measure of safety, that people were forced to believe it. They concluded that Gretton had gone mad, but Mona knew better, although she did not contradict the report.

The severe nervous shock, occasioned by the terrible ordeal through which she had passed, necessitated a prolonged stay abroad and a complete change of scene. Mrs. Barron, having lost her vengeful benefactor, had scarcely any resources to fall back on, so Cyril Thornton came to the rescue. Mrs. Barron objected at first, declaring that it was not fair to him.

"I can work," she said with calm dignity, "and I would have worn my fingers to the bone and have brought Mona up to work in a factory for her living rather than have touched a farthing of that money! No, Mr. Thornton, I cannot accept!"

"Mona is to be my wife," urged the young man, "and I want her to be strong. So she must go away, and you must go with her to take care of her, because I insist! I have the right to insist, have I not, dearest?" he added to his future wife.

So Mrs. Barron yielded. And, just as misfortunes do not always come singly, so does it occasionally happen that strokes of good fortune tread quickly on one another. On the very wedding-day Mrs. Barron received from Gretton's solicitor some notes found in his late client's private drawer, and those notes exculpated her husband and vindicated her own steadfast belief in his integrity!

George Day.

"What do you consider the hardest problem of a man's existence?" "Getting his own consent to crawl out of bed in the morning."

Thirteen young women died last year on the day named for their wedding. And yet young ladies continue to run the risk of meeting a similar fate.

"How in the world, Mrs. Wisely, do you manage to have all of your three daughters in so early when they spend the evening out?" "The last one home has to get breakfast next morning."

Alice: "Marie was so annoyed. She heard that a certain concern was using her photograph as an advertisement——" Grace: "You don't mean it!" Alice: "Yes, and when she investigated the matter she found it wasn't her photograph at all."

"I think, Charlie," said Mrs. Smallface to her hopeful, "that I shall put you into long trousers very soon." "But not until after Christmas, ma?" "Why not?" "Oh, because you know, ma, I shall have to go into short stockings, and they don't hold much."

Digitized by Google

A Story which Proves that Eavesdropping Does Not Pay.

Miss Eva Braxton was nervously happy, and the cause of this peculiar state of mind was very simple. Mr. John Morgan had proposed on the previous evening and had intimated his intention of calling to see Mr. Braxton on the following afternoon and formally asking his consent to the marriage.

In ordinary circumstances, the lady would naturally feel both happy and nervous during the time that her lover was interviewing his prospective father-in-law, even although she might feel quite positive that father would raise no objection. In this instance, however, the nervousness was due to a double cause.

Miss Braxton had begun by feeling nervous in the usual way, but all at once a thought struck her and increased the feeling.

Why was he so long in returning to her in the drawing-room? It surely could not be that papa had raised any objection? Then it must be that John was discussing this transaction as he did almost every other. It seemed absurd, but she was bound to admit that it would be just like him!

This is how it was. Mr. Braxton and John Morgan had become great friends during the past twelve months or so. They lived near to one another; their business brought them frequently together in the City, and in spite of the difference of fifteen years in age, they suited each other admirably. The friendship had grown to such an extent that the one would scarcely take any step without consulting the other.

For these reasons it seemed that the marriage was most desirable; it would be a source of happiness to Mr. Braxton as well as to the young people. John Morgan was only thirty-two—seven years older than Eva. He would welcome the proposal warmly. But it was just there that the vexatious thought came in.

"John is so accustomed to discuss everything with father that it is more than probable that he will actually ask father some questions about my personal qualifications!" said Eva. "I don't think it would strike either of them as out-of-the-way; they are used to it.

"Father would naturally think a great deal of me, but he is such a strange man, and has been away so much, that he does not know me so well as some people, and he would honestly discuss me.

"I am not angry at the idea that he would say anything against me, because I know he wouldn't and couldn't!" (This last word very emphatically.) "But it is the idea of being overhauled that vexes me!"

Then Miss Eva Braxton smiled and shook herself, figuratively. What nonsense was this? She was foolish!

She tried to dismiss the subject and make herself easy with a book for a few minutes longer; but it was too difficult a task, and the thought came back and settled on her like a nightmare.

She was apt to be quick to take offence and just as quick to be sorry for the outburst. The long absence of her lover—he had been gone quite twenty minutes—irritated her.

"I'll go after him!" she decided.

And she lost no more time. Passing from the drawing-room in the front to the apartment behind it, where she expected to find her father and her lover, she saw the door standing open and one glance showed her that the room was empty. Where were they?

The blinds were down, for the sun streamed through the windows into that room during the afternoon and made it unbearably warm. She was about to pass on when the sound of voices came to her ears. The windows were open, to let in such air as might be puffing lazily about, and it was through the open French window that the sound of voices came to her.

"They are outside," murmured Eva. "I'll go to them."

She crossed the apartment, her feet making no noise on the soft carpet, and stood behind the blinds.

Just as she was about to pull the blind aside and pass through the window, the old notion came back to her with greater force, and she resolved to wait a minute and listen.

"I usually ask you for your opinion on anything that interests me," Tom was saying, "and this is a matter that affects you more than most transactions. Then you think she really will suit?"

"Well, John, I do not know that I can be so positive as that," said Mr. Braxton deprecatingly. "In giving my opinion, I have, it is true, spoken from my experience, but at the same time I have borne in mind what others have said. I cannot, as you will understand, give so reliable a verdict as others."

"Then he is talking me over, and, worse than all, my father is speaking diffidently about his daughter!"

Eva's face reddened with anger; she was wrathful enough to have confronted them on the spot and put them both to shame, but her curiosity got the better of her annoyance, and she decided to listen to a few more of their choice observations concerning herself.

Her father refrained from giving a decisive opinion because he had been abroad and he left it to others, to strangers, to give a correct verdict! As if their opinions would not be biassed by jealousy!

"You see, she must have a gentle disposition or she won't be manageable if anything happens to disturb her ordinary running," said John, in a grave tone. "I've heard that she can show temper, and a good deal of it, at times, and that's what makes me nervous about her. I heard that only this morning, and it worried me, because, you see, I have as good as settled the affair! I absolutely must have one with a quiet disposition!"

Digitized by Google

"A quiet disposition!" murmured Eva sneeringly. "I suppose I must be as meek as a lamb, not daring to open my mouth under any provocation, while you, the lord and master, can throw the things about and 'say things,' as you slangily put it! Worried, oh? Because you have as good as settled the affair? Oh, you can be released at once!"

"—— worry about that!" were the next words heard by the irate young lady behind the blind. They were spoken by her father.

"No," said John reflectively. "I suppose I could cry off by paying a small forfeit! Otherwise she is not a bad creature. A little too thin, perhaps, occasionally throws her legs out too much in running—not so graceful as she might be, but I can wink at that."

"Oh, that isn't much to grumble about in the circumstances, because she is for everyday use, so to say. She wouldn't make any show at all among the more aristocratic creatures in the Row; but you don't want her for that or I would say 'Don't have her!' You want one that is quiet, easy to drive, and not likely to make a fuss!"

"Exactly!" agreed John. "But I'm disturbed about what I heard this morning, and I won't absolutely clinch the bargain till I've found out more about her!"

"I don't blame you, and I am sorry that I cannot help you much this time. I share your views entirely!"

"All right!" said John. "I'll let you know as soon as I find out. I say"—looking at his watch and rising hurriedly—"I must get back to Eva! Whatever will she think I've been up to? I want to keep it dark from her!"

Eva drew aside the blind and stepped out, confronting the two men with flashing eyes.

"There is no need to hurry yourself about coming back to me, Mr. Morgan!" she said sarcastically. "As it happens, I have heard a good deal of your interesting conversation! I can quite understand that you wish to keep it dark. I also comprehend your anxiety at the prospect of having a wife with some spirit in her. You men always prefer a woman who will meekly submit to everything and walk about the house like a tame bird, afraid to—to—— "

She stopped; her anger would not permit her to continue. She turned to her father and blazed forth at him.

"I never thought that you, my dear father, would talk like that about me! Oh, it is too bad!"

"My dear Eva, I——" began Mr. Braxton, his voice betraying the utmost bewilderment.

But Eva turned from him to John Morgan.

"You need make no payment in order to be rid of so undesirable a wife as I should make! Perhaps I have a temper. I will relieve you from the necessity of making inquiries—I have a temper. I will release you. There is your ring!" (Taking it off and throwing it at his feet.) "I don't want to see you again; I despise you! Oh, to think that you should both talk about me as if I were a horse or a dog, or——Thin, am I?"

"My dear Eva," expostulated her father, "I was talking about a horse!"

"A—horse?" gasped Eva, brought to her senses by her father's look and his emphatic statement. "What——"

"I was thinking of buying a horse suitable for my wife to ride and I consulted my old friend," declared John coldly. "However, there will be no need to trouble further! I am not likely to marry, for, although I do not object to spirit, I do not relish the notion of being spied on and it would be a sad thing for a woman to marry a man whom she despises and whom she actually thinks could be guilty of such manners as you credit me with! I do not ask for meekness, but I want a fairly gentle disposition. Good afternoon!"

She wanted to hold out her hands to him and ask for forgiveness but her pride held her back till it was too late. He was gone and she had lost her lover.

She waited for him to come again, but he had gone to Australia; he decided to go to the Antipodes in furtherance of his business. She waited for some sign from him after his return, but none came. Then she humbled herself and wrote to him.

"I am obliged for your note," he wrote back, "and I am ready to forgive, but it is difficult to forget. Besides, I have come to the conclusion that I should not run well in double harness."

Miss Eva Braxton burnt the note sorrowfully and registered a vow to remain single.

H. Bramley.

PETER'S PATRON.

Telling of a Rivalry Between Poetry and Love.

Peter Griffin was a poet and poor. This in itself is not a wonderful thing, but Peter was by no means blest in the knowledge that many other followers of the muse were similarly circumstanced.

He had longings—a "soul" some call it. But such sordid details of everyday life as bread and cheese, to say nothing of a little butter upon the bread, perpetually interfered with his inspirations. Even poets must live!

He was not a prig, nor was he conceited. He did not believe that he ought to be Poet Laureate instead of Alfred Austin. In fact, I do not think he envied that personage in the least.

He had written some fairly successful songs, for which he received the usual modest remuneration; he had contributed poems and verses to magazines and newspapers, and in some cases the editors thereof had imitated Oliver Twist, and asked for "more."

He did not affect long hair, nor did he wear a shabby velvet coat. He was just twenty-six, had a berth in the City; but he carefully concealed from his fellow clerks the fact of his poetic capabilities, and was simply an ordinary young man of the day, both in appearance and conversation.

It was a dreary winter evening, and Peter had been "touching up" some new poems before sending them to an editor. He sat in his somewhat dingy bed-sitting room in the suburbs, and dreamt he was famous.

He had been reading, a short while previously, I think it was Walter Besant's "Chaplain of the Fleet," and he mentally compared himself to poor Solomon Stallabrass, the starveling poet in that story.

Why did not rich men and women become patrons of the poetic muse in these times? he wondered.

Was there not one soul in all London who admired the art sufficiently to endow the poet with such pecuniary means as would stimulate him to write an epic, instead of having to scribble verses to bring him bread and cheese ?

Digitized by Google

Peter felt in his heart that if such a one would but come forward, be his patron, and free him from dire necessity by making him comparatively independent, he could produce a noble, even a great poem.

But, cramped by uncongenial surroundings, the dull daily routine of an office, and the sheer need of having to write that which was saleable, he had the desire to do greater things without the possibility of doing them.

Such a patron as he dreamt of would not only enable him to write at ease, but would insure to the world a work that should hand the name "Paul Lawrence," Peter's nom de plume, down to posterity, and do incalculable good to the cause of art.

His musings were interrupted by the postman's knock. A few moments later the grimy maid of all work brought him a letter. It bore the imprint of the publishers of a magazine to which he had frequently contributed verses of a somewhat higher class than usual.

He tore it open, to find it contained an inclosure, a crested envelope, addressed to him, care of the editor. He opened this and read :

"520, Eaton Square, S.W.

"Lady Anstruther, having greatly admired the poems signed 'Paul Lawrence,' would be glad and honored if their author would kindly call upon her."

Peter's heart gave a great thump and then stood still. A patron at last ! He rubbed his eyes, and read the letter again. Was it a hoax ? No, it could not be ; no one who would be likely to play such a joke upon him knew his poetic proclivities.

None of his colleagues at the office, from manager—nay, from principal even—to office boy, knew of his other name and existence.

He looked at his watch. It was Saturday, on which day he cast off the trammels of the City and put on the toga of the poet—only in a metaphorical sense, of course—at two o'clock. It was now six. He would don his best and call upon Lady Anstruther that very evening.

Never in all his six-and-twenty years of life had Peter dressed himself with more care and thought. He discarded tie after tie in his anxiety to look his best. Even when he finally decided which one to wear, he was doubtful whether his first choice was not better taste.

At last he drew on a new pair of gloves and set out, after a lengthened survey of himself in the cheap looking-glass.

To make assurance doubly sure, he stopped on his way at a stationer's, and, referring to a London Directory, found that Lady Anstruther did live at 520, Eaton Square.

It was with a beating heart that he arrived at that house, and summoned up his courage to give a correct rat-tat ! with the knocker.

The door was opened by a footman gorgeous in red coat, white stockings, knee breeches and powdered hair. Her ladyship was in, said this being condescendingly, and Peter was ushered in a languid manner into a morning room. He had not waited, with a certain feeling of trepidation, more than two minutes when her ladyship rushed—literally rushed into the room.

She was a short, stout, white-haired lady, of some sixty years, with a benevolent countenance and a gushing manner. She grasped our poet with both hands.

"Welcome !" she cried enthusiastically. "How very good of you to come so soon ! But, oh, you do not look in the least like a poet ! I feel quite disappointed !"

"I am very sorry !" was all that Peter could stammer out.

"No matter ; it is not the man but the mind that we measure."

Poor Peter could not but feel this remark was somewhat unflattering.

"Please be seated, and let me tell you why I so wished to see you. You must know that I am an intense admirer of the muse of poetry. And your poems are so truly beautiful, so high in aim, so perfect in every respect, that I wanted to meet you, to help you, to spur you on to far greater things, to nobler aspirations, to be your—your what is it ?"

"Patron," suggested Peter boldly.

"That is the word—your patron ; and when you are great and famous—a Byron, a Tennyson, nay, a Shakespeare perhaps, who can say—the world will speak your name and say : 'Louisa Lady Anstruther was his friend, his patron, his discoverer. To her we owe him !'"

Her ladyship paused, partly for effect, and partly from want of breath.

"You are too good !" murmured Peter.

"Not a word. Do not deprecate yourself. By so doing you question my good taste, Mr. Lawrence."

She looked at him so closely and steadily that Peter began to feel a trifle uncomfortable.

"You are good-looking and young. You have the world before you. With my aid and influence it will be at your feet in a few years' time. Tell me about yourself."

Peter told her. She nodded, interpolating "Yes," "Excellent," "Capital," here and there.

"You will leave the City, of course," she said when Peter had finished. "I am glad you have no relatives. I shall of course adopt you. I have no children ; you will be my son. I shall make you a handsome allowance to enable you to write in comfort. You will go into Society—the best—with me, and you will commence at once. Now, if you will."

Her volubility took away Peter's breath.

"I shall allow you——" She named a sum beyond his wildest dreams. "You must have a valet. He will teach you how to dress. That tie, for instance, is atrocious ! You could not wear that in my house."

Poor Peter !

"Where do you live ?"

Peter told her.

"You will dine with me to-night. I have a few friends to whom I shall introduce you. You will drop your own name. I will order the carriage to take you back to your—your home, where you can dress and return here. The carriage will wait for you. We do not dine until nine."

Her enthusiasm bewildered Peter, swept him off his feet. But he contrived to murmur what he meant to be thanks.

Her ladyship rang the bell and ordered the carriage imperiously. When it was announced, she gave him her hand, saying : "Au revoir," and, seized by a sudden happy impulse, Peter stooped and kissed it.

"Very pretty !" said her ladyship, to whom all flattery was honey, "but not quite so gracefully done as it could be. However, you will learn. Stay, have you money ?"

"Enough," stammered our poet.

"Pay your landlady, or whatever you call the person, out of this."

She handed him a pleasantly plump purse, which Peter was too bewildered to refuse.

Was he dreaming ? Was he on his head or his heels ? Was he going mad ? Peter wondered, as the carriage bore him back to his dingy suburban lodgings. How lucky, thought he, that he possessed a dress suit ! Then for the first time since he had read Lady Anstruther's letter he remembered something that he had not spoken of or thought about.

Nellie ! Nellie, his simple, humble little sweetheart ! Poor Nellie—loving, trusting, tender-hearted, curly-haired Nellie !

Peter's heart gave him a twinge of pain. This would part them for ever. He knew that Nellie and his new patron were as wide apart, socially, as the Poles. Poor Nellie !

Her sweet little face with the soft, pitiful eyes came before him as he packed up his belongings and put on his dress clothes. Already she seemed a part of some other existence he had once led. He must write to her, do something for her, help her—but he could never marry her. To his credit let it be recorded that Peter felt despicably mean.

He tried to dismiss her from his thoughts that evening, driving back to Eaton Square, during dinner, and afterwards. But ever and again her face came before him with tearful, reproachful, yet tender eyes, and he was anything but happy.

Digitized by Google

He got through dinner successfully, being fairly apt, and, though not quite at ease, quick-witted enough not to betray himself. His patron was delighted with her protégé. From that night Peter Griffin died and Paul Lawrence took his place.

Was he happy? He did not know—he could not say. The life was a dream of ease and luxury. A study was fitted up for him, with creamy, hand-made notepaper to write upon and an expensive gold-mounted fountain pen to inspire him. Here he sat when not driving or visiting with Lady Anstruther.

But he wrote nothing. New clothes poured in upon him. He was made much of by the ladies, flattered and flirted with. He wrote to Nellie, and now and then in some lovely drawing-room, surrounded by charming women and in an atmosphere of ease and cultured leisure, her sorrowful face would arise, not to reproach him, but to remind him of the time when it had seemed to him the very sweetest in the world.

Poor Nellie! She would forget him in time. He must marry well. His patron said so.

But he wrote nothing. One day he sat down intending to commence a great epic. He sat for an hour without result. He did not write a single line. He could not!

Then the horror of the thing suddenly fastened upon him. Suppose he could not write any more! The blood in his veins tingled at the thought; his hands grew clammy, his head swam giddily. The fear drove him frantic. He turned again to his table and picked up his pen. He wrote furiously, feverishly.

Rubbish—utter silly jingle, with halting metre and not a poetic idea in it!

He threw down his pen and went for a long walk. When on his return, he tried again, the result was the same. Failure! He could not write a line!

Then he realised that the muse had forsaken him. It was no avail to hope the morrow would bring her back. He knew it would not; nor would a hundred to-morrows. He was as certain as that he was living that he would never write again. Poet he was, but now he was an impostor, a fraud, a lie.

His brain throbbed at the thought. The happy, tender ideas and fancies that had thrilled him in his dingy room, here, amid comfort, wealth, and luxury, would not come. And he knew that they never would come, too; knew it without hope of doubt.

His whirling thoughts returned to Nellie. How her tender face and simple, loving ways would have comforted him! But he had cut himself adrift from her for ever by his choice. And this—this was his punishment.

His patron found Paul Lawrence strangely absent at dinner that night.

There was a large and fashionable party, and those who expected something poetic from him must have gone, so far as that was concerned, empty away. It is to be trusted that they consoled themselves with the reflection that poets, of all men, shine least in society.

Lady Anstruther quietly rallied him, and hinted that he was thinking out an epic. Poor Paul! He gave a sickly smile, and made an apology that he did not mean. So soon did he begin to play the hypocrite. But for how long?

Those terse, pregnant words haunted him for long after. For how long could he keep up?

He knew—none better—that he would never write even so much as a quatrain or a rondeau in the lap of luxury, much less the great epic his patron expected of him.

How he bore the next week—fortnight—month, Paul Lawrence never knew. Every day he tried to write—it was a waste of beautiful paper and the best ink money could buy. Yet in his dingy, dirty garret, he could scribble without ceasing, ideas flowed, thoughts came to him; though the paper on which he wrote was bought by the pound, cheaply, and his inkstand was—a penny ink bottle! And he's patron!

Ah, that was the point. Even the most complaisant of patrons are anxious to see the results of their patronage.

To Lady Anstruther's surprise, then disappointment, and at the last annoyance, there were no results.

This story is not a tragedy, though to poor Peter it began to assume almost those dimensions. He tried to avoid Lady Anstruther, but he could not. He began to fear she was growing suspicious.

He was not far wrong. And all the while he had to play the liar and the hypocrite, while he knew very well in his heart the lap of luxury was not the place in which to write poems, or, indeed, to do any kind of work worthy of the world for which it is written. He knew his brain was dulled by the artificiality of the life he led. He knew it.

But he thought of Nellie. Where was she? Was she breaking her heart because he, as others had done before him, had chosen luxury rather than love? And she had loved him, with tender eyes, clinging soft hands, and tears of admiration in the former which were a million times more eloquent than all the fulsome praises of his patron's friends.

He thought of Nellie—his old sweetheart. But even thinking of her could not bring him back his lost gift.

One very wet night Lady Anstruther went out to dine without him. He had pleaded that he wanted to "think out" some work; but even then he fancied he saw something like contempt in his patron's eyes. Was he right? he wondered.

True, the poem he had shown her the day before was a poor effort. But—it was the best he could do.

When alone he made no attempt to write. He put on a macintosh and went out. Miserable at heart, through the rainy, miserable streets he went, whither he hardly knew.

It was an absolute relief to be free. He suddenly felt hunger. He went into a restaurant and had a chop from the grill, and he enjoyed it more than a ten course dinner!

He went out, after paying his modest bill, with a queer feeling throbbing at his heart. He looked round him dazedly. The part to which he had wandered seemed strangely familiar. He looked again; he was in the very same suburban street in which he used to meet Nellie! And there she stood, under the gas-lamp—a little white-faced, pathetic figure, with oh, so sad eyes. She ran to meet him with a cry.

"Oh, dear, dear love, I knew you would come back to me!" And the poet could not speak, so he simply took her in his arms under that twinkling, unconscious gas-lamp and kissed her.

How she clung to him, how her soft eyes filled with tears, how she held his hand in her cold fingers!

With a mad impulse her lover—he was that still—tore off his gloves, threw his silk hat into the roadway, where a passing cab promptly converted it into unrecognisability, and took her again into his arms. Ah, there are some things words cannot express.

"Forgive me!" he said.

"What have I to forgive, love?" was all Nellie replied.

Was it all a dream? thought Peter. Yet no! There were his hat and gloves—his patron's gift; he was bareheaded, in the rain, under a gas-lamp, with Nellie's arms about him. Thank God, it was not a dream.

* * * * * * *

That was how Peter never went back again to Eaton Square; how Lady Anstruther had occasion to bemoan the "ingratitude of the poetic temperament," and how Nellie found her lover.

But the world did not lose a poet, because Peter's patron frequently sees and hears the name of Paul Lawrence, though she never speaks of him, nor will ever meet him again.

He is successful, happy, contented; and he has Nellie. And he knows that the poet's patron is not luxury, but—Love.

Clifton Bingham.

"Don't you want to leave footprints on the sands of time?" asked the mentor. "No," answered the young man, who is ambitious but lazy, "I'd rather leave carriage ruts."

He (reading item in newspaper): "It is estimated that in a few thousand years the human race will have become entirely destitute of teeth." She: "And yet you want Tommy to be a dentist."

Digitized by Google

CLOSING DATE: AUGUST 27TH.

Letter Juggling Competition.

CASH DOWN. FIRST PRIZE, £25.	CASH DOWN. SECOND PRIZE, £10.	CASH DOWN. THIRD PRIZE, £5.

TWO BILLIARD TABLES (measuring 4 ft. 10 inches by 2 ft. 8½ inches), together with cues, balls, marking board, and spirit level,
And TWENTY-FIVE GRAMOPHONES, each one fitted with a Concert Sound-Box, and accompanied by two records.

● ● ● ● ● ● ●

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct. Only one name must be written on each line.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and fasten it to the other eleven lists, in order of date, then post them all in an envelope addressed to The Editor, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., so as to arrive not later than by first post on Thursday, August 27th. Put the words "Juggled Letters" on the top left-hand corner of the envelope.

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

TWELFTH LIST.

133. CEEFKLLLORSU	139. ADDEIIKLNOST .....
134. ACEFOOPRV	140. ABCEKLLMNOÓP .....
135. AACCHIILNRRT	141. ACEFGHILNO .....
136. BEGLOOPRSS	142. ADEGHLORTUY .....
137. AACILLLMNOR	143. AAACGHILLNNPR .....
138. ACIKRWW	144. ABCEEFNORT .....

I agree to abide by the Editor's decision in this Competition.

Name..... Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

Powerful New Series.

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

THE FIRST SIX EPISODES.

Though my real name is not Olive Beresford, I am calling myself that for the purpose of these confessions. An aunt had left me an income of £150 a year, and just as I was wondering how I should occupy my time, I received a letter from Annabel Vernon, an old school-friend, who was now married, to come and spend the week at Vernon Towers.

I was delighted to accept the invitation, and arrived on the Friday evening, being met by Mr. Vernon at the station. The house party consisted of a Mrs. Grainger, Mr. Taskot and Mr. Dean Fisher, who was an expert Bridge player.

After dinner, a Mr. Bainbrig and his sister, near neighbours of the Vernons, arrived, and Bridge was proposed. Miss Bainbrig and I were novices at the game, and Mr. Fisher undertook to teach us how to play, Mr. Taskot making the fourth at our table. We played for a penny a game—at least, that was what I understood penny points to mean—and I congratulated myself that my partner and I were doing very well. The scores were not added up that evening, so I did not know exactly how matters stood.

On the Saturday morning I got up early and went for a walk, during which I met Mr. Taskot, who told me that he had lost heavily the previous night after the ladies had retired.

That same evening we played Bridge again, and when the scores were added up Annabel told me that my losses amounted to £11 7s. 10d.

This sum meant a great deal to me, and I wondered how I was ever to pay it. I made friends with Mr. Taskot, and learnt from him that I was supposed to be an heiress. When I told him how matters really stood he promised to help me.

We met the following morning, Sunday, before breakfast at the spot where we had previously encountered one another. Mr. Taskot told me that I had only been asked to Vernon Towers that my friends, as I thought them, might fleece me. He promised to lend me the £11 7s. 10d., and we fixed upon a code of signals by which we might meet the sharpers on an equal footing.

Unfortunately, Mrs. Grainger, on her way to early service at church, saw us together. I then knew that I should hear more of the meeting.

In the afternoon, while the other members of the party occupied themselves with cards, I went for a walk, during which I was rescued from a mad dog by a Mr. Maurice Ray, who gave vent to an expression almost of surprise when he learnt where I was staying.

On the Monday I sat down to the card-table with delight, looking forward to having my revenge.

EPISODE SEVEN.

Fluctuating Resolutions.

Our scheme worked admirably at first, and I became so excited at winning one game after another, that I was in danger of being too careless in exploiting the code of signals agreed upon. Being now better acquainted with the ramifications of Bridge, I was not misled by apparent success, but paid very particular attention to the honours scores, and knew how the games were really going.

"Our luck is good to-day, eh?" smiled Mr. Taskot. "But that must not tempt us into playing carelessly."

The last word was accompanied by a warning glance which had its intended effect, and I curbed the exuberance of spirit I had begun to show.

The Vernons looked thoroughly mystified, and the growing frown on Annabel's face indicated the vexation of spirit which her unusual losses were occasioning her.

Mr. Fisher was also surprised, for it must have seemed astonishing for his accustomed methods of card manipulation to have no better result than to make his losses greater.

Mrs. Grainger had a headache, she said, and preferred not to play until evening, but I think the true reason of her abstinence was to be found in the fact that she was an invariable loser, and wished to impose some kind of limit to her disbursements.

Harry and Annabel Vernon took turns at making a fourth, and I think nobody but Mr. Taskot and I was sorry when luncheon time put a stop to play for the time being.

On second thoughts, I am not sure I wasn't glad myself, for Mr. Fisher was beginning to make me feel rather uncomfortable by his curious glances. He was watching me very keenly, and, towards the last, I became almost afraid to pursue the tactics which had answered so well up to then.

So, upon the whole, it was just as well that we ceased playing, and I'm sure I enjoyed my lunch all the better for knowing that I was now a good many pounds into pocket. I had not stopped to argue that I had no business to indulge in the scheme of retaliation after I had recouped the losses which I had just cause to resent. It was enough for me that Mr. Taskot considered it quite fair to fight our tricky entertainers with their own weapons.

To tell the truth, the glamour of gambling already had me in its grip, and when, early in the afternoon, there was made a perfunctory suggestion that we should have a game of tennis, I was one of the first to negative it.

"Considering you are such a novice, you have made astonishing havoc with other people's pockets," observed Mr. Fisher, with a benevolent smile, which seemed to indicate that he did not mind having lost a trifle himself. "If ever anybody else wants lessons from me, I think I shall cite you as the most prodigiously clever pupil I have ever coached."

"Thank you," I laughed. "You are pleased to flatter me. But perhaps my luck may change this afternoon."

"A change of partners might easily influence your luck."

I gave an involuntary start of alarm at this remark. Was it possible that Mr. Fisher suspected what was really happening, and that Mr. Taskot's clever code of signals had not proved subtle enough to avoid detection? And, if so, was the remark about a change of partners intended as a hint to that effect?

The idea gave me such a shock that I resolved not to handle another card except in scrupulously fair play, for I had become suddenly alive to the folly and wickedness of what I had been persuaded by Mr. Taskot's specious arguments to do. But another glance at Mr. Fisher's guileless face convinced me that my fleeting suspicion was nothing more than the outcome of an accusing conscience, and I breathed freely once more.

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Grainger found it impossible to resist playing till evening, especially after it transpired that a table had been fixed in the verandah, where we could indulge in our fascinating amusement without losing the benefit of fresh air and sunshine. But Harry Vernon said that he had some business to attend to, and Mr. Fisher announced his intention of devoting a couple of hours to his arrears of correspondence.

This left but four of us for Bridge, and Mr. Taskot, who was to be my partner again, asked me to have a short promenade with him on the terrace until our opponents were ready to play.

"I have something important to say to you," he observed, as soon as we were out of hearing of everybody else. "Do you know, Miss Beresford, that you forfeited a big winning by not giving me the signals in the last game?"

"I know," was my murmured reply. "But we had got our losses back before then, and I was nervous too. I fancied that both Mr. Fisher and Mr. Vernon were suspicious, and dared not go on."

"If that is all, you may rest assured that you were mistaken. I am positive that our secret is safe."

Our secret is safe!

The phrase jarred on me. I had been easily persuaded to do a foolish thing. But I had not contemplated making common cause with a man who would allude to the transaction as "our secret," and my eyes flashed with vexation.

"There is all the more reason then," I said sharply, "that the matter shall go no further. I am sorry I gave any signals at all."

"You will be more sorry, if you do not give a succession of them."

"How so?"

"Well, thereby hangs a tale. I told you before that I had detected the Vernons and Fisher in sharp practice?"

"Yes."

"And I also told you that the only way to fight them was by using 'counter irritants,' as the doctors say. At present, you and I stand to be slightly into pocket, so far as to-day's play is concerned. But, while I was smoking a cigarette on the verandah, just beneath the window of Harry Vernon's own den, I heard him and Mr. Fisher drilling a new scheme of spoliation into Mrs. Vernon, by which our pockets are to be practically turned inside out.

"Now I have an objection to be swindled. I have also an objection to creating a scene, and it will please me to leave here without giving the slightest indication that I have fathomed the rascality which is going on. So I think we had better adopt defensive measures again, and it will be Mrs. Vernon's own fault if her fresh attempt at roguery is a failure. And be sure you still let them think that you are an heiress."

Mr. Taskot's statements made me feel very angry, and, in spite of previous resolutions, I agreed once more to defend myself as he wished, particularly after he hinted at the pleasure it might give me to use my winnings in buying a present for Annabel, which would more than pay for the selfish hospitality that had been tendered to me.

EPISODE EIGHT.

A Thunderbolt.

I sat down to the game in a curious mood. Of course the best way to avoid being fleeced again would have been to refrain from playing. But I was fascinated to such an extent that I could not resist the opportunity of trying my hand at it once more. After this visit was ended, I was not likely to have many chances of playing Bridge again, and I wanted to make the most of what time remained to me for the thrilling pleasure.

Besides, it would do the Vernons good to meet with their match, and I owed them a bitter grudge, not only for what they had done, but for what they intended to do.

Mrs. Grainger was exceedingly pleased to have Annabel for her partner, for the latter was spoken of as a sort of mascot, to whom luck showed himself a staunch attendant, and in whose company, therefore, it was more than probable that former losses would be won back.

Annabel's mood puzzled me a little until I recollected that her taciturnity was probably caused by the close attention she was paying to the new scheme of fleecing into which she had recently been drilled by her husband and Mr. Fisher.

The same idea evidently struck Mr. Taskot, for he smiled meaningly at me, and I nodded back, just to show him that I did not mean to allow myself to be swindled.

For awhile my partner and I had no difficulty in winning, and I looked in vain for the tactics which I had been warned to expect. However, I reflected that we were only being allowed to forge ahead in the game for a couple of small score rubbers to lull our suspicions, and at the first indication of a change of luck, I brought my defensive measures into operation.

Once, when Annabel was dealing, I distinctly saw her slip two cards up her sleeve, while she was pretending to bend down for one that had dropped by design, of course.

"So," I thought, "that is how you manage to have such good trumps, milady! You secure a couple of leading cards, probably both of the same suit, and then you choose your trumps to fit in with the honours cards you have secreted! But what becomes of the surplus cards?"

Very critical observation convinced me of two things. Annabel had not hampered herself with extra cards to get rid of, but had selected a couple while shuffling, and had dealt the rest out so dexterously that only a suspicious observer could detect any sharp practice on her part.

Mr. Taskot had not missed what was going on. But he shot me a warning glance, which I interpreted as a hint not to betray the discovery I had made, and, in necessary self-defence, we both pursued our own little arrangement, confident that neither Annabel nor Mrs. Grainger could guess any ulterior motive in certain gestures by which we told each other what cards we had in our hand.

For instance, if I found it necessary to raise my hand to the right side of my head and toy with the tortoise-shell comb which held some of my hair in due bounds, hearts were the cards of which I had most in stock, and if any of them were honours, I indicated their exact value by the finger which pushed the comb into place.

The thumb meant the ace, the first finger the king, and so on. The left side of my head helped to indicate diamonds. A touch of my neck brooch served for clubs; and spades, the lowest in value, were cleverly served by the knot of black velvet which added smartness to my cream lace coffee coat.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Taskot's code of signals was slightly different. But it was equally unobtrusive and ingenious, and we presently began to win at such a rate that our opponents were "staggered," to quote one of Annabel's favourite verbs.

"Upon my word," grumbled Mrs. Grainger, "I never saw anything like it! Here am I, quite an old stager at cards, yet I lose all the time, no matter with whom I play. Even Mrs. Vernon cannot change my luck! Yet two people of little or no experience with cards, can win all before them! It is absolutely astonishing!"

"It is more than astonishing," was Annabel's venomous comment. "It's peculiar, more peculiar than anything I have seen for a long time."

What could she mean by the stress she laid on the adjective? Was it possible that she had noticed what we had been doing, just as we had fathomed her trickeries without much difficulty?

I was frightened at the bare thought, but soon put it aside. It had been easy us to for detect her malpractices because we were on the look-out for them. But she had no reason to suspect that we were prepared to guard our interests in the way we were doing, and, of course, it was peculiar, that, even by cheating, she should have none of her usual luck.

"Don't you think we had better cease playing now?" I asked, after being made quite dizzy with excitement by the reckoning up of the score, which showed me to have won over a hundred pounds during the afternoon.

"Give over now?" sneered Annabel. "You forget that you are the victor, and that it is the privilege of the vanquished to prolong the game."

"All the same, I won't play any more this afternoon," was Mrs. Grainger's decision. "Perhaps my luck will turn, if I break off for a while. I ought to have stuck to my resolve not to play at all till evening."

"I am sure Miss Beresford and I will be happy to give you your revenge whenever you like," said Mr. Taskot, "especially as Mrs. Vernon has been so unusually unlucky. But very likely she will have all the winning cards up her sleeve next time, and will leave her antagonists without a rap to bless themselves with."

Annabel turned quite pale at this exceedingly broad rub. But Mr. Taskot's face looked so innocently pleasant, and so absolutely unconscious of guile, that the keen home thrust was dismissed as an oddly coincidental figure of speech, and the appearance of two maids, who were bringing tea to the verandah, was the signal for putting the cards away for the time being.

I was thankful for this, for though I did not mean to profit by what I was winning, I was extremely uneasy.

"Never mind," I thought, "after I have bought some handsome presents for Mrs. Grainger and Annabel, with the money I have won from them, my conscience will be at ease again. As Mr. Taskot put it, my treacherous hostess will have been hoist by her own petard, and I will take good care never to do any more signalling after I leave Vernon Towers."

Annabel's tea equipage was the daintiest I had ever seen, and she made a charming picture herself as she gracefully handled the Queen Anne teapot.

Mr. Taskot immediately began to carry the cake-stand towards Mrs. Grainger and myself, but was gently called to order by our hostess.

"We can't begin without Mr. Fisher and Harry," she said plaintively. "I do wish they would remember that tea should never be kept waiting a minute."

"Perhaps they are out in the grounds, and did not hear the bell," suggested Mr. Taskot.

But one of the maids corrected this impression by saying: "The master says he will be here directly. He and Mr. Fisher have been taking some snapshots, he says, and are just finishing them off."

A sudden smile illumined Annabel's face, and if there had been anything to be triumphant about, I should almost have fancied it was a smile of triumph. Mr. Taskot saw it, and looked rather puzzled. But in another second the two dilatory gentlemen put in an appearance, and everything proceeded very merrily for the next half hour, when the first faint indications of the coming storm made themselves felt.

"Taskot," said Mr. Fisher, taking out his cigarette case, "can you spare me a few minutes of your valuable time? I have a fancy for strolling in the shrubbery while you and I have a smoke together. I'm sure the ladies will excuse us."

As a matter of fact, no excuse was necessary, for Mrs. Grainger was already going up to her own room, and Annabel, smiling her very sweetest, asked me to go with her to Harry's den, to see what success his photographic experiments had met with.

"Do come and have a look at them, there's a dear," she said. "Harry is really very good at that sort of thing, and you'd be surprised at the lovely pictures he turns out sometimes, although he is only an amateur."

Could anybody believe that card-playing had cast such a glamour over me that I was losing all interest for everything else? Yet it certainly was the case, and I had no inclination to see the results of anyone's amateurish efforts, for I had been victimised in the past by a girl friend who had "artistic leanings," and I had no reason to suppose, notwithstanding Annabel's eulogy, that Mr. Vernon was cleverer than most other amateurs.

But if I had only guessed the real motive which induced the Vernons to ask me to visit "Harry's den," I should have run upstairs, snatched my hat and gloves, and left Vernon Towers in a panic, reckless of what was to happen afterwards!

"Sit down here, there's a darling. You'll be nice and comfy in that chair, and you'll have all the better opinion of Harry's genius. Point of view is everything, isn't it?"

I agreed that it certainly must make a difference, and then resigned myself to the infliction of having to give perfunctory praise to a long series of hideous sun pictures.

Nor was my expectation belied. For fully three-quarters of an hour I was shown all sorts of rubbishy efforts, until I became so bored that I could no longer even pretend to be interested.

"But these are all old things, are they not?" I asked at last, being anxious to put an end to the mild martyrdom I was enduring. "Suppose you show me what has been done to-day?"

"My dear Olive, great things have been done to-day," replied Annabel, whose husband seemed to be intently watching for somebody. "For instance, Mr. Fisher and Mr. Taskot have just been having a talk which will prove of the utmost importance to us."

"I see them coming back from the shrubbery," interrupted Mr. Vernon. "Annabel, Miss Beresford shall see my latest effort now."

It suddenly occurred to me that, for some obscure reason or other, my hosts had been trifling my time away, and that they were now going to disclose their real object in inviting me hither.

Digitized by Google

"Have they been waiting till the two gentlemen had finished their talk?" I was thinking when, following the direction of Harry Vernon's gaze, I distinctly saw Mr. Fisher nod his head vigorously. I also saw that Mr. Taskot was livid with rage, and I tasted a faint foreboding of coming disaster when Annabel thrust a Kodak film into my hands, and exclaimed loudly: "Yes, my dear, you shall agree that great things have been done to-day. What do you think of that?"

Great Heavens! Shall I ever forget the shock which that photograph gave me! Or the sickening dread with which I listened to Annabel's mocking words. "Lovely, isn't it? Did you ever see anything more realistic? Nobody would imagine that you were not posing for effect, would they?"

Annabel's words, and the deadly meaning that underlay them, seemed to strike me dumb, and I could do nothing but gaze in growing horror at the frightful evidences of my own folly, which she took a positively fiendish delight in forcing upon my shuddering notice.

While Mr. Taskot and I thought ourselves absolutely safe from observation, and while we thought Mr. Vernon and Mr. Fisher were nowhere within sight of us, they had occupied themselves in taking innumerable snapshots of us and our doings, with the result that every signal my partner and I had made was faithfully reproduced on the tell-tale films, and I knew only too well that I was entrapped, without hope of mercy, by people whose business it was to live on what they extorted from others!

"A case of diamond cut diamond, eh?" sneered Annabel. "Miss Beresford chose to come here and pretend almost idyllic innocence of the ways of the world, so that we might not guess of what double-dyed deceit she was capable. She wanted to cheat us out of our money, and to laugh in her sleeve at our simplicity. But she has met with more than her match, I fancy."

My distress and terror were by this time so great that I rose from my chair with a frantic gesture.

"Let me go!" I cried. "Let me go! I will explain everything afterwards."

"After you and Mr. Taskot have abused our hospitality by inventing another code of swindling signals?" returned Mr. Vernon. "No, thank you, Miss Beresford, I have a better plan than that in view. You are absolutely in our power now, and if you wish to avoid ruin and disgrace, you will do exactly what I am now going to dictate to you."

(What his terms were will be told next week.)

TITLED DECOY.

"Express" Correspondent.

MILAN, Sunday, Aug. 2.

The police have arrested a gang of professional gamblers. A genuine countess, Sacchi, acted as decoy. Having access to the best society, she easily persuaded persons to visit her at her splendid villa near Milan. There, the visitors were made drunk, and invited to play cards. It is said that many Americans are among the victims.

The above extract from the DAILY EXPRESS will be of exceptional interest to the readers of our "Bridge of Ruin" series.

"WELL, Mollie," said her papa, who is a Volunteer captain, "did you see me marching through the town to-night?" "Yeth," said Mollie, "and I was very angry, papa. They might have let you have a drum to play on like those others had."

Your Editor Chats.

THE last list of letters in the Juggled Letters Competition will be found on page 239. All attempts must reach this office not later than by first post on Thursday, August 27th, addressed to the Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. The words "Juggled Letters" must be written in the top left-hand corner of the envelope. The attempts of competitors who do not address their envelopes correctly are liable to be disqualified.

A NEW competition will start in a few weeks. Valuable money prizes will be offered in addition to Gramophones and two of Messrs. J. R. Mally and Co.'s famous Billiard Tables, complete with cues, balls, marking board, and spirit level. With each Gramophone, too, are given away two records.

WITH the help of the summaries of the new serial and new series, published on the first page and page 240 respectively, any of you who have not already started to read these stories can do so now without missing anything of importance which has transpired in the two instalments that have already appeared.

This week's instalment of "THE 'BRIDGE' OF RUIN" is startlingly dramatic, telling how the code of signals arranged between Mr. Taskot and Olive Beresford is discovered and the results that follow this discovery, leading to the further enmeshing of the Girl Gambler in the toils of her so-called friends.

THE denial of some little luxury in the shape of sweets, or scent, or tobacco for just one week would not be a very great hardship. This is what I ask you to do and then send what you would have spent to the FRESH AIR FUND, to help to give some poor little slum mites that longed-for day in the country to which they have been eagerly looking forward all the year.

Most of you have more than one bright spot in the whole year, but a day in the country through the FRESH AIR FUND is the only bright spot in many little children's year, so I hope you will all respond liberally to this appeal. All amounts, which will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly, should be sent to the Hon. Sec., FRESH AIR FUND, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Send what you can at once, otherwise the spending of the money will have to be deferred until next year.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

THREE OF A KIND.

The Love Story of an Old Maid and rier Two Nieces.

"I do wonder," said Miss Polly Whittle suspending her knitting and sending an indignant gaze across the street where a young lady, dressed in the cloudiest of white muslins and the bluest of blue ribbons, was being helped into a carriage by a young gentleman—"I do wonder what's the sense of a woman getting married, and making a slave of herself, when she might be comfortable and independent.

"There's that Jenks girl"—indicating the young lady before mentioned. "She had everything she wanted at home, and her father was worried if she scratched her little finger. She could dress as she liked, go where she liked, and do what she liked. And here she must up and marry that ridiculous snip of a clerk, who earns three hundred a year.

"Of all the foolishness! I wonder where she'll get her ribbons and her scent? It's an example of blindness and perversity, and I hope you girls will take warning."

But for Miss Polly's last remark one might have supposed she was alone in her shady drawing-room that afternoon. It would have been a mistake.

Her niece Jane, a tall, demure-looking young lady of twenty-five, sat at the table, dotting an embroidery pattern. Her niece Mollie, a curly-headed damsel of seventeen, sat in the open window, swinging the sprays of wisteria abstractedly, and watching the couple who had excited Miss Whittle's indignation with envious eyes.

It was a little, old-fashioned room, with a high, gilded looking-glass, a few quaint pictures, claw-footed chairs, spare curtains, and a great vase of syringa on the mantel.

Miss Polly, a woman of forty-five, looked quite as old-fashioned, as she sat knitting vigorously in her white cuffs and black silk apron.

"I hope," continued Miss Polly, after waiting a reasonable time and receiving no response to her former remark, "I shall never see either of my nieces making a fool of herself."

"No, certainly, aunt," said Jane.

"Oh, no!" echoed Mollie, from the window.

"As I have always said, I want to save you from the misfortune of the sex. I want you to keep what health and happiness you have, and not slave yourself to death for other people."

"Yes," was the subdued response of the two listeners.

"I see you understand me. Why, Mollie, there comes Mr. Wilkins home to supper, and there's no fire made! Run, child—oh, stop a minute—I forgot to say that I am going out to tea to-morrow night, Mr. Wilkins and I, to Mrs. Green's. She's been talking about having a tea-party for two years, and now it's coming off. We're to go at three and stay till nine."

Mollie whirled about suddenly in the doorway, and there was a peculiar expression in Jane's grey eyes as she raised them to her aunt's face.

"Shall you stay so late?" she asked.

"I mean to, if I'm well. I don't go merely to get my supper; I go for the sake of social intercourse. What are you waiting for, Mollie?"

"Nothing," responded that damsel, dancing on with sudden light-heartedness. "Supper in fifteen minutes, auntie."

I hate explanations, so I will only say that Miss Polly was a maiden lady with two orphan nieces and Mr. Wilkins was an elderly gentleman boarding with Miss Whittle for the summer.

He was a tall, spare man, a widower, with stiff, grey hair, and a curiously puckered face, which wore a feeble smile.

He always wore most amazingly stiff shirt collars and squeaky boots, and his conversation was a hopeless search for terms that should sufficiently praise Miss Polly. Perhaps this was the reason that the latter endured him with such wonderful patience, and reproved Jane and Mollie very severely for laughing at his personal peculiarities.

If any one had been looking for Miss Jane Saunders immediately after breakfast the next morning, they would have found her in her chamber hastily scribbling a letter.

Of course we cannot make her correspondence public, so we will merely watch while she puts the letter in her pocket, dons hat and jacket, and starts for the village, walking gravely and innocently, as if that pocket were empty.

After doing one or two small errands she goes into the post office. The letter is directed to Mr. Herbert Ellis. The postmistress smiles a little as she sees the name, and Jane turns away with flushed cheeks.

Mollie was out at the gate, as pretty as the morning, ostensibly occupied in breaking dead branches off the rose bushes, with a reckless disregard for thorns.

"Why, where are your scissors and gloves?" inquired Jane.

"I don't want them," said Mollie, hastily. "I can work as well this way. Isn't there a prayer-meeting to-night?"

"Yes," replied her sister, feeling her cheeks grow hot again.

"You're going, I suppose?" questioned Mollie, very busy with the rose bushes.

"I think so, if you're not afraid to stay here alone."

"No, indeed!" was the quick answer, delivered with unnecessary earnestness. "Don't think of staying on my account."

"Very well."

The instant Jane was out of sight, Mollie, looking suspiciously at the front of the house, that looked back at her meekly with closed blinds, after peering down into the recesses of the garden on her right, called in suppressed tones to an Irish child on the street, "Mick!"

"Yis'm!"

"Going past Mr. Bent's shop?"

"Yis'm."

"Give this note to Mr. Hall—remember, to Mr. Hall. If you'll be back in ten minutes, and won't tell anybody, I'll give you the biggest piece of cake you ever had! Will you?"

"Yis'm."

Mollie listened to the patter of his bare feet with a satisfied smile, and went on trimming the rose bushes demurely.

Mick, returning in precisely seven minutes, was duly rewarded with an immense slice of cake, duly cautioned never, never to tell and dismissed well content. Then Mollie opened the note; for, like all communications written by females, her note required an answer.

Digitized by Google

Dearest Mollie—I will be with you to-night at precisely half-past seven. I'm inclined to bless both my stars and the dragon.

Tom.

At three o'clock that afternoon Miss Polly came into the drawing-room, where her nieces were sitting demurely, cutting bits of bright silk for appliqué work. She wore a lace cap, tied with yellow ribbons, and a green silk dress. Let the reader not be shocked, for Miss Polly was fond of bright colours and went to tea-parties seldom.

"Don't sit up for me," she said patronisingly, regarding herself in the glass with great complacency. "I shall take a key, and we can let ourselves in. Does my dress fit well, Jane?"

"Very well, aunt."

"What flowers shall I carry? London pride is pretty, and sweet-williams—don't you think so?"

"I think other flowers will do better. I'll go and cut you some," said Jane dutifully.

"No; sit still. I hear Mr. Wilkins on the stairs. I'll pick some myself as I go out."

You might have heard Mr. Wilkins at the other end of the town, such stiff boots had he seen fit to assume on this occasion. It was quite a wonderful thing to watch him as he stood in the little path, awkwardly holding the bouquet of pinks and coreopsis Miss Polly had given him, remarking every other minute that "the — hum — the flowers were—hum—excessively pretty," and finally offering his arm laboriously.

"Does my dress fit well, Jane?" she said, regarding herself in the glass with great complacency.

The two girls turned away from the window without comment, only there was a good deal of wonder in Jane's eyes, and a good deal of fun in Mollie's. They sewed industriously the rest of the afternoon, scarcely speaking to each other, until the clock struck five, and Jane went out to get tea ready.

"What a beautiful sunset!" said Mollie, as she rose from the table. "How long does the meeting last, Jane?"

"Until half-past eight; but I may not be home then, for I'm going to carry old Mrs. Davis some medicine. Don't sit up for me. You can leave the back door open, or I'll take the key of the front one. I shall be back before auntie," she added guiltily, seeing Mollie's surprised face.

"You'd better take the key. I think I'll go to bed early. Don't come into my room, and disturb me, Jane. I never sleep well if I am waked."

As Mollie put the last dish comfortably away in the cupboard she heard the clock strike seven, and saw Jane passing out of the gate basket in hand. She felt guilty. How good Jane was, and what a difference between them! Jane was going to do good, and attend a prayer meeting, and she was going to disobey her aunt, stay at home and see Tom. But, somehow, Mollie thought the prospect pleasant.

At half-past seven she was down by the gate. She had little time for anticipation, for somebody sprang through the gate or over it, and greeted Mollie with the freedom of an old acquaintance. It was a merry-faced young gentleman, with blue eyes and brown curls.

"My respects to the dragon," said the new-comer, bowing to the house with great deference. "My respects to Wilkins and your unfortunate sister. How am I blessed with the opportunity of seeing you?"

"Auntie and Mr. Wilkins are at a tea-party, and Jane's gone to a prayer-meeting. Hurry, Tom! Come down in the garden, or somebody will see you. I've locked up the house. You can stay till just half-past eight."

"One hour! Momentarily expecting that the dragon will fall upon me! I don't care if she does!"

"Stop calling her a dragon, Tom, and don't talk so, if you have any pity for me."

"Quite tragic! Excuse me for saying so, Mollie, but how ridiculous all this is! Here we have been engaged a year, and you frown if I bow to you in the street; you scarcely let me show my head near the house, and you won't hear of my speaking to your aunt.

"If I walk past here I discover Miss Polly glaring out of the window, or Wilkins squinting out of the front door. If I look at you twice in church I'm the object of Miss Polly's furious attention. Now, I say it's ridiculous! I'm not a Gorgon—I'm a respectable young man—at least, I always thought so. If you don't think I'm competent to arrange matters, can't you go and tell your aunt you want to get married?"

"You know I would if I dared, Tom, but aunt is dreadful. I try sometimes, but I can't; really, I can't."

"What's to prevent? Will she put an end to your existence, or shut you up and feed you on bread and water?"

"She'd disown me, Tom. She'd cut me off without a shilling, and never have my name spoken again."

"Is that all? I'll own you, and I'll give you twenty shillings for every one she won't give you, besides bestowing my name upon you. Come, that's an offer!"

I will not give the conversation in detail. Suffice it to say that it was just nine o'clock when Mr. Hall, having exhausted all his arguments without effect, finally became indignant and determined to depart.

Digitized by Google

He was making one final appeal to Mollie, who, still lacking in courage, sat sobbing on the seat before him, when they both heard the gate close softly, and saw dimly two figures turning towards the garden.

"Mercy on us!" exclaimed Mollie, in terrified accents. "Tom, the pear-trees!"

Before Tom quite knew what he was about, he had followed Mollie, or had been dragged by her, under the shadow of the trees, behind a flourishing clump of lilacs.

The voices were very near them now, and a moment after another miserable couple seated themselves on the same seat which the concealed pair had left so unceremoniously.

"Poor little Mollie," said Jane mournfully, glancing back at the dark house. "She has gone to bed long ago, I daresay; I wish I was as happy as Mollie! Oh, what would she think of me if she knew?"

"Think?" replied the voice of Mr. Herbert Ellis. "I own it wouldn't be very agreeable to be discovered lurking about the house in this fashion, but if you will allow me to go to your aunt to-morrow morning, and tell her I want to marry you, she could think or say nothing unpleasant. You are sacrificing your happiness and mine to a miserable caprice. Your aunt happens to have a prejudice against marriage, and so you promise to remain single until she dies."

"Oh, don't speak so! I owe aunt Polly everything, and her death will be the greatest misfortune in the world to me."

'Well, then, consider me a little, let me come here to-morrow and speak to her plainly."

"Oh, I dare not! Oh, Herbert, what shall I do? There she comes now!"

In fact, two more figures were discernible coming through the gate, unmistakably the figures of Miss Polly and Mr. Wilkins. They seemed in no hurry to go in, but stood leaning on the fence in the moonlight and talking. Presently—disastrous movement!—they were seen sauntering slowly towards the garden.

"What shall I do?" gasped Jane, in the extremity of terror.

"Come under the shade," said Mr. Ellis. "She won't see us."

"Oh, Herbert, what shall I do? There she comes now!"

In a moment they were so near their fellow-sufferers that Mr. Hall could have touched Mr. Ellis's coat-tails.

"The moon is delightful!" was the first remark of Miss Polly's that reached their ears.

"It is!" responded Mr. Wilkins. "Hum—it is. Enchanting."

"I love to walk by moonlight."

"It makes me quite—hum—sad—lonely."

"Ah!" said Miss Polly, sympathisingly.

"I—hum—feel as if I hadn't a friend in the—hum—the world."

"That's strange"—Miss Polly stooped to gather a rose—"when you have so many."

"You are—hum—mistaken. Hum—I haven't one."

"I'm sure I'm your friend, Mr. Wilkins!" said Miss Polly, speaking lower and putting the rose before her face.

Mr. Wilkins became bewildered in a desert of "hums."

"He—hum—hum—he wished she would—hum—ah—he wished he could—hum—believe it."

"I should think you might," rejoined Miss Polly, "when I say it. I suppose the thought of your past happiness is rather trying?" she continued.

"Hum—no. I—hum—could be—hum—happier than I—hum—ever was."

"Indeed!"

"I—hum—assure you. If—if—you—hum—thought so."

"Don't!" exclaimed Miss Polly. "Remember—think of Mrs. Wilkins dead and gone."

Mr. Wilkins was so abashed by this outburst that he said absolutely nothing for five minutes. Miss Polly got out of patience.

"You weren't congenial," she said. "I see. Ah, that is trying!"

Mr. Wilkins was betrayed again, and declared he—hum—never knew what—hum—congeniality was till—hum—till lately. Would she—hum—hum—let him say so?

"Don't speak to me!" exclaimed Miss Polly, sinking down on the much-enduring bench. "I am a disgrace to myself! Oh, if those girls should hear this, what would they say?"

Those girls! Such a shout of laughter behind her! It frightened Miss Polly and Mr. Wilkins nearly into fits. When they recovered a little there was Tom and Mollie on one side, Jane and Mr. Ellis on the other, the last two looking very surprised.

Mollie's arms were about her aunt's neck, and she was crying.

"We'll say you're the dearest auntie in the world! Be good now."

"Be magnanimous," put in Tom. "You see, we've all found each other out."

"And are all equally culpable," rejoined Mr. Ellis.

"And, oh, auntie, say that you don't mind in the least bit, and we'll all be so very happy," put in Jane, who had suddenly recovered her tongue.

Miss Polly Whittles was a wise woman. I shouldn't have written about her if she hadn't been. And when she saw that Fate favoured her, she did not try to thwart it.

Then the six of them all trooped into the house, and although the hour was somewhat late in Miss Polly's estimation they held a hurried consultation, and half-an-hour later tender farewells might have been witnessed in different parts of the garden.

Acute Miss Polly! So it happened that three weddings took place in one day.

A. L. Andrews.

Digitized by Google

Splendid Serial Story.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

FORTIETH CHAPTER.

Agnes Has Her Innings.

For an instant there was a sudden hush in the library.

Gilbert Chase took a step back in startled hesitation, undecided whether to wait until the voice spoke again, or to ask Lady Maitland the strange question that had been flung almost as a challenge into his mouth.

Agnes pushed open the door and came into the room. Her face was malicious and spiteful, as she looked at the tall woman who had hitherto treated her with mocking sarcasm and ridicule.

Now her turn had come, and she was glad that she had so carefully treasured the scrap of paper she had rescued from the dog that morning some months ago.

She had remembered the few words that had been written on it, and as her suspicions had grown more bitter against her father's lovely wife, she had been on the watch for any link that might bring a clue in its wake as to the real owner of the ambiguous message.

She had followed her stepmother from the hall to the library, and listened to the opening words of the conversation between her and the detective with a sullen rage, as she now realised that the man whom she had counted upon as a substitute for the more desirable Heriot North had been spirited away by the woman she hated with all the strength of which her puny soul was capable.

The moment the detective had mentioned the name "Vernon Grant" in connection with that of a released convict, the whole of the enigma was made plain to her in one flash, and she had cried out with a mad impulse to see the woman she hated humbled, and a convicted bigamist.

But Agnes Maitland was not acquainted with the strange nature of the woman who, in moments of great stress, seemed to collect all her energies and resources to the undoing of her foes.

Lady Maitland smiled slightly, and turned to the detective, who stood irresolute in the presence of such perfect command and beauty.

"Well, Mr. Chase," she began, in musical tones. "You heard the request of my step-daughter. Will you do as she advised, or defer your strange questionings until a more convenient time. I am anxious to get back to Sir Trevor."

Agnes interrupted sharply. "Ask her now; she will be sure to do something that will secure her from further questioning. I know her, and have long suspected her of—of concealing a secret!"

Gilbert Chase looked from the acidulated specimen of humanity to the stately woman whose beauty seemed to put a barrier between herself and other people, and, for the moment, he felt a twinge of pity pass through him that she should be treated as a peg for suspicions in her own house. Then he pulled himself together with a jerk, as he remembered how for many years—supposing his doubts correct—this woman had imposed upon Sir Trevor Maitland with impunity, and his heart hardened as he said curtly:

"Excuse me, miss; I must ask you not to interfere with my conversation with her ladyship. I think she understands that it is no idle question that I have put to her." Then turning once more to the calm, self-possessed woman standing with one white hand toying with the chain that fell to her waist, he said:

"Your ladyship will, I know, pardon my persistency, but I asked you a question. It was, 'Can you tell me anything about a photo,' the image of yourself, left with the landlady of a house in Ennismore Gardens, London, who informed me that it had been given her by the owner of the photo, Mrs. Margaret Grant, the wife of the felon, Vernon Grant?"

A slight smile played across the curved lips of Sir Trevor Maitland's wife, a smile of mingled sadness and mockery. She had regained the mastery of herself, after that first wild moment of almost self-betrayal. She had never calculated upon her secret being stumbled upon by the detective engaged upon the unravelling of the murder of the man in the spinny.

It had never occurred to her that once her blackmailer's lips were sealed, her guilty past would not be buried in the oblivion for which she had plotted. Digby Scarlett and Heriot North would reveal it to no one; she felt convinced of that, in spite of her enemy having betrayed her to the man who had believed in her. That had been a splash of jealous rage, not of malice aforethought.

She roused herself with a start, and when she spoke her voice was low and musical as usual.

"I was at first inclined to resent your impertinence, Mr. Chase; but on second thoughts it is ridiculous to be annoyed at what is obviously one of the tricks of your trade, just as scratching is the peculiarity of the cat! To spy and to scratch are unpleasant processes, but occasionally useful. But at the same time I am rather sorry that you have wasted so much good time on the unfortunate past that belongs to the dead!"

Gilbert Chase looked at her sharply. Her well-bred snub had a little damped his assurance while it nettled his temper.

"The dead! On which side, your ladyship?" he remarked drily. "The wife of 'Vernon Grant' is among the living, now; and—so is he!"

Lady Maitland breathed a trifle more quickly for a second, then replied slowly:

"I know nothing about the man, Mr. Chase. I refer to my sister!"

"Your sister!" exclaimed the detective and Agnes Maitland with one voice. "What do you mean?"

She raised her brows. "Surely you did not commit the absurd error of imagining that I was that woman? I hardly like raking up a sad family skeleton; but the wife of that man of whom you spoke was"—she paused slightly, as though her tongue had suddenly twisted over the words she was uttering—"was my twin sister! The scrap of paper to which my clever stepdaughter refers is quite correct. I was informed that my brother-in-law was dead!"

She rose slowly, apparently oblivious of the livid expression on Agnes Maitland's face, and the blank astonishment depicted on that of the detective.

"I have satisfied you, I hope, Mr. Chase?" she smiled. "Is there anything else you would like to know?"

Gilbert Chase put his hand in his pocket mechanically, and drew out a pocket-book which he fingered with thoughtful care. He was so taken aback by the story the cold, even voice of Sir Trevor Maitland's wife had unfolded with such an air of confidence, that he almost regretted his precipitancy in not having considered such a like solution, before exposing himself to the enmity of so haughty a woman as he knew her ladyship to be.

But when he spoke his voice revealed nothing of the thoughts within him.

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

"Your statement is absolutely convincing, your ladyship," he began slowly, "with the exception of one little detail that had just slipped my mind. Can you tell me whether—your sister had a child or not?"

She opened her lips to give the answer that quivered on them, then paused in time. How much did this creature with the inscrutable eyes know of the past, she wondered? It were better not to commit herself by an unwise admission.

"I am not sure," she said at last. "Why do you ask?"

He smiled, and looked at her with a sudden gleam in his eyes. "Because it will interest your ladyship to learn that you have a beautiful niece somewhere in the world, waiting to be received by her long-lost aunt. She would now be about eighteen, I should fancy. Mrs. Philpott tells me she was christened 'Dolores'!"

A faint shadow flickered into the eyes of Sir Trevor's wife, but she returned the gaze of the detective with calm assurance.

"That is very interesting, Mr. Chase! I only trust that one day chance may bring her to my house! Now perhaps you will excuse me. I have matters of more importance to attend to than the mere indulgence of idle gossip. For, after all," she said with a sneer on her beautiful lips, "that is what your 'important few words' has dwindled into."

With a cold inclination of her stately head, she left the room, leaving Gilbert Chase with the unpleasant impression of having been worsted in a battle of wits by a woman whom he had hoped to dumfound by his knowledge.

He gazed after her admiringly.

"Well, I'm blowed!" he muttered. "She's got a nerve of cast iron! A regular 'flyer,' that's what she is, in spite of nearly giving herself away at first! I shall wait before I tackle her ladyship again!"

A rasping laugh startled him from his reverie. He turned sharply, to see Agnes Maitland looking at him with a mocking sneer on her hard, vicious mouth.

"So," she said, her voice trembling with rage; "you have let that woman go! You have been led from your sense of duty by a pair of violet eyes and a dimpled chin! You are as bad as those other fools, Digby Scarlett, Heriot North and Ernest Heath! They know something, and it suited them not to tell.

"I know that Scarlett and she play into each other's hands for some reason; and as for Heriot North, I heard him myself telling her that he would 'keep faith with her, and that nothing would make him betray the bond between them—not even death'; and now"—she laughed shrilly—"his words have come true, for death has sealed his lips! She is safe so far as he is concerned, for the fire at the 'Hollies' has burnt one of the men who knew something!"

Gilbert Chase bit his lips. It was true that that morning he had heard something of the fire and that several lives had been lost, and he had wished regretfully that he had made sure of his man while there was yet a chance.

The angry, abandoned words of Agnes Maitland, although he credited her with more imagination than truth, caused a sensation of uneasiness in him, making him curt and snappy.

"My dear madam, it is impossible to do more than ask questions at first. Suspicions must be proved before the liberty of anyone can be interfered with. At present I am biding my time; you don't know everything."

Again the lean, spiteful woman laughed, bringing a flush to the pale face of the detective.

"How much do you think I know? Has it ever occurred to you to come to me and find out? Had you done so, you would probably have made a name for yourself among your associates in Scotland Yard, instead of wasting your time over the finding of Ivy Strange!"

Gilbert Chase took a step towards her. "Don't imagine, miss," he said slowly, "that it is waste of time to find Ivy Strange! In spite of your unflattering opinion of my capabilities, I know what I'm about!"

The cruel, watery eyes narrowed to the shutting-out of their pale grey colour, as Agnes leant forward and with a voice oddly tense and impressive, whispered:

"Notwithstanding your cleverness, Mr. Chase, you do not seem to be aware of the fact that her ladyship was on terms of strange intimacy with the dead convict for whose murder you are hounding that meek-and-mild girl, Ivy Strange—the charity child! Ask her ladyship what she had in common with the low tramp whom she could only meet at midnight, and then——"

"Then what?" said the detective, his eyelids twitching nervously.

Agnes opened the door, looked out into the hall, and closed it again. Then turning once more to the impatient man, she said slowly: "I will tell you! Listen!"

Some twenty minutes later, Gilbert Chase left the Manor. His steps were those of a man impelled at intervals by spurts of sudden thought, and slow, irregular strides. His face was pale, and his eyes shone with some emotion his iron will only kept down.

He drew his hand across his brow. It was wet, though the air was keen.

"Gilbert, old man," he muttered. "A regard for the niceties of the English language prevents me from expressing myself with the full and eloquent oratory of which I feel possessed. But you are learning, my boy, and the worst of it is that your teacher is no chief of criminal investigation, but a soured, jealous old maid in a village! I have stumbled all along the line, it seems. I have begun to devote too much attention to Digby Scarlett after our last encounter, and let the lesser threads go by, but now"—and he drew a deep breath—"I'm beginning to see the light!"

FORTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

"The Power of Love."

Jack Maitland had been wandering round the streets of London, seeking vainly for his sweetheart. He meant to find her first, and convince himself that she was well and still loved him, then—and not till then—he would look for the man who had so cruelly disabled him.

A very shrewd guess was concerned with the name of Digby Scarlett, and yet had not Gilbert Chase told him that the master of the "Rest" had returned to the Manor after a fruitless search for him? But in spite of that, he could not get away from the idea that it was not the hand of a poacher on his father's estate that had shot him.

As for the charge against Ivy, he had laughed at it, secure in the conviction of his own intimate knowledge concerning her tender and gentle nature, that was far too sensitive to take the life of a human creature.

One morning, about three days after he had left the Manor, as he was turning over the pages of the Express, while idling at the breakfast-table at the Orient Club, he chanced to glance at the column devoted to personal correspondence, such as appointments and greetings between lovers. As his eyes wandered down the list he suddenly sat up straight and breathed quickly, this time looking keenly at the paragraph that had roused him from his moody thoughts—

"Nurse Beaumont has news for her late patient, J. M. She will be at Waterloo Station at six o'clock every evening for half an hour in the First Class General Waiting Room."

"Nurse Beaumont! Nurse Beaumont!" he muttered. "It must be the same kindly woman who nursed me. I remember now her telling me that I was to get well for Ivy's sake; she bucked me up just when I was losing interest in everything, and longed for death. Anyway, even if I am wrong, it will do no harm to go and give a look in the waiting-room at Waterloo. And somehow I feel that I shall see my old nurse!"

The hours dragged by until, at a quarter to six, he hailed a hansom and was soon on his way to Waterloo Station, a strange excitement that increased with each pulse of his being, telling him that he was to learn something that would either bring him to the side of the girl he loved, or place a barrier between them for all time.

Digitized by Google

He went to the first-class general waiting-room at once, but it was empty with the exception of a few men reading newspapers. He sat down and watched the door with eager eyes.

At a quarter past six he rose with a sense of disappointment and a tired look in his face. He had wasted a day for nothing, and was twenty-four hours further from his heart's desire.

As he strolled towards the door, a woman hurriedly entered, and looked back quickly at the man who had passed her with his eyes moodily cast on the ground. She caught her breath and hurried after him, her face quivering with suppressed emotion.

"Mr. Jack!" she cried, touching him on the elbow. "At last, sir, at last, sir! Thank God!"

He wheeled round quickly, his eyes alight with relief and surprise. He caught her hand in his with a nervous grip.

"I was afraid you would not come, or that I had made a mistake!" he said huskily. "Another moment and we would have missed! Tell me," he went on rapidly, eyeing her with burning eyes, "is—is she in London? Have you bad news for me? Your advertisement said you had. It cannot be that she is—married after all?"

Nurse Beaumont shook her head, a faint smile curving her kindly mouth at the impatience of her late charge.

"No, sir," she said quickly, "she is not married, and she is in London. The news I have for you is not bad, but——"

"But what?" he cried tearfully. "Oh, nurse, be quick, and put me out of my torture at once, or I shall go mad!"

"You heard, I suppose, sir, that Miss—our young lady," she said hastily, leaving out the name of the girl, "is hiding away from those that want to say she committed a cruel murder?"

He nodded impatiently. "Of course I have! All that rot was told me at once, but I never gave it a thought, except to laugh at the idea of her being anything but the best and dearest girl in the world, in spite of their telling me that the wretched tramp was her father!"

A gleam of excitement shone in Nurse Beaumont's eyes.

"I am glad to hear you say that, sir," she answered, "for now I can take you to her with a clean conscience, seeing that you believe none of these things that are being spread against my poor, sweet young lady."

Jack laughed for sheer joy. "Hurry up, nurse! What is it to be—a hansom, a motor-car, or an air-ship? Anything that will take me to her the soonest!"

"Then a train will be the best and safest, sir," said Nurse Beaumont, utterly innocent of any irony in her words, and wondering at the sudden laugh that came from the lips of the boy who had lain so near death only a few short weeks ago.

Jack took the tickets to Surbiton, and as they drew nearer their destination the smile left his lips, and his eyes became anxious, while a red spot of excitement flamed on either cheek. They took a cab at the station, and presently were outside the house where for so long his sweetheart had hidden from the law that demanded her liberty.

A cold sweat broke out on the boy's face, and he clutched the arm of the woman who had brought him to the girl he loved.

"Tell me—what is she doing in this house? She had no money, and this is the residence of a man with plenty."

She looked at him strangely. "Yes, it is, sir. You will know all—from her."

They entered the house and went into the drawing-room. Then, looking at him hesitatingly for a moment, she said:

"One word, sir, before you see her. You will be surprised at what you will be told, but don't in turn frighten her by what you may know is taking place in Melton. I will go now and send Miss Dolores to you!"

"For goodness sake, send no one else to me!" he said impatiently. "I want to see no 'Miss Dolores,' only my Ivy!"

The door closed, and after what seemed an interminable time, it reopened softly, to admit a slim figure in some clinging black material, that intensified the red gold of her hair, and the white-rose pallor of her skin.

"Ivy, my darling!" he said hoarsely, reaching out his hands to the girl, who for one instant stood swaying in the doorway like a flower under the breeze. Then with a glad choking cry of mingled joy and pain, she was in his arms, weeping the tears that only joy can bring forth—tears that have their source in the heart.

"This must be a dream," she murmured, after a while. "How did you, whom I imagined had gone out of my life for ever, come here, darling?"

He laughed tenderly, then kissed the wistful face raised to his.

"Our good fairy, nurse Beaumont brought me, sweetheart. I have been wandering through the streets of London looking for you ever since I knew everything that had happened. Oh, my little love!" he exclaimed passionately. "How you must have suffered all this time, but that is over now! You will only know happiness in future!"

"Yes," she said slowly, "I have suffered, but I have also found much happiness in a way that seems almost like a miracle; so wonderful it has been!"

Then quickly, and gliding over the cruel conduct of Lady Maitland that had been instrumental in fastening suspicion on her, and making her run away, she told him of all that had happened, stopping short at the most important stage of her story, to say suddenly, and with heartfelt earnestness:

"Jack, that poor murdered tramp was not my father! You never let them convince you of that, did you? At first I thought it true, and it nearly broke my heart!"

His arm tightened round her. "No, sweetheart mine! I could not believe such a lie! Why trouble about it?"

"Why?" and her voice rang proudly and firmly, as she cried, "because I have found my father, my own dear, good father, whose life was shadowed in his youth by a great wrong done him by the man who has so nearly wrecked our lives—Digby Scarlett! See, Jack!" she half sobbed, as the door opened and a tall, white-haired man, with an infinite weariness in his face, but a great peace in his eyes, came into the room. "This is my father, Vernon Vivyan, the author, and the noblest man on earth!"

The hands of the two men met in one silent grip, the eyes of both suddenly becoming misty.

"I must correct what my little new-found girl has said," Vernon Vivyan spoke at length. "I have another name; it is"—and a dark flush rose to his pale cheeks—"that of Vernon Grant, an ex-convict, and the man whose perjury sent me to fifteen years' penal servitude was our common enemy—Digby Scarlett! Had it not been for the good offices of Nurse Beaumont, my child and I might have passed out of each other's lives ignorant of the joy so near at hand."

He stopped and looked at the boy who was so loved by his little treasure, and he smiled—one of those very rare smiles that came to his lips but seldom.

"I have found her, my Dolores, not to lose her, but to lend her to you! I am glad you will make her happy. I have a mission to perform before I rest, after that—when I have faced my enemy, and done one other thing—I shall know that my duty is finished! But now you young people have a lot to say to each other. We shall meet again!"

When he had left the room, Ivy, in a few artless sentences, told Jack all that she knew

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

through Nurse Beaumont about her birth, adding shyly:

"It was the mark under the hair on my temple that helped her to trace me, darling—the mark that has been one of shame before, but now to me is worth more than a martyr's halo!" She stopped, then said after a pause:

"One strange delusion my darling father has, is that he sees in Lady Maitland's photograph the likeness of his dead wife, my mother! Nurse Beaumont has said nothing about her to me—or to him—but I cannot get the idea out of his head! I should not like to think that she was my mother! Besides, it is impossible that she should have married again."

Jack was silent. He was thinking deeply and swiftly. The girl's words had set a train of thought in motion in his mind, startling in its weird possibilities.

He took her in his arms and kissed eyes, hair, and mouth, then, with reverent fingers raised the loose curls on her brow and pressed his lips to the brand of the broad arrow.

Suddenly, above the throbbing of their young hearts, there sounded loud voices in the hall, the voices of men raised in fear and questioning.

Instinctively Ivy tightened her hand on her lover's arm, as the door was flung wide open, and Vernon Vivyan rushed into the room, followed quickly by the man who had almost discovered her identity on the night he had dined with the master of the "Retreat." It was Ernest Heath!

FORTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

Ernest Heath Intervenes.

With a great fear tugging at her heart Ivy stretched out her hands to the man who was her father.

"Tell me," she gasped, with whitening lips. "What has happened? What has happened? Why do you and Mr. Heath rush into the room like this?"

Standing between her lover on one side and her father on the other she turned to the man who faced them with panting breath and excited eyes.

"I have upset Mr. Vivyan rather badly, I fear," he began; "but I came here from Melton and have come to warn you, Miss Lodge, that your hiding is in danger of being discovered by the detective who is hunting for Ivy Strange; and I know I am right in believing you to be that lady."

Before she could reply, Vernon Vivyan flung his arm before her to protect her from physical harm, and cried passionately:

"I cannot let her go! I know what it is when once the law holds you in her grip. She crushes the life, the heart, the very soul out of you, leaving but a wreck of what you once were."

"I don't understand," Ernest Heath said, looking at Ivy with a puzzled frown. "I did not intend to pain you, and meant to render you a serivce if I could by warning you. I left Melton yesterday, and feared to come straight on here because I might have been watched. So I waited, and by driving in a four-wheeler from town I managed to get here without attracting any attention."

"Where did you say you had come from?" said Jack, speaking for the first time. "I am the son of Sir Trevor Maitland, so take an interest in anyone coming from my native county."

"The son of—of Lady Maitland?" queried Ernest Heath, in a curious tone, looking at the frank, manly face of the boy before him, whose air of proprietorship towards Ivy told its own story.

Jack shook his head. "No, she is my step-mother—far too young to be my own."

"And Miss Strange?" said Ernest Heath slowly. "Her parentage is, I hear, still under a cloud? Don't you think that as she professes to be innocent of this murder, she would do more good by facing the music? I know it is the most natural thing in the world," he went on, "to want to shield her from the publicity of an arrest, but surely it is the cruellest in the end, for it keeps her far more before the public eye while she is still being searched for."

Vernon Vivyan turned sharply to him—his face was grey and his eyes were haggard.

"Firstly, Heath, let me tell you what you did not know the last time you were here. I have only lately discovered that Miss Lodge was the runaway Ivy Strange, the foundling from Melton, and my long-lost daughter, whom I had never seen—Dolores Grant! Through the villainy of a man called Digby Scarlett I was sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude for forgery. My wife"—and he paused suddenly—"was Margaret Heath."

Ernest Heath started violently. "Then—then——" he exclaimed, "she must have thought you dead. She must have, for I have seen—oh, my God! This is awful!" he murmured. Then he looked at Ivy—a long, searching glance, full of tenderness, thought, and pain.

"Child, leave us," he said; "your father and I have much to discuss. But before you go, I would like to touch your brow first; you are very like someone who was once dear to me."

He bent his head and pressed his lips to the girl's burnished hair, and Jack Maitland, watching, knew that there was a tragedy underlying that kiss on his unconscious sweetheart's head.

He drew her softly out of the room, and the two men were alone.

Ernest Heath looked at the silent figure of the man whose work had attracted him to the extent of wishing to know more about him—the man whose personality had seemed to spell despair and everlasting sorrow.

Then, as he looked, another face rose up before him—a woman's, beautiful and haughty, with a coldly-gracious manner, that had changed to a wildly-beseeching one, when they had stood alone for those brief moments before he had left Maitland Manor.

"It cannot be," he muttered, "and yet it is, I know, in spite of the hair, and severity of style—it is the woman!"

Just then Vernon Vivyan turned. "I want you, if you will, to stay here with—her, while I go and find my enemy and kill him. The end is coming. This time I will be the victor."

With a sudden grip, Ernest Heath caught his arm. "Are you mad, Grant? Do you want to break that child's heart, as it would—to lose you in that way! Killing your enemy would not publish your innocence of that forgery charge, and only serve to put a rope round your neck. Besides——"

He stopped abruptly. A strange, burning gleam had come into the haggard eyes of the man who had married his little cousin in the years that had gone.

"How is my innocence ever to be proved?" Vernon said, slowly, "except by forcing the black-hearted villain to disgorge his infamy?"

"I know a better way than bullet persuasion," replied the other, with emphasis; "and you will know what it is soon. Your duty now is to take care of—her, the girl we both claim, with young Maitland, the link with the past. Promise me you won't seek out Digby Scarlett?"

Vernon Grant hesitated, then answered: "I promise not to seek out Digby Scarlett."

And it was not till afterwards that Ernest Heath remembered the manner in which the promise had been kept.

With a hasty farewell to his host he left the room, and sought Jack and Ivy, who were in an adjoining one.

"I want you two young people to stay with Mr. Grant," he said, quickly. "Don't leave him alone. I am going away on important business."

Jack went up to him, and, drawing him aside, said in a low tone: "Sir, tell me—you won't visit the—the—Manor? My father is lying in a dying condition, and any scene——" He stopped, and glanced meaningly at Ivy—he could not think of her by any other name—and following his gaze, Ernest Heath answered gravely:

"I shall not visit the Manor. He knows nothing."

When they were alone, Jack said quickly:

Digitized by Google

"Darling, I am going now. But I want you to meet me, with Nurse Beaumont, to-morrow at Kingston Parish Church. Then I shall have a special license ready, and we shall get married quickly, and return to your father. He would be pleased, and you, dear one, will be happy with me to protect you."

She flushed warmly. "But my name, Jack; it is so notorious now, that no clergyman would marry me while the police wanted me."

He drew her to him tenderly. "No, sweet, your name is now Dolores Grant; no one knows that. Then, as Mr. and Mrs. John Maitland, we will return together to face that charge, strong in each other's love. I will take no refusal, and I know that your dear heart has none to give me."

"But—but, my father," she murmured, protesting while she yielded; "he ought to be told, Jack. He may feel hurt at our want of confidence."

"Sweetheart," he said gravely. "It will be a joy to Mr. Grant to see you safely my wife, before the police can step in between us! You know how he longs for your happiness."

And his kisses stopped the questions that fluttered to her lips.

In the meantime Ernest Heath was waiting at St. Pancras for a train to start for the north. As he settled himself in the corner of a first-class compartment, he murmured:

"It is a bold move, but for his sake I'll play it for all it is worth. I don't think time has robbed me of my peculiar gift; it has been an amusement hitherto, but this time it will bring tardy justice to avenge a great wrong."

The following morning a quiet little wedding took place in Kingston Parish Church, between two hearts that beat as one; attended only by an elderly woman, whose eyes sparkled with almost as much joy as those of the bride and bridegroom. Then together they returned to the "Retreat," and as they entered the house so dear to them, Jack whispered to his girl-wife:

"Now to make him rejoice with us in our joy—to say that he has not lost his daughter, only gained a son."

They ran to the room where he always sat among his books, and with a happy laugh Ivy flung open the door:

"Father—darling, father!"

Then the laugh died on her lips, and she turned a blank look upon her new-made husband.

Vernon Grant had gone; but a photograph lay on the open desk, and as their eyes fell upon it, a wave of terror sent the blood from their faces, and they understood.

The face that looked up at them from the cardboard was that of Lady Maitland!

FORTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

The Man and the Boy.

Gilbert Chase examined his note-book carefully. He had erased and corrected the notes until they bore very little resemblance to those he had first made when the young son and heir of the dying Sir Trevor had enlisted his services on behalf of the girl he loved, the girl on whose account Gilbert Chase was now waiting for a telegram from his junior.

He had wired him to hunt up the address of the author Mr. Vivyan, and at first this had seemed more difficult than he had anticipated, for the publishers of Vernon Vivyan had refused to give up the address of their contributor, but had offered to forward any communication.

At first this had delayed them not a little, but Scotland Yard has a way of getting over difficulties, and Gilbert Chase had wired his instructions for the arrest to be made of the missing girl, Ivy Strange, who was, under a disguise, probably in the house of the author as secretary.

And it was the answer to that telegram for which he was now waiting so impatiently. It was to have been sent immediately after the arrest of the girl, and that ought to have been accomplished some two hours ago. He could not understand the delay; it chafed him, for he felt he ought to have gone

POINTS FOR THE PORTLY.

Why the "Russell" Treatment is Famous.

The "Russell" treatment has gained its world-wide reputation—First, because it is based on rational, scientific principles, not the least of which is that it is of no use to reduce the subject in weight without increasing strength and vitality at the same time; Secondly, because it is invariably recommended enthusiastically, by every person who has followed it, to his (or her) stout friends and acquaintances; Thirdly, it always effects what is promised, viz., a permanent cure. If our frequent announcements in the magazines and journals have not convinced you of the great efficacy of the "Russell" treatment, the fault is in the announcements and not in the treatment.

What the "Russell" Treatment will effect.

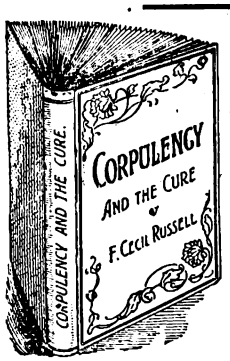
Within twenty-four hours of adopting the "Russell" treatment the subject will experience a loss of weight in superfluous fat varying from ½lb. to 2lb., in ordinary cases. Where the corpulency is very excessive the decrease will be much more. Following this there will be a sure and steady daily decrease until normal weight and elegance of figure are regained. The treatment may then cease with full assurance that the cure is radical and permanent. Owing to the tonic action of the principal curative agent used, increased strength and vitality will keep pace with the gradual attainment of symmetrical proportions.

How the "Russell" Treatment acts.

The chief curative agent employed, of which the recipe is given in "Corpulency and the Cure" (see notice below), is a harmless liquid of purely herbal constituents. Whilst assisting in the daily reduction described, this admirable tonic promotes a keen appetite and powerfully assists digestion and assimilation. The larger amount of nutriment required by the treatment thus goes to the supply of new rich blood and healthy muscular tissue; nerve force and brain power are increased. After a course of "Russell" the subject is the possessor of health, strength, and energy beyond all previous anticipations.

How to study the "Russell" Treatment.

None could be expected to adopt such a treatment without serious study. The means is to hand. Mr. F. Cecil Russell is the author of the standard work on the causes and the cure of obesity. This work, entitled "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), will be sent to stout readers of Short Stories, who will send three penny stamps (for private postage) to F. C. Russell, to Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.



STANDARD BOOK FREE.

On receipt of three penny stamps to defray postage under plain sealed envelope, &c., Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, 27 Store St., Bedford Square, London, W.C., will be pleased to forward to all readers of Short Stories a gratis copy of his authoritative work, "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages, 8vo). It contains the most exhaustive information on the causes and cure of obesity, besides a thousand testimonials from the author's patients, and as many extracts from the Press.

All communications treated as strictly private.

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

himself; but he had a strange disinclination to leave Melton until he had accomplished what he had in hand.

He had visited the scene of the murder of Mike Holland once more after hearing the fresh evidence Agnes Maitland had divulged in her jealous spite, and had argued that it was no positive proof to find the stump of a cigar, after all.

As he walked to and fro in his room at the "New Age," a knock at the door disturbed him. Going hurriedly to it, he opened it, and a youth stood outside with an orange-coloured envelope in his hand.

Gilbert Chase took it from him with a pleased smile, and shut the door. Now he was sure of the girl he wanted!—the girl whose evidence would put a noose round someone's neck, if not her own; and somehow he did not think it would be her own!

He opened it hurriedly; then a muffled anathema rose to his lips as he read the few words that dashed the cup of success from his grasp. They were:

"Went Retreat as ordered, girl gone, also the master; no one in possession but a stupid old woman, who knows nothing; send instructions."

With a bitter sensation that Fate was on the side of the wrongdoers, he folded the flimsy bit of paper and placed it in his pocket, then went slowly down the stairs of the inn, out into the street. It was nearly dusk, and he was too preoccupied to notice a tall man coming towards him.

"Excuse me," said the stranger in a melodious voice, "am I on the right road to Maitland Manor?"

"Yes," he answered curtly; "keep straight on for about a mile and a half, and you will reach it, lying back near the wood."

The stranger passed on with a courteous acknowledgment, and as he disappeared Gilbert Chase wondered where he had heard a voice like that before! It haunted him, like the face of Lady Maitland had, until chance brought back the occasion to him of a brief meeting in the years that belonged to the past.

"It can't be a relation," he said, half-aloud, "going to see poor Sir Trevor on his deathbed; and it can't be that Mr. Heriot North who was nearly burnt to death the other night! He won't be about for some time at least! I wonder who it is? He's a stranger in these parts, that's clear."

And later on Gilbert Chase knew that the stranger was a man he would have given much to meet again, a man who would have proved a strong lever in the charge he was bringing round a proud, beautiful woman.

* * * * *

"Let me go, mummie. I want to do something that will help, something that will make you think me useful; now poor father is too ill to look after you, I want to take his place," and the wistful, childish face of Woolf Maitland gazed up into that of his mother.

She hesitated. It was agony to refuse him anything, and, on the other hand, she hated to have him out of her sight, the one pure love that had remained hers. As danger had threatened her more closely, her heart had centred its whole strength upon the son for whom she had willingly done so much and dared so bravely!

She smiled wearily, and said gently: "You have been to the 'Hollies' before, Woolf; there is no great service in inquiring for poor Mr. North; but if your heart is set upon it, then I will let you go; only come back soon, my darling, and be careful. I hate to let you go from me into those lonely roads at night!"

She bent her head and kissed with passionate tenderness the face of the child who was the essence of her life.

Boylike, he was restive under her caresses, and with a merry laugh ran lightly down the drive, the woman watching his lithe little figure until it disappeared. Then, with a soft expression in her eyes, she turned back into the Manor to watch the ebbing away of the life of her son's father.

The shadows grew darker along the country lane, and a slim, childish figure wrapt in its thoughts of self-importance did not hear the "toot-toot!" of a motor fiend, scorching along the road like an infuriated demon, with snorting engine and glaring red lights.

"Toot-toot!" and above the shriek of the motor a man's voice rang, sharp and imperative.

"Child! child! Out of the way! Quick!"

The boy turned, startled and wondering, but he did not move, fear seemed to have chained his feet to the ground. Then with a sudden dash, the man sprang forward into the middle of the road and flung his arms round the boy.

"Toot-toot!" came the motor, deafening them by its proximity; and then, before he could get the child out of the way, there was a thud and a shriek, a sickening sensation of life beneath the motor, and the next moment the great demon of the King's highway sped into the mist, leaving in its wake the two crushed shapes that lay across the lane, blurred and still, with an awful silence!

FORTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.

The Tightening of the Coil.

"Remember, I want none of your fairy tales. If you try to bluff me with lies, it will be the worse for you!" and Gilbert Chase planted his back firmly against the side door of the Manor that led to the servants' entrance.

Mary Mason was his companion, and her black, beady eyes flashed vindictively upon the cool, imperturbable countenance of the detective.

"There's nothing I can tell you," she said sullenly. "I'm only one of the servants at the Manor, and know no more than the rest of them! And I can't stay long anyway, because Master Woolf has been brought in unconscious, with a strange gentleman who tried to save him from being run over by a motor-car. They are very bad, and I'm wanted to help."

"Oh, yes; you can stay, Polly," the detective retorted, noting the start that his use of the name had occasioned. "You won't be wanted for a few seconds; and it will be better for you to speak the truth briefly now, than to go into a police-court and have few details about your interesting career dragged out!

"How would you face your respectable fellow-servants at the Manor if they knew that you had only recently come out of prison, and belonged to a family of gaol-birds, of which the most notorious was your charming brother, the dead Mike Holland!"

The woman who had passed as "Mary Mason" for all those months drew back with a pale, frightened face and cowed eyes.

"How did you find out—that?" she gasped. "Who split on me?"

"I had the pleasure of meeting 'Mrs. Mike Holland,' your dainty little sister-in-law," he remarked blandly, "and she was very communicative—up to a certain point, but she gave me the address of her 'town residence' in Whitechapel!" He suddenly ceased his bantering tone, and said sharply: "Now, Polly Holland, you have thrown out a great many hints lately; I expect you to cease to suggest and do a little plain speaking, by way of a change."

The woman bit her lip. "What do you want me to tell you?" she said, after a brief pause.

"I expect you to tell me what this secret was between the dead convict and your mistress, Lady Maitland!" he said, in a business-like tone. "I believe you once served as the bearer of a message between them?"

"I know nothing about the secret," she replied quickly. "I only know as one night, when the family was at dinner, I was putting something away in 'er ladyship's dressing-room, when I 'eard a noise like a moan and a scratching sound coming from the wardrobe. I went up to it but it was locked, and after a bit I got the key of another wardrobe and opened the door, when Mike tumbled out 'arf dead!

"I was took by surprise. But 'e told me that 'e had 'er ladyship in 'is power. 'E wouldn't tell me any more; 'e was always close, was Mike, but 'e said as 'ow there was a chance of makin' a mint of money! I took 'er a note from 'im once but she got round me so clever like that I can't say as she got it. She's one with a nerve!"

Digitized by Google

"What prison was your brother in?" said the detective thoughtfully.

"Dartmouth—'e 'ad a 'twelve year stretch' for robbery and coppin' a peeler on the nut!"

"Dartmouth!" murmured Gilbert Chase. "I see now—another man was working on the bogs at about the same time; that man was—was—phew! What a narrow little circle our lives run in!"

He looked at his informer. She was watching him from under her long lashes in a suspicious manner. But much as he distrusted her veracity, he knew he could rely upon it this time. Fear for her own skin had made her divulge another's secret.

"Remember," he said curtly; "you may be called upon to give evidence, so be careful what you say now. Did you ever find anything suspicious?"

She shook her head regretfully. "No; I listened and spied a lot on 'er, but only found a silver tassel off one of 'er dresses near the—the old oak in the spinny!"

"The old oak!" he said sharply. "What, since the—murder?"

"No, before—long before that, sir."

He caught her wrist suddenly. "Do you know, Mary, or Polly, who the murderer of your brother was?"

A grey pallor spread over the woman's sallow face.

"No," said she hoarsely, her eyes glittering with apprehension. "I don't! I don't!"

"I am going round to the front entrance presently," he said. "I shall ask to see her ladyship. I may require you again."

It was the morning after the disappointing telegram had reached him, saying that his prey had escaped again. He had gone on to the Manor and asked to see Lady Maitland, but had been met with the news that Sir Trevor was rapidly sinking, and that her ladyship could not leave his bedside.

For some unaccountable reason he had refrained from pressing his inquiry at such a time, and he had turned back, and cut across the wood into the village that way.

One of the witnesses in the case he was unravelling was on a sick-bed, too, nearly burnt to a cinder, but he would eventually buttonhole him; while there was the master of the "Rest," whose movements were certainly worth watching.

As he passed the front windows of the Manor he looked up at them, and then he saw that every blind was drawn.

He stood for a moment, awed by the knowledge that Death had taken the squire of Melton, and for a few seconds he remained silent, hat in hand, an expression of regretful deference on his face.

"Poor old Squire!" he murmured. "I'm almost certain he heard something that opened his eyes, and the shock was too much for him at his age. Out of respect for his memory I will leave her to at least regret some of her doings! She has only begun to realise that a rope dangles perilously near her lovely neck! And Mr. Jack is now the master!"

He moved away slowly. As he was crossing the road to enter the "New Age," a voice hailed him.

It was Digby Scarlett, and he greeted the detective with derisive hilarity.

(To be concluded shortly.)

Jones: "You say she is proud?" Bones: "Proud, why that woman wouldn't read a serial story because she'd have to buy it on the instalment plan."

Little Dot: "I don't see how cows can eat grass." Little Dick: "I s'pose when they is young, the mother cow keeps saying to her children: 'If you don't eat grass you shan't have any cake.'"

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS

THE FAMOUS HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

THE PILLS

have gained their wonderful reputation by sheer force of merit, because every person who uses them recommends them to others. They have positively no equal for thoroughly cleansing the system and putting the liver and kidneys in functional order, without pain or griping. They are the best known remedy for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, and the common condition of ill-health, known as "run-down" or "out of sorts." Females of every age find Holloway's Pills an invaluable remedy and aid.

THE OINTMENT

is known throughout the world as positively the best and quickest remedy for Bad Legs, Old Wounds and Sores, and Skin Eruptions of every kind, and should be used in conjunction with the Pills. It is also the speediest remedy for Rheumatism, Lumbago, Pains and Stiffness in the Limbs and Joints, Backache, &c. For pains and Soreness at the Chest, and for Throat and Lung Complaints arising from Cold or Weakness, Holloway's Ointment affords most welcome relief in a very short time.

A COMPLETE DISPENSARY IN THEMSELVES.

AND OINTMENT

Digitized by Google

Good Name for It.

She: "Why do they call a battleship 'she'?" He: "Because there are so many arms about her."

Peaceful Separation.

The Maid: "I trust that theirs was a peaceful separation?" The Man: "Very! He put the Pacific between them."

Didn't Want a Piano Solo.

Geraldine: "Life will be one grand sweet song after we are married." Gerald: "I don't care as long as it isn't a piano solo."

A Hard Face.

"Jack wanted my photo to put over his heart to keep the bullets from penetrating." "He must think you have a pretty hard face if it can stop bullets."

Accounted for by Ignorance.

Mr. Spelter: "Oh, you may talk as you please, Jane; but you were an ignorant woman when you married me." Mrs. Spelter: "Yes; that probably accounts for it."

No Cause for Excitement.

"Isabel, your new hat is absurd; it looks just like a huge flower-bed." "Well, you needn't get so excited, Edgar; you don't have to get up before daylight and pull weeds out of it."

A Physical Impossibility.

"Horace," she said chidingly, "why don't you tell me you love me?" Seizing a scrap of paper, the young man wrote on it: "How can I, darling, unless you remove your arm from round my neck?"

Still in the Family.

Jack: "My grandfather had a fine collection of silver which he bequeathed to my father on the condition that it should always remain in the family." Ethel: "Then you have it still?" Jack: "Well—er my uncle has it."

Where She Scored.

Mr. Whingleby: "Oh, you needn't feel so uppish. You're not the only girl in Peckham." Miss Flashleigh: "No, I'm not the only girl in Peckham who has publicly announced that she wouldn't have you if you were the last man on earth."

Unable to Agree.

"No, we couldn't agree," sighed the man. "I said I wasn't worthy of her, and she said I was. For the sake of harmony I yielded my opinion and said I was worthy of her, and she, not to be outdone in generosity, I suppose, yielded her opinion and said I wasn't."

Subtle Flatterer!

"Henry," she said disconsolately, "you didn't give me a birthday gift." "By Jove, that's so," said Henry, "but, you see, you always look so young that I can't realise you ever had birthdays." Then she was happy, and he smiled the mean, subtle smile of a man who has saved money.

He Claimed a Privilege.

"No, George," said the sweet girl, "I can only be a sister to you." "Well, then," he savagely replied, as he heard a subdued chuckle, "as your brother, I shall claim the privilege of lying under the sofa while you make fools of the other fellows."

Unkind Reflections.

"How long have you been married, Mrs. Ashleigh?" "Eleven years. You wouldn't believe it, would you?'t "Not after seeing your husband." "He is young. The fac' is that we ran away from school together and were wedded." "Oh! Then he must have been one of those boys we read about who are always falling in love with their teachers."

Willie Knew Something.

"Willie!" she cried from the window, "you two boys get out of that hammock. You know you will break it down!" "Two little fellows like me and Tommy break it down?" inquired the boy. "Yes, you will." "An' last night, when that Mr. Smithkins called on you, an' you got tired sitting on the couch, and——" "Never mind, Willie," she interupted hastily. "Perhaps it's all right, after all."

Only First-Class Travelling Wanted.

"Nellie," spoke the youth, with an air of confidence, "only say the word and you and I will sail together on the rough sea of life, bravely buffeting its waves, trimming our sails to meet the adverse winds that——" "Go, Geoffrey, go," interrupted the maiden. "The man who takes me on that journey must offer me a first-class passage on a steamer," Whereupon Geoffrey sailed out of her presence with a decided list to port.

Experience Teaches Wisdom.

He had just reached the peroration of his tribute to the modern athletic girl when the little fellow in the corner interrupted him. "Pardon me," said the little fellow, "but may I ask if you married one of these modern girls?" "Why, no, I——" "I thought not," interrupted the little fellow, as he resumed his seat, and those sitting near him were quick to note that he carried one arm in a sling and had a large bump on the top of his head.

The Elopement Was Cancelled.

He had adjusted the rope ladder and stood waiting in breathless silence. Suddenly her face appeared at the window. "Darling," she murmured, "you will have to go without me." "What!" he cried hoarsely. "Do you falter at the last moment? Speak, Miriam. What is it that keeps you back?" The young girl buried her face in her hands. "I am sorry, John," she moaned. "But father has just left a note in my room saying that I may have that new hat, after all." John knew it was all over then, and took away his rope ladder to look for another mash.

She Was Pleased.

The young man had only recently taken up photography and was an ardent enthusiast. He persuaded the girl to whom he was engaged to pose for him. She was seated in a hammock, and he stood directly before her when he took the picture. In a day or two he proudly exhibited the result of the sitting. She gave one glance at it and then handed it back. "Don't you like it?" he inquired. "I don't presume to criticise," was the reply. "I thought it was pretty good for a first attempt," he insisted. "Perhaps it is. I am glad you are satisfied with it." "Of course it might be better." "Do you think it looks like me?" "Yes." "Then, Herbert, I am content." "But you don't seem very cheerful over it." "Perhaps I don't show it; but that photograph has made me very happy." "I'll have a frame made for it and give it you." "No, I don't want to keep it. But it fills me with joy, nevertheless. They say that when beauty fades, affection vanishes; but when I realise that you can see me depicted with hands and feet like those, without breaking our engagement, I am convinced that there can't be any doubt about your loving me when I am old."

Digitized by Google

Plain Women Become Beautiful.

Beautiful Women Intensify Their Beauty.

A Wonderful Book Free.

The Peralia Perfumery Co., of 73 Camden Street, North Shields, will send to every reader of SHORT STORIES mentioning this paper, and enclosing a penny stamp with their application, a wonderful booklet, entitled "Beauty's Boudoir." This book, which reveals many astounding secrets of immense importance to every woman, will be sent strictly under cover. Amongst the many items of information it tells how to remove in one night all Wrinkles, Crow's-feet, Blackheads, Facial Defects, &c. How to make the pimply, freckled face as fair as the lily. If the bust is undeveloped, you can learn how to develop it. If you are too short, how to increase your height. This marvellous book also deals with the hair and informs you how you can curl the hair and permanently keep it in curl without the use of curling irons; in fact, if you are interested in your personal appearance at all, we advise you to send 1d. stamp and your address in full, at once and the Peralia Perfumery Co. will forward you per return this charming book, which deals in a clear and explicit manner with many matters in which women of all ages are interested. There are some wonderful proposals in this book, and no lady reader of this paper can afford to miss this chance of gaining the valuable information contained therein. Address:—The Peralia Perfumery Co., Dept. 14, 73 Camden Street, North Shields.

DEAFNESS AND EAR DISEASES.

A new treatment for defective hearing by outward applications is described in the last issue of THE REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE, AND THROAT DISEASES. 10,000 copies of this Medical Journal have been set aside for Free Distribution by post. To obtain a Free Copy address The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

Kaputine is not a single dangerous drug, such as has been condemned by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The medical paper "Health," recommends

Kaputine THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache,

Toothache & Neuralgia.

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Safely, surely and without bad after effects.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1·; Samples 1d. each

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free. Kindly mention this paper.

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19

or by Deferred Payment System.

"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."

CATALOGUES GRATIS.

TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

30 Deansgate Arcade Manchester 4 King Edward St. Leeds

THE 5-MINUTES PAIN CURE FREE.

LINEEL LINIMENT is a very valuable discovery. It does not merely give relief, but it ABSOLUTELY STOPS, in Five Minutes, all aches and pains of a nervous or muscular character, such as Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Sciatica, Gout, Headache, Facache, Toothache, Tic, Sprains, Bruises, Cramp, Stiffness, &c. To prove this you are not asked to buy it. Send postcard (mentioning this paper) for free bottle, carriage paid. Lineel Liniment acts electrically upon the nerve tissues, and is a discovery of the celebrated Professor Loeb and Dr Matthews, see Daily Mail, May 25th, 1903. THE LINEEL CO. LTD, 16 Bevis Marks, London, E.C.

ELECTRO-SILVER TEAPOT.

18/-

Our Specialitie, Queene Anne design worth 35/-; heavily plated with real Silver, Ebony Handle and Knob, price 16/6 cash, or 18/- easy terms, 2/- deposit, 2/- on receipt, and 2/6 monthly.

Catalogue Free.

MASTERS, Ltd., High Street, RYE.

Every home is happy where

SAPON, THE IDEAL CLEANSER

is used.

Makes wash-day play-day.

Death to dirt, but preserves the fabrics;

perfect FOR WOOLLENS.

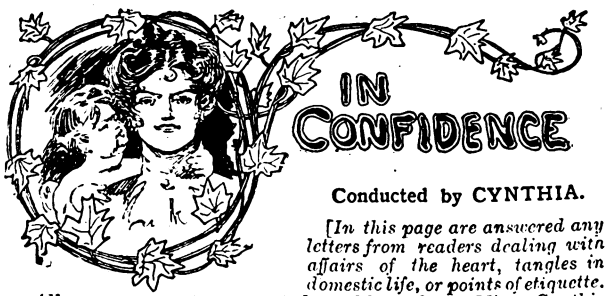
FREE Packet on receipt of post-card to SAPON Ltd., Dept. 68, St. Swithin's Chambers, London.

Digitized by Google



Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Taking the Visitors Compliments.

"A GENTLEMAN friend has been staying a day or so with us," writes "QUEENIE." "We did not very much care for him, but on his departure he said he had made a most enjoyable stay. How should I answer this compliment?"

* * * * *

I am afraid there is only one stock answer in such a case, and that is "I hope we shall see you again, Mr. Blank." However you may have disliked the gentleman, you should try and give the impression that his visit has been pleasant to you, though there is no need for you to ask him again.

❦❦❦

The Absent Kiss.

"DOES my young man think anything of me?" asks "E. N." "I have kept company with him for three months and he has never yet offered me a kiss. Should I wait a little longer, or shall I break off the engagement?"

* * * * *

I suppose the absence of the kiss is not the only sign of his feelings towards you. Perhaps he is too modest to embrace you, but wants to know you a little better. You must judge by his general actions, the way in which he speaks to you, whether he seems glad to meet you and sorry to part, and a host of other things. But, I must say, when there is any real love on a young man's part, he does not usually lose many opportunities for signifying it in the usual way—that is, by a kiss.

❦❦❦

An Indiscretion.

"SEASIDE LASSIE" suffers from a lack of friends, especially of the opposite sex. The other day, a young student at a local college spoke to her, and having taken a great fancy to his appearance, she answered him, and allowed him to walk with her. Since then, they have met in the evenings, without her parents' knowledge. They would be very angry if the affair leaked out, as they occupy a very good social position, and could not afford to be talked about in the town. Should "SEASIDE LASSIE" drop the young man, and if so how?

* * * * *

I sympathise with "SEASIDE LASSIE," as no doubt the temptations to receive attentions from a nice young man are very great. I think, however, she had better postpone the affair until she and he can meet on a more satisfactory footing. It is not quite right for a girl in a good social position to have secret meetings with strangers which might be noticed by other people. The young man should find some means to get properly introduced to her, and until he is able to do so "SEASIDE LASSIE" should ask him to allow the affair to drop. And in future, "SEASIDE LASSIE," do not speak to strange young men, no matter how attractive. That is not what a well brought up girl should do.

Absent Parents.

"MY parents are going away for a holiday," writes "MISS W. E." "I shall be alone in the house with my two brothers. Would it be wrong of me to ask a young man occasionally to tea or supper?"

* * * * *

If your brothers are at home, certainly you could do so. After all, you are hostess in the absence of your parents, and could ask whom you liked. Most girls, I am afraid, would not have any doubt about doing so.

❦❦❦

The Art of Recognition.

"SHOULD a lady always make the first bow to a gentleman friend in the street?" asks "HETTIE." "If so, how should she act if she met him several times afterwards on the same walk?"

* * * * *

It is the lady's privilege to make the first acknowledgment of a man. The second time of meeting, it is usual to just smile recognition; but if more meetings result, one is quite justified in turning the head in an opposite direction. The situation is usually saved, in such cases, by the parties speaking to each other.

❦❦❦

Confiding In Brothers.

"SHOULD a girl tell her brother her love affairs?" asks "ALICE." "I have lately been receiving attentions from a young man, unknown to my brother, though my mother knew all about it. When he found out, he was most angry, saying that I ought not to 'carry on' with fellows he did not know."

* * * * *

If your mother approves of your conduct, I suppose that is licence enough. If your brother, however, is a good friend of yours, you would not be doing any harm by confiding your love affairs to him. It might be a wise safeguard, as a man would be very careful not to get entangled with you if he knew you were being sternly watched over by a male relation. Further, a brother might help you in many ways in testing the suitor's position and suitability for your hand. Cold, calculating men often observe things about others which escape the eyes of young ladies in love

❦❦❦

A Vanishing Vision.

"DISCONSOLATE LOVER" is in a fix. He met a girl several years ago, and only saw her once. He did not trouble to inquire her address, or even her surname. Since that, he has been recalling her sweet face and quiet manner, and has experienced a longing to see her again. In fact, he has discovered that she is the one girl in the world he could ever love. The trouble is that, now that he wishes to resume her acquaintance, he does not know how to trace her. Beyond her Christian name and her district, he knows nothing of her whereabouts. She is a factory operative.

* * * * *

As you say, to advertise in a newspaper might not be the best means of reaching her, as factory girls would not be likely to read the papers. However, one cannot be sure on that point, so you might at any rate try once in one of the dailies. If it did not reach the girl herself, possibly one of her friends might see it. Supposing that to fail, I suggest that you haunt the neighbourhood in which she works at the times for closing the factories, and carefully watch for the girl. It might be a wearisome task tracing her, but what is that when the prize is the "one girl in the world"?

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"No Better Food."

—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

Cocoa

"The Most Perfect Form of Cocoa."

—Guy's Hospital Gazette.

Ask for the

"FIVE BOYS" MILK CHOCOLATE

"Highest Standard of Purity."
A. B. GRIFFITHS, P.H.D., &c.
Analytical Chemist, London.

"Unrivalled as a Chocolate Confection."
"MEDICAL MAGAZINE."

BRITISH MILK AND BRITISH LABOUR.

Digitized by Google

"MATCHLESS"

"ALWAYS BRIGHT AND CHEERFUL."

METAL POLISH

GUARANTEED FREE FROM ACID.
PRODUCES QUICKLY A LASTING BRILLIANCY.

Manufacturers:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

"QUICKLIT"

THE ONLY PERFECT
FIRE LIGHTER
BREAKFAST READY IN 5 MINUTES.

DELICIOUS.
WHOLESOME.
PURE.

JOHN HILL & SONS

16 GOLD MEDALS.

"ROTHESAY" RICE

A delightful plain cake, rich and fragrant, per 6d. lb.

PROSPECTIVE BRIDES

should write for a Free Sample of Wedding Cake, giving particulars, and enclosing a portion of a cake or biscuit label, and name of Grocer

'TUDNO' CAKE & BISCUIT FACTORIES, ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE

RICH CAKES

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 765.] Week ending August 29th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

In spite of the fearful torture, she held her wrists to the gas jet till the cords were burnt through.

(An Incident from the Thrilling Story, "Gwendolen's Burglars." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine is not a single dangerous drug, such as has been condemned by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The medical paper "Health," recommends

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache,

Toothache & Neuralgia.

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Safely, surely and without bad after effects.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1; Samples 1d. each

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free. Kindly mention this paper.

TO CURE SICK HEADACHE.

Sick headache means an overtaxed stomach and a derangement of the digestive organs.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

have proved themselves a boon for removing that distressed feeling and discomfort. A dose will remove the immediate cause, and if repeated for a few days will enable your system to work normally.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

THE 5-MINUTES PAIN CURE FREE.

LINEEL LINIMENT is a very valuable discovery. It does not merely give relief, but it ABSOLUTELY STOPS, in Five Minutes, all aches and pains of a nervous or muscular character, such as Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Sciatica, Gout, Headache, Faceache, Toothache, Tic, Sprains, Bruises, Cramp, Stiffness, &c. To prove this you are not asked to buy it. Send postcard (mentioning this paper) for free bottle, carriage paid. Lineel Liniment acts electrically upon the nerve tissues, and is a discovery of the celebrated Professor Loeb and Dr Matthews, see Daily Mail, May 25th, 1903. THE LINEEL CO. LTD, 16 Bevis Marks, London, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

SONGS COPIED.

Legibly (as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Moorhard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials!
Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor

66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Coniston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

No. 765.] Week Ending August 29th, 1903. [One Penny.

NEW SERIAL STORY. START TO-DAY.

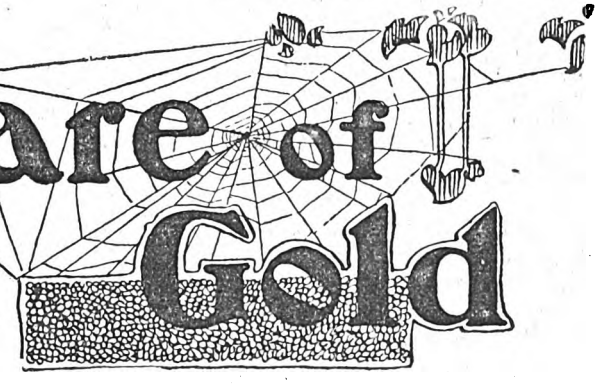
The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

By

Henry T. Johnson.

BEGIN READING HERE.

George Geldart, the rich City merchant, awakens to find that he is lying in a coffin, wrapped in graye clothes. Fearful lest he may lose consciousness again before he properly realises his surroundings, he clambers out of the sexagon.

There are voices!—those of a man and woman. Moving by instinct, he flings aside a wardrobe door and hides within. It is his son Eric, and his adopted daughter Clare talking. From their conversation he learns that his younger son, Ronald, has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

A tap at the door! Geldart hears the frou-frou of the girl's skirt as she goes from the room, and presently he hears another voice, the voice of Boanerges Blagdon, his business partner, whom he has so often befriended.

It then transpires that Eric Geldart and Blagdon have conspired to end the life of the former's father. Eric demands a price from Blagdon for recovering some of the latter's promissory notes from his father's possession—old Geldart had noticed their disappearance, and thought that he had been robbed of them by Ronald. Blagdon promises that Eric shall have his price, then they leave the room.

Geldart slips swiftly out of the wardrobe, and, taking with him various articles, deposits them in the coffin, putting the lid back in its place. Then the undertaker's men come in and screw it down.

No sooner is this done than Ronald enters the room, and his father hears him bemoaning the fact that the body is out of sight, and his heart goes out to the son he has so cruelly wronged.

Click! Once again the door is closed. Ronald is gone!

And then George Geldart leaves his hiding-place again, dons a suit and hat of tweeds, an overcoat, and a pair of boots; then, watching his opportunity, he slips downstairs and out of the great house which can never more be his home.

George Geldart is penniless! He determines to go to Ronald, but on reaching the hotel where his son was staying, he is informed that the boy has gone no one knows where. He strolls out into the streets and there sees, what is supposed to be his own funeral, pass, attended with much pomp and show. Then he feels his unutterable loneliness, and is wondering in what direction to turn his steps, when he is greeted in a hearty manner by a man called Stanyer, whom Geldart had known in his youth.

In his will George Geldart disinherits Ronald, and leaves practically everything to Eric, who, with the help of Lord Lynton, puts up for Parliament as Pro-Con. (Progressive-Conservative) candidate for Little Claverton, and is duly elected. He falls in love with Madeleine Lorraine, Lord Lynton's daughter, though he is pledged to marry Clare Armitage, his adopted sister.

After the reading of the will Ronald leaves the house and while wandering aimlessly along the streets, manages to stop a pair of runaway horses attached to a brougham.

Ronald is borne to a doctor's, and there learns that he has saved the life of Madeleine Lorraine, who was in the carriage.

Stanyer has made a fortune in business in Australia, and wants someone to look after things in England for him. He offers the position to Geldart, and the latter, telling him nothing of what has transpired, agrees to act for him, and sets up an office in Crosby Square.

Here Geldart meets with Mr. Sampson Scrimshaw, Company Promoter, who has offices in the same building.

Recovering from his accident, Ronald is able to come to the assistance of another girl, Phyllis Daventry, who has been attacked by two pickpockets. His efforts to find a situation have, so far, been in vain, and he is contemplating the necessity of leaving Mrs. Skimper's boarding-house where he had taken up his residence.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT.

NINTH CHAPTER.

Eric Makes his Maiden Speech.

Eric Geldart had attained his heart's desire; at least one of its desires, the magic letters M.P. were tacked on to his name. He had taken his seat, and had already proved himself a fighting force and an invaluable adjunct to the band of political guerillas under whose flag he had enlisted, the Progressive Conservatives.

As has been pointed out, it was the policy of that company of Parliamentary irregulars to squeeze the utmost possible out of either party by throwing its weight into either scale when the scales were almost equal and ounces turned the balance, principles which suited Eric Geldart admirably, seeing that he was perfectly willing to throw his weight and influence into either scale, to desert or join any standard, even that of his new made captain, provided there was tangible advantage to be reaped.

To the vain man no walk in life is more alluring or offers more attraction than that of a Member of Parliament, unless perhaps we except that of a successful actor; both perform in the public view, both have their Press notices, and both adapt the part they play to the requirements of the public.

Eric, a young man of means, and not only unmarried but unattached, was as great a social as a political success, and indeed for a similar reason; there was a chance of attaching him.

Lord Lynton lost no opportunity of impressing on his daughter the brilliant future awaiting his political protégé, also the necessity of her making a wealthy marriage, and was more than disappointed to observe the indifference of Madeleine towards him. Eric himself made no secret of his infatuation and lost no opportunity of declaring it.

The session was at its meridian and political feeling was peculiarly tense. The Ministerial party were suffering from decrepitude, having survived for several years its re-election after the allotted Ministerial span, and His Majesty's Opposition, after a lengthened period of enervation, had at length girded its loins to a strenuous struggle.

In few phases of life is chance a more potent element than in politics, the glorious uncertainty of cricket is annihilated by the possibilities of a system which enables the destinies of an Empire to be swayed this way or that according as the members of a party are rallied to a swift and cunning whip or have dallied at an Ascot meeting.

The political sky, an arch of speckless turquoise in the morning, may at noon emit from its blue a bolt that will shake the earth, and ere sunset be obscured with cloud.

Party feeling was running high. The answer in hot haste of a minister had been seized upon by an Opposition watchful and alert as terriers at a rat hole, and the Ministry stood on its trial, face to face with not only exultant foes but whilom friends. Eric Geldart, dropping in at Lorraine House, found Lord Lynton in a state of unwonted excitement.

"Geldart!" he exclaimed as Eric entered the morning-room, "they've done it this time, isn't it a judgment on them for the way they've treated me?"

"Exactly what I thought last night when I left the house," said Eric, who had never, as a matter of fact, given the Viscount a first, let alone a second thought in conjunction with the affair.

"They'd have been thrown out last night," the Viscount went on, "if there had been a snap division. I was in the Peer's Gallery watching the whole business."

"It'll be a near thing to-night," said Geldart musingly, "there's a rumour of wobbling on their side."

"Well, now!" said Lynton, "it'll do them good. Perhaps it'll teach them gratitude. They'll be glad enough of your support to-night, for of course you'll go into their lobby?"

Eric made no answer, for just at that moment Madeleine entered, dressed for riding, and looking so delightfully fresh and fair that there was every excuse for Eric talking of anything and everything but politics.

"You had an exciting time last night in the House," she said, "and they tell me the storm isn't over yet."

"Last night's business was child's play to the fun there'll be to-night," he said, "come and see."

To his infinite delight she assented, and Eric, taking care to avoid any further discussion on the subject with her father, walked out with her, and, after assisting her into the saddle made his way clubwards intent on sketching out his plans.

The events of that evening's sitting will long be remembered in the annals of the House of Commons, historic as those annals are.

The word had gone forth even to the very ends of the earth that the fate of the ministry hung in the balance, and the atmosphere of the House was electric with excitement.

In the outer lobbies men of importance and ladies of eminence gathered in crowds, in numbers sufficient to have swamped every gallery in the House, and in many respects the precincts of the House resembled the vestibule of a smart West End theatre on an important first night.

Inside the House, the excitement was most intense of all, for here was the very vortex of a maelstrom, the breathless hush of one minute succeeding the stormy roar of another as this or that gladiator made his point.

Madeleine Lorraine, one of a bevy of fashionable loveliness, gazed on the scene like the rest, under the spell of the fascination peculiar to a momentous contest, whether of intellects or force. For the love of battle is innate in the breasts of women as of men, and in no arena is the battle fought more strenuously than on the House of Commons floor.

Instinctively her eyes sought and rested on the face and form of Eric Geldart. He was seated with the little knot of members forming that tiny apology for a party, the Progressive Conservatives; his legs crossed, his hands in his pockets, his hat shading his eyes, and Lady Harwardine, her chaperon, smiled wisely as, noting the direction of Madeleine's eyes, she whispered:

"There's Mr. Geldart, dear Madeleine; they say he's going to speak to-night. With the House so evenly divided as they say it is on this question, his party will be quite an important one."

Somehow the girl's heart strangely softened towards Geldart that night. She saw him there, a man among representative men, waiting his turn in a contest affecting the destiny of an Empire, he was strong and daring—perhaps, after all, it is strength and daring which women most admire in men.

Somehow she felt her heart beating quicker, and inclining towards him more than ever yet before. For she knew he loved her, he had said to her that, cheered by her, he could be sure of life's battle all along the line, and it is the consciousness of such a faith in her that wins a woman's heart.

Yet, even in that moment there came the recollection of another handsome face, and for the first time she reflected how strangely similar it was to the strong, set face down there.

Then she smiled at her own folly. Grateful as she felt to the brave fellow who at the peril of his own life had saved hers she reflected that in all probability she would never set eyes on him again; they had met just for a few moments, even as ships upon the ocean speeding different ways. And Madeleine remembered that hers were no days, nor was hers the environment of sentimental romance.

And one other woman's eyes were fixed on Eric Geldart's face, while down there the battle waxed fiercer and fiercer.

The Ministry were in a tight place, for the Irish Party, astute Parliamentary hands to a man, and that night in splendid fighting trim, had thrown their lot in with the mover of what was practically a vote of censure on the Government. But ministers, like other men, are often dangerous in the tightest places, and with their backs to the wall they fought like lions.

Below the gangway they were conscious of a few waverers, and were fully alive to the certainty that the division must be a close thing.

"But," whispered the Home Secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer reassuringly, "even if Thurston and Smee mean to rat we've got Maythorne and his lot," and he glanced in the direction of the Progressive Conservative Party, who, so far, had not broken a lance in the tournament.

Digitized by Google

"I suppose so," said the other, "I suppose Hastie has sounded them. Let's ask him," then, turning to the Ministerial Whip, he whispered, "How about Maythorne's lot?"

"I think they're safe," was the answer, "that chap Geldart seemed inclined to give himself airs when I tackled him at the club, of course he's a young man as well as a young member, and you know their way; said something about the ministerial short memory."

"Oh, yes, old Lynton put him up to that, they're great pals, he's after the daughter, or she's after him, any way, there's the hang of it, we must muzzle Lynton, give him something as a solatium for the Lord Lieutenancy. Hullo, we shall soon learn their little game, Claverton's up!" for that moment Eric Geldart, removing his hat, rose in his place, and the Speaker, ignoring other simultaneous risers, remarked tersely, "Mr. Geldart," recognising the traditional claim of the maiden speaker.

There was a hush, absolutely heavy in its intensity, the courtesy accorded by the House to every member on the occasion of his maiden speech, for who can tell what for the House and for the country may lie in store?

It may be that a new Rupert of debate is about to break his maiden lance, it may be that a new Bernal Osborne is arising to leaven the prosaic routine of Parliament with the brilliancy of his wit, that a new Gladstone has come to thrill it with his fervid eloquence, to galvanise it with his vitality, a new Parnell to disorganise and bewilder it, or a new Disraeli to enthral it with mysterious glamour, alternately to delight it with skilful mockery, to dazzle it with the genius of his statecraft.

True, such are rare birds, even amongst the elected, but it is only when they have fluttered their oratorical wings they can be told.

The Ministerialists accorded Eric an encouraging cheer, the Opposition a polite one, but before he had been on his legs five minutes the benches opposite him clamoured with delight, while those on his own side were dumb with dismay. For the member for little Claverton smote them hip and thigh, holding their policy up to derision and tearing it to tatters and amid a salvo of Opposition cheers swelling into a hurricane from below the gangway.

He resumed his seat after hurling at the Ministry the thunderbolt that the "Pro-Con" party had gone over to the other side.

And, just as suddenly as he, the new member for Little Claverton, sprang into prominence, so that germ of a party fructified and sprang into being as a political force. True it numbered only a sextet, but on a division they meant twelve, and it was anticipated that they, with the ministerial waverers, would turn the scale.

And so it was. The amendment being put, the Speaker called upon those in its favour to say "Aye," and on the contrary "No." And two storms of Aye and No filled the House with their volume, and the Speaker expressing his opinion that the Noes have it, from the Ayes arose a clamorous demand, "Divide—divide—divide!" whereupon the Speaker called upon the strangers to withdraw, to which request the strangers paid no heed, and appointed the tellers of the respective sides.

The division bell began to tingle madly. There was a busy hum as members filed out in twos and threes and groups, many of opposite sides cheerfully conversing together as they went their way, until those ways divided.

"Madeleine, dearest," whispered Lady Harwardine, "what a splendid speech. Eric Geldart has made his name and his mark for ever."

"Yes," answered the girl, adding sadly, "but he has sold his friends."

"Tut, tut, child," the Countess answered, "we are in the world of politics, I will dree his weird, the Hon. Member shall be Right Honourable ere long."

Madeleine could not help wondering whether both terms were not, sometimes bought at the cost of honour. But she made no answer, for her cheeks were aflame, her eyes aglow, her heart was beating fast. The man who loved her above all others had made his mark and set his seal upon his time, there in the eyes of the world.

And when half an hour later he came up to the gallery, she gave him her hand so frankly, with such a look in her wonderful eyes, that he felt the citadel of her heart was almost won. Yes! As in lists of old, Beauty's smile is given of right to him who conquers.

But in that half hour much had happened.

The division over, members filed back into their places, and soon what had been a beggarly array of empty benches, became a packed assembly, with not one patch of leather of the seats visible; the side galleries were crammed, while telephone, telegraph, and cab had brought to the Reporter's Gallery a veritable host.

Amid a breathless hush the tellers returned to the House and ranged themselves before the Speaker's table.

And as they did so, before one word was spoken, there went up from the Opposition a hurricane of cheers, for it was seen that the Opposition teller held in his right hand the white slip of paper containing the figures of the division, and because he bore that simple slip of paper they knew their side had won.

An hour later Eric Geldart, leaving the House, sought

He felt a touch upon his arm. He turned and there, in the starlight, looked upon the face he would fain have forgotten—the face of Clare Armitage.

Digitized by Google

the Terrace that he might cool his heated brow with the breeze from off the river, for heart and brain were in a whirl of excitement, such as comes to few men, an exhilarating intoxication, terrible in the poignancy of its very ecstasy, yet well worth living to feel.

He had won political distinction, of that he was certain, he was certain also of the price of his alliance, of that he had made certain at luncheon time.

And he believed that he had won the heart of Madeleine Lorraine, and to him that seemed a prize almost as precious as political success. Not quite, because he prized the latter above all things in earth or heaven.

His cousin Ferdinand, who had been consumed with indignation at the commencement of his speech, particularly at that portion wherein Eric definitely declared the intention of himself and colleagues to support the vote of censure, moderated the vehemence of his indignation as he observed the effect of Geldart's maiden effort on the House and listened to murmurs of "The most dangerous man against us!" "Pity we've lost that man!" "A new force to be reckoned with," and so on, and so far from answering inquiries as to their kinship with an off-hand "Sort of family connection, very distant!" swelled and beamed with gratification as he answered in a much louder tone, "Oh, yes, member of my family, son of my cousin George. George and I, of course, were like brothers, so I regard this chap quite as a nephew, indeed I'm as proud of him as if he were my son."

And, amid the uproar following the division, Mr. Ferdinand Geldart, M.P., deliberately rose from his seat, doffing his hat and striding majestically along the floor of the house, advanced to where his young kinsman with sparkling eyes and a face aflame, was sitting and extending the right hand glove of good fellowship said in his most impressive tones:

"Eric, I congratulate you. My dear boy, we are opposed in political views, but we are allied in blood and patriotism and I am proud, unaffectedly proud, to congratulate you as one whom I've regarded almost as a son on your brilliant maiden effort, and my only regret is that your dear father, my almost brother, was not spared to be present to witness your brilliant triumph."

While those seated around murmured sympathetic, "Hear—hears!" One member, a journalist representing a Scottish Highland crofter borough and a London Society paper, writing up and working up the incident for the benefit of his readers, Eric listened coolly to his relative's encomium and replied:

"You are extremely kind. Let me see, your name is spelt the same way as mine, is it not? There's some kind of family connection, of course, you came to our house at my father's funeral."

Mr. Ferdinand Geldart was somewhat taken aback at this reception of his overtures towards amity, but, concealing his embarrassment, he replied:

"Oh, yes, yes, your dear father and I were quite like brothers, how dreadful his being cut off in so untimely a fashion. Well, you've done very well and I congratulate you. By-the-bye, have you heard anything of your brother?"

"No, news," said Eric, "and I think you will understand when I ask you as a gentleman, a friend, a kinsman, and a fellow-member of this House, never to mention or to refer to him in my hearing again."

"Quite so," replied Ferdinand. "I heard the story, and I respect your feelings."

On Eric's way through one of the corridors he was stopped and button-holed by an enthusiastic admirer.

"By Jove, Geldart, you've knocked them, you've made yourself, old man."

"Hullo, Scrimshaw!" he said, "how do you do? Where are you?"

"I'm in the Special Gallery."

"Ah, watching the game to get your hand in before you join in it?"

"Yes, Geldart, and if I work it half as well as you, old chap, I shall be more than satisfied. Good-night—good luck!"

"Bounder," muttered Eric, as he strode away, "nevertheless, useful."

How pleasant it was to pace there on the terrace pulling at a rare cigar with the warm South wind of the summer night kissing his fevered forehead, as though to felicitate him on his success within, and to think of it all there alone beside the dark expanse of water that silting and slithering against the Terrace wall, seemed to whisper, "Well done—well done, well begun, go on and on to bigger things, play party against party, man against man, woman against woman, let self be king, self—self—self!"

It seemed to him the very happiest moment of his life. He felt a touch upon his arm. He turned and there, in the star-light, looked upon the face he would fain have forgotten—the face of Clare Armitage!

"Clare," he exclaimed. "You here?"

"Yes, Eric, I've been inside, witnessing your triumph. Eric, you outmatched them all, everybody said yours was the strongest speech, that you were the strongest man, and I listened, and it was music for me to hear, almost as sweet music as listening to you. Yes, Eric dear, I came to share your triumph."

She took his coat-collar in her hands, drew towards him, and would have kissed him, but he pushed her from him rudely—almost roughly.

"Don't be a fool," he exclaimed angrily. "Remember where we are."

"Oh, yes, I know—I know, but, oh, Eric, I came to watch you to-night with my heart full of seething anger only when I saw you and when I listened to you so bold and strong down there, with those white-haired men hanging on to your words, I felt all the anger vanish, there was pride, only pride, and I said I'll forget all hard words, Eric will forget them too."

"No! No!" he exclaimed. "I can't forget, I won't forget, at least what I mean is, what is to be forgotten is the boy and girl nonsense about any attachment between us, it's a dream to be forgotten once and for all."

"What, you tell me that, you dare to say that! Tell me, who was that girl you came and spoke to in the Ladies' Gallery? I saw you, I watched you, though you didn't see me, the girl with fair hair and doll's eyes, tell me, who was she?"

"That lady," he answered sullenly, "is the Hon. Madeleine Lorraine."

"And what is she to you, or you to her?"

He answered deliberately and untruthfully, although it was his hope that what he stated as a fact would some day be one.

"She is my fiancée."

Turning deathly white Clare drew herself up for a moment then suddenly her demeanour changed, laying her folded arms upon the parapet of the Terrace wall, she let her forehead fall upon them, and her frame shook with the hidden sobs.

And as they stood there alone, Big Ben up there booming out the hours, an evil thought came into Eric Geldart's mind, an evil impulse stirred his callous heart; there was no one looking, how easy just to—to—— One swift, strenuous heave, she will be over, her voice that could work for him so much harm, would be for ever silenced.

Doubtless could the river speak it could tell of many a one so silenced, many a dangerous presence removed. Should he—should he?

There was an evil name for it, but then if it were never known, she had it in her power to blight the future which shone just now so brilliant, her breath could tarnish it once and for ever, could curse his whole life, and in a moment—just a desperate struggle—and Old Father Thames would tell no tales!

Digitized by Google

He sprang at her, seized her in his arms.

"Eric!" she cried convulsively.

And then up from behind a cloud sailed the silver moon, and there in its steel blue radiance out of the shadows glided and faced him——

Surely he could have sworn to it. His father's spirit!

It stood still, regarding him with wondrous eyes, he felt his heart sink, his blood grow cold, his flesh creep as it passed on.

"Eric! Eric! What do you mean?" asked the girl, looking up into his face.

"Didn't you see it?" he asked.

"What—what?"

"Never mind."

"But why did you seize me like that?"

"I—I was going to kiss you, and to ask you to let bygones be bygones."

"Oh, yes, yes, only, Eric, never forget I can never give you up. Kiss me."

Their lips met, and his imprinted upon hers the kiss of Judas.

TENTH CHAPTER.

"We'll Spoil The'r Little Game."

Since the eventful night of their making each other's acquaintance, Mr. Scrimshaw saw considerably more of his City neighbour, not in his own superb offices, which Geldart rarely entered, but upstairs in the bare, scantily-furnished room that served for the purposes of Stanyer's agency, Scrimshaw often sat after hours and sometimes before his own office hours, arranging with Old Mystery little matters of business he did not care to intrust to his own staff.

The little office on the second floor was not now quite so bare, but it boasted no luxuries.

It was by no means upholstered and furnished like the floor beneath, it boasted no luxurious divans, Turkey carpets, seductive big, saddle-bag or velvet armchairs, no rare prints or engravings, nor was its atmosphere redolent of the subtle flavour of expensive cigarettes. But on the mantelpiece a tape machine intermittently clicked and emitted its serpentine coils of tape with figures, hieroglyphics to the uninstructed or popular world who were not connected with the Markets.

And on Old Mystery's table reposed a telephone tinging every now and then, with one especial switch to Scrimshaw's own apartment, the file of the daily list adorned the walls and a shelf contained interest tables, directories, gazeteers, banking directory, the rules of the Stock Exchange, and other works of reference necessary to such as congregate upon the world's Rialtos.

"I want you," said Scrimshaw one evening, "to write Brallingham, he's the member for Brixwell, and ask him whether he doesn't think the time has arrived for the business he and I discussed to be arranged. I may as well tell you what that business is. He's very hard pressed, and owes me a considerable bit, he's beginning to flounder already, and if he isn't careful he'll be out of his depth in no time."

Old Mystery made a note in a black, oblong book marked "S.," and his semi-principal went on.

"I've shown him one way of getting out of his mess quite comfortably. I want him to apply for the Chiltern Hundreds on the score of ill-health, recommending me as his successor to his party. I've got the place pretty well salted, attended a heap of functions, and I've some property there too.

"We can nobble his association in five minutes, they are a most businesslike lot, and it'll work like a charm. As soon as he announces his intention of retiring I start stumping; by the time the new writ's issued we shall have the whole thing cut and dried. I may want you to do some work for me on the election, only remember, not a word."

"Then are you of Brallingham's own shade?"

"Don't know," grinned the other; "he's just a wee bit too shady. My idea is to attach myself to that new party; they're going to make things hum, I can tell you."

"What! The Pro-Con's? So that's what you wanted me up at the House about last night?"

"Yes, I've approached young Geldart about it; smart chap that!"

"Very!" said Old Mystery, drawing a deep breath.

"He's the backbone of the whole concern. Maythorne's a mere figurehead. Geldart brought off that coup last night; he'll soon elbow Maythorne overboard if he doesn't take a back seat."

"He's not particular I should think."

"Not a bit—hard as nails and smart as paint; almost a bit too smart. I have to watch all the points in dealing with him."

"Then does he deal with you?"

"Oh, yes, we're in a lot of things together. He does an occasional flutter in the Share Market, which reminds me, by the bye, to ask you to make a note to write him reminding him that his cover's exhausted, and that I've a debit of a thousand odd against him; you'll find the figures in my private ledger."

"But I thought Geldart was pretty wealthy."

"So, he is, fairly; only his late governor tied up his money so that this chap can't anticipate income. He ought not to want to, the old man left the lot to him, the younger brother did something quisby—took some securities and bank notes out of the old chap's private safe at home. The old man was in the City, on the produce market, you know; pompous old priz, I believe."

"Ah!" Old Mystery drew a deeper breath.

"Wanted the world to go round just as he wagged his finger—at least so I gather from the young 'un, who's a bit like him himself. However, he conveniently died, as Eric puts it."

Hearing himself spoken of like this invariably gave George Geldart just the impression of having been really dead and buried for months and months beneath the stone crowded with the record of his alleged abundant virtues.

Repressing, however, the shudder that thrilled him, he continued methodically, almost mechanically, to enter Mr. Scrimshaw's instructions in his note book.

"Who do you think they'll put up against you?" he inquired, and Mr. Scrimshaw answered airily:

"I understand the candidate on the other side is a gentleman rejoicing in the name of Blagdon."

"Boanerges Blagdon?" quickly ejaculated Old Mystery, and Mr. Scrimshaw, knitting his brows, said in a curious tone:

"Hullo! What do you know about him?"

"I—I've heard the name."

"Now, look here, Old Mystery, you know lots about him; I know that, though I don't quite know how much you know. Now remember our bargain—I'm content to let you remain Old Mystery, I don't even want to know your right name, who you are, nor who you have been.

"It may be you've made a mistake of some kind, it may be you've come a cropper; that's no business of mine, only this is our compact—you're going to be straight with me and I'm going to be straight with you.

"You and I have one little knack in common; we understand the value of money, the potentiality of money, and the science of figures; we know the worth of property, and in financial calculations next to myself you can cut margins as fine as any man in the city of London.

Digitized by Google

"This is our bargain, we work in secret, and we're as straight right through the game as we were at the beginning, when you laid on this table the bank note I'd lost and should never have missed, and I, in return, showed you how fifty pounds could be turned next day into five hundred by a little flutter in Eldorado A's."

"That's right."

"Then tell me what manner of man is this fellow Blagdon that I've got to fight."

"Firstly, he's a thief; secondly, he's a bully; thirdly, he's a coward; and fourt ly and lastly, he's a liar."

"A pal of yours, I suppose, from your intimate acquaintance with his character."

"I was once his friend," said Old Mystery.

"And now there's a score to be settled between you, eh? You owe him for something or other."

"It's more a question of what he owes me than what I owe him."

"I say, Mystery, ours was a strange meeting—rather a lucky one. By-the-bye, there's just a possible chance that this fellow Geldart might jib, he certainly would if he could; he's very great pals with Lord Lynton—indeed, they say he's after his daughter.

"Lynton, though in the Lords, is one of the pillars of that political wasp party, the 'Pro-Cons,' and it is just within the bounds of possibility that young Geldart, aided by Lynton, may be able to chuck me overboard, a thing he'd do without a moment's hesitation—if he dared, even I drowned. Now, do you happen to be able to put a string in that direction?'

Old Mystery smiled cunningly, and then his face clouded. He had the man in question in his power, he had only to say the word and the rising star was dimmed for ever. But he remembered, the man in question was his son, the son that he had loved and cherished, and Nature's touch upon his heart strings struck a chord that thrilled him to silence.

At the same time he remembered the other son, to whom, in his firstborn's interest, under that firstborn's influence, and misled by malicious representation, he had been unwarrantly unjust.

He would do his best to right the wrong; it was not only his desire, it was his duty, and Eric Geldart's injustice to his brother should be righted, even though he, his father, had to play the part of that Rhadamanthus whose accepted lot it was to doom his hope and heir.

A boy's feet rattled up the stair. Presently a messenger entered with a cable. Old Mystery opened it with knitted brows, and spelt out of the code agreed upon between himself and Stanyer the following:

"Hear you have been dead four months, explain."

Taking from a safe the file containing the code, he wrote what represented the following:

"Am minding your business—do likewise."

And an hour or so later Frederick Stanyer, sixteen thousand miles away, spelling out this message from the cypher, soliloquised:

"What on earth's the little game? It was George Geldart I met over there before I crossed back, I'll swear, and our little business has worked since like a charm. Whatever game he's playing, he's playing fair with me. I'll take his tip, I'll mind my business and let him mind mine on the other side and his own too."

Then the lonely old man there in the barely furnished room leant his head upon his hands, absorbed in thoughts neither cheering nor consoling.

What a sordid world it was, and what a selfish one, each fighting for each, and those least tainted with greed and grasping going to the wall; a shoal of glutton fishes, the strongest sharks best in the swim, all surging and struggling and fighting for the gold wherewith the devil baits the net for human souls, a flock of ravenous birds in the air, the doves and wrens falling out with broken pinions while the hawks and vultures in the first flight, swooped with swift wings towards the Snare of Gold, the snare that lures to evil and destruction.

He felt some qualms at times regarding the safety of his property, seeing that Eric and Blagdon were two of his trustees.

Then he reflected with satisfaction that there was a third, old Dick Farningham, director of the Bank of England, master of a City company, director and pillar of several of the biggest banks and other corporations in the city; his integrity was above suspicion. But then so had Blagdon's been before he found him out; so had Eric's, his firstborn, until that dread hour when in a sense he himself seemed to have been re-born!

(Another long instalment of this story will appear next week.)

Aceleigh: "Can you unite the separated?" Clairvoyant: "I never fail." Aceleigh: "Well, just connect me with the five-pound note I got separated from last night."

"Has Willie Giggs a responsible position?" asked one girl. "Yes," replied the other, "in one way. Every time his employer rings a bell he's expected to respond."

"I don't know," cried the excited feminine voice in the darkness, "whether you are my husband or a burglar, but I'm going to be on the safe side, and shoot."

Little Johnnie says he likes his Sunday-school better than he does his day-school. In Sunday-school, he says, when he does anything, the teacher only says: "I wouldn't do that?" but in the day-school out comes the cane.

. . THE . .

BOYS' LEADER

Pearson's New Paper.

"THE PAPER A BOY CAN TAKE HOME."

The first number will appear . .

SEPTEMBER 8th. ONE PENNY.

Stories by . .

JULES VERNE,

GEO. MANVILLE FENN,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

(President of the U.S.).

1000 FREE GIFTS weekly for the mere asking.

Place your order now!

ONE PENNY. SEPTEMBER 8th.

Digitized by Google

GWENDOLEN'S BURGLARS.

The Story of a Girl's Bravery.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

"But, papa, would you have me marry for money?"

The speaker was a lady of twenty-two, who addressed a worried-looking gentleman of sixty years.

She was his only daughter—his only child in fact—and he would have been justified had he considered few men deserving of her.

She was very pretty. She had a pliant, graceful figure; a perfectly colourless face, excepting for the vivid red in her lips; eyes hazel, and black brows, and hair bright as sunlight.

"I would not have you marry for money," her father said. "That would be a degrading contract. Allan Prescott has something besides his money to recommend him. Still, his pecuniary advantages are not to be despised. I wish to see you comfortably established in life, for my affairs are in such a bad condition that I fear I cannot long support you."

"If you simply desire me to be supported, I might maintain myself. I can play the piano; I can keep house; I can paint on china and make a pudding. Surely, I can find my vocation!"

She spoke lightly, but her words irritated her father.

"You have said something like that before, Gwendolen, and you mean it, in spite of your trifling tone. Why don't you say frankly that you would be a music teacher, a housekeeper, a dauber on china, or a cook, rather than marry Prescott? That is undoubtedly what you mean."

"If you prefer me to say such disagreeable things, I will do so, papa."

Her father took her by the shoulders, while an expression on his face indicated that he would like to shake her. She remained standing, her black brows drawn into a sharp little point above her nose, and with a decidedly bored expression about her red, sarcastic lips.

"Now meet the question fairly. Will you marry Allan Prescott or not?"

"I should think it would be soon enough to answer when he asks me," she said, inconsequently. "Would you have me emulate Elizabeth Baxter, who refused her lover 'afore he axed her'?"

"He has told me of his intention to ask you to be his wife, and I would know what answer you will make. Oh, Gwendolen, can you not see that you have worried me to death? My business affairs are reaching a crisis, and before the end comes I want to see you safely cared for. If Prescott was unworthy of you, I would tell you to paint pottery for a living rather than be his wife; but he is a gentleman, a man of honour, and he is fond of you. What more can you desire? Confide in me, my dear. What answer will you make?"

She drew away from him.

"Don't ask me, papa. I really don't know what I shall say."

Mr. Thayer seated himself with an air of a man whose patience was exhausted.

"Go away!" he said, crossly. "I can never get a straightforward answer from you. I want to be alone."

She started to go—a little resentful flush rising in her cheeks—then hesitated, came back, knelt beside his mute figure, and placed her cool little hands upon his head.

"Dear papa, if you will know that I mean no disrespect to you, I will tell you all I feel regarding this proposal."

He made no answer, but encircled her with his arm.

"When you told me this morning that Mr. Prescott had spoken to you, you were displeased because I did not accede at once to his proposal. You said he was honourable and agreeable, and that he had money. You and I have been so constantly together since mother died that I had believed you would be reluctant to lose me, and yet you seemed very willing to give me up. Your business required ready money, you said, and if you had not the expense of keeping a home for me you might save enough for your purpose. I know your trouble, and I want to help you. But would you want me to marry if we were in straitened circumstances? Suppose Mr. Prescott were poor; would you still wish me to be his wife?"

Her father withdrew his arm from her waist.

"Let us be candid with ourselves and with each other, papa. I cannot marry for a mercenary motive."

"Very well," he interrupted, almost roughly; "let us have no more words about it. You are willing to see me bankrupt and disgraced. I might have expected as much from one with your sentimentalities."

Her answer startled him.

"Yes," she said, rising to her feet, "I would rather see you a wretched pauper in the street than know that my father, whom I had honoured, had sold his daughter to keep up the business."

She was going haughtily out of the room, when he stopped her.

"It is as well that you should know the details of the case," he said. "I will not be alone in my pauperism, for when I fall a score of my creditors will sink with me. They will say I have robbed them, though God knows nothing has been further from my intention. My house is already mortgaged for more than it is worth, and I am absolutely without resource."

She put her arms about his neck now, and drew his tired head against her bosom.

"Will you not consider this proposal, Gwendolen? Allan will be here to-night, and will want his answer."

"Yes," she said, slowly; "I will consider it."

* * * * *

Gwendolen had cause to be proud of Allan Prescott's love. He was a man of exceptional attainments, and, better still, a man of perfect honour.

He was ten years older than she, had a spirited and handsome face, a tall, active figure, and a breadth of chest and firmness of muscles which spoke eloquently of his strength.

He and Gwendolen's father were both manufacturers; and though the former did not know it, his success in his commercial career had added many lines to Mr. Thayer's careworn face. Mr. Prescott, having so much more capital, had been able to supply retailers with goods much faster than Mr. Thayer, and had thus unwittingly gained many of the latter's customers.

Mr. Thayer believed it would be useless to struggle against such competition, and was in despair, when Allan came proposing to marry Gwendolen. If only the girl would yield, here was an easy adjustment of all difficulties. Those two men, once related, could not remain rivals, but must unite their interests.

It was Saturday, and Mr. Prescott was expected at Thayer's house, there to remain until Monday. Being quite incapable of taking any advantage of his host, he had acquainted Mr. Thayer with his intention of addressing Gwendolen with a proposal of marriage.

She was lovely that evening. Even her father noticed that she looked remarkably well. As soon as he could do so gracefully, he left her alone with her lover

Digitized by Google

He went to the library and sat there an hour. He wondered what was being said behind the closed drawing-room doors. What answer would Gwendolen make?

She had been standing beside a centre table when he left the room, with the strong light of the chandelier shining full upon her face, but he had not been able to judge from her expression what was in her mind.

How cool, how self-possessed, how almost scornful she looked in that glaring light! She had known perfectly well why he was leaving her alone with Allan. Had she mentally blamed or thanked him for his absence?

The time dragged on. It would have been difficult to judge who was the most anxious to know her answer—the young, hopeful lover within the closed doors, or the tired old man who waited without.

The drawing-room doors opened at last, and footsteps approached the library.

"When you are ready to retire," Gwendolen was saying, "James will show you to the south room. You will prefer it to the guests' chamber, into which the sun can never shine. Good night."

Then she ran upstairs. Mr. Thayer rose to his feet.

"Well," he said, extending his hand as Prescott entered the library; "has she given her consent?"

Allan took the offered hand and answered, huskily:

"She has refused me. If I had been a poor man," he continued, at length, "I might have had a chance of winning her. She realises that she would better her financial condition by marrying me, and she would not accept me with that thought in her mind. She has been most candid with me, and I have never loved and admired her more than I have to-night. She has told me of your difficulties, and how my manufactories are hurting yours. If you like, we will talk over your affairs, and see if, together, we can pull you out of the troubles into which you have fallen."

Very late that night Mr. Thayer tapped at Gwendolen's door.

"I saw your light, and knew you must be awake," he said. "I want to tell you that my affairs will be all right, after all. I am very sorry you disappointed Prescott, Gwendolen. Still, you know your own heart best. He has proposed that he and I shall unite our business interests, and after this the firm's name will be Prescott and Thayer. If it was all right between you two, I would be happier to-night than I have been in twenty years.

"By the way, I sent James to bed an hour ago, and did not remember to ask him what room Prescott was to occupy. He said he believed you mentioned it was on the south side of the house. Being in doubt about it, I put him into the guests' chamber. Good-night, my dear. You should have been asleep long hours ago."

He went away, and Gwendolen turned her light down very low, and seated herself at the open window.

So Allan had taken her father into partnership with him. She had told him of their embarrassing circumstances because she believed he would be considerate of his weaker competitor; but she had not hoped for such generosity as this.

She had told him frankly that she liked him, but had never thought of him as a lover until that day.

Coming, as his proposal did, together with her sudden knowledge of her poverty, she had been unable to separate them in her thoughts; and she would not do him the injustice, nor herself the dishonour, of promising to marry him while she could weigh any mercenary considerations.

She sat a long time, thinking of what had passed between them. Now that she had refused him, he would probably come there no more, and, very singularly, the thought gave her pain.

She was still sitting in the darkness, when she was surprised by hearing footsteps in the corridor. Everyone in the house should have retired long before, and yet she was certain she heard subdued voices close to her door. What did it all mean? Who could be going stealthily through the halls at two o'clock in the morning? The house was large, and her room was far from her father's or the guests' chamber.

She suddenly felt a sickening sense of fear and helplessness. Were there burglars in the house? The thought set her heart beating so wildly that she was sure it must betray her. She was not a timid woman, but had never encountered any danger great enough to test her courage.

She listened. After all, she might have been mistaken. She could hear nothing now. Doubtless the sounds which had frightened her had been conjured by her overwrought imagination; she had been excited by the events of the day—by her father's misfortunes, by Mr. Prescott's proposal, and by the disappointment and pain she had unwillingly given him.

All these occurrences had made her nervous, and induced her present unreasonable state of fear. She was calling herself a coward, when she discovered a light shining through the crack above her door.

She crept across the room and listened intently, with her face pressed close to the door. There were several men outside—how many she could not learn; but even in the tumult of her excitement she managed to hear some of their conversation. They had stopped close beside the door.

"Which is his room?" one man asked.

"Hush!" said a second. "Not that one—don't turn the knob!—that's Miss Thayer's bedroom. His is in the lower hall. She told me he was to sleep in the south chamber."

"We'll go to his first," said a third. "They say he carries a bag of money with him every Saturday night. Be careful with that lantern, and keep quiet. If he wakes, he'll be a tough customer to deal with."

A sharp click followed, which startled Gwendolen almost into a shriek. Some one had cocked a revolver.

"I think that will quiet him," one of the men remarked.

Gwendolen stood with her hands pressed to her heart, trying to restrain its tumultuous beating.

She had now recognised the second speaker to be her father's butler; and with a woman's quick intuition had understood the whole situation of affairs. These men were burglars, and the butler, either by choice or compulsion, was their accomplice.

He had been told that Mr. Prescott was to occupy the south chamber, and had not known of the exchange made in that gentleman's quarters through Mr. Thayer's mistake. He was therefore conducting his two burglar companions to the south room, where they expected to rob Allan Prescott. Not finding him there, the butler would immediately suppose he was in the guests' chamber, where they would find him.

What chance had one man, unconscious of danger, and doubtless asleep—what possible chance could he have against three armed and desperate ruffians?

These thoughts flashed through her mind while the burglars went stealthily down the corridor. She had not made a sound, for it would have been worse than useless for her to call for help.

In that remote part of the house no one would hear her, excepting the burglars themselves, and she shuddered while she thought that they might so effectually silence her that she would never utter another sound. She was not a coward, and she suddenly determined to risk her life to save Allan Prescott from these outlaws.

The guests' chamber was in a wing of the house opposite from the south room, and she would attempt to reach Mr. Prescott's door, and warn him of his danger before the burglars returned. It would be a perilous experiment. They might have some one stationed in the corridor, or she might, by a mis-step in the dark, betray her intention. Should they discover her, they might make short work of her. Still she would risk the danger for the man who had befriended her father

Digitized by Google

Knowing that she must act quickly, she summoned all her courage and unlocked the door. When it opened, it creaked raspingly upon its hinges. She listened. Had it betrayed her? Instead of retreating, the footsteps now advanced.

She tried to close and lock her door, alive now to her own danger; but she was too late. Three masked men were in her room, stifling the cries which broke from her white lips, and binding her hands and feet with cords which cut cruelly into her delicate flesh.

It was all done so quickly that she had scarcely realised what happened. A lantern had been thrust into her face blinding her so that she could not see her assailants. They had told her that if she uttered a cry, or attempted to escape, they would send her into eternity.

They had not covered her mouth, knowing, doubtless, that, even if she had dared to cry for help, she could not be heard. they bound her to the chair into which they had roughly thrust her, and left her alone.

She could only remember that she had failed to save her lover from these men, who were in search of his money, and who would have it if they stained their hands with his blood to obtain it.

She remained, perforce, where they had left her, sick and dizzy with pain and fright, when she suddenly saw a chance of escape. She attempted an experiment from which another woman would have shrunk as fearfully as from the burglars.

The gas-jet was just above her head, and the light burned very low, as she had left it when she sat by the window. She found that, by holding her hands high above her head, she could reach the burner.

She determined to burn the cords from her wrists.

It was a daring feat; but she accomplished it, moaning with pain, but clinching her teeth when the fire licked her tender flesh, and bearing her suffering like a staunch little martyr at the stake.

When her hands were free, it was a comparatively easy matter to remove the other bindings, and she stood released.

The burglars had left the door open, so she had one difficulty less to encounter. She was thankful that her dress was of wool, and did not rustle when she moved.

She slipped noiselessly into the hall, which was now dark, since the thieves had taken their lantern with them.

In spite of her excitement, she could hear them returning. They had found the south room empty, and were on their way to the guests' chamber.

There was no time for caution now. They were close behind her, and she must run—run for her life, and save Allan Prescott.

She rushed through the dark corridor, hearing a frightful oath which followed her, and knowing their footsteps were in hot pursuit. The door of the guests' chamber was before her. Unless they fired and shot her, she would reach it in time.

* * * * *

Mr. Prescott had been very restless that night. Gwendolen's refusal had bitterly disappointed him.

He reproached himself for having been so precipitate in his proposal.

"Why did I not wait?" he asked himself. "Why was I such an insane fool as to suppose she had understood my regard for her? She has been very honest with me. Another woman, in her circumstances, would have married me off-hand, to escape from her difficulties. Gwendolen said that she liked me, but she chose poverty and hard work rather than pretend that her liking was anything warmer than it is. Perhaps I might have won her, if I had been less impatient to test her feeling for me. Now all is lost."

He did not undress nor attempt to sleep. He sat moodily, watching a foolish moth fluttering about the light. He was still busy with his gloomy thoughts when some one tried his door. It was locked, and the person without beat violently against it, calling him by name.

"There are burglars in the house! They are coming to your room! Oh, wake!—do wake at once!"

He opened the door, and Miss Thayer almost fell into the room. "Ring the bell!" she implored, "and try to wake the servants. Have you nothing with which to defend yourself? The butler is in league with the thieves."

He rang the bell and rushed into the hall.

In a little while he returned, and found her white as ashes.

"Too late!" he said. "They heard you at my door and ran away. We have the butler, however, and will probably catch the others also. When did you see them first?" Then seeing the burns and livid marks where the cords had cut into her wrists, he gave a cry. "You have been hurt! Tell me what has happened!"

They went to the library, where she told him all, while he dressed her wrists as tenderly as a woman could have done.

"And you did all this for me, Gwendolen?" he said.

"You have done more for me to-night than I for you. You have saved my father's good name. And I love you, Allan."

He started to catch her in his arms, but drew back.

"You do not mean that, Gwendolen. You have had a terrible strain on your nerves to-night, and you feel happy and at rest because the danger is past."

She rested her injured wrists upon his arms.

"You have reason to doubt me—reason to disbelieve me—since I have not known my own mind. But hear me now. To-night, when you spoke to me in the drawing-room, I did not know my heart. I believed I had only a warm friendship for you, and that I had more anxiety about papa's affairs than affection for you. I meant to be honest with you, for I thought too much of you to deceive you, even for my father's sake."

"Do not deceive yourself this time, Gwendolen," he cried. "I cannot bear a second disappointment."

She continued a little more firmly and courageously:

"After I went to my room I began to see matters differently. Papa came and told me his troubles were at an end, and I knew we could live here just as we had always done, the only difference being that you would not come to see me. That difference made me very wretched. I began to know that if you had been poor, and dishonoured, as papa came so near being, I would have shared your fate rather than remain here without seeing you. And then the danger came to you, and I knew that if you were killed I should die. Papa's troubles did not influence me then. I put my arms into that flame to save you, because I——"

He had her in a close embrace long before this.

"Go on," he whispered. "Let me drink my fill of this sweet confession. Because I——"

"Because I love you, Allan."

* * * * *

Mr. Thayer came down late to breakfast. Having been relieved of his heaviest cares, he had slept sounder than usual, and had heard none of the disturbance caused by the burglars.

He was most astonished when he learnt what had happened.

"I telegraphed for a detective," Prescott told him, "and he came immediately. I was fortunate enough to secure the butler, and had him locked in his own pantry until morning When he was arrested he told who his accomplices were, and the detective says he will have them within twenty-four hours. They ran away empty-handed; but, sir, had it not been for your daughter's bravery, they might have succeeded in carrying away considerable plunder."

"You and Gwen look remarkably cheerful for persons who have passed such a night of horror," Mr. Thayer remarked.

"Last night a second partnership was agreed upon in your library, and all it lacks now is your sanction," replied Allan.

Mr. Thayer stared in bewilderment.

"What!" he said. "Has she changed her mind?"

"Oh, no! I only made the mistake of insisting upon having my answer five hours before it was ready for me."

A. C. Manton.

Digitized by Google

Fairview.

The Story of an Old Maid's Love.

"Fairview! Fairview Station!"

I had been half-asleep after a railway journey of eight long hours, but as the porter's cry rang in my ears I started up wide awake and greatly excited.

The little station at which we had stopped was a dainty affair at the boundary of a large private estate, and I stood beside my box, as the train dashed forward again, looking down a long avenue of large trees on one side, while beyond the railway track and but a little distance from it, stretched a rocky coast, against which the ocean broke in a hoarse, monotonous roar.

I was looking at the waves dashing up on the great rocks, when a voice beside me inquired:

"Miss Maxwell?"

"Yes," I said, turning quickly to face an elderly man who had left a handsome carriage and pair at the steps of the station platform.

"I have your box on, miss," he said respectfully. "I drove down as soon as we heard the train stop. It is but a step," and he held open the carriage-door for me.

And, indeed, the distance in the grounds themselves was so short that, but for the box, it would have been a farce to send the carriage.

We drove round an imposing sweep in front of a stately mansion, and as the carriage stopped, a tall figure, in the deepest mourning, came from the drawing-room window upon the wide verandah to meet me.

Even in the excitement of meeting my hostess for the first time, I could not avoid the start of surprise her appearance caused.

Without one spot or line to break the black of her dress, her face, rising from the heavy crape ruffle at the throat, was utterly colourless, and her hair, banded in waving masses, was white as snow.

Large, black eyes, soft as velvet and deeply mournful, looked out from the deathly white face, giving it a startling appearance. The features, as I knew later, were perfect, and as she took my hands and drew me into a close, tender embrace, her lips parted in a smile, very sad, but very loving.

"You have come," she said, in a low voice, deep, but musical. "How very kind! We are strangers yet, but I hope you will learn to love me."

"It is you who are kind," I said quickly, "to give me a summer holiday in this lovely spot, and so near the sea. I love the sea."

A strong shudder shook the tall, erect figure still holding my girlish one in a close embrace; but my hostess only said:

"You must be very tired, and Nancy shall show you to your room to rest before dinner. I hope you are hungry, too, dear, for I have ordered our midday dinner to wait for your arrival. Jerome has taken your box in, and Nancy is waiting."

As she spoke I noticed for the first time a servant waiting in the doorway a woman past middle age, who curtesied as I looked at her.

"Show Miss Maxwell her room, Nancy," her mistress said, "and make her comfortable until dinner-time."

I had been too much bewildered to say much, and had still a dazed feeling as Nancy led the way to a large room, most beautifully furnished, from whose wide open windows I could see the ocean rolling in, to break in great crested waves upon the rocks, that lined the coast, while below me stretched to the shore a garden full of July bloom, carefully tended, and with only a delicate wire fence to separate it from the rocks beyond.

Nancy made me most thoroughly comfortable, unpacking my clean linen while I was in the bath she had prepared, brushing out my hair and braiding it loosely, bringing me a cup of tea and some biscuits, and finally settling me in a deep armchair by the window, with the advice to take a nap until she came to dress me for dinner.

But I was far too much excited at first to sleep, and curled up in my chair to think over once more the strange circumstances that had brought me to Fairview.

Two years before I had lost my father, and from a life of luxury and self-indulgence was suddenly called upon to earn the bread I ate, or starve. I was but nineteen, and motherless from a child, my father's idol, with no idea of economy, household affairs or bread-winning in any sense of the word.

As a heroine, I am aware I should have been slighted by my friends as well, but truth compels me to acknowledge that I never knew what good friends I had until I needed them. All my burdens were shared by tender sympathy, a class of music scholars made for me, a pleasant boarding-house found, and I was set afloat in my new life by kindest care.

For two years my life was tranquil and busy, and I learnt many of the lessons poverty only teaches. But when my second summer holiday came, I was counting my spare cash to see if I could get a week or two of country air, when a letter came to me from "Fairview," signed by "Hesba Lovering," a strange letter, that cost me many hours of anxious thought before I answered it.

She wrote to me that my father had been her friend many long years before, but that the news of his death had just reached her.

She wanted to know, to love the only child of her old friend and begged me to spend my summer holiday at Fairview as her guest.

Very delicately she told me that she knew of my altered circumstances, and suggested that, if I could be happy with her, I was to remain as her companion at a salary more than double the income I was able to make by teaching.

Kindness itself was in every line of the letter, but not one word of patronage. On the contrary, Miss Lovering wrote of her own lonely, loveless life, as if the kindness was all to come from me in the acceptance of her offer.

After much deliberation I accepted the invitation for the summer only, and found myself, on a hot July day, curled up in an armchair in a luxurious room looking at the ocean, and dreamily wondering "what would come next?"

What did come was a profound sleep, from which Nancy roused me to dress for dinner. Oh, the luxury of having a maid once more, of resigning my heavy, troublesome hair to skilled fingers, to be daintily attired without an effort of my own, and see a fluffy mass of white muslin, with little black bows here and there, in place of my travelling-dress, and yet take no thought of myself!

Nancy seemed to be as delighted at exercising her taste and skill as lady's-maid as I was to have her, and gave me a last finishing stroke, with the remark:

Digitized by Google

"There, miss, you are all right, and the prettiest thing we've had in Fairview for many a long year."

My hostess was in the drawing-room, waiting for me, and the dinner-bell, and I saw that, although she had changed her dress, it was still of black, unbroken by line or spot of white; but, in spite of the appearance of age given by her snow-white hair, I noticed that the ghastly pale complexion was smooth as a child's, without one wrinkle upon the broad, white brow.

Her step was light and firm, her teeth perfect, her form erect and vigorous. To look in her face, one might guess her age to be sixty or seventy; to see her move, or hear her speak, one would readily believe her to be twenty-five.

She was an enigma to me in every way, but nothing could exceed her kindness; and I had not been her guest a week before I loved her with the enthusiastic devotion only possible in young, ardent natures.

We had no society—literally none; but every other pleasure was placed before me. A trained saddle-horse carried me for long, breezy rides, with Jerome for a protector and guide; a low pony-carriage, Miss Lovering driving, took me inland to all the pretty spots within miles of our home.

A grand piano had been tuned for me, and piles of new music placed beside it; an ample library was always open, and a perfect storehouse of materials and patterns invited me to all the newest devices in fancy-work.

I was very happy, singing about the house, reading aloud to my kind friend, trying my skill at needlework, without a care or a tear. But every day, in sunshine or in storm, I had an hour or two of actual terror in trying to meet Miss Lovering's wishes in what seemed to me a strange whim.

I have already spoken of the rocks that lined the coast near Fairview; in one of these, the largest of all, there was a deep cave, like a vast room, some seven feet high, but stretching back to gloomy depths of shadow.

At low tide the floor was hard and dry as a board, but there were great rocks scattered all about, like chairs and footstools.

At high tide the entire cave was filled with water, and it was impossible to escape from it as the shore lay below the entrance.

To me it was a gloomy, dangerous place, to be avoided with shuddering terror. But here I found myself every day when the tide was low, watching Miss Lovering with a sort of fascinated horror. She never asked me to go, but she led the way and I followed.

She sat upon one of the rocks facing the ocean, and looking with her dark, mournful eyes out upon the waves, as if they held her by some mysterious spell. Never speaking, her lips often moved silently, while her hands were clasped in a rigid, strained fashion, as if to suppress cries of agony.

Often the water touched our feet before she roused herself, and we had to wade through it knee-deep back to safety. It terrified me, but it fascinated me.

We were there in the heaviest thunderstorms, when the reverberations were deafening; we were there in soft summer showers; we were there when the sunlight lay like glittering diamonds on the dancing waves, seeming to mock the weary, white face turned towards it.

This cave had a weird fascination for Miss Lovering. One of her bedroom windows commanded a view of it, and there she would sit for hours, her hands idly folded, gazing at the entrance, for she could not see beyond that, while the look of agony on her face was like that of a person in intense bodily pain.

It will easily be understood from what I have already written that Hesba Lovering was not the companion to be chosen by a girl, young and full of activity; but with all her sadness, and the mystery of her strange loneliness, she was charming.

She had the rarest powers of conversation, and, having lived many years abroad, could bring into vivid light the scenes she had witnessed, the people she had met, the adventures she had shared, often caressing my hand while she talked, and giving me the rare, sad smile that was the nearest approach to pleasure her face ever expressed.

It was one of her peculiarities that she was entirely idle.

She made me sing or play for her, and showed her knowledge of music by correction or criticism, but she never touched the piano.

She left her house entirely to the care of a housekeeper, her grounds to the direction of a head gardener; her sewing was done by a resident seamstress, under Nancy's direction, and she never touched fancy work.

She was the only person not an invalid I ever saw who sat with her hands folded or clasped entirely empty at all times.

Occupation would have seemed a necessity to one so lonely, for, excepting myself, she saw no one but her servants, and it was impossible for her to make a companion of a servant.

A tall figure . . came from the drawing-room window.

The summer was gone, when, one morning, we were seated in the cave, I crouched on the sands at Miss Lovering's feet, and I said—

"My holiday ends this week."

To my amazement she drew me into her arms in a strong clasp, crying out in a tone I never heard from her lips before:

"You will not leave me! You will not go! I cannot bear the agony of my life alone again! You will stay!"

"But," I said, "you must have relatives or dearer friends who will come to you?"

"None! My relatives are dead, my friends are scattered. Listen! I did not mean to tell you, but I will. All this is yours."

"All what?" I asked wonderingly.

"Fairview and an income of two thousand pounds a year. I made my will before you came, and when I die you are my sole heiress. If you leave me you will come back after my death, for I will never alter that will, but, oh, my child, I implore you to stay!"

"Yes," I said, "yes; but I cannot understand. Why should I, a total stranger, inherit your fortune?"

"I will tell you all!

Digitized by Google

Yes," she cried fiercely, as if answering some unheard voice, "I will tell you. But Bessie, your father, did he never speak of me, or of Fairview?"

The pleading passion in her voice was hard to answer, but I said:

"Never. I never heard of Fairview until I received your letter. But I once heard him speak of an Aunt Lovering and a cousin that——"

"Hush! Hush! Do not speak her name! Did he tell you," and her voice sank to a shuddering whisper, "how she died?"

"No."

"I must tell you! It will turn all your love to hate."

"Nothing can do that!" I cried.

"But I must tell you. Something drives me on and on to speak! No one has ever heard, no one knows! I might carry my secret to the grave, but I will tell you, Gerald Maxwell's child, the child of the only man I ever loved."

"Do not tell me now," I said. "You are not able. You are trembling from head to foot."

"Yes, now—now, with the great, hungry waves calling me! Oh, how I hate the ocean—how I fear and hate it! That was the beginning of what I am going to tell you. Uncle Arthur Lovering owned Fairview, built it, and chose this spot because he had an adoration for the sea. In locked rooms I never open you will find priceless treasures of marine life, collected for years from all parts of the world; they represented my uncle Arthur's life.

"Ethel, your father's cousin and mine, was as enthusiastic as he was, while I shrank and shuddered like a fool at all the slimy horrors, and would not admire even the shells. We were orphans—Ethel and I—children of uncle Arthur's two brothers, with equal claim upon him; but I was sent away to a boarding-school, and Ethel kept at Fairview with a governess and when he died he left me a hundred pounds a year, and Ethel all else he possessed. It was not just—even now I say it was not just."

"It was not," I said, as she waited for me to speak.

"I had been banished from Fairview for years when uncle Arthur died, and soon after Ethel wrote to me to come and share her home. There was one provision in the will that, if Ethel died unmarried, I was to be my uncle's heiress, and Ethel thought I ought to share her home.

"Why did I come? Why did I ever enter the house? For listen! I loved your father, and he loved me. I was living with my mother's aunt, and Gerald Maxwell was my dearest friend. He did love me, and yet I came to Fairview.

"I had been here through a long dreary winter before I knew that Gerald Maxwell was Ethel's cousin—her mother's nephew. There were other guests in the house, and Ethel's governess was chaperon when Gerald came to Fairview.

"Then there awoke in my heart a jealousy and envy that were little short of insanity. To my eyes, distorted by this unworthy passion, Gerald was wooing the heiress. He was the same to me, but I would not see that he had not changed, and I drew back in angry pride to leave the field to Ethel. She was so pretty—a living sunbeam—with golden hair and blue eyes, not tall and dark as I was; and she was winsome and gentle, full of tender, loving ways that I could never have. I was cold and grave.

"Gerald shared all her pleasure in adding to uncle Arthur's collection of sea treasures, and they spent hours together amongst the rocks, gathering what the waves had left there, finding anenomes, selecting sea-weeds, and then coming home to spend hours again in preparing what they had collected for the shelves of the museum.

"I never shared their rambles. I hated the sea, and, above all, I hated this cave, where they would find many wonderful shells and rare weeds. Did you ever notice the anenomes here, Bessie? They say they are wonderful!"

I confessed my ignorance, never having been much on the coast.

"Those anenomes," said Miss Lovering, "they drew Ethel here as if they had some magic power. As soon as the tide was low she took her basket and her knife to come to see what the sea had brought her, or to seek the anenomes far back in the shadows of the cave. Sometimes she begged me to come but I never would. I was afraid of being caught in the cave and drowned. My terror of the sea was inborn and utterly unreasonable, but it was too deeply rooted for me to conquer.

"All that summer the house was full of guests. We drove and rode, we danced and sang as if uncle Arthur had been a century in his grave instead of eleven months. It shocked me, who scarcely knew him, but Ethel was her own mistress, past twenty-one, and her word was law in the household. I did not suffer from want of attention, for I was a very handsome woman in those days, and Ethel was liberal in her gifts of pretty articles for my wardrobe.

"But I loved Gerald while I was driving him away from me by my bitter, jealous suspicions. I would not see that he gave Ethel a cousin's love, paid her the attentions due to his hostess. Excepting that he shared her love of the ocean, he paid her no more attention than the other gentlemen in the household did; but I was wilfully blind to that fact.

"To my jealous fancy he was courting the heiress of Fairview, and setting aside any claim I might have. He had never asked me to be his wife, so there was nothing to bind him, and I was too proud to try to win a love that was taken from me. Bessie! Bessie! How can I tell you the rest? Oh, will my heart never break? Will this weary life never end?"

She was rocking herself to and fro on her seat of stone, her hands clasped over her knees, her face working with agitation. I implored her to cease trying to tell me her story. I begged her to come home, but I might as well have talked to the roaring waves beating on the rocks at our feet.

"I must tell you!" she cried. "See, do you understand? One life stood between me and Fairview. One life stood between me and Gerald Maxwell. If Ethel died I would be heiress of Fairview, and Gerald would return to me.

"It was in September—— Hush! Hush! Don't tell me it was on this very day—the third of September! I was at my window—you know where I sit—I was looking out, thinking my own wicked thoughts, when I saw Ethel go into the cave alone.

"I scarcely noticed her, it was so common a thing to see her go upon the same errand; but when the tide began to rise, Ethel did not come out. You understand, Bessie, she did not come out, and I sat and watched the tide rise!"

She shivered as she spoke, her voice almost a scream.

Presently, in a low tone, almost a whisper, she continued:

"When the tide went out they found her. She had fallen over one of the rocks and broken her leg. Probably she fainted; but she was lying on her face, drowned by the cruel waves she loved so much. Only one word, one cry from me would have sent strong arms to rescue her at any moment after I saw her danger.

"But I did not move or speak. I saw Gerald Maxwell enter the cave when the tide went out. I saw his face of horror as he hurried to the house for help. I saw the men carry the light hall sofa to the shore and stand it below the cave, while they climbed up and with much hard work lowered the body.

"I saw them bring Ethel to her home for the last time, and still I never moved. I could hear voices calling me, hands shaking my door, but I did not stir. It was night when I staggered down to the library, where Ethel lay, in a dim twilight, upon a long table.

"She was dead and Fairview was mine, and I knelt down and prayed to die too, reviling the hour I was born. All the guests remained for the funeral, and I was pitied and caressed as one utterly overcome by the shock of my cousin's death.

"Gerald was tenderly kind to me as a father to a sick child, but he went away with the others after the funeral.

"A few days later he wrote to me, telling me how deeply he had ever loved me, how he had hoped to make me his wife until this fortune came between us. He was going abroad, he wrote, to conquer his love, if he could, for he would never place himself in the position of a fortune-hunter.

"Every line told me his love. Every line told me this was farewell. I was a murderer for his sake, and my punishment was that I lost him for ever.

Digitized by Google

"I lay all winter praying yet fearing to die, and in the spring I went to Europe. I travelled everywhere, yet ever the sea was calling me back to Fairview. I saw Gerald Maxwell's marriage in a newspaper, and did not die; I could not die, for I was strong and well, and I was afraid to take my own life.

"So the years dragged on and on, and ever the sea was drawing me back to Fairview, until I came here, to live over, day after day, that fatal scene that made me accursed in the sight of Heaven, although no living man or woman has ever suspected me. See!" she cried, standing erect suddenly, "the tide has come now for me! See it rise!"

And then for the first time I noticed it, creeping up and up on the slippery shelf of rock that lay between the entrance to the cave and the land. It was already in the cave, and escape over the slippery rocks, under water, was always difficult.

"Go!" Miss Lovering cried; "they have not come for you! Go!"

"Not without you!" I screamed, clinging to her; "you must come."

"No; I will never leave the cave again! See! Ethel mocks me—your father is beside her!"

"Oh!" I murmured as the awful truth smote upon me, "she is mad!"

"The tide comes for me," she said, "but not for you!"

She caught my wrists as she spoke, in a strong grasp, so far beyond my power to resist, that I was like a child in her hands. Before I could prevent her, even if I had had the power, she pushed me from the mouth of the cave, and let me fall to the rocks below.

Half stunned, drenched from head to foot, I staggered to my feet, and tried to climb up again, only to slip back every time. I could see her sitting in her old attitude, deaf to my cries, gazing out upon the water, that was already covering her feet.

I could see her sitting in her old attitude.

I ran along the shore, screaming for help, until I came to a group of fishermen, to whom I appealed frantically.

"In yon cave?" one said; "then she's drowned for sure."

"But she is not drowned yet," I cried; "bring a boat and save her."

"There's not a boat could get there, miss. The waves would dash any boat to atoms on them rocks, with the tide coming in."

"Come yourselves, then," I cried; "you shall be paid anything you ask. You can climb up and save her."

"Why didn't she come out?" asked one. "There was time enough afore you could o' run here."

"Oh, please come," I said; "while you are talking, she is drowning."

"Who is it?" asked one.

"Miss Lovering, of Fairview."

"Eh! The madwoman?"

"She is not mad!"

"Well, they do be saying she is! But she is rich?"

"Yes! yes!" I cried eagerly. "Very, very rich. You will be well paid if you save her."

Greed conquered, and they rose to their feet, five strong fishermen, whose bare, muscular arms and legs gave me fresh courage. I sped along ahead of them, my wet garments hampering me, but nerved by a new hope.

When the cave came in sight, I dropped like a stone to the ground. The whole entrance was under water!

"Don't take on so," one of the men said, not unkindly; "she could have got out, and she's but a poor crazy body. Everybody down to the harbour knows she's been crazy for years. Don't take on, now. We'll get her out for you as soon as the tide goes out, if you will go up to the house and wait."

But I would not stir. It seemed to be years before the tide turned, and crept out slowly, slowly, until a white rigid face, with staring eyes, could be seen above the waters; crept down, slowly, slowly, until I could see the still, motionless figure, as I had left it, looking out upon the hungry waves.

They said afterwards she must have died of heart-disease before the waves reached her face, or the death struggle would have thrown her from her seat. I cannot tell! I only know how we found her, rigid and motionless, as I had seen her sitting for hours through the long summer, only that the weary heart had ceased to throb, the sin-shadowed life was ended.

S. A. Sheilds.

Digitized by Google

His Former Friends.

Should a Man Drop All His Old Chums When He Becomes Engaged?

"Congratulations, old chap, and all the rest of it!"

"Thanks, Jack, I hope to say the same to you soon."

"Not much, you won't catch me getting tied up, at least not for a few years at any rate."

The speakers were Sidney Weston and Jack Carthropp. The former had become engaged only a day previously.

"I suppose we sha'n't see you at all now, Sid?"

"Oh, I don't know! I don't suppose Ethel will want me every evening; I'm sure to have one or two evenings free for a game of bridge or a cycle ride."

"Good! Then you won't be altogether beyond the pale."

So time went on, but Sidney Weston only very occasionally met his erstwhile chums. Before he was engaged he had been one of a faithful band of four. Very often they would go away for week-ends; they went together to almost every play in the London theatres that was well spoken of, and generally had dinner together before. Two of the four lived in "diggings," and very often they would give a bridge or a whist party continuing until early in the morning.

Then Sydney Weston met Ethel Thornleigh and fell in love with her. His outings with the other men grew less frequent, and to finish it all he became engaged.

The other three congratulated him, but secretly thought it was a very silly thing to do. Whenever they had a love affair it only lasted two or three weeks, and this they pointed out to Weston, and suggested that he should do the same. He laughed and told them they did not know what love meant.

On his way home from the station one evening, Weston met Jack Carthropp.

"By the way, Sid," said the latter after the usual commonplaces, "I was going to look you up to-night. I want you to come round to my rooms to-morrow night and make a fourth at bridge. Miss Thornleigh will spare you for one evening, won't she?"

"I don't much expect I shall be seeing her to-morrow night, she's going with her mother somewhere. So I'll come round."

"Don't forget, then, eight o'clock," were Jack Carthropp's parting words.

Later on that evening Sidney Weston met his fiancée as usual. They were walking slowly along in that apparently aimless manner peculiar to lovers.

"I'm going round to Jack Carthropp's place to play bridge to-morrow night, Ethel."

"Why, you're always going there."

"My dear girl, I've been twice since we have been engaged. Besides, you know I sha'n't be seeing you to-morrow night, you had already arranged that."

"I suppose you are only too glad to avail yourself of an opportunity of a change from my society," rejoined Ethel in a pettish tone. Any mention of Weston's former chums was to her like a red rag is supposed to be to a bull.

"Why can't you stay at home when you're not seeing me? I don't rush off and see people immediately, supposing you don't happen to be coming round," she went on.

"Well, dear, surely there's no harm in my going round to play bridge at Carthropp's place. What can I do if I stay at home?"

"You can read. I don't know why you do not take up some hobby to employ your spare time."

"But when I come home," replied Sid, "I want enjoyment. And if I can't see you, I take what else I can, and that happens to be my male friends."

"I suppose that is how it will be when we are married. I sha'n't be sufficient, you'll always be wanting those nasty fellows in, or else going out with them and leaving me alone."

"Why, Ethel, how can you say such things? You know you come first in all my thoughts. You know I'd sooner be with you than with any one else. It's only when I can't see you that I meet my old chums. And you know how occasionally that is."

The end of it was that Sid went home with a heavy heart, and a feeling that Ethel was very unreasonable. Whilst Miss Thornleigh cried herself to sleep in the belief that she did not occupy the whole of Sidney's heart.

"I'm having a few of the fellows in to dinner next week, Ethel," said Weston some few nights after.

"Are you?" was the not very gracious reply.

"Yes, dear. You know I promised before I was engaged that I'd give a dinner to the fellows when I got my promotion, so I'll do it next week and get it over."

"Will there only be men there?"

"Yes, it will only be an informal affair. The mater has promised to see that there's a good spread, though."

"I think you ought to say that as you're engaged you cannot have the dinner now."

"Why, Ethel?" cried Sidney in surprised tones. "What ever for? I promised it, and I cannot break my word. 'Twill be the last I shall ever have of the sort, surely there's no harm in it?"

"Why can't you have girls? I don't like being left out in the cold."

"But don't you see, dear? I promised this before I hardly knew you, just for the fellows, and I cannot back out of it now."

"It's always the same, you and those wretched men friends. You always put them before me."

"My dear girl, I don't. You are always first in my thoughts, and, knowing how much I care for you, I wonder how you can say such things to me."

"I think you ought to put them off," said Ethel in a persistent manner.

"But, Ethel, I cannot break my word."

There was no reply.

"You see, if I'd known you before, I should not have made such an arrangement."

This sort of conversation occurred almost every evening until the night of the dinner came round. On the evening previous to it, Ethel worked herself into quite a fever heat over it.

"I hope you'll enjoy yourself to-morrow night," she said in a cold, hard manner.

"Ethel, are you going to be nice at all about it? You know you've made me sorry I ever made any arrangement for the dinner at all, and I shall not enjoy it anything like I should have done."

"Yes you will, you'll forget all about me with your men friends, and enjoy yourself as much as possible."

Digitized by Google

"How can you be so cruel, Ethel?"

"How can I be cruel?" she repeated.

"Yes, you."

"But I'm not, it's you that are cruel. I don't know why you became engaged to me when you prefer the society of your men friends."

"Why will you harp on that subject, Ethel, when you know I'd sooner have you with me than anyone else on earth? It's only when I can't have you that I see other men. You see, you haven't any particular chums, so you can't see things in the same light as I do."

"It's a good thing I haven't," she replied. "For if I went out like you do we should never see each other."

"Like I do?" he repeated. "During the three months we have been engaged I have spent three nights in the society of the fellows."

"But you wanted to spend more, two or three times you suggested going to the theatre with them."

"But that was some evening when I was not seeing you."

"If you want to go to the theatre, why cannot we go together?"

"You know you are not particularly fond of it, and very likely you wouldn't have gone. At any rate, I did not go when I saw you did not like the idea of my going out without you."

"Well, I hope you'll enjoy yourself to-morrow evening."

"I shall try to by not thinking of you if I can help it," was his bitter reply.

"I expect that will be very easy when you're with those fellows," was her equally bitter retort.

"Oh, why are you so like this, Ethel? You do so misunderstand me."

"Do I?"

"Yes; knowing how much I love you to think that I put others before you."

There was no reply. The couple were now outside Ethel Thornleigh's home. She turned to go in.

"Good-night, Sidney." Then she shut the gate.

He gazed at her in sad surprise, she had never left him like this before. Slowly he turned and walked away. Suddenly there was a rustle of skirts and the patter of running feet.

"Oh, Sidney, I can't let you go like this!" her voice cried in his ear. Then he turned and caught her in his arms, and there was no heartache that night.

So the night of the dinner went by, and for some little time all was clear sailing again.

"Sidney, I'm going down to Mabel Horton's for the week-end next week. She's home for the holidays and has written asking me to spend the week-end there. I always go once a year, you know."

"All right, dear," cheerfully responded Sidney. "Still, I'll see you don't go when you are Mrs. Weston."

"You silly old dear, I sha'n't want to then. I'd sooner you came with me now, but you know they cannot put you up as they have only one spare room."

"That's all right, Ethel. You enjoy yourself, I don't mind."

It was three nights after this that Sidney Weston was with Ethel Thornleigh, and in a gleeful tone exclaimed:

"What luck, dear! You know you'll be away next week-end?"

"Yes."

"Well, the fellows are going to Hastings for the week-end, so I shall be able to join them."

"Do you mean you'll go to Hastings with them?"

"Yes, dear."

"I thought that's how it would be! Directly there's an opportunity of rushing about with those fellows, off you go."

"But why shouldn't I, Ethel? You'll be away and enjoying yourself."

"Why cannot you stop at home for once?"

"Great Scott, Ethel! I'm always at home. Ever so much more than I used to be."

"It makes me wonder how things will be when we are married. You won't be content to stay at home and take things easy, and go in for quiet amusements. You'll want to be running about all over the place, that's how it will be."

"You don't understand, Ethel, or else you won't, that when I've got you I shall want nothing else besides. I sha'n't want any men friends or that sort of thing when we are married and I can have you always. And as to going about without you, why, I shouldn't think of such a thing. I should always want to be with you as much as possible."

At any rate both went away to their separate rendezvous, and they managed to enjoy themselves. Though the same thought, that they would have enjoyed themselves more together, occurred to each.

The short absence brought a great longing for reunion, and in consequence they were too much taken up with each other to quarrel about the week-end subject again.

"I'm going to meet Dolly Hewett next Friday, Sid. So I sha'n't be seeing you," announced Ethel one evening.

"All right, old girl," was Sidney's response, "I'll clean my bike that evening; it can do with it."

Next week Ethel stated she was seeing Dolly Hewett both on Tuesday and Friday. Sidney Weston was somewhat surprised, but still he good-naturedly raised no objection.

The week after she announced that she had asked Dolly Hewett to go shopping up West with her on Saturday. Now Saturday was always kept most religiously to themselve In consequence Weston was somewhat annoyed.

"That's a little rough on me, isn't it, Ethel?"

"But I've promised Dolly Hewett."

"Hang Dolly Hewett!" growled Weston.

"Don't say 'Hang Dolly Hewett,' Sid, it's not nice."

"Well, I'd like to do something to get her out of the way," he grimly replied.

"Why should you be so hard on her, Sidney?"

"Well, why should she interfere between you and me?"

"For the same reason, I suppose, as you allowed your friends to interfere between you and me."

"But they didn't; you know I always saw them on evenings when you could not see me."

"Still, you knew I disliked your going with them. But, Sid, do you mind much about my going out with Dolly Hewett?"

"Oh, no," he retorted bitterly. "If you'd sooner go with her than with me, do so by all means."

"Oh, Sid!" she cried, and then the tears came into her eyes. In a second he was by her side.

"My dear," he whispered, as he held her in his arms, "I did not mean it; you know I want you with me always."

"Then I won't go with her, Sid, if you do not like it," and she smiled through her tears.

"And I'll give up going with the fellows," he cried.

"But sometimes," she said with a smile, when her lips were free, "I'll set the prisoner at liberty for a time and give him permission to go out, won't that be good of me?"

"Yes, dear. But the only real way will be to see each other every evening except under very special circumstances."

And that, after all, seemed the best way out of the difficulty. Therefore, young man and young maiden, take this to heart, and when you become engaged don't have any chums, they are apt to cause jealousy, and jealousy generally leads to quarrels.

Wenton.

Digitized by Google

Powerful New Series.

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

THE FIRST SIX EPISODES.

Though my real name is not Olive Beresford, I am calling myself that for the purpose of these confessions. An aunt had left me an income of £150 a year, and just as I was wondering how I should occupy my time, I received a letter from Annabel Vernon, an old school-friend, who was now married, to come and spend the week at Vernon Towers.

I was delighted to accept the invitation, and arrived on the Friday evening, being met by Mr. Vernon at the station. The house party consisted of a Mrs. Grainger, Mr. Taskot and Mr. Dean Fisher, who was an expert Bridge player.

After dinner, a Mr. Bainbrig and his sister, near neighbours of the Vernons, arrived, and Bridge was proposed. Miss Bainbrig and I were novices at the game, and Mr. Fisher undertook to teach us how to play, Mr. Taskot making the fourth at our table. We played for a penny a game—at least, that was what I understood penny points to mean—and I congratulated myself that my partner and I were doing very well. The scores were not added up that evening, so I did not know exactly how matters stood.

On the Saturday morning I got up early and went for a walk, during which I met Mr. Taskot, who told me that he had lost heavily the previous night after the ladies had retired.

That same evening we played Bridge again, and when the scores were added up Annabel told me that my losses amounted to £11 7s. 10d.

This sum meant a great deal to me, and I wondered how I was ever to pay it. I made friends with Mr. Taskot, and learnt from him that I was supposed to be an heiress. When I told him how matters really stood he promised to help me.

We met the following morning, Sunday, before breakfast at the spot where we had previously encountered one another. Mr. Taskot told me that I had only been asked to Vernon Towers that my friends, as I thought them, might fleece me. He promised to lend me the £11 7s. 10d., and we fixed upon a code of signals by which we might meet the sharpers on an equal footing.

Unfortunately, Mrs. Grainger, on her way to early service at church, saw us together. I then knew that I should hear more of the meeting.

In the afternoon, while the other members of the party occupied themselves with cards, I went for a walk, during which I was rescued from a mad dog by a Mr. Maurice Ray, who gave vent to an expression almost of surprise when he learnt where I was staying.

On the Monday I sat down to the card-table with delight, looking forward to having my revenge.

To my horror, however, at the end of a most successful game for me, I discovered that my signals had been suspected and Mr. Vernon had succeeded in taking snapshots of all the signs my partner and I had made to each other.

EPISODE NINE.

Some Terrible Alternatives.

"Come, Miss Beresford, you have been allowed ample time to lament the failure of your plot, and I now await your attention."

At these words, spoken in a cold, sarcastic tone by Harry Vernon, I was stung into something like recovered self-possession, and, hurriedly dashing the futile tears from my cheeks, I stood up to face my denouncers, knowing full well that I need expect neither pity nor mercy from them.

"As you please," I said, in an almost inaudible voice. "I am ready to listen."

"And to heed," added Annabel. "Otherwise, you will live in Queer Street for the rest of your life."

"Look here, darling, let me manage this business now. I think I know better how to deal with our treacherous guest than you do, and I would prefer not to risk such interference as your tender little heart might dictate."

So said my host, and I could almost have laughed at the idea of Annabel Vernon being accused of possessing too tender a heart to deal with a lonely girl whom her own evil trickery had stung into reprisals. But I was in too terrible a position to pay lengthened attention to anything but my own woes, and I hardly realised the full sting of her answer until afterwards.

"Poor boy," she cooed, kissing her husband with an affectation of innocence which was in ghastly contrast to her black nature. Poor, dear boy! What a shame it is to have such ingratitude displayed towards you, after trying your best to make other people happy. Never mind. However badly other people may behave, we have each other, eh?"

"Oh, what a hypocrite!" I thought, clenching my hands still tighter together, in the tremendous effort that was required to enable me to retain a comparatively calm demeanour. "How dare she pretend to have been trying to make me happy!"

Mr. Vernon smiled affectionately at his wife as she passed out of the room, leaving him to "deal with their treacherous guest," upon whom he now bent a look as hard as adamant.

"Don't let me keep you standing," he said, with a mock politeness which contrasted forcibly with his determined manner. "I should be sorry to cause you unnecessary fatigue."

I was shaking so much that I was glad to sit down, and I am afraid the true inwardness of the case did nothing to mitigate my sense of guilt or of coming disaster. Mr. Taskot's specious reasonings lost all their fatal glamour, and I felt that nobody would believe the excuses which previously seemed so convincing.

"A curious little series, isn't it?" observed Mr. Vernon, sitting down near me, and manipulating the tell-tale photographs in such a way as to bring each one, in turn, under my notice. "When these are reproduced in various papers, accompanied by the story of their origin, I fancy they will make a great sensation. 'Country House Scandal. Lady guest cheats at cards. Plot to swindle the host and hostess.' What fine headlines these will make! And what a reception Miss Beresford will meet with when she tries to mix with her old associates as a respectable person! Quite interesting, isn't it?"

Goaded to speech by these cowardly words, I made a vain effort to regain the position my nervelessness had lost me.

Digitized by Google

"You forget," I said, "that there is another side of the story. How about the cards which I saw Mrs. Vernon put up her sleeve?"

"Yes, I just thought you would try that sort of a dodge on! Happily, nobody is likely to believe a wild tale, concocted after detection, by a person whose own misdeeds are proved beyond possibility of denial."

These dreadful words turned me absolutely sick with horror, for, though they were so wide of the truth, I knew very well that the man who spoke them was right in his opinion, that whatever I said against the Vernons now would be construed into a feeble and vile attempt to put the guilt on to the wrong shoulders.

"You don't answer me," he continued. "That means that you have not a word to say in excuse of your ungrateful conduct, and that you see no reason why we should not denounce you to the police as a swindling adventuress."

"For Heaven's sake, don't do that!" I gasped. "I couldn't live under the disgrace."

"I see nothing else for it, unless——"

"Unless what? Unless what?"

"Unless you pursue your recent tactics with more caution."

"I shall never adopt them again! The lesson they have given me will suffice for all time."

"A lesson in caution—yes. But your little device for winning other people's money is too valuable to be allowed to drop. You have shown yourself very clever in your own interests. You must now display equal cleverness in ours."

"I do not understand you."

"Yet it is not difficult to grasp my meaning. Instead of playing with Mr. Taskot for your partner, you will henceforth prove useful to my wife and me. So I give you your choice. Either you will repay us for our trouble and forbearance by winning for us, or you will go to prison. You can please yourself which you do. But there is no doubt as to the course that will prove least disastrous to you."

"I am going home. I do not want to touch a card again."

"That is a great pity, Miss Beresford, for you are not going home, and you will have to touch hundreds of cards before we have done with you, unless you choose the alternative penalties of ruin, exposure, prison, and perpetual disgrace."

"But even if you compel me to accede to your terms, there is still Mr. Taskot. He knows everything."

"But he will keep the knowledge to himself, for his own sake. He is even less able to afford disgrace than you are, for he is a well-known personage in society, so he has chosen the wiser course. He has agreed to pay a sum down as indemnity; to leave Vernon Towers at once; and to keep a still tongue in his head for ever, if you agree to do likewise."

I do not seek to excuse myself for not having the moral power to defy Harry Vernon, and take the threatened consequences of my previous folly. But I never had quite my share of courage, and I was terrified into submission by the prospect of evils which I dared not face. I was also vaguely hopeful of some unexpected way out of my difficulty, and, seeking to stave off disaster, I tearfully consented to do whatever the Vernons commanded me to do.

"You agree to my terms?" demanded Mr. Vernon.

And my answer, low spoken though it was, satisfied him.

"I must!" were the words I quivered. "I have no help for it."

EPISODE TEN.

I Make a Desperate Resolve.

Mr. Taskot must have left The Towers immediately after his interview with Mr. Dean Fisher, for he did not make his appearance at dinner, and we were informed, with many expressed regrets, that "dear Mr. Taskot" had had a telegram, which had compelled him to rush off to catch the first train up to town, without having time to say good-bye to anybody.

"Happily," continued Annabel, "we have persuaded Olive to stay on for a while. She is her own mistress, so we are not interfering with anybody else's comfort by having her here, and I'm sure I hope she'll stop with us for many a week. It's so nice to have a girl friend in the house."

To this deceitful speech I gave no answer, but, mindful of certain lessons which had been impressed upon me, I did nothing to betray its true value. Nor did I offer any contradiction when my former school friend went on to say that she must insist on my taking more fresh air and outdoor exercise than I had done during the last few days, to dispel the nasty headache which late hours seemed to have brought on.

Mrs. Grainger was already making preparations for departure, and when Annabel suggested that she also should prolong her visit, the negative answer was so emphatic that I concluded the poor lady had lost a great deal more money than she liked.

But, before leaving, she gave me a very cordial invitation to visit her after I left Vernon Towers, and I promised to do so.

That same evening, the Bainbrigs and a couple of friends of theirs came in for a game at Bridge. The strangers were brothers, named Garford, who were made very welcome when it transpired that they were fairly wealthy.

"How nice of you to make our party up into two sets," smiled Annabel to Miss Bainbrig, who replied: "To tell the truth, we wanted another rubber. But the boys haven't played yet, although they want to learn, so we thought they couldn't do better than learn from somebody with more experience of Bridge than we have."

"That makes five novices in the party," mused Annabel, "so we don't quite know how to parcel ourselves out. The best way will be to cut for partners."

Everybody agreed to this, and I had a wild hope that my punishment was to be staved off for the present. But my hope was soon belied, for Harry Vernon and I were cast as partners, and though I felt sure that this result had been obtained by trickery, I could not help myself. Our opponents were Mr. Bainbrig and one of the Garfords, and I sat down to the table with such a feeling of despair at the idea of deliberately cheating people who had never injured me, that there was actual truth in my sudden plea of illness.

"Oh, I cannot play!" I faltered, letting my hands fall nervelessly into my lap. "I—I feel so ill."

"Ill!" exclaimed Annabel, from the other table. "There, what a forgetful little wretch I am! I promised you a splendid cure for your kind of complaint, and I had forgotten all about it. Harry, do you mind fetching it? It is in the third left-hand drawer of your bureau, where you locked it, to be safe until I asked you for it."

Harry rose from his seat with a show of alacrity, and nobody but myself understood the meaning of the searching look he bent upon my face. Neither did they guess that Annabel's words veiled a dreadful threat.

Digitized by Google

But they were not obscure to me. For it was in the third left-hand drawer of the bureau in Harry's "den" that the fatal photographs had been locked, and as I dared not risk their production, I made a desperate attempt to recover myself.

"No, don't trouble to fetch the medicine," I stammered. "I am nearly well again, and I would not take it if you fetched it."

"But you might have a relapse," suggested Mr. Vernon, who with difficulty repressed the smile which his knowledge of fresh victory evoked.

"It was only a passing faintness, and 'relapse' is too strong a word to use."

My host was now sure that he had quelled my feeble attempt at rebellion. But he had no mind to trust to a partner whose nerves were all ashake, so he solicitously fetched me a glass of champagne, and his outward manner was kindness itself as he whispered: "There, Miss Beresford, I daresay this will prove more agreeable than the medicine Annabel believes in."

I drank the wine, and having satisfied the guests that my indisposition had really been only a passing one, I lifted the cards dealt out to me. I was dummy this time, so had nothing to do, and before my right-hand opponent had become the dealer, I was possessed by the glamour of the game we had started.

Nevertheless, I failed to give the required signals, and my heart quaked when, it being now my turn to deal, I caught the threatening look bent upon me by my partner.

"You still look very shaky," he murmured significantly. "Don't you think I had better fetch Annabel's remedy?"

After that I became desperate, and Mr. Vernon had no cause to accuse his partner of lack of rapport. We played far into the night, and when I went to bed I was the sharer in a large sum of money won from our unsuspecting opponents.

The attractions of the game itself, and the excitement of making big scores, together with the knowledge of what lay in store for me if I refused to obey orders, were all conducive to the temporary lulling of my conscience, and my laughter rang out more than once clearly enough to provoke a swift glance of intelligence between the rapacious couple into whose toils I had fallen

But, once in my own room, influenced by neither the glamour of play nor the threats of exposure, I threw myself on the bed, and wept a heartbroken requiem to my own self-respect.

"You are a deliberate cheat!" I told myself. "You could find excuses for retaliating upon the people who only brought you here to swindle you out of the money they thought you possessed. But what excuse have you for helping to cheat honourable persons who have never done you any wrong?"

So spoke the voice of Conscience. But the voice of Fear interposed.

"You dare not face exposure," it said. "And you know very well that you are in a trap from which your captors will only allow you to escape after you have served their purpose. Dare to defy them, or refuse to do their bidding, and you are lost for ever."

Then came Desperation to advise me.

"Are you sure," it said, "that there is no way of escape? Are you going to resign yourself to a life of constant fear and ignominy? And do you forget that even after you have helped these people to rob others of their fortunes, they will still hold those photographs as a weapon of terror over you?"

Ah! That was where the worst sting came in! It was not a case of speedy liberation from thraldom, but of more abject plunging into slavery. Why, then, should I not make an effort to free myself from the power of my cruel enemies?

"The third left-hand drawer of the bureau."

Was it quite inaccessible to me? And was it quite beyond the bounds of possibility for me to abstract and destroy the proofs of my former folly?

Anxious deliberation convinced me that my position, even in the case of detection in the attempt, could not be much worse than it was. If I failed, and if the Vernons guessed that I had tried to free myself from their power, they could but impose weightier penalties upon me, and as I knew by this time that they subordinated everything to their greed, I did not think that they would utterly destroy the goose through whose agency they hoped to gather so many golden eggs.

"Yes, I will risk it!" I determined at last. "I will wait until three o'clock. Everybody is sure to be in bed and asleep by that time. Then I will try to secure the photographs, and, if I succeed, I will leave Vernon Towers to-morrow."

EPISODE ELEVEN.

The Third Left-Hand Drawer of the Bureau.

I wonder how a burglar, not yet accustomed to his work, feels? I am sure his first experience in his chosen profession must be a terrifying one. But it cannot be half so trying as was my midnight adventure at Vernon Towers. The burglar, whatever may be the privations that drive him originally into theft, deliberately selects the locale of his operations, and no doubt weighs up very carefully the respective attractions of several dwellings.

But to me, whose task was equally dangerous and underhand, there was no choice of venue, and I would almost have given my life to be free from the necessity of doing that which stress of circumstances was now compelling me to do. Yet it was my only hope, and I made my preparations with a caution born of the most desperate anxiety to rid myself of a deadly incubus.

Carefully selecting my apparel, I prepared myself to avoid all unnecessary risks of detection. My dark tea-gown was lined with nun's-veiling, and would not give the slightest rustle. Neither would my bedroom slippers betray me, and there was no fear that I should make more noise than I could help.

I had noticed the kind of key used by Mr. Vernon when he locked the drawer of the bureau, and fancied that it was rather like one that figured on my own bunch. But, though I took the precaution of carrying my own keys with me, I had little hope that they would prove useful. Failing a key to fit the lock, I meant to prise the drawer open, provided I could find a suitable implement to do it with.

"I shall of course remove nothing but the photographs of me which were taken without my permission," I argued, "But their removal will at once inform the Vernons who it is that has tampered with the bureau. The question is—Will they make a fuss? Or will they understand the danger of provoking me to explain that they compelled me to cheat for them, under threat of exposure? The very fact that they played with me after taking those snap-shots ought to show that they were ready to condone whatever I did, so long as they were able to make an ultimate profit by it. Anyhow, I can only save myself by fighting my enemies in the dark."

Digitized by Google

To reach Mr. Vernon's little sanctum, it was necessary to pass several bedrooms, and I quaked a good deal as I did so. But I passed down to the first floor without being apparently either seen or heard, and was thankful to find that the door of the room was not locked. Hastily turning the door handle I passed in, shutting myself up with little fear now of being interrupted at my work, even though I turned up the electric light.

Greatly to my dismay, the flap of the bureau was locked, and I had thus two difficulties to overcome instead of one. The piece of furniture was quite of modern make, and its lock was not particularly complicated. But my keys proved quite useless to serve my purpose, and I looked round for something powerful enough to force the flap open. A strong steel paper-knife lay on the mantelpiece, and I eagerly seized it.

Gliding back to the bureau, I was inserting the knife beneath the flap, when I heard that which made my heart almost stop beating. There was a noise in the corridor outside, as of swiftly advancing footsteps, and I looked wildly round for a possible hiding place. To turn down the light was the work of a second, and to squeeze myself behind a huge easy-chair did not take a minute.

But I had barely done so much when the door was hurriedly opened, and my horror can be imagined when I realised that both Harry and Annabel Vernon had followed me!

If the light had been seen shining under the door I was lost, even if I had not been already suspected of being here, and I positively quivered with dread of what the near future had in store for me.

With what relief therefore did I gather that this nocturnal visit to Harry Vernon's den had nothing to do with the fact that I was there first. Probably the door was too well made to allow a chink of light to shine through, and I was glad that my operations had not gone far enough to betray my presence.

The lock of the bureau was as its owners had left it. The keys with which I had tried to open it were in my pocket. And it was hardly likely that either husband or wife would notice that the paper knife was not on the mantelpiece still. If only they did not look behind the chair, I was saved!

"A most stupid thing to do," observed Annabel. "But it is not too late to prevent mischief."

"I don't know that it was stupid," contradicted Harry. "In fact, I think it was exceedingly clever of you to mention the exact place in which she saw 'the medicine' deposited. Anyhow it gave her a fright, and instantly brought her to reason."

"Yes, but if I had not remembered about it, our plans might have been upset. The girl is not so simple as she looks, and I believe he quite capable of trying to ruin our beautiful little scheme by abstracting the photographs."

"So do I. But we are rather too clever for her. If she does attempt to take the proofs out of the third left-hand drawer of the bureau, she will find her trouble wasted. I'll slip them behind the overmantel. Nobody would dream of looking there for them, and I'll duplicate them to-morrow. We shall then be secure against accidents."

The next two minutes were about the most anxious ones of my life. Everything now depended upon which side of the overmantel Harry Vernon selected as a hiding place. If he came to the side on which I was hidden, all hope of rescue was at an end for me, and I should be in his evil power as long as he chose to exercise it.

With my heart beating almost to suffocation, I listened and quaked while the bureau was denuded of its fatal proofs, and while these were transferred to the back of the overmantel. And with what thankfulness did I observe that the opposite side of the fireplace afforded a readier means of access than the one which sheltered me!

(Another instalment next week.)

YOUR EDITOR CHATS.

I have received the following letter from a married lady reader of Short Stories:

"Dear Sir,—A short time ago in your paper, Short Stories, there was a love problem, entitled, "A Matter of Course; or, Should a Husband be a Complacent Person?" and I want, through your paper, to thank the author of that story for a deal of happiness it has brought me. We have been married three years, and I have one of the best of husbands in every possible way, only in the one thing he was exactly like the husband in that tale, and therefore unknowingly caused me many an unhappy hour, the reason being that he did not understand how much those little words 'I love you,' mean to a woman, be she either wife or sweetheart.

"I never had the strength of will to try to give him the lesson the wife in the tale did, and instead of us drawing closer together, I expect I should have grown in time heartily tired of it all, and we would have gradually drifted apart. But now all is altered, we are really the happiest couple in the kingdom, for one day he took that paper away with him, read the tale, and wrote asking me if that was really how I felt over the matter, and, if so, that in future everything would be different, for, 'like the man in the tale,' he had always cared ever such a lot for me, but did not think it necessary to simply tell me so. He thought I ought to know, and for three long years I was often very unhappy and never cared to tell him why. My husband asked me to write and give both our heartiest thanks to the author for the happy chance that caused him to write, and us to read, 'A Matter of Course.'—Yours gratefully,

"A Very Happy Wife."

[I am delighted to hear that at least one married couple have benefited by reading a story in Short Stories. Do any other readers know of similar experiences?]

I would take this opportunity of reminding competitors in First Juggled Letters competition that all attempts must reach this office not later than by first post on Thursday this week, August 27th, and I would again draw your attention to the sentence in last week's "Your Editor Chats," which reads: "The attempts of competitors who do not address their envelopes correctly are liable to be disqualified." The proper way to address the envelope containing your attempts is: The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., with the words "Juggled Letters" in the top left-hand corner.

I have been glad to learn from the many letters received that both the new series and new serial are popular, and I expect that as further instalments of "The Bridge of Ruin" are published general surprise at the revelations will be expressed. Anyone who has not already started to read them should do so at once; they will be sorry to have missed any of the incidents that appear each week.

Though the summer is drawing to a close it is not yet too late for contributions to the Fresh Air Fund to be sent, and I would ask all those who have not already forwarded a donation to remember that in the heart of our big cities there are thousands of small children pining for a breath of pure, fresh air. To these children the boon of a whole day in the country is inestimable. With the sum of ninepence, laid out by the Fresh Air Fund, one child can have this coveted boon. Wouldn't you like to feel that you had helped to make one little life happier?

All contributions should be sent to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. They will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

The Conversion of Colonel Crackenthorpe.

Telling of How a Cycling Picnic Started the Wedding Bells Ringing.

"The Secretary of the Witheram Cycling Club presents his compliments to Col. Crackenthorpe, and wishes to know whether he would be so very kind as to accord to the Members of the Club permission to pass through his grounds on the afternoon of the 27th inst., and to visit the ruins of Crackenthorpe Abbey. The Secretary would undertake to promise that no damage or injury of any kind shall be done to the ruins by any member of the club."

"What infernal impudence!" cried the Colonel, after reading the above epistle at the breakfast-table. "As if I were likely to allow a whole lot of tag, rag, and bob-tail on cycles to come into the park. The Secretary of the Witheram Cycling Club indeed. I like his impudence! What's the fellow's name? Ah! here it is—Mr. Arthur K. Brandon. Now who on earth is Mr. Arthur K. Brandon?"

"Brandon!" cried Lucille, the eldest girl. "Why, Connie, wasn't that the name of the man you met when you were staying with the Hampdens'?"

"Just look at Connie's face, it's nearly as red as Aunt Clara's cap-ribbons!" began Madge, the irrepressible, and only very vigorous treatment from Lucille under the table, stopped that young damsel's further remarks before their father's attention was aroused.

"Yes," said Connie calmly, though a little tell-tale colour had certainly risen in her face when the name was mentioned. "He was a great friend of the Hampdens, and Witheram is not far from their place."

"Well, I don't know the man from Adam," cried the Colonel, "and I call it great cheek on his part to write to me. Why, I should have a lot of these tiresome cyclists careering madly about in my grounds I don't know. It's bad enough to meet them suddenly in the roads."

Colonel Crackenthorpe was one of the few remaining bigoted opponents of the wheel. When the craze first set in among the fashionable world, he had set his face rigorously against it, and had forbidden his daughters to learn. A good many fathers of families in the neighbourhood had started with the same idea, but by degrees all had given in to the force of circumstances, except the Colonel, who prided himself on his consistency; and though his daughters might sigh with envy when their friends described the delights of a glorious spin, he remained firm in his determination.

"Our ruins, of course, are one of the most interesting sights of the county, and one can hardly wonder at people wanting to see them," put in Lucille, who was a clever girl, and knew her father's weak points.

But an unexpected and quite unintentional ally sprang up in the shape of Aunt Clara.

"Of course you will refuse," said that lady, in her decided, dogmatic way, "you can easily write and say that you dislike to have your privacy invaded by a number of strangers."

Now, though Colonel Crackenthorpe hated cyclists, there was something he hated with a yet more bitter hatred, and that was the sister-in-law who was at present honouring him with a visit.

Nothing rubbed him so severely the wrong way as the manner in which she invariably tried to settle all his affairs for him, and no arguments in favour of the Secretary's request would have been of so much avail as Aunt Clara's opposition.

"I shall do nothing of the kind," he said testily. "As Lucille says, the ruins are one of the sights of the county, and the possession of them entails a sort of public duty. So long as this secretary man can guarantee that they won't go and cut their names on the old trees, or do any of the other idiotic things tourists are given to, I don't mind their coming for once in a way. Connie"—turning to his second daughter—"you can write him a civil note from me and say I consent to their coming."

"Well, I am surprised at you, George," said Aunt Clara, "but surely you will at least impose some restrictions upon them, tell them what part of the ground they may go through, and at what hour the place must be clear of them."

"Nonsense, my dear Clara. If I do a thing at all, I like to do it properly. Tell them to let me know how many are coming, and some refreshments shall be provided for them in the old refectory. I dare say there may be some among them who will be interested in the historical associations of the place."

The girls looked at one another in open-eyed astonishment, and Madge, who was still in the short frock stage of girlhood, clapped her hands and cried out: "What fun! And may we go and see them feed?"

"Madge!" cried her aunt, raising her hands in horror. "How can you dream of such a thing? I think we had better all go out for the day, or shut ourselves up in our rooms."

"There will be no occasion to do that," said the Colonel stiffly, "the cyclists will not come near the house, and if I think fit to take my daughters to see our guests—mind, I do not say I will—but if I think fit, I shall certainly do so."

It dawned at last upon Aunt Clara that her interposition had quite a contrary effect from what she intended, so she turned the conversation into another channel, and no more was said upon the subject of the Witheram Cycling Club, which, however, did not drop so speedily out of the mind of one member of the party.

Connie Crackenthorpe had not forgotten the delightful talks she had with the young lawyer she had met when staying at the Hampdens, nor the earnest hope he had expressed that they might meet again soon; a hope that seemed little likely of fulfilment, since Witheram was in the next county, twenty miles from Crackenthorpe Abbey, and the Hampdens only invited her to visit them once a year.

The thought arose in her mind that the eagerness of the Witheram Cycling Club to behold the Crackenthorpe ruins might be prompted by the desire of its secretary to see her, and though she chid herself for the preposterous idea, it still lay under the surface of her thoughts, gladdening her unconsciously, as a hidden warmer under-current enlivens the waters of a stream.

The Witheram Cycling Club were fortunate in their weather when the day fixed for their trip to Crackenthorpe Abbey arrived—a day after a cyclist's own heart, bright, yet fresh and cool.

Arthur Brandon congratulated himself on the success of his bold step in writing to Colonel Crackenthorpe, for he had done it with very little hope of a favourable reply, knowing from report that gentleman's obstinate dislike of the gentle wheel.

He put it down in his heart to the persuasions of the Colonel's fair daughter, not being behind the scenes as the reader is; and the thought that perhaps she too might rejoice at this opportunity of meeting again, lent wings to his feet, so that in the exuberance of his joy he was very nearly being "run in" for scorching on the public high road.

Digitized by Google

The run to Crackenthorpe passed off without any special incident, and hot and thirsty as the riders were, when they reached the Abbey, the sight of the cold collation spread under the shade of the moss-grown walls was exceedingly welcome.

The Colonel had almost forgotten his idea of going to see his guests, when a chance word from his sister-in-law fanned into flame his love of opposition.

"I'll just go and have a look at them," he said. "Lucille, you come with me."

"Oh, father, I promised to go over and practise archery with Mabel Turnbull," said Lucille, who was as good-natured as she was clever. "Connie might just as well make herself useful for once. She has been mooning about doing nothing all day."

"Well, then Connie, I insist upon your coming," said her father. "I won't listen to any excuses." And Connie went up to put on her hat with dutiful submission—and a heart bounding with delight.

They found the repast in the old refectory on the point of conclusion, and the Colonel, when the "secretary fellow" had been made known to him by his daughter, was much surprised to find him a man of well-bred appearance and perfect manners. "The fellow actually seems to be a gentleman," was his inward comment.

He stepped out swiftly, and caught the bicycle with its wobbling rider.

Pleased with the thorough appreciation of his hospitality shown by the club and by the deference of the secretary, the old gentleman actually condescended to go up and inspect the row of obnoxious machines that reposed against a fence, and to ask a few questions about their peculiarities.

Presently one of the owners, an elderly member of the club, came up to adjust something in his machine, and looked at the Colonel closely. Then he approached him, hat in hand.

"Beggin' your pardon, sir, but surely you must be Master Harry—leastways that used to be Master Harry at Headon House, where I was under-gardener? Don't you remember Bill Thorpe, sir?"

The Colonel turned and looked at him closely. "Of course I do," he cried, "why, Bill, it was you first taught me to handle a gun."

"Aye, sir, I did," said the other with a grin, "and do you remember that day with Farmer Stockem's rabbits?"

"I should think I did. I believe it was the proudest day of my life. And do you remember the trouble we got into about that hen-pheasant? Why, it's like going back to the old days to see you again!" And the two men rambled on into recollections of boyish sports and scrapes they had enjoyed together.

And then Thorpe explained how he had now settled down as market gardener in the little town of Witheram, and had allowed himself this one day's holiday to enjoy his favourite amusement of cycling. And the Colonel recapitulated briefly the succession of deaths that had resulted in making him, the younger son of a small squire, the owner of the large domain of Crackenthorpe Abbey.

Meanwhile, Arthur Brandon, with a culpable neglect of his duties to the club, had managed to get to the side of Connie Crackenthorpe, and almost unconsciously they found their steps straying from the ruins, which the tourists were inspecting at their leisure, into a moss-carpeted glade, where in the sunshine and the stillness, Arthur Brandon found words in which to pour out his tale of love and longing, his hopes and fears, his own unworthiness of such an inestimable treasure.

As he stood there, stumbling through his broken sentences with the unmistakable ring of true sincerity in his voice, his dark eyes aflame with feeling, and his clear-cut, resolute lips trembling with eagerness, he looked a lover of whom any woman might be proud.

And so Connie seemed to think, for though she kept on saying, "No, it could never be, she was sure her father would never consent," her own views on the subject did not transpire, except in so far as her lover could discern them in the soft flush on her cheek, and the shy, happy glance of her blue eyes, and in the fact that she did not withdraw her hands from his eager clasp.

He was urgent to obtain more definite confirmation of his hopes, when the sound of voices close by startled them. They were standing near a clump of elder bushes, and he hastily drew her behind it as the footsteps came nearer.

Down the path that led through the middle of the glade came her father, accompanied by an elderly man trundling his wheel, and talking to him with a familiarity such as very few could have ventured on with the master of Crackenthorpe Abbey.

"And so you really find this cycling enjoyable?" the Colonel was saying.

"I assure you, sir, it's the next best thing to flying. When you have a gentle incline before you and can slip along it without any exertion, why it's heavenly; and as for the difficulties, they just increase the pleasure as soon as you have mastered 'em. You just have a try here, sir, where there's nobody looking. I'll hold you on just at first. Do 'ee now, Master Harry!"

Digitized by Google

Whether it was that the revival of old associations roused again in the Colonel's bosom the venturesome feelings of boyhood, or that the habit of obeying this mentor and guide in all matters pertaining to sport, insensibly returned to him, it is impossible to say; but the fact remains that he let himself be persuaded to mount the old man's bicycle, and Connie and Brandon held their breath in astonishment as they saw him zig-zagging about the path in the manner common to beginners, upheld by the stalwart arms of the ex-gardener.

Their glances met in irrespressible amusement, but they dared not move or make a sound, lest the Colonel should discover that this utterly unexpected performance on his part was not without spectators.

Bill Thorpe took him on some way and then turned him back again. "That's famous, Master Harry," he cried. "why, you'd learn it in no time," and up and down they went. "Do you know, I left you quite alone that time and you went on all right?"

"Did I really, Bill?" cried the Colonel, delighted—"leave me alone now, and I'll try."

But, alas! this time self-confidence came to grief, and Colonel Crackenthorpe soon measured his length upon the turf.

"A fall or two at first," said his teacher cheerily, "is all in the day's work." And he had the Colonel up and on the machine again before he had realised his disaster.

The lovers dared not issue from the friendly shelter of the elder, but as this arrangement brought them into very close proximity, Arthur Brandon was nothing loth to be thus detained.

A few more turns and the Colonel, emboldened by success, again insisted upon trying alone. This time he made—or rather his wilful wheel made for a tree close by the elder clump, and Arthur Brandon foresaw that a fall among the gnarled roots was almost inevitable.

He stepped out swiftly and caught the bicycle with its wobbling rider, but he had the tact to appear as apologetic aggressor and not as rescuer.

"I beg your pardon, Colonel Crackenthorpe," he said. "I must have startled you coming out suddenly like that. I thought that to stop you like this was the only way to prevent a collision in which one of us might have been hurt."

The Colonel dismounted and mopped his brow. He was startled at the sudden appearance of Brandon on the scene and of his daughter, who now came forward, calm outwardly, but with inward quaking. He looked at them both scrutinisingly, but there was no trace of a smile on either face, so he concluded they had not seen him until just now.

"I did not know," continued Brandon, "that you were cyclist too, and I am delighted to discover the fact."

"Oh!—er—I can't really call myself a cyclist—yet; I was only just trying—in fact, it is the first time I have ever been on in my life."

"Really!" said Brandon, "yet you were riding quite alone when I—so nearly ran into you."

"Yes," said the Colonel complacently, "I think I should learn it pretty quickly if I had any one to help me just at first."

"That you would, sir," remarked Thorpe, "and if I had the time to spare I'd gladly come over and help you."

"If you would allow me," said Brandon eagerly, "it would be nothing of a ride for me to come over here and help you, and I should consider it a privilege——"

"Oh! I should not like to take up your time," began the Colonel, but Brandon assured him that he would positively enjoy it, and that it was the only return he could make for the Colonel's princely hospitality to the Witheram Club.

"I am wondering what Aunt Clara will say," suggested Connie, with a mischievous glance at her father.

"You little puss!" said the Colonel, who was in high good humour, "don't you tell her a word about it, till I have mastered it, and then we will take her by surprise."

"Would it suit you if I came next Saturday?" inquired Brandon, determined to strike while the iron was hot.

"Do," said the Colonel, "come over to lunch if you can. The ladies will excuse your bicycling costume, I am sure. And, by-the-way, I must get a machine. What kind would you recommend, Thorpe?"

Thorpe, like every other cyclist, had his favourite make, and waxed eloquent upon its merits, and in the enthusiasm of his new departure, Colonel Crackenthorpe walked off with him eagerly discussing details, and leaving the lovers to follow at their leisure.

But Fate, which had befriended Arthur Brandon so conspicuously hitherto, was determined to prevent his getting quite a satisfactory answer from Connie that day.

He had just got again to the same point in his wooing at which he had been interrupted before, when as they emerged from the glade in suspiciously low converse, they suddenly came face to face with Aunt Clara, who had thought it her duty to come and look after her niece, whose father was so culpably careless as to be capable of letting his daughter talk with these common people who were invading the park on wheels.

Her worst fears were realised when she caught sight of the pair, and she hurried Connie off into the house as quickly as possible.

After dinner that night she took her brother-in-law seriously to task.

"Do you know," she began, with an unconscious imitation of Penley in the Private Secretary, "I was quite upset to-day by something I saw. I thought your admitting those strange men into the Park was rather rash, but when I met Connie, actually Connie, coming out of a shrubbery path in earnest conversation with the secretary, if gave me quite a turn. Why, it positively looked as if he had been making love to her."

"Pooh, nonsense!" said the Colonel. "I had been with them myself just before. And even if it had been, the man is a gentleman. Bill Thorpe was telling me about him, a well-connected man, and rising in his profession. Really, Connie might do worse."

Aunt Clara had already fully-formed matrimonial projects in her head for her two elder nieces, and she proceeded to argue and to irritate the old man till he was worked up into a thoroughly bad state of temper, when she left him, declaring that she washed her hands of him and his daughters, who would all come to a bad end if he had his way.

She expatiated to his daughters upon the terrible temper he was in, so that when poor Connie received a summons to the study, she entered it in fear and trembling, not knowing what was before her.

It reassured her a little to see what his occupation had been. Various advertisements of cycles, brakes, saddles, pumps, and other accessories, strewed the table. The Colonel had been poring over a handbook on cycling.

"Tell me, Connie," he said, "this young man who is so anxious to help me in riding—is there—is there anything between you?"

Emboldened by his tone Connie took her courage in both hands. "There is nothing, papa—yet, but—but he wants there to be something, only—only it depends upon you."

"And what is your opinion?"

"My opinion," said Connie, laughing and blushing, and pressing her cheek against her father's arm. "My opinion is—that he will make you an excellent teacher of cycling!"

Her father stooped and kissed her lightly on the forehead, pleased with her unwonted caress.

"Well, well, my dear," he said, "we will see. It's not a thing to be decided lightly. I shall have the opportunity now of getting to know the young man."

And so it came to pass that the irrepressible bicycle found its way into Crackenthorpe Abbey, and the Colonel became such an enthusiastic wheelman, that Arthur Brandon gave up the idea he had formed of making his honeymoon journey a cycling trip from the well-founded fear that his father-in-law might insist upon accompanying the bridal pair.

Gilbert Stanhope.

Digitized by Google

The Man Milliner.

A Love Story with the Usual Happy Ending.

My father had never brought me up to work. He had always given me an ample allowance and taught me to consider myself his heir.

My mother was long since dead, and when my only sister a few years back had married a wealthy silk merchant, she had received a handsome dowry, and it had always been understood that that represented her share of my father's fortune and that I was to have the rest.

Now, upon our father's death and within a few weeks of my thirtieth birthday, I found myself confronted, for the first time, with the necessity of earning my own living.

My father had died at a moment when he was heavily involved in speculations of which I knew nothing, and the legacy that should have stood between me and the world was practically worthless.

In a few months, by which time his affairs would be finally settled, there might be a small balance to the good for me, but meanwhile my capital and income alike were meagrely represented by a few hundreds still in hand from my half year's allowance.

My father's sudden and unexpected death was in itself sufficient to have unmanned me, for we had always been the best of friends, but the additional blow which had fallen on me in the loss of my prospects roused me to action, and I wearied my brains puzzling how I might best meet the emergency.

I was staying for the time being with my sister, having received a cordial invitation from her and her husband.

None of the many plans they had proposed to me seemed specially adapted to my capacity, and I was sitting in the drawing-room somewhat dismally discussing my future with my sister whilst she pulled to pieces a very elaborate headstructure, which she declared did not suit her in the least though she owned to its being a very expensive creation by Madame Modiste.

"I don't seem to get it right, somehow, Jack," she said despairingly, after half an hour's wrestling with various bits of chiffon, lace and ribbon. "Just leave off talking of the Gold Coast for a minute and bring your great mind to bear on the subject that occupies my attention. You have excellent taste. Now, tell me, dare I add this bit of pink in the front. It was at the side; is it an improvement here. And what about these flowers? Don't you think a feather is perhaps more becoming to my style of beauty?"

Cis is very pretty; at least I am very fond of her, and I admire her awfully, so I collected my wits and told her to put on the hat.

She did so.

"You're right; it's all wrong for you," I said critically. "It doesn't want pink at all; anyway that's much too deep a colour for you. And you ought to pull down the brim in front a little more. And I tell you what, just take out those flowers and if you've got a feather I'll stick it in for you scientifically just where it wants to go."

Cis jumped up. "I'll fetch you a feather. I've got one I know. Now, don't budge; I won't be a second!"

She ran off and I examined the hat with much interest. It was a large picture hat, but Cis is on an imposing scale and can carry off a good deal in that way. I began to decorate the hat according to my idea; Cis returned in a few minutes with the feather and I showed her where to put it in.

"Why, you've altered the whole thing!" she cried.

"Yes; just pin the things in place; I can't do that part; then put it on and see how it looks."

She proceeded to carry out my instructions, and I watched her operations with some excitement as to result. When she finally tried it on she uttered an exclamation of delight.

"It suits you down to the ground," I said. "Upon my word, I've never seen you look better in anything!"

"Jack! you are clever! I'll have it made up and wear it exactly as it is. It looks just as if it came out of a Bond Street shop."

Her words gave me an inspiration.

"Cis!" I cried, "you've cut the Gordian knot! I know what I'm going to do now. I'll open a bonnet shop."

"A bonnet shop!" she echoed.

"Yes. You say I've got taste. I believe I have. I believe I could plan a hat to suit any face, provided it was not surpassingly ugly. I'll design and group all the hats like I did yours and employ girls to sew them. I shall be the rage, you see. I'll put a fancy name over the shop like they all do. What's the feminine of Jack, Joan? Jennie?"

"Oh!" gasped Cis, "I think it's a splendid idea. I'll put some money in it to give you a good start, and Tom will, too, I know. But you mustn't take refuge behind a woman's name. No! Just write up large 'J A C K,' and let everyone know it's managed by a man. It's such a popular name, and the women will flock to the shop. Besides, with those pleading dark eyes of yours, you could make a woman buy anything."

The long and the short of it was that in a few weeks' time I found myself establisfied with a mild flourish of trumpets as a man milliner.

"Jack's" hats were speedily the rage. I made a point of giving each client personal attention wherever possible, and I became the fashion. Need I say more?

One Saturday afternoon my sister and I were having ices in some very smart tea-rooms when she nudged me.

"Jack," she whispered, "I'm certain that's one of your bonnets. It looks like you all over."

I started. It was a simple white straw hat wreathed with forget-me-nots and tied under the chin with pale blue strings, but the face—the face that its broad brim shaded! it was the face of my dreams, tender, delicate, womanly.

Digitized by Google

"Yes," I responded in some confusion, "I remember grouping that very hat, but I didn't make the sale. Miss Perry did last week, I believe. I wonder who the fair client is? I must look her up in the books."

"Why, don't you know," rejoined Cis, "it's Lady Laura Lovel; she was in here yesterday with another girl, and Mrs. Bracebridge pointed her out to me. Oh, Jack, you are doing splendidly. Think of the connection you have got already!"

I could not think, I could not reply, I could only look across the room and see as in a mist a fair face with a wealth of clustering pale gold hair wreathed in forget-me-nots.

She lifted her face as we passed. Eyes like the summer sky, a smile of heavenly sweetness, that was the picture that impressed itself on my mind. I repeated over and over again her name, "Lady Laura Lovel! Lady Laura Lovel!" She was far beyond me now, beyond the dreams of nobly ambitious love. In the old days I might have had hope.

When I got home I looked through the books and found an entry of her purchase. Yes, my sister was right; the blue bonnet had found an owner in Lady Laura Lovel. I knew her already by repute as one of the season's belles.

I was not surprised now at the furore she had created nor at the train of wooers she was credited with; I was as madly in love with her myself as any of them could be.

I went then and there out and bought a dozen society journals on the chance of finding some scraps of more or less reliable gossip concerning her. The descriptions of her scarcely tallied with the impression I had received of her delicate, ethereal beauty.

One of the magazines even contained a portrait of her, which I could not at all reconcile with the picture enshrined in my heart. It did not do her justice by any means, in fact could scarcely in my opinion be termed a likeness!

I should never have recognised her from it; her fair hair appeared much darker in the photo which was very misleading, and her features had suffered considerably in the touching-up process. Nevertheless, I carefully cut out the reproduction, kissed it and stowed it away in my pocket-book.

Many, many times during the ensuing week did I condemn myself for my folly, my worse than useless infatuation. For what chance was there for me? I had not even the honour of her acquaintance nor dared seek it. Yet, in spite of my telling myself this over and over again, I rarely now left the show-rooms during the fashionable hours for shopping.

One day whilst I was still building my flimsy castles in the air I was confronted with an announcement in one of the dailies that a marriage had been arranged between Lady Laura Lovel and Major-General Willoughby-Cave and would shortly take place.

My brain reeled; it was all over then! But I would not believe it possible. She was my destiny, my Fate! Assuredly there must be some mistake, the statement would be contradicted later. I would get the early edition of the evening papers presently and see.

I worked through the rest of the morning mechanically. In the afternoon a bevy of lovely young girls came in and clamoured to see "Jack." They would not be put off; they must have his personal and undivided attention.

I came to them and they explained they wanted me to suggest a scheme for bridesmaids' hats. They described their costumes and showed me patterns. One of them remarked: "It's Lady Laura Lovel's wedding, you know."

Her words dashed my last hope to the ground. In the face of such overwhelming evidence to the contrary, I could no longer cling to the belief that a miracle was going to be wrought on my behalf to give me my love.

I tried to rally myself and to study the eager faces round me in order to evolve a curve that should be equally becoming to them all. Finally they went away, delighted with my suggestions and leaving the order with me.

They had not been gone very long and I had retired to my desk, hidden behind a large folding screen, where I was trying to realise the cruel blow that had fallen on me when Miss Perry came up softly and said: "Lady Laura Lovel is here and would much like to see you."

There was no help for it. I must go. I should be face to face with her at last. I did not know whether to be glad or sorry.

Of course directly I saw her my eyes became riveted on her. She wore the same forget-me-not blue bonnet that had emanated from me, and I noticed as in a dream that she was accompanied by a young girl of about her own age. I bowed and addressed myself attentively to her. She hesitated and drew back, and the darker girl leant forward and said rather haughtily:

"I want to choose some hats to complete a trousseau. I don't want colours. Please show me only white and cream."

She was a pretty, graceful girl, nut brown in colouring and her face seemed to strike me as familiar; but I was disappointed to have to concentrate my attention on her as I should have much preferred to listen deferentially to Lady Laura's ideas and fancies.

I found my new client very hard to please and much more disposed to be guided by Lady Laura's opinion than mine. It was not the sort of thing I was accustomed to; however, I did not mind at all in this particular case.

I grouped a picture hat roughly with trails of flowers and leaves composed of hand-painted chiffon, and asked her how she liked it. She seemed pleased with the idea and turned to Lady Laura.

"How do you like it, Amy?" she asked.

"Amy?" I queried to myself; "some pet name, I suppose."

"I think it ought to suit you to perfection, Laura," she answered.

This one Laura, the other Amy! Was it a case of mistaken identity, I was asking myself in bewilderment.

Evidently; for the darker beauty decided on the chiffon hat and requested it to be entered to Lady Laura Lovel. I also succeeded in pleasing her with several other designs, and it was arranged between them that Amy was to come in in a couple of days time and see what she thought of them.

After that I put everything else aside, even the bridesmaids hats, to get on with the trousseau order. On the day appointed I was quite unnerved with excitement, dying to see Amy, and to learn who she was in reality.

Presently Miss Perry put her head round the screen and announced: "Miss Duchesne."

I jumped up; the name of Duchesne was almost an introduction of itself. Before her marriage my mother had been a Miss Duchesne, and I also bore the name among a long string of baptismal ones.

I told Miss Perry to show Miss Duchesne into the best reception-room, and to say that I would wait upon her there.

I did so without delay, and in the long conversation that ensued our talk was not only hats nor even mainly hats.

I learnt the connection Miss Duchesne had with our family which was remote enough truly, but she seemed prepared to accept me as a semi-relation, "having no real ones to call by the name," she said, with a rather plaintive little smile.

Later, when the acquaintance thus begun had ripened under my sister's gentle auspices, Miss Duchesne confided to me that Lady Laura Lovel was an old school-friend of hers in days of former prosperity, and that she had since been very good to her when the wheel of fortune had gone round.

The forget-me-not bonnet had really been purchased by Lady Laura, but she had almost immediately pressed it on Miss Duchesne's acceptance, because her fiancé had happened to remark he disliked her in blue. Miss Duchesne herself, she further confided to me, was on the stage, "But I do not think," she finished, with a little sigh, "I shall ever be a success."

"I know one rôle in which you would be perfect!" I said.

"What is that?" She lifted her eyes to mine.

"As my wife," I said. "Would you take that part in life? Would it content you to be merely loving and beloved on the world's stage?"

"I think it would," she murmured, "you are such a convincing lover!"

Ellice Beere.

Digitized by Google

A Good Deal of "Pretty."

"Miss Giggleton is pretty plain, isn't she?" "Yes, she is pretty plain, but her younger sister is pretty pretty."

He could be the Sun.

"You are the world to me," he whispered. "All right," she answered; "you can be the sun. I'm going to marry your father."

Troubles would Soon Come.

He: "It would be a pleasure for me to share your troubles and anxieties." She: "But I haven't any." He: "Oh! you will have when we are married."

Must Make Allowances.

Belle: "Would you allow a man to kiss you?" Maude: "Um—well, I think it is our duty to—er—make allowances for the weakness of mankind, you know."

Oscular Demonstration.

Melinda: "Pa, that young man, Mr. Charley, is very fond of kissing." Papa: "How did you find that out, you naughty girl?" Melinda: "I had it from his own lips, pa."

A Plausible Reason.

He: "I have read over a hundred novels during the past year." She: "Indeed! Probably that accounts for it." He: "Accounts for what?" She: "Your ability to talk fiction."

Curiosity Conquered.

Claribel: "You told me you were never going to write to young Hankinson again." Angie: "He's written me a dozen letters I haven't answered, but in his last one he left a page out, and I had to write and ask him what it was about."

A Fight to a Finish.

"Waiter," said a young civil engineer, after vainly struggling with knife and fork for fully ten minutes on an alleged spring chicken, "bring me a chisel, a steel wedge, and a heavy hammer, for I'm interested now, and am determined to see of what material this thing is made."

Winning her Favour.

"I hope you will excuse my delay, Mr. Jones," she said sweetly; "but I must confess I ran up to my room to look into the mirror a moment before seeing you." "That's quite excusable, Miss Fair. A lady with a face so attractive may well be excused for wanting to look at it occasionally." Miss Fair is never out to Mr. Jones when he calls.

Anything to Oblige.

Augustus Edward found his beloved weeping bitterly when he called. On asking the cause she explained: "Ma has no respect for my feelings at all. The servant was giving my sweet pet Fido a ride in the baby carriage, when ma lifted it out by the neck, and put the baby in its place. Wasn't it cruel?" "Aw, it was dreadful, don't-cher-know? Just say the word—aw—and I will lift the baby out by the neck—aw—and replace the dawg!"

Just why he Wanted her.

She: "I don't want to marry you. I don't even want to talk to you!" He (a widower) eagerly: "That's the very reason I want you to marry me!"

Her Only True Love.

He: "Are you sure that I am the only man you ever really and truly loved?" She: "Perfectly sure. I went over the whole list only yesterday."

Caught on the Links.

Beatrice: "You know, Will said he'd like to be caught playing golf?" Patience: "Yes." "Well, I caught him on the links this afternoon. We're engaged."

The Pangs he Felt.

The Sweet Young Thing: "I wonder if you ever felt the pangs of love?" The Savage Bachelor: "I had a deep and abiding love for green apples when I was a small boy."

Very Punctual.

Smith: "Your friend Wheeler is keen on punctuality, isn't he?" Brown: "I should say he is. Why, he even carries his watch in the hip-pocket of his trousers, just to prevent his ever being behind time."

From Bad to Worse.

Harris: "Walters has been looking pretty bad since his daughter got married, hasn't he?" Correll: "Yes; you see, he had no sooner got his daughter off his hands than he found he would have to put her husband on his feet."

Spoiling the Sentiment.

Naomi: "George, I believe that love brings us anguish as well as bliss." "So do I." "Do you ever experience that restlessness, that anxiety, that positive pain, that——?" "Certainly, love." "And what do you think causes it?" "Cucumbers."

Sweetly Filled.

Tommy: "I'se got de toofake, awfully." Visitor: "You should have the tooth filled, Tommy." Tommy: "I did have it filled. That's what makes it ache so." Visitor: "I never heard of such a thing. Did you have it filled with gold?" Tommy: "No; only sweets."

Put his Foot into it.

"Oh, Miss Brown, who was that plain young lady you were out with this afternoon?" "That, sir? That was my sister." "Oh—ah—I beg ten thousand pardons! I ought to have noticed the great resemblance! That is—that is——" Then he wished an earthquake would happen there and then.

A Proposal was Expected.

Mr. Green: "Now, I'm going to tell you something, Ethel. Do you know that last night, at our party, your sister promised to marry me? I hope you'll forgive me for taking her away." Little Ethel: "Forgive you, Mr. Green! Of course, I will. Why, that's what the party was arranged for, you know."

No Chance Now.

"Has George ever hinted that he had thought of you as a possible wife?" asked the anxious mother. "No," replied the girl, a far-away look in her eyes, "and I'm afraid he never will." "Why," said the mother, "I thought——" "It doesn't matter what you thought, mamma, dear," interrupted the daughter. "Only last night he complained of feeling drowsy, and it wasn't nine o'clock."

A New Way of Proposing.

"Edith." "Yes, Tom?" "I—I have a very important question to ask you. And—" "Yes, Tom?" "Now, don't play any sister games on me." "What is your question, Tom?" "I—I—well, the fact is, my name is going to be printed in the paper soon—in the paper, next to the advertisements, don't you know; and I was wondering whether it would be all alone among the deaths, or with yours among the marriages." "Oh, Tom!"

Digitized by Google

Splendid Serial Story.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

FORTY-FOURTH CHAPTER. (continued).

"You are not very lucky in getting your birds to hop into your net, Chase!" said Digby Scarlett. "Let me help you. If it is Ivy Strange you want, then I saw her step out of the London train, not half an hour ago. She was not alone, being accompanied by a cavalier in the person of Mr. Jack Maitland!" and he laughed harshly.

"You mean Sir John Maitland, Mr. Scarlett!" replied the detective gravely. "I will go and see Miss Strange."

But Digby Scarlett did not hear him. "Sir John," he snarled; "then the old squire is dead! Don't let that girl marry Sir John, Chase!" he laughed. "Arrest her—anything, rather than let her marry him!"

"Do you want to marry her yourself, sir?" said Gilbert Chase quietly.

The other smiled strangely. "I both wish and intend to! But rather than see her another man's wife, I would put a rope round her neck!" And his mouth grew cruelly vindictive. "I always get my own back—her ladyship—that boy—Heriot——" He stopped suddenly, aware that his tongue was running away with him. "Don't listen to my rot!" he said hastily. "I've been drinking! Go and arrest the girl. And find out when the widow of the late squire intends marrying again."

Gilbert Chase looked at him strangely. "I don't fancy Mr. Scarlett, that her ladyship will marry—a third time!"

A curious expression crept into the man's eyes—half fear, half joy; as, with another reckless laugh he put his spurs into his horse and galloped away.

Then, breaking into a quick run, the detective presently found himself back at the Manor, inquiring for the elder son of the dead squire, for he could not yet frame the words "Sir John."

He was shown into the library, and two figures stepped forward to receive him. They were Jack Maitland and the girl wanted by the police. There was a pause, then the detective spoke:

"I'm very sorry, sir, to intrude at a time like this, when you are suffering from a bereavement in your family; but the law will not stand still for joy or pain, and it is my disagreeable duty to take your companion away with me!"

"I quite admit the justice of your proceeding, Chase," said the grave voice of Jack Maitland, "and am sure neither of us bear you any ill-will for doing your duty. But," and his hand drew the silent figure of the girl closer to him, with a protecting yet proud gesture, "I must correct you on one point. This lady is not 'Ivy Strange' any longer; she never was 'Ivy Strange'; her real name being Dolores Grant. She has lately changed it to that of Dolores Maitland—my wife. We are both prepared to produce an alibi to prove she was in the Manor that night of the murder."

Gilbert Chase was silent from astonishment and chagrin. Astonishment that the secret he was so carefully working out should have been discovered by the girl most interested, and chagrin that instead of effecting a sensational arrest, the "suspect" should have returned voluntarily to give herself up to justice, backed by the presence of her husband.

Her husband! His thoughts suddenly went to another woman—the widow of the late Sir Trevor Maitland! How would she enjoy the situation, he wondered cynically? Did the new Lady Maitland guess who her mother was?

The door opened suddenly, and the wife of the late squire entered. She was dressed in dead black, but the three in the room noticed that she had not seized the chance of making herself alluring in widow's weeds. Her face was colourless, but she held herself with the same old pride as formerly.

FORTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.

"I Will Repay."

"I have just learnt that you had returned," she said, addressing herself to Jack. "You were too late to see your father; he was unconscious, so perhaps it is better so! But," and she clenched her white teeth over her lips suddenly, "your brother, little Woolf, is fatally hurt, and the stranger who tried to save him from the motor is also dangerously injured!"

Jack stepped forward, touched by the apathetic expression of her voice.

"Mater! Let me tell you that I have discovered the parentage of—of my wife!" and he drew Ivy proudly forward.

"Your wife!" and her face contracted suddenly as with pain. The eyes of the woman and the girl met; then Lady Maitland turned away.

"Ivy" stepped forward impulsively. "Tell me," she murmured. "May I see the—stranger who tried to save little Woolf? He is—I mean," she said hastily, "I think I may know him."

The detective, a silent watcher of each expression and turn of speech, saw Lady Maitland hesitate, a curious change cross her face, then she said coldly:

"You may come; only do not excite him. It is better so."

Silently she led the way to the room where the stranger lay—a man who was already being looked upon as a hero.

With one fearful glance of terror and apprehension young Lady Maitland flung herself down by the bed of the man.

"Father! Oh, my noble-hearted father!" she moaned. "Don't let me lose you when I have only just found you!"

Moved by a sudden instinct, Jack and the detective had stayed outside the room—only Lady Maitland and the younger woman having entered it.

The man opened his eyes. "Sweetheart, is it you? I am glad you are here. The little boy—who was he?"

"Lady Maitland's only son!" Ivy whispered. "You gave your life for him, and he no longer knows it! Oh, father, father, the pity of it—the pity of it!"

A spasm crossed the man's face. He stroked her hair gently.

"I want to speak to his mother—to Lady Maitland! The mother of the boy!"

Filled with a sudden fear, Ivy beckoned the silent woman to the bedside.

"Come! He wants you! Don't turn your back!" she whispered passionately. "He knows you—as I know you—at least play your part worthily—mother!"

The eyes of the woman and the girl met, both haughty, proud, and defiant; but in those of the younger woman a gleam of pity shone.

Digitized by Google

The widowed woman approached the bed, her face as white as the sheets that covered the man lying on it.

"You want to speak to me?" she murmured. "I am here."

He motioned her lower. "I vowed vengeance when I first learnt the treachery of the past," he said, hoarsely. "I have given my life for your child, willingly and gladly, poor little chap, but—" and he raised himself in the bed—"how did you treat my daughter? By hounding her down and casting suspicion on her for what she did not do!

"Look back and remember one kindly word or action you bestowed upon the child that was ours. When I discovered this at first, I was only bent on killing him—Scarlett—or you, for having forgotten so lightly. But now I see that vengeance has passed into a Higher Hand than mine, and I have done with hate—for He will repay—not one score will be left unpaid. Only a great pity—remains for you—for you are more lonely than I ever was. You will never know the love of a daughter!" and his hand touched the bright tresses of the girl he called child.

A quiver parted the lips of the late Sir Trevor's wife.

"You are right. I am more lonely than you—for I have the memory of a bitter wrong always with me, and the knowledge that I have ruined many lives and lost the boy who was everything to me! And the awful bitterness is," she continued in a deep, trembling voice, "that the hand I had most wounded should have been the one to stretch out salvation to my son! That I should have sinned, to have coals of fire heaped upon my head. Is not that gall and wormwood enough!"

A gentle knock at the door heralded the entrance of Jack and the detective.

Jack bent over the man whose hand he had so recently clasped.

"Mr. Grant, I never expected to find you in this house. I want to tell you something that will make you very happy, I think. Ivy—your Dolores and myself were married two days ago. She is safe, and will always have someone to protect her—and love her!"

The eyes of the dying man brightened.

"But—but that charge!" he murmured.

"We will face that together," Jack answered. "I know it will not hold water when once I speak out what I know. I am afraid of nothing for her but peace and honour."

The detective moved forward gently. "You are Vernon Grant," he said, slowly. "The man who was convicted and found guilty of forgery eighteen years ago?"

The man flushed, and a look of fear shot from his eyes that revealed the uncertainty a once convicted felon always feels in the presence of a man who, by law, has the right to interrogate him.

"I am," he murmured. "Why this question—now?"

"Because it is my painful duty to ask you whether you recognise this lady, known by the title of 'Lady Maitland' for more than fifteen years, as the same person who was your wife at the time of your arrest," said the detective gravely.

The dying man raised his eyes to the impassive face of the woman who stood near his bed. He noted the glint of gold still in her rich hair, the soft curves of her mouth and chin, and the shadow her long lashes cast upon her cheeks.

Above all, he remembered that she had once been his honoured wife, and although a veil had fallen between them for all eternity, she was still the mother of the child who had all his heart's love—and that disgrace brought on her would recoil on the innocent head of their child—the wife now of the new Squire of Melton.

And with the knowledge of all the pain his recognition would cost, the man lied—deliberately and nobly perverted the truth—for the sake of the living.

"No," he said, slowly, "I do not remember ever having seen her ladyship before. She is a stranger to me—quite a stranger, I say. The woman I married died some years ago."

Gilbert Chase crept out of the room, a sense of his own littleness in the presence of so much courage and nobility making him forget his professional instincts.

With a sudden gesture Lady Maitland flung out her hand to the man lying on the bed, exhausted and unseeing. Jack drew his girl-wife aside—a sense of delicacy making them both wish to leave these two souls—the sinned against and the sinner—to speak their last words on this earth.

"Tell me," she murmured, "you forgive me. Tell me I have not lost the privilege of praying for pardon! You will remember my weakness and forget my wrong-doing?"

Their eyes met. And the veil seemed to lift for a breathless second, and husband and wife read each other's souls.

"As I hope to be forgiven, so I forgive!" he murmured "Go in peace!"

Ivy ran to her father's side with a cry, and flung her young arms round him; but she was too late to do more than shower soft, tearful kisses on his hand. The weary, strenuous soul had left the cage in which it had been confined for so long. The author, Vernon Vivyan, had begun a New Book, and the mother and his child looked into each other's eyes as strangers.

"Mother," said the girl, timidly, her voice trembling with tears, "let me take the place of poor little Woolf; let me, in some humble way, be something to you. I know you did not like me before—but then you did not guess!"

"Stop!" the older woman cried. "I will tell you that I did know who you were—later; but I refused to believe it, because I hated the idea. I hated you then—but now," and she smiled bitterly, "you have your revenge. You are the mistress of the Manor—the honoured, courted, and tenderly-loved creature, while I—I seem to carry a blight with me—I bring devastation in my wake to those silly enough to love me!"

The girl caught her fingers hungrily. "Mother, don't spurn me, don't call yourself hard names. I can't bear it. For his sake—the sake of the noble man who belonged to us both—don't revile yourself. Let us both begin together a new life of trust and honour."

The woman put the tender, clinging fingers aside, not roughly but firmly.

"Our ways lie far apart, child. I cannot pretend the farce of knitting my played-out life with that of a girl who is a stranger to me. My affection will be buried with my boy. Besides," she added, a cold smile touching her lips, "you would not be so eager to forgive and forget if you knew everything! Your life will be riveting new links, daily, while mine will be snapping off old ones!"

"What can there be that I do not already know now?" cried the girl. "Mother—mother, don't keep me in the outer circle of your confidence. Tell me what can send our lives apart?"

Casting a hasty glance round, Lady Maitland leant forward, and seizing the trembling girl by the shoulders, whispered something in her ear.

The girl's face blanched, and she recoiled in sudden horror.

"No, no! Oh, mother! Not that!" she murmured. "Not that!" and then she fell, an unconscious heap at the feet of her new-found parent.

FORTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.

The Eleventh Hour.

Two days later Sir Trevor Maitland and Woolf—the "Joseph" of his old age—were laid reverently side by side in the family vault of the Maitlands in Melton Church, and the stranger, who had given his life for the boy, was laid in a neat plot beneath a weeping willow, and on the simple headstone that was afterwards replaced by an imposing marble cross, were the words:

VERNON GRANT, AUTHOR,
AGED 48.

And underneath—

"Vengeance is Mine—saith the Lord."

The widow of Sir Trevor, Pearl Maitland—the woman whose beauty had brought low so many lives and made waste of so much honourable ambition in those over whom her meretricious beauty had wielded a power more potent than the deadliest poison — stood alone in her boudoir, a shadowy figure in black, with haunted eyes and quivering mouth.

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

"That girl—Jack's wife—knows. Will she—will she use her knowledge?" she murmured. "It would be a sweet revenge for her to play upon me. In her place I would not hesitate—no, for my nature is lower than that of his daughter!"

She rose swiftly, and going to the dressing table looked at herself in the glass with a sadly bitter smile.

"Your day is ended; very soon now you will throw up the sponge—and you won't regret it—not one little bit! All the heart to which you could lay claim was buried this morning in the grave of a little boy. Fate has taken him from you, and you have no right to protest. It is your punishment that you should lose the one creature for whom you sold even your chances of salvation. And now it does not matter—nothing matters! And very soon you will not matter."

She smiled again, and drew from the bosom of her dress a small phial. As she looked at it her face grew curiously rigid, and a listening expression flickered into her eyes.

"I must be quick!" she murmured. "They may come now my loved one is buried. There is no reason to defer their errand. But they will be here too late!"

She raised the ominous phial to her lips, but, as she opened her mouth a hand suddenly grasped her wrist, and the bottle fell to the floor. With a startled exclamation she turned an saw the girl she had tried so hard to wrong.

"You here!" she said, harshly. "Cannot you leave me in my downfall while you glory in your new-found happiness? Must I be tortured by your interference even here? Or"—and her eyes contracted suddenly—"have you come to say that—it is too late? That they know? If that is so, then pick up that bottle and let me escape my own way."

"No—no!" the girl said, in a low, sobbing voice—"not that way; you must not. For my sake, mother—for the sake of—of he who is gone—don't leave like that."

The woman repulsed her coldly, with a searching glance at the white, tearful face.

"Surely, since you know what I told you the other day, you will agree that this way"—with a gesture towards the bottle—"will be preferable to the other!"

A shiver shook the slight frame of the new Sir John Maitland's girl-bride, and she pressed nearer the woman who had wrought so much pain in her young life.

"No, no!" she gasped. "In spite of everything—even what you said—about—that, don't dream of such a wrong, of letting so wild an act crown your despair. You did not know—you must have been mad—when that happened."

"Mad!" murmured Lady Maitland quickly. "Yes, I have been mad—and am only just realising how mad, now that I have forfeited all the love I once possessed." She turned harshly upon the girl. "Why don't you go and leave me? I am still entitled to my privacy."

The arms of the girl she had wronged for so long stole round her gently. "I cannot and will not leave you in trouble," she said softly. "Think what he would have said had I deserted you in your loneliness. Even with his last breath he shielded you at the expense of a lie; and oh, mother," she cried passionately, "won't you take his place for me? May I not have a little of the love that poor little Woolf had—the right to comfort and shield you."

"You say all this to me?" said the low, tense voice of the older woman, beautiful in her ruin as in her pride of life; "to me, when you know that I did all I could to harm you and throw suspicion on your shoulders?"

"Yes," said Ivy bravely, "because I want your love, mother, to know that the parent for whom I have always yearned will have a little tenderness for me, and let me come into her life, even at the eleventh hour."

A curious light shone in the violet eyes gazing at the face so like her own.

"The eleventh hour!" she murmured—"the eleventh hour! You are right, child! I have reached that hour of my life. It comes to us all—some late in the day, some early—with me it is the mid-day."

"Dear mother," the girl continued, moved by the note of sorrow in the lovely voice. "Won't you kiss me—once—this once—as a mother? Only you"—she went on quickly—"Jack, and myself will know the secret, and we will never divulge it to anyone. I am content to pass as the village foundling so long as my mother acknowledges me when we are alone."

Lady Maitland put her hand out slowly—a sad, mocking smile touching her lips.

"Child, we cannot retrace the path we have once trod! The road I have chosen I must tread alone. But I thank you for the words your generosity has prompted you to say, and ask you to forgive; but, believe me, it is impossible to make such a past as mine, and a future as yours, meet on equal terms."

"Then you refuse——" Ivy began, when Félice, Lady Maitland's French maid, entered the room, looking bewildered and frightened.

"Milady! Milady!" she stammered. "Two gentilhommes 'ave sent me to say you are desired dans le salon."

The violet eyes flashed for a moment, and the ex-mistress of Maitland Manor grew suddenly very pale. A soft touch on her arm roused her, and she heard Ivy's voice saying:

"We will be there immediately. Felice, you may go."

The door closed, and the two women faced each other with trembling lips.

"You know what this means?" said Sir Trevor's widow slowly.

Ivy wound her arm protectingly around her mother's waist.

"I think I do," she answered, with misty eyes; "but come, mother—for so I will call you for the last time—we will face it together."

A swift gleam of pride shone in her ladyship's eyes.

"I am proud of your courage, Dolores," she said simply, and, bending forward, the lips of mother and child met for the first—the last—time. Then slowly they wended their way downstairs.

In the drawing-room Gilbert Chase and another man rose, as the two stately figures, that might have been those of twin-sisters rather than what the elder detective knew them to be, came into the room.

"Lady Maitland," he said gravely, addressing himself to the woman who had posed as Sir Trevor's wife for nearly sixteen years, "it has transpired, after due inquiry, that the warrant for the arrest of Ivy Strange was wrongfully taken out, her alibi having proved successful. But it is my unpleasant and painful duty," he continued slowly, "to inform your ladyship that I hold a new warrant for your arrest, on the charge of being guilty of the murder of the man Mike Holland in the spinny. I must also warn you that anything you say now, may be used in evidence against you."

There was a pause, then, in a curiously even voice, Lady Maitland said:

"Will you give an order for my carriage—I mean," correcting herself with a slight smile, "my step-son, Sir John's carriage, to be ready for me? I am prepared to go!"

A wave of admiration swept over the two men and the silent girl at the wonderful calm of a woman who, in the hour of her defeat, could so gracefully yield to the inevitable.

Gilbert Chase moved to the bell, when a rumble of wheels coming nearer and nearer up the drive, as though tearing on a matter of life and death, arrested his hand.

After a pregnant pause, in which each moment seemed an hour, the door was flung open to admit the young squire and another man, who cried loudly:

"Stop! Stop!"

It was Ernest Heath, and in his hand he waved triumphantly an envelope.

Digitized by Google

FORTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.
Nemesis.

"Stop!" cried Ernest Heath again. "I have important news to tell you that will prove the absolute innocence of Sir John's wife—Ivy Strange that was"—and he put his hand gently on that of the girl whose story he knew.

"You are mistaken, sir," said Gilbert Chase coolly, "our arrest concerns another lady."

Slowly and with much significance the eyes of the woman who had been a laughing petulant girl when last he saw her as Margaret Heath, his cousin, met those of Ernest Heath, and the disguise fell away with all other pretence, as they recognised each other.

"I do not understand," he said slowly. "This lady—the widow of the late Sir Trevor Maitland—can have no connection with the murdered man in the spinny.for I hold the confession of the murderer in my hand."

"What?" cried three voices, those of the two detectives and Ivy—"the confession of the murderer."

Ernest Heath gazed at them gravely. "Yes, the confession not only of the greater charge, but also of a cruel perjury that ruined an innocent man's life; and lastly, a foul attempt to murder by burning the house that contained an enemy!"

A glance of intelligence dawned in the eyes of those standing round. Only the white, tense face of the accused woman remained unmoved, as her gaze rested intently on the man whose words had caused a respite in her fate.

Ernest Heath was speaking quickly to the small crowd that seemed to have grown since he and Sir John had dashed into the room on the heels of justice.

"I had reason to wish to clear the honour of a recently dead friend," he said impressively, "who died giving his life for another, and whose career had been blighted in youth by the man who was his false friend. I possessed a strange gift which I had cultivated in former days, and which I had used sometimes in jest. But, on this occasion, I utilised it on a matter of honour for my friend.

"After much trouble and waiting I obtained an interview with the man I sought, and finding him in a semi-intoxicated condition, very speedily had him under the influence of hypnotism. I gradually drew from him a confession of perjury in a forgery case against the dead Vernon Grant, nearly nineteen years ago; then——" He paused, and his eyes rested on the white, rigid face of the ex-Lady Maitland. "Then I suddenly thought I would sound him on something else, and, under the power of hypnotism and my skilful questioning, he committed to paper a confession that it was his hand that had laid the death-trap for the owner of the 'Hollies;' and, lastly—but most importantly—that it was his revolver that had killed the man in the spinny! I left him gradually reviving, and outside I met Sir John on his way to see the man, but prevailed upon him to return with me."

"And his name is?" said Gilbert Chase, loudly, prepared for the answer.

"Digby Scarlett!" replied the other gravely. "This is his confession," and he handed the envelope to the detective, who opened it and read:

"I, Digby Scarlett, of the 'Rest,' wilfully perjured myself to secure a conviction against Vernon Grant on a charge of forgery, nineteen years ago. He was innocent. I also attempted to burn down the 'Hollies.' And it was my hand that fired the fatal shot that killed the man in the spinny. He interfered with me, and in a rage, before I realised what I was doing, I had shot him in the head. I bent over him to see if he was dead, and, finding he was, I left him there."

Gilbert Chase sighed. He understood the meaning of the half-burnt havana now, and realised that if he had pursued

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS
THE FAMOUS HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

THE PILLS

have gained their wonderful reputation by sheer force of merit, because every person who uses them recommends them to others. They have positively no equal for thoroughly cleansing the system and putting the liver and kidneys in functional order, without pain or griping. They are the best known remedy for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, and the common condition of ill-health, known as "run-down" or "out of sorts." Females of every age find Holloway's Pills an invaluable remedy and aid.

THE OINTMENT

is known throughout the world as positively the best and quickest remedy for Bad Legs, Old Wounds and Sores, and Skin Eruptions of every kind, and should be used in conjunction with the Pills. It is also the speediest remedy for Rheumatism, Lumbago, Pains and Stiffness in the Limbs and Joints, Backache, &c. For pains and Soreness at the Chest, and for Throat and Lung Complaints arising from Cold or Weakness, Holloway's Ointment affords most welcome relief in a very short time.

A COMPLETE DISPENSARY IN THEMSELVES.
AND OINTMENT

Digitized by Google

THE BOND BETWEEN.

his idea then he might have made a sensational capture, and gone up a step in his profession. It was too bad, just when he had imagined he had made a grand coup in getting out a warrant for the arrest of Lady Maitland. And yet he could not understand her attitude; it had been such a tacit acknowledgment of guilt, so he thought.

"Thank you, sir," he said. "Of course this confession squashes all other arrests on the head. It has brought the whole affair down to a prima facie case."

He looked round the room thoughtfully.

"You will excuse me, ladies and gentlemen; I have an important visit to pay."

As he and his partner left the Manor, Gilbert Chase laughed grimly.

"Well, they say the third time brings luck! But I could eat my hat if her ladyship did not have a very good shot at the man too! So at heart she is as bad as the other. I can guess that the 'interference' of the poor beggar was on behalf of Mr.—now Sir John—Maitland!"

Ivy turned to her husband when the room had emptied:

"Dearest! I am so glad this has happened. I was afraid—afraid, and yet—I felt she could not have done—that!"

Her adoring young husband kissed her tenderly. He did not speak; he was thinking of a look he caught in his stepmother's face as she had left the room.

That evening a woman, heavily cloaked, stood in the churchyard by the family vault of the Maitlands.

"Good-bye!" she said softly. "I am going away for ever; but the memory of this churchyard will be always with me!"

She paused at the new-made grave under the willow.

"Forgive!" she whispered; then moved swiftly on.

At the churchyard-gate a man met her. It was Heriot North.

"I know everything!" he said simply. "I want to apologise that I should have wronged you by thinking——"

"Don't!" she said sharply. "I was a murderess in heart. I went out to kill, only bad marksmanship made me wound instead. But in God's eyes I am the same!"

He came closer. "Is it any use my telling you that in spite of all the past that has gone—the wrong that has been done—I am still devoted to you in heart and soul? May I hope that when time has softened your present hurts, the bond between us may be rivetted into a closer and dearer one than that of shame?"

She shook her head gently.

"I have done with life. In that churchyard I have buried every human desire and hope. From henceforth I will expiate my sin in seeking my peace with God!" She held out her hand. "Good-bye! and forgive me for bringing pain and sorrow to you—you are a noble man, Mr. North!"

His fingers closed on hers, and the chilly contact made him feel that it was already the hand of a dead woman.

"Farewell, and God bless you!" he murmured brokenly. "I shall always remember!"

* * * * *

That night Digby Scarlett sat in his study. The blinds were up, and the moon had risen high in the clear sky.

Presently he rose and walked to the window.

"I don't know," he muttered uneasily, "whether it's imagination or not, but I feel that there is something close to me—something that will soon be upon me, crushing me and making me helpless! I wonder what that chap called for this afternoon! I can't remember him going away!"

He pressed his face to the glass, then started back with a cry.

Two men were walking up to the door, and a certain air about them, sent a sinister thrill through the master of the "Rest," and he knew that the end had come! That his day would soon set!

He went to his desk, and, sitting down, poured out a glass of neat brandy, which he half drank; then, with fierce eyes on the door of the study, he gently pricked his finger under the nail with something. It did not hurt much, and he smiled grimly.

"I am glad I always kept that hemel by me. It has proved my best friend!"

He drained his glass; then, still smiling, with twitching lips, waited for his guests to be announced.

The two men who entered the "Rest," shortly left again, but not with the man they had expected to take away. Again had Fate cheated Gilbert Chase! The third chance had been won by the man who lay, with smiling lips, on the bed in the guest room of the "Rest."

FORTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.

In Memory's Garden.

Five years later.

The squire of Melton, Sir John Maitland, looked up from a letter he had read three times.

Outside on the lawn the dainty figure of his wife, the beloved lady of the Manor, played with their son and heir, Vernon Grant Maitland, the pride of Melton; and a smile lit the squire's face as he watched them. Presently he opened the window.

"Sweetheart, come here for a moment!" he called.

Carrying the boy in her arms, Lady Maitland came.

Something in his face told her that he had heard an echo from that past they had fought to forget.

"What is it, Jack?" she said, in a hushed voice, letting the child scramble out of her arms. "Is it about her?"

He nodded, and putting his arms round her shoulders, they read together a letter.

"The Convent of the Sacred Heart,

"Amiens, France.

"Dear Sir,—At the dying request of one of our revered Sisters, who, after five years of stringent piety, died of consumption, caught from doing the roughest of out-door nursing; we are sending you the inclosed locket, which was round her neck at her death. Sister Margaret was loved by all. Faithfully yours,

"The Mother Superior."

Together they opened the locket. There were two photos in it, one of a little boy, and the other of a woman in the zenith of imperious beauty.

Tears fell from the eyes of Lady Maitland.

"Oh, Jack!" she whispered, "she has expiated all by this time!"

"Yes," he said gravely. "She has paid the debt."

For a time neither spoke, busy with the ghosts of the past.

"We must show this to Ernest Heath," Jack said presently. "He and Muriel are coming down to stay with us next week."

"Yes," his wife answered. "I am glad Ernest and Muriel fell in love. In spite of his being so much older, they are very happy."

"Agnes isn't," smiled Jack; "she was obliged to bury her broken heart in the management of a home for incurables, where she is certain to keep them 'incurable' out of spite!"

Ivy looked at her son, the light of her life.

"Look, darling!" she said tenderly, with tears gleaming in her eyes. "This is a beautiful lady—mummie loved her!"

"Vernie love booful lady, too," responded the child simply, as he kissed the photograph of the woman.

* * * * *

In a dreary station situated in the plains of India, a man with a bitterly sad face and gray hair works at a desk. He is lonely, obscure; and people wonder at his sudden fall from a brilliant journalist into the plodding editor of a third-rate paper. But the man knows the reason.

On the top of the desk, in a silver frame, is the photo of a woman, strangely beautiful and alluring. And the man would sometimes lift his head from his work, and, looking at the face in the frame, murmur: "You will never forget—and I shall never forget. None knew but ourselves that once we were knit by a Bond of Silence and Shame—the Bond Between!"

The End.

Digitized by Google

FACTS ABOUT CATARRH.

Some interesting facts about the success of the Drouet Method in Catarrh where operations have failed are given in the last REVIEW OF EAR NOSE, & THROAT DISEASES. Those who wish to read the details of the cured cases can obtain a free copy of this Medical Journal by addressing The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

RINGS Privately Engagement

Cash or Easy Payments. SIGNET or DRESS.

LOVE LOCKED Hearts Ring
9ct. Gold 10/6
18ct. Gold 25/-

See our Registered Designs
CATALOGUE FREE.
MASTERS Ltd.,
157 High Street, RYE.

Icilma

Nature's Remedy for Complexion and Skin Troubles, whether caused by cold, heat, age, irritations or accident. Send 2d. for two sample tubes (different scents) of Icilma Fluor Cream, perfect for the Complexion.—Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

The Daily Express

HA'PENNY.

USE BORAX

FOR WASHING CLOTHES — FOR CLEANSING EVERYTHING

DRY SOAP

Contains nothing that can injure the most delicate fabric, everything to produce white sweet clothes and bright healthy homes, with the minimum of labour.

Tens of thousands of packets are bought every week by housewives the Kingdom over. They know the best.

Try it in your next wash.

At all Grocers and Oilmen in ½-lb. packets—same price as the ordinary washing powders.

By Special Appointment — Makers to the King.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

Write for FREE SAMPLE AND NOVELTIES.

Name this Paper and your Grocer.

BORAX STARCH GLAZE IMPROVES ALL STARCH

DEATH TO DIRT!

FREE TRIAL PACKET

on receipt of post-card to Sapon Ltd., Dept. 68, St. Swithin's Chambers, London.

'SAPON' makes Washday Playday.

For Woollens, Silks, Laces, Blouses, Delicate Fabrics, and for all Home Washing.

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Should Boys Propose?

"I AM seventeen and very fond of a girl a year younger," writes GUS. "Should I propose to her now, or do you think we might want to break it off when we grow older?"

* * * * *

Propose, by all means, GUS, if you feel you must. As to the future, well, that will take care of itself. If you remain on the same intimate terms when you are twenty-one, then depend on it, she is the girl for you. If not, then I have no doubt both of you will be well satisfied to break off the engagement by mutual consent.

❦❦❦

Should She Give Him Presents?

"ELSIE" is in a situation, and is very much in love with a young man there. Would it be wrong for her to give him cigars, or cigarettes, as a small gift? "ELSIE" is sixteen, and he is twenty-two.

* * * * *

Well, I think "ELSIE" ought to wait until the young gentleman has shown that he returns her feeling towards him. It is usual for the man to give the presents first, and the girl is not expected to always return them. Now and again some little gift can be given, but it is not usual for them to be too frequent.

❦❦❦

Haunted By a Young Man.

"FOR years," writes SYLVIA (Leeds), "I have been haunted by a certain young man. He travels by the same train, takes the same suburban walks, and often has his tea at the same shop as myself, but I have never formed an acquaintance with him. I don't know that I wanted to, as we have rather grown tired of gaping at each other. However, this year we are staying at Tynemouth, and to my surprise the first person I met on the sands was this young man.

"On seeing me he smiled and raised his hat, and I am afraid, in sheer confusion, I returned the salute. Now, what I want to know is, ought we to have recognised each other, and, on returning home, shall we have to be acquainted with one another?"

* * * * *

I think it is quite natural that he should have saluted you. After all, manners unbend at the seaside, thank goodness, and we lose that foolish reserve that we keep up in towns. You did no harm in returning his bow—I should have done the same. However, let him take the first steps in claiming your acquaintance, and when he speaks to you, be nice and agreeable, and introduce him to your parents. If, on returning home, you see each other as frequently as before, well, if one has to encounter another person everywhere one goes, it is just as well to be on bowing or speaking terms as not.

Is it Love?

"I ACCIDENTALLY became acquainted with a young man," writes "MAIDA," "who was staying here for a week's holiday. We met every day, and he professed to be very happy with me. He came to my home, and met my mother and sisters, and also brought me two very nice presents, and kept me supplied with chocolates. When he left our town, he appeared very upset at parting, and I have since received postcards, letters, and flowers from him. Do you think these attentions mean that he has a regard for me?"

* * * * *

Well, he seems to have done the things a man usually does when he has a regard for a girl. I might even say he has gone beyond the "regard" stage, for his constant attentions to you suggest that he is very far gone indeed. Depend on it, if he is able, he will very soon turn up again, as he has evidently taken more than a mere fancy to you.

❦❦❦

Newspaper as a Co-Respondent.

"I AM annoyed with my husband," writes ETHEL. "We have only been married six months and something has come between us. He has ordered a newspaper to be sent every morning, and instead of talking to me at breakfast, he reads it and never says a word. Besides, he props it up against the cruet stand and uses cross language if anybody removes it."

* * * * *

Poor ETHEL! To have love's young dream shattered so easily and by a newspaper! Well I am afraid that is a very frequent cause of trouble which disturbs sooner or later the happiest of unions. I advise you to get used to it. A man at breakfast time is often more like a bear than anything else, and perhaps it is as well that he should vent his ferocity on the money market or the policy of the Government than on the way the breakfast has been cooked. Let him alone, ETHEL. News, like music, has charms which soothe the savage breast, so don't interfere with it. And if you want a little mild revenge try reading Short Stories when he comes home to tea, and see how it works.

❦❦❦

Marrying Beneath Him.

"I AM not engaged," writes ADOLPH, "but think it is more than likely that I shall be very soon—I don't know to whom. What troubles me is this: My people are well connected, and my mother has a positive horror of my marrying beneath me. I have met scores of girls in our own set, but find them affected, cold, and proud. They seem to despise any intimacy with me.

* * * * *

"The trouble is that I have also met a great many girls in a lower social position, and always get on far better with them than with the others. They seem to understand me better. Now, what do you think of this question? Am I the kind of man that ought to marry beneath him?"

* * * * *

ADOLPH's complaint is that of a great many other young men. Girls of a certain social position, certainly, do rather assume an attitude of reserve towards men—that is part of their breeding. Quite naturally, the result is often to drive really eligible fellows either into the society of their own sex entirely, or of girls of a lower social standing. Such girls as the latter often do attract men above them by their natural manners and candid speech. And very often they make far better wives. After all, a woman who is a lady at heart, will very soon become one in name if properly cared for, and if ADOLPH should be attracted by a girl beneath him, I cannot see why he should not marry her.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE

BOYS' LEADER

WILL APPEAR

Tuesday, September 8.

24 PAGES.

("Pearson's Weekly" Size.)

ONE THOUSAND FREE GIFTS EVERY WEEK.

FREE FOR THE MERE ASKING.

A Complete ½d. Comic Paper will be given away every week with the BOYS' LEADER.

Digitized by Google

"If all the year were playing holidays,
To sport would be as tedious as to work."
—Henry IV.

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

Cocoa

is one of the few good things you do not tire of; it is WELCOME TO THE PALATE at Breakfast, Lunch, and Supper. Besides being "AN EFFECTIVE STRENGTHENER," its flavour is peculiarly inviting, and the most capricious appetite is gratified by its delightful aroma when properly prepared, and in the words of that eminent authority, Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c., there is

NO BETTER FOOD.

300 GOLD MEDALS AND DIPLOMAS.

Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 766. Week Ending September 5, 1903. ONE PENNY.

"THE CAPTAIN PUSHED UP THE PICTURE. BEHIND THE CANVAS WAS A FLIGHT OF STONE STEPS, AT THE FOOT OF WHICH WAS—A LITTLE PINK SLIPPER!" (SEE FIRST PAGE.)

Digitized by Google

THE IDEAL SIZE AND SHAPE AT LAST.

A New Model...

No. 3A F. P. K.

taking Pictures 5½ by 3¼.

Fitted with F.P.K. Automatic Shutter £4 10 0

Fitted with Bausch and Lomb Shutter £5 2 6

The most perfect Folding Pocket Kodak yet placed on the market. It has every desirable movement, and its admirable proportions adapt it for the best class of landscape work.

KODAK

No pains have been spared to make this model as perfect as possible in all its details. The workmanship is ideal, and the whole thing so beautifully compact, that it may be put easily in the pocket.

OF ALL DEALERS, OR OF

KODAK LTD. 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, LIVERPOOL; and 72-74 Buchanan Street, GLASGOW.

Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, W., 171-173 Regent Street, W.; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

WOMAN'S POWER.

You have it in your hands to be attractive. Personal Magnetism, Charms, Talismans, The Art of Luck, &c. Particulars of new Occult Society, and specimen copy of

'THE TALISMAN,'

PUBLISHERS,

52 STATION PARADE, HARROGATE.

The Daily Express

HA'PENNY.

INDIGESTION

makes health impossible; you cannot hope to be healthy if your food fails to nourish your body. For Indigestion the most successful remedy is

Page Woodcock's Pills

For Wind on the Stomach, Biliousness, Indigestion, and all Stomach and Liver Troubles there is no remedy so safe and sure as these famous Pills. Sold by all Medicine Vendors at 1/1½ & 2/9, or post free for price, from PAGE WOODCOCK, Ltd., 14 & 16, Euston Buildings, LONDON, N.W. (late of Lincoln.)

SMITHS

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

300 Gold Medals, &c.

Half a tea-spoonful is sufficient to make a cup of most delicious Cocoa.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 766.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending September 5th, 1903.

THE LITTLE PINK SLIPPER.

A Story of a Romantic Evening and Morning.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

The Evening.

"My dear, dear brother!"

Two girlish white arms clung about a pair of broad shoulders, and two soft lips met a bronzed cheek. The author of this impulsive greeting was caught up and held in the silent embrace which says so much more than words. Then Captain Leopold Carleton, V.C., D.S.O., set down his sister and looked at her.

She was slender, dark, and pretty—the prettiness of the girl who has almost ripened out of girlhood. Even in the moonlight that illuminated the front of the rambling, irregularly-roofed house before which they stood, the likeness between brother and sister was striking. But Leopold Carleton was taller and graver. Young as he was, travel and hard fighting had left their mark upon him.

"Good-bye to my baby sister, Joan," he said laughingly, "and 'How are you?' to Joan the woman. You have grown up, kiddie, with a vengeance!"

"Well," retorted Joan Carleton, blushing, "I had to do something while you were away. But never mind me, come and be introduced. You'll like the Admiral and he'll like you. As for Lady M., her bark's worse than her bite, and you're not the same old Leo if you can't wheedle her a bit. You ought to, for you are shockingly late, you know."

So saying, she took him by the hand and led him up the steps to the open hall-door that showed brightly in the scented summer evening. A ramshackle conveyance of the "fly" order had halted hard by, and out of it the Captain's servant was already removing his master's "traps."

The house their owner was approaching was quaint and high-gabled, a salt sea breeze fanned it, and from some point not far away stole fitfully the murmur of waves on a shingly beach.

"My brother, Lady Majendie," said Joan Carleton; and her brother, passing into a cool, flagged hall, bowed low over the plump, ringed fingers of a stout, black-browed woman of distinctly formidable appearance.

"What you must think of me, Lady Majendie," he remarked seriously, "I dare not ask myself. But I was assured that I could connect at Exeter with a train that would get me here by six o'clock. Instead of which, I was left on a junction platform to kick my heels for more than two hours. I would have stayed over and come on in the morning but that I feared a telegraphed excuse might alarm Joan. So I have trespassed on your tolerance by arriving at this unconscionable hour."

Leopold Carleton made his apology with simple frankness, yet with a certain formal elegance. Also, he was undoubtedly a handsome man and without a trace of self-consciousness in his pleasantly youthful bearing. His hostess softened.

"You did quite right," she replied graciously, "for Joan has been on tenter-hooks all day. Besides, as the Admiral says, who comes to The Hollies comes to Liberty Hall."

"That's so, my boy," put in a ringing, cheerful voice. A ruddy, blue-eyed personage had stepped up to Leopold Carleton and his hands were seized in a vigorous grasp.

"I'm glad to see you again, my lad," he was told. "I'll be sworn you don't remember our first meeting. By Jove, I little thought when I poked you in the ribs as a toothless infant, that I was touching the spot where a Victoria Cross was to hang. Dash it, we're proud of you, my lad, and I only wished your dad had lived to know of your exploits."

Admiral Sir John Majendie frowned and blew his nose loudly. Leo Carleton's heart warmed to the genial old sea-dog who had been his father's friend.

"I'm afraid everybody makes too much of my doing what was only my duty," he said modestly; "but I ought to thank Lady Majendie and yourself, Sir John, for taking Joan under your wing. I can't think what she would have done but for your kindness, for she and I are practically the last of the Carletons."

The Admiral coughed. "There may be more than enough one of these days, for all that," he rejoined mischievously. "But as for Joan, Pollie and she are just sisters, and have been since they went to school together. You'll see Pollie in the morning, she—she——"

Sir John hesitated suddenly; his wife completed his sentence.

"My daughter is subject to headaches, Captain Carleton," added Lady Majendie, with a kind of embarrassment, "she retired quite early."

As if to emphasise this observation a series of sonorous strokes fell upon their ears. A large clock in a corner of the hall was striking the half hour after midnight. Leo Carleton put his hands to his ears.

"Silence that accusing crime!" he exclaimed. "Lady Majendie, I shall never really expect to be forgiven."

His hostess laughed; she was thoroughly appeased. "Indeed, there's nothing to forgive," she declared; "and now you'll be ready for some supper, I've no doubt."

Digitized by Google

Her guest made a protesting gesture. "Frankly," he replied, "I dined at the junction, and so did my man. So there is no excuse for my keeping your people up any further. Pray let me hide my diminished head as speedily as possible; I could not survive hearing that clock strike one."

The Admiral chuckled. "You're your dad all over," Leo was informed. "He couldn't bear to put the ladies about. Not that you've put Lady Majendie about in the least. But, anyhow, you'll have a biscuit and a nightcap with me, and we'll smoke a cigar before we turn in. Then, since you're so anxious about it, Lady Majendie and Joan can have their beauty-sleep, after all."

"Certainly, if it will ease Captain Carleton's mind," said his wife. "Come along, Joan—you can admire your brother ever so much better by daylight. And he will look more of a soldier when he looks less penitent."

With which Parthian shot Lady Majendie retired. Joan Carleton lingered, to be folded once more in her brother's arms.

"Good night, little woman," he murmured; "if you knew how often I have thought of you when I heard 'Lights out.' It seems quite strange to be under the same roof with you."

Joan kissed him fondly and tripped away up the long staircase. The Admiral took his visitor's arm and carried him off into the smoke-room. Here they disposed of the promised biscuit and "nightcaps," and the old veteran and the young soldier lost themselves in the charms of professional gossip.

Their cigars smoked out, the Admiral looked at his watch.

"You won't hear that clock strike one," he said, "not till to-morrow afternoon. How the time has flown, it's nearly two. I expect you'll not be sorry to get to bye-bye. I'll show you the way to your berth—unless you'd like another peg?"

Declining this technical invitation to an additional whisky-and-soda, Leo Carleton accompanied his host through the corridors of the rambling old house, and was finally ushered into his apartment, or rather his apartments, for his sleeping chamber proved to be a panelled cabinet off a fine antique room hung with dusty oil-paintings. The room was already lighted, and the Captain's man was dozing in a chair.

The Admiral went to look out at a window. The moon rode high, and far off, at the foot of a wooded cliff beyond, the garden of The Hollies glittered the sea.

"You'll have a pretty picture to wake up to," he remarked; "that's why I put you on this side of the house. It was your dad's favourite room, too, when he and I were your age. Good night, my lad, you're very like him."

He shook hands with his guest once more and departed. Leo got into his pyjamas, dismissed his sleepy servant, and, throwing open the window, stood a moment to breathe the delicate night air.

The day had been sultry, even the young soldier, fresh from the East, had felt it warm for travelling purposes.

It was pleasant to be in England once again, pleasant to look upon the waves that lapped an English coast, pleasant, for a while, to have done with work and danger and to take his well-earned ease.

A sudden long breath warned him that he was beginning to feel the coolness of the night, and, closing the window, he stepped back into the room. As he did so he trod upon something and glanced down.

At his foot lay a tiny golden trifle, evidently an ornament of some kind. He stooped and picked it up; it was a locket and fell wide in his hand, gaping on a loose hinge.

Within were a couple of portrait-heads, one obviously that of his host, the Admiral. Opposite to this, in the other side of the locket, was the face of a pleasant, rather good-looking woman of middle age.

"Humph!" said Leo Carleton, "the first Lady Majendie, I presume; she must have been a much more agreeable person than her successor. Heigho! I wonder if the second Lady M. henpecks her husband—she is just the sort. Poor old boy! he should have remained a lorn widower, as I intend to do a bachelor."

He snapped the locket to close it, but it sprang open again. To the Captain's surprise the faces revealed were no longer those of the Admiral and his presumable consort.

The portraits which confronted Leo Carleton were counterfeit presentments of himself. One was a faded amateur print, one a "carbon" head, an excellent likeness, in spite of its diminutive proportions.

The Captain whistled softly.

"Hullo!" he exclaimed, "this must be Joan's. Yes, the faded one must have been cut out of the group that newspaper fellow did of us, after that brush with the Wazaris, when I got the Cross. I did send it to her, I remember. And this other is out of a regimental dinner thing. So she carries me about with her, does she, poor child—it's more than I deserve."

He examined the locket. It was small and old-fashioned, and, thin though it felt, opened in two places, which accounted for his discovery of the second couple of portraits. But he did not recollect that such a locket had ever been among his sister's possessions.

Laying it on his dressing-table, he brushed his curly hair for a moment to foster a drowsy disposition, put out the lights, passed into his little sleeping chamber and, ten minutes later, was in the arms of Morpheus.

Another ten minutes elapsed, or it may have been a quarter of an hour, and then he sprang up. His man had forgotten to draw the blinds and the room was flooded with moonlight. He glanced around and laughed.

"By Jove," he said, half-aloud, "I thought I was in the hills again and that the camp was being rushed. Instead of which I am in peaceful old England. Phew, for this relief much thanks."

He was about to lie down once more when a singular noise—part rattle, part whine—penetrated from the adjoining dressing-room.

"Humph!" he observed. "What is that?" And he got up, thrust his feet into a pair of shoes, and went through.

The moonlight showed him that the neighbouring room was empty also. And yet a vague sound, soft, indefinable, not unlike the rustle of skirts, reached his ear. He groped for some matches and lit the gas. There was no sign of an intruder. Yet, subdued and not far off, he distinguished a dull echo, suggestive of a cautiously closed door.

Leo Carleton knitted his brows. "Some ghost-trick," he said. "Is Joan playing pranks?"

Receiving no answer to the query, he turned back towards his bedroom, and stopped suddenly. It seemed as if an icy wind had suddenly blown upon his feet. But he was not near the door of the apartment.

He glanced about him and started. Beside him was a tall oil-painting in a massive frame. And at the bottom of the canvas was a black gap of an inch or two inches in depth; from this gap there blew undoubtedly the cold draught that had attracted his attention.

The Captain put in his hand; the picture was on a species of panel and he could push it up. As it rose it made the rattling, whining noise he had heard before, and a prominent decorated gilt boss in the frame descended along a narrow groove in the moulding.

Digitized by Google

Beyond the painted panel was a recess, and in the recess a curving stone staircase. And on the bottom step of the stair lay a little heelless slipper of wadded pink silk.

Leo Carleton took up the dainty thing and handled it. Then he struck a match and investigated the recess; it was dark and cold, evidently being contrived in the thickness of a huge old party wall.

There were candles on his dressing-table; he lit one and ascended the curving stairs. They led to a heavy door, handleless and locked. The Captain contemplated it for a moment and proceeded to descend to his own quarters. Passing into his dressing-room from the recess he paused to lower the painted panel. It clicked sharply as it was shot home.

He crossed to his toilet-table to set down his candle. Doing so, he perceived that the small gold locket he had deposited there half an hour earlier was gone. He stood, looking from the spot where it had lain to the pink slipper he held in his hand.

In the end, the riddle represented by this dainty article of apparel proving insoluble, he extinguished the candle, turned out the gas, and went to bed again.

The Morning.

In spite of his odd adventure, Captain Leopold Carleton slept soundly throughout the remainder of the night and for a considerable period subsequent to the dawn of a new day.

When he awoke the yellow rays of the summer morning had taken the place of the moonbeams which had lighted his apartment when he had last opened his eyes upon it.

He yawned, got up, and glanced from his window. The Admiral had been right. Beyond the neat, if not large, grounds of The Hollies, the white beach, green-topped cliffs, and blue waters of the bay, made a delightful picture for a newly-awakened sleeper.

The Captain plunged into his toilet forthwith, and a moment later his man knocked at the door with his shaving-water. Leo Carleton had but a second to realise that he had left the little pink slipper on one of the boxes of the dressing-table. Snatching up his mysterious prize of the night before, he thrust it into the pocket of a lounge-jacket that his attendant had laid out ready for wear.

"Hurry up, you rascal," he said cheerily, as the man entered. "I want a cigarette in the garden before breakfast." The servant, an old soldier, saluted and fell to work upon the Captain's firmly-modelled chin.

This done, Leo dispatched him into the inner room in search of a cigarette-case, and profited by his attendant's absence to put on the jacket into a pocket of which he had whisked the slipper.

Then, duly provided with the cigarette-case, he sallied forth, not to seek the garden, but deliberately to "lose" himself in the ramifications of the quaint and antiquated house.

Mounting to an upper storey, he strolled along a wide corridor, glancing occasionally at a compass on his watch-chain, occasionally from a window of the lofty passage. At length his saunter reached its slowest.

"Now," he said to himself, "that confounded stair should come out somewhere here. If only I dare examine those doors!"

As he spoke one of the portals referred to swung ajar, and there emerged a very fresh and dainty young person in a smart and creamy linen frock. She was blue-eyed and fair-headed and the foot that peeped from under her gown was small and well-shaped. The Captain stepped aside politely, then he bowed, and accosted her with much self-possession.

"As a fellow-resident under this roof," he remarked, "may I throw myself on your mercy? I have been trying to find my way into the garden, and as I only got here last night, the house is a trifle bewildering to me. I have even come upstairs in the hope of finding a more obvious way down."

The other glanced up at him and her eyes fell—fell to scan shyly the tip of her small tan shoe. Suddenly she drew it in and blushed. The blush did not escape the Captain.

"Oh," she said calmly, "you must be Captain Carleton: I am a Majendie whom you did not see last night. Pray let me show you the way to the garden."

"I have then the pleasure of meeting my sister's dearest friend," answered Leopold Carleton. "I ought to be jealous. Joan and I used to be inseparables when we were kiddies. But there, I can only consent to be grateful that you have reconciled Joan to my absence."

He moved along the corridor at her side, studying her covertly.

"By the way, Miss Majendie," he observed abruptly, "you will be able to tell me if there happens to be a ghost story connected with the Hollies."

His escort flushed again. "N-not that I am aware of," she faltered. "Why do you ask?"

"I scarcely know," replied Leo with an air of abstraction "I am a light sleeper, and I thought I heard a rustle of garments in the night."

"A soldier," said the other scornfully, "and startled."

Leo shrugged his shoulders; he and his companion were descending the stair by which he had gained the upper corridor.

"Not exactly startled," he answered, "but the experience—if experience it were—made me dream. I—I dreamt of Cinderella. You remember Cinderella, the lady who lost a slipper.

Miss Mary—otherwise Pollie—Majendie halted and put a trembling little hand on the banister-rail at her elbow. The Captain felt that she was determinedly refraining from encountering his gaze.

"I—I have forgotten all my nursery stories," she said; "but if you will go along that passage and down the next staircase into the hall, you will easily reach the garden, and be able to blow every one of your dreams out of your head."

Another of our regular readers is this fair-haired lassie.

"You think I ought to?" queried Leopold Carleton gravely.

"I—I am sure of it," stammered the other, and though her head was bowed, he could see that her cheeks were crimson.

"Very well," he said, "I will take your advice. Au revoir till breakfast-time."

And, without looking back, he went on downstairs. When he was safely outside the house and in the sunny old garden, he burst into a fit of silent laughter. But for all that, he wrinkled his brows a good deal as he strolled to and fro with his cigarette, and the shadow of perplexity still brooded on his handsome face.

At last he heard a step behind him, and turning, saw his sister, a graceful, girlish figure, in fluttering white muslin. He kissed her affectionately, and put her arm through his own.

"What a lovely corner of the world this is," he observed. "Do you know, I haven't enjoyed a cigarette so much for years?"

Digitized by Google

Joan peeped up at him, her young face was even more shadowed than his.

"Leo," she asked, "what have you been saying to Pollie Majendie?—that was she you met upstairs just now. She says you are perfectly horrid, and that she wishes she'd never seen you."

"Oh, does she?" rejoined the Captain warily. "What an odd thing—I rather liked her."

"And so did she you," said Joan impulsively, "till she saw you this morning. Why, when we were at school together she used to read all your letters, and she begged two of your portraits from me and carried them in a locket with her mother's and father's. And she just worshipped you over the way you won the Victoria Cross."

"Dear little enthusiast!" commented Leopold Carleton. But a curious light had sprung into his dark eyes, a light that was as much sudden tenderness as amused intelligence.

"Yesterday," added his sister warmly, "she put those flowers in your room herself, and you only didn't see her last night because Lady M. grumbled at your being so late and made a scene when Pollie defended you. Pollie's headaches only come after her step-mother's scenes. And now she says that you're one of her lost illusions."

The Captain winced.

"I'm—I'm sorry," he exclaimed. "I suppose I was a bit blunt and grumpy; I—I only asked the way to the garden. But I'll see if I can't remove any bad impression I happened to make. Won't you introduce me formally and let me try?"

"Oh, yes," said Joan delightedly. "I'll go and coax her out here." And she hurried off.

Leo Carleton twisted his moustaches.

"I was a bit rough on her," he murmured to himself; "poor little soul!" And he, too, went off in hot haste.

His goal was his own dressing-room. Luckily it was empty; his servant had descended, and it had not yet been invaded by house or chambermaid.

He found the spring in the picture, pressed it, pushed up the panel, and laid the small pink slipper where he had discovered it. But before he did so, he—well, not to put too fine a point upon the fact—he kissed it. Then the panel clicked into position and he went back to the garden.

* * * * *

Joan never knew what was the reason of her friend's sudden change of demeanour towards the gallant Captain, or for her equally sudden conversion. But Leo does, for soon after Joan's formal introduction he contrived to whisper to Miss Pollie Majendie—unheard by his sister. Had, however, his words been audible to that person, she would have been more puzzled than enlightened.

"If Cinderella will look again on the—ahem!—the back-staircase of the palace," he said, "she will, I am sure, find her missing slipper."

Pollie Majendie glanced up quickly, blushed, and smiled. Like her step-mother, she had become of opinion that the Captain was a very handsome young soldier. But on her part the opinion was no new one.

That opinion she did not change again, nor has she changed it yet. The only thing she has changed is her name.

Leo wears a certain old-fashioned gold locket on his watch-chain. Pollie had dropped it when presiding over the final decoration of his dressing-room, and only ascertained her loss too late to rescue it before he had taken possession of the apartment.

Horrified at the thought that he might find it and discover himself enshrined in it, she had sought to regain the little ornament by stealing to the room, after all was quiet, down the old secret staircase, the upper door of which led to a cupboard in an unoccupied room near her own.

R. Norman Silver.

The Rebellion of Pat.

Telling of a Wife's Repentance.

"Oh, Geoffrey," said young Mrs. Crayne one morning, as she sat at breakfast with her husband. "I quite forgot to tell you last night that Stanley has a couple of stalls for the Lyceum this afternoon, and he asked me to go with him. I promised I would; I knew you would not mind."

Geoffrey Crayne did not answer for a moment, then he said quietly:

"I would rather you did not go, Pat."

"Oh, but I have promised!" replied Patricia.

"In spite of that, I am sure, to please me, you will not go, Pat, dear."

"But it's absurd, Geoff!"

This was the first difference of opinion they had had during their brief married life, and Pat did not understand it.

"Really, Geoffrey," she continued, "I am bound to go. What reason can I give for withdrawing? Besides, Stanley is your cousin, so that I cannot see why you should object."

"Nevertheless," said Geoffrey, "I do object, and I must ask you not to go."

"But why?" persisted Pat.

"Because," answered Geoffrey slowly, "although Stanley Forrest is my cousin, I have never yet known anything to his credit, and should not wish my wife to be in his company."

"But, my dear Geoffrey, he is universally liked, I am sure, and I cannot possibly refuse to go now. I should look simply absurd! Really, Geoffrey, I am obliged to go," concluded Pat decidedly.

"Patricia!" said her husband, in a tone she had never heard before, "I forbid you to go."

Pat's Irish eyes flamed, and her cheeks flushed crimson, but she did not reply.

"You understand?" continued Geoffrey, noting her silence. "I am sorry to have to deny you any pleasure, but in this case I must forbid it!"

Breakfast was finished in silence.

When Geoffrey left the house, he kissed his wife as lovingly as usual, but did not receive the accustomed caress in return, and he left home with a heavy heart. He knew he was perfectly right, but he felt that his wife failed to see it in that light, and he was grieved to have been obliged to disappoint and annoy her.

All the morning Pat wandered aimlessly about the house. Although most lovable and sweet, she was unaccustomed to being crossed in any way, and she strongly rebelled at being forbidden to do anything for the first time in her life.

Should she stay at home, she wondered, or should she go in spite of Geoffrey? And one moment she was arguing to herself in favour of the former course, and the next the latter.

After all, she finally decided, why should she not go? There would be no harm in it, and if she could not be seen with Geoffrey's own cousin, with whom might she appear?

Besides, she was not a school-girl to obediently do just as she was told for no reason at all. She had never heard anything against Stanley Forrest before, and probably it was merely jealousy or something of the kind which made Geoffery speak in such a way. It would be different if there were really any cause.

Digitized by Google

So, after many arguments with herself, she decided to go. If Geoffrey should be angry, she could soon bring him round.

She judged, in this respect, by former experience, for Pat's mother had died when she was very young indeed, and her father could never be angry with her for more than a moment or two.

Pat enjoyed the play immensely, although now and then unpleasant thoughts of Geoffrey would intrude themselves upon her. Would he be very angry, she found herself wondering. But no, of course not! All men were like her father. Geoffrey might blaze for a moment, but then he would cool down again in no time, with a little gentle coaxing.

At length the performance was over, and Pat, having dressed more carefully than usual for dinner, found herself awaiting Geoffrey's coming with a tiny, unacknowledged fear at her heart.

She saw him coming up the path to the house, and, after a moment's hesitation, decided that it would be best to go and open the door for him, as usual, just as though nothing out of the common had occurred.

Geoffrey kissed her even more affectionately than usual, and Pat saw at once that he fully believed she had obeyed his wishes.

Her heart sank, for she felt that she could not allow him to remain in ignorance, and yet she knew that it would be far harder to bring up the subject herself than to answer a question from him as to whether she had been to the theatre or not. She returned his greeting bravely, however, determined to carry it off with a high hand.

So dinner passed off with much talking and laughter, but when dessert came and they were alone, Pat felt that now or never she must confess.

"Geoffrey!" she said suddenly, and then stopped short.

"Well, dear?" he inquired.

Mentally bracing herself up, Pat made a bold plunge.

"Geoffrey, I went with Stanley this afternoon!"

A walnut which Geoffrey had been busy peeling for her fell from his fingers, and, just missing his plate, rolled on to the table-cloth.

After one sharp glance at her, Geoffrey picked up the nut, and silently went on peeling it.

Pat was puzzled.

"Geoffrey, did you hear?" she asked.

"Certainly!" he replied.

"Well?" said Pat, seeing that he did not intend to remark further, and feeling, to tell the truth, a trifle nettled, "have you nothing to say at all?"

"Nothing!" replied Geoffrey, without even looking up.

Pat gazed at him in astonishment. She had expected at least some word of reproach, and found Geoffrey's attitude quite unintelligible.

Dinner was finished without a word being spoken, for Geoffrey made no attempt at conversation, and Pat, although angry with herself for it, did not quite know what to say.

Bedtime came without a single remark having passed between them. Geoffrey was seated by the fire, apparently deep in a book, and as Pat rose to retire, she looked at him uncertainly.

"Good-night, Geoffrey!" she said, in a hesitating voice.

"Good-night, Patricia!" replied her husband, without so much as glancing up from his book.

The hot tears rose to Pat's eyes, but she forced them back, also a lump of unpleasantly large dimensions, which threatened to choke her on the spot, and raising her head proudly, she walked from the room.

A week passed away. Geoffrey continued to treat Patricia with a cold politeness which was worse to her than open rupture.

She felt that the breach between them was widening daily, and she longed to throw her arms around her husband, and ask his forgiveness; but Pat, warm-hearted and sweet, had still within her a pride which forbade surrender without what she termed to be sufficient reason.

If Geoffrey had told her definitely of any wrong action of Stanley Forrest, and if she had then accompanied him to the theatre in spite of that, it would be different, but under the circumstances, she would not believe that Geoffrey knew anything definite, and therefore she considered that he was as much in the wrong as herself.

On the seventh day of their estrangement, however, something occurred which changed Pat's view entirely.

She and Geoffrey were at a ball. Nobody watching them could have seen any difference in their demeanour towards each other, this being one of the exceptions which prove the rule that onlookers see most of the game.

Pat was resting alone in the conservatory, having dispatched her partner on some slight errand. She was miserably wondering whether Geoffrey and she would ever again be to each other what they had been before that fateful afternoon, when her husband's voice fell upon her ear.

She could see no one, but could distinctly hear all the conversation, and although an unintentional eavesdropper, she shrank from passing her husband, which she knew, from the direction of the sound, she would be obliged to do to leave the conservatory.

"Look here, Stanley!" she heard her husband say, in an angry tone, "you promised me that you would leave the country in a week, and now a fortnight has passed, and you are still here."

"Well," answered the voice of Stanley Forrest, "why should I not be here? You have no right to command my actions!"

"Indeed!" said Geoffrey Crayne. "On that point, we must differ. Since you were good enough to forge my name to a cheque for a large amount, I consider you have given me some considerable claim upon you!"

Pat, her hands grasping the arms of the chair, leant forward, listening eagerly, with an expression of horror on her face.

"And when," continued Geoffrey, "in addition to that, and after committing such an action, you ask my wife to accompany you, a forger, to the theatre, I think matters have gone too far! Now, either you clear out in twenty-four hours from now, or I make the whole affair public!"

"Pooh! You daren't, for the sake of the honour of the family, of which you are so infernally proud!" came the sneering reply. "Rather a come-down, though, for your wife to have gone to the theatre with a forger, as you so affectionately term me, wasn't it? Wonder you allowed it, old man! I never dreamt you would when I asked her."

"By Heaven," cried Geoffrey hoarsely, "if you were not my cousin——"

"Ah, Mr. Forrest, we have been looking for you. Do come! We want to arrange with you about——"

And the voices died away in the distance, as the party left the conservatory.

Pat rose stiffly. Her knees trembled under her, and she felt suffocated.

She moved a few steps forward, then suddenly stopped, for a few yards away Geoffrey was sitting, with his face buried in his hands.

Pat watched him hesitatingly for a moment, with a whole world of contrition and love in her eyes. Then she went swiftly forward, and, kneeling beside him, she gently touched his fingers.

"Geoffrey!" she whispered. "Forgive me—forgive me!"

For a second his eyes met hers, and then his arms were clasping her tightly to his breast.

"Pat!" he said joyously, "my wife!"

Norah Caryll.

"Auntie," said Polly, ruefully rubbing her forehead, "that big photograph of you is a striking likeness, isn't it?" "Do you think so, dearie?" "Yes," said Polly, "it just fell off the mantelpiece and hit me on the forehead."

Digitized by Google

Those People Next Door.

The Romance of a Semi-Detached Villa.

I CAN'T think what has come over Maisie lately. She was the sweetest little thing imaginable when I married her two years ago, and now she's at loggerheads with everybody. Of course, I know Westbourne is a little quiet for her when I am in town all day, but that is no reason whatever why she should become quarrelsome and be always finding fault.

The people next door are Maisie's pet aversion. I thought the Gregsons were rather nice at first, although we had never spoken to them. They are a young couple, like ourselves, and Mrs. Gregson somewhat resembles Maisie. I told Maisie so one day, and she was so upset that she wouldn't speak to me for a week. Whenever she has anything to say, such as mentioning a visit from the tax collector, she said it to the cat so that I could hear.

However, we concluded a treaty of peace at last, but it didn't alter Maisie's feelings towards those people next door.

A state of war seems to exist between her and Mrs. Gregson, and Maisie—the old, sweet-tempered Maisie—would sell her soul, I believe, to get the better of Mrs. G.

Whenever I come in at night she drags me straight into the dining-room before I can get my coat off, and, pushing me into an armchair, pours into my unwilling ears an account of all the imaginary things her enemy has done against her during the day. My belief is that the man who wrote "Home, sweet Home," couldn't have been married.

Just what I expected happened one morning. Maisie keeps a few fowls at the bottom of the garden, and the people next door have a cat. That cat was responsible for the first bloodshed, and carried the war into the enemy's country.

On the morning in question, when Maisie went down to feed the chickens before breakfast, as she always does, she found the cat in the fowl-shed, and all that remained of a couple of her pets were a few bunches of feathers.

When I happened to look out of the window I saw that she had caught the Gregson's cat by the scruff of the neck, and was hurrying the unfortunate beast towards the water tub.

I ran out to prevent the murder, and found Maisie in a state of frenzy absolutely unprecedented.

As ill-luck would have it, Mrs. G. had watched the whole affair from her window, and rushing into the garden half climbed the apple tree and propped herself up on the fence just in time to see her cat thrown into the tub with a splash.

By the time I arrived on the scene Maisie and Mrs. Gregson were standing glaring at one another with only the fence between them. Maisie was purple with passion, and Mrs. Gregson was so infuriated that I thought she would have fallen from her perch, while compliments were flying about like leaves in an autumn wind.

I went up to Maisie, and, taking her arm, tried to lead her indoors, but wrenching herself free she returned to the fray. I implored, threatened, promised her everything a model husband could do, but it was of no avail; she meant to have her say, and she didn't come in until she'd said every word of it.

The campaign thus opened proceeded briskly. If Maisie played "The Last Rose of Summer" on the piano, Mrs. Gregson played it with variations; one day she put up a pair of pink curtains in the drawing-room, and the people next door followed with crushed strawberry; then when Mrs. Gregson appeared in a bright green hat with flowers in it, Maisie went one better, and blossomed out with headgear that would have given points to the most accomplished botanist.

This victory cost me just two guineas, and from that time forward I was dragged into the campaign by the heels.

Five servants left in three weeks; I got into trouble with the post-office because of the way in which Maisie had insulted a postman, and I had to leave half a crown for the coal porter every time he replenished the cellar owing to the way she abused him for dirtying the newly hearth-stoned coal shoot.

Then I had to spend £5 in increasing the height of the fence, because Maisie insisted that Mrs. Gregson sat in the little side window all day so as to keep a diary of what we had for dinner.

The summer sales at Barker's about finished me. I had been kept late in town, and got home in about the worst of possible tempers to find a man waiting on my doorstep, Maisie having flatly declined to let him in. It is Barker who has the monopoly of the drapery trade in Westbourne.

"Good evening, sir," he said. "I have just called to see you about a little matter concerning Mrs. Tomlinson."

"Oh, I'm not responsible for anything my wife does," I answered irritably. "However, come in; I will give you five minutes."

I took him into the study and turned up the gas. I thought he seemed rather nervous, and he fidgeted with his hat.

"You will excuse me, sir, as of course I don't wish to offend any of my patrons, but there was a fight in my shop today."

"A fight? Why, man alive, what's that to do with me? You had better go to the police."

"No, sir, I'd rather not do that until I have explained fully. The fact is, sir, you won't mind my saying it, but—er—it was your wife."

"My wife! What do you mean, you scoundrel?" I went up to him and took him roughly by the shoulders. I felt perilously near knocking him down.

"Yes, sir, you see it was this way. Mrs. Gregson, whom, perhaps you know, sir——"

My hands dropped to my side like lightning. He held the ace, and he knew it. I was prepared for any revelation bar murder, and I don't think even that would have been a very great surprise. I nodded as he paused.

"Well, sir, Mrs. Gregson was just buying a piece of very choice Lyons silk at five shillings the yard, when Mrs. Tomlinson ran up and said she'd had her eye on it and meant to have it, and as it was the only remnant I had, I couldn't accommodate both of them, could I? Well, sir, there was words, only words, but presently the ladies became put out, just a little put out, sir, if you will excuse my saying it—and unfortunately for me the silk was between them. They both dragged at it, and the best silk won't stand that, sir. It tore into ribbons, and then——"

"Well?"

"They both declined to have it, and walked out of the shop."

"And what was the value of the silk?"

"Two pounds, sir; not a penny less."

I was just producing this sum when the door opened and Maisie appeared.

"Oh, you've come about that silly silk, Mr. Barker. I should have thought that after all I bought in your shop—why I've simply made your business by recommending you to my friends—you could have been lenient. Jack, I forbid you to pay for the silk. It was all Mrs. Gregson's fault."

'Pardon me, madam——"

Digitized by Google

"Well, Barker, I don't want to leave you, as your gloves at 2s. 11½d. are really good, but if my husband submits to this blackmail, I must."

It was blackmail—I knew it, Maisie knew it, Barker knew it, and he played the same suit again.

"Then I suggest that we settle it amicably," he said. "If you will continue to patronise my establishment I will forego this little loss."

"Of course Mrs. Tomlinson will do that," I interposed, grasping at a straw like a drowning man, but the straw proved unsupportable, as it invariably does.

"Now I have some very pretty study furniture in my furnishing department," resumed Barker. "I sold Mrs. Gregson a suite of it to-day."

"Study furniture, did you say?" asked Maisie eagerly. "Why, Jack, that's just what we want, this is getting so shabby."

I tried to convince Maisie that our furniture was barely two years old, but she had dismissed Barker with a promise to call and purchase something to-morrow before I had time to get a word in edgewise.

When he had gone I began to talk to Maisie seriously. I impressed upon her that I should soon be in a state bordering on bankruptcy if she persevered in her silly attempts to get the better of those people next door, but she only cried, and said I always would knuckle under to everyone, so I went off to the study in a tiff and chewed the cud of my anger and the stem of an old clay pipe. Would to Heaven I had never got married!

Next day I met Gregson in town. I was demolishing a chop in the club, when he entered and walked straight to where I was sitting.

"Excuse me," he said. "But isn't your name Tomlinson?"

"Yes. And yours is Gregson?" I replied.

"Glad to meet you." We shook hands. "I say, couldn't something be done to make our wives reconciled to one another? Can't we put dog-collars round their necks and bring them together just out of scratching distance? It's getting so beastly expensive, you know."

Gregson was my brother in adversity. There's nothing like it for breeding real friendship. I told him to sit down, ordered his lunch and a bottle of Moet.

"Look here," I said at last over the coffee and cognac. "Things will never straighten out unless we take the bull by the horns—no personal inference intended. So come round on Sunday and bring your wife. I invite you on my own responsibility."

This arrangement made, I went and bought a diamond and pearl brooch for Maisie as a peace offering, and started for home to break the news. I told the cabman to drive by the longest way, so as to put off the ordeal as long as possible. When I got in, to my utter amazement, Maisie came forward, and, putting her arms round my neck, kissed me in a way she had never done since the honeymoon.

"Oh, Jack, dear, I've such got a lovely surprise for you," she crooned. "Do come and see."

I followed her into the study with a beating heart. The first thing I noticed was a pile of millinery boxes on the table and they all bore the name of Barker. I dropped into a chair and wiped my forehead.

"This is a surprise," I groaned. "Quite unexpected, I'm sure, and——"

I paused, for she had begun to open the boxes one by one, and was trying on the hats in front of the mirror. I'll swear that Barker didn't let her have one of those monstrosities under a couple of guineas.

"You see, Jack, Mrs. Gregson can't wear the best hats now, because I've bought all the prettiest Barker had. Don't you think they suit me?"

What can a chap say when his wife looks pretty in a hat, and, worse still, knows it? I simply asked her where she got the money from.

Mrs. Gregson propped herself up on the fence just in time to see her cat thrown into the tub with a splash!

Digitized by Google

"Money? Oh, Jack, dear, the bill hasn't come in yet," she replied sweetly. "But I have kept the greatest surprise to the last. Come along."

I followed her into the kitchen like one in a dream. Stocks of unpacked furniture were piled up everywhere, and the cook and housemaid were dodging each other between them as they endeavoured to get the dinner. Glancing through the scullery door the same sight met my eyes, and I looked imploringly at Maisie for an explanation.

"That's the new study, furniture, dear," she said. "And there's a heavenly Chippendale cupboard coming for the drawing-room; it cost quite ten guineas more than Mrs. Gregson gave for hers. Aren't you pleased?"

"Er—yes—it's rather amusing, isn't it?" I stammered like an idiot.

We went back to the dining-room just as a loud knock came at the front door. Maisie opened it herself to admit a man carrying a heavy case.

"Is this the curtains or the dinner service?" she inquired.

"The curtains, mum. The dinner service is coming by special messenger this evening. And Mr. Barker sent his respects, mum, and says the new bedsteads and the drawing-room carpet will be sent up by a van in the morning."

I felt like murder, and when I came out the man must have seen it in my eye, for he hurried off the step.

"Look here," I said, "if you value your life get out of the road as fast as your legs will let you."

"Jack!" half screamed Maisie.

"Go on, you set of thieves!" I roared, like an infuriated bull, and the man went.

I banged the hall door so that the glass panes rattled.

"What is the meaning of this—this insanity?" I gasped.

"Mrs. Gregson——"

"Dash Mrs. Gregson!"—only the epithet was stronger—was the only expression that suited the case, and I bounced into the study and bolted the door, knowing that it was the safest thing I could do.

I sat there for half an hour till I heard the housemaid's squeaky voice telling me through the keyhole that Geoffrey Stretton had called to see me. Geoffrey is an old school chum, and has just bought a practice in Westbourne. I think he cared for Maisie at one time, but somehow Fate deemed that she should marry me, and Geoff threw his heart and soul into medicine to forget.

The next moment he was in my room, and I poured my troubles into his ear. When I had finished he got up and crossed to where I was sitting.

"Jack," he said firmly. "Has it ever struck you that you're a selfish hound?"

"I say, Geoff, old man, the joke's a bit ill-timed, isn't it?"

"I mean what I say," he replied without a smile. "Don't you know what is the matter with Maisie—Mrs. Tomlinson, I mean?"

"Candidly, I don't," I said. "Though now you come to mention it, her mother died in a lunatic asylum."

"My dear Jack, it's nerves—simply nerves! Imagine yourself cooped up in a slow place like this all day with scarce a friend and only the servants to talk to. Latterly you have taken to remaining at your club all hours of the night."

"She drove me to it," I replied, taking a leaf from old Adam's book and shifting the blame on to the woman.

"You do not show her that you care for her. Jack, you idiot, why can't you see that a wife like Maisie is a pearl of great price, and should not be treated like a dog? Have you given her any pocket money for herself lately?"

"I gave her half a crown for a pair of gloves the other day."

"Well, go on."

"And of course she has her housekeeping money, and every woman puts away a nest egg out of that."

"A wife like Maisie doesn't. Now here are a few items you have spent on yourself to my own personal knowledge during the past fortnight." He had drawn a paper from his pocket and began to read: "Cigars from Molstein and Company, £8; new frockcoat, £5 5s.; race meeting, £17; bouquet for the actress who played 'Joan' in 'Sweet and Twenty' at the Novelty, £1 1s.; wine——"

"For Heaven's sake shut up!" I broke out. "Prescribe a remedy and have done with it."

"I will. Show Maisie that you care for her, that she is the best little girl in the world; take her out, study her wants in everything; in short, set to work to make her married life really happy, and begin operations by taking her for a fortnight's holiday—a second honeymoon."

"But it's impossible. I'm so busy just now."

"Yet you've spent seventeen hours at the club since last Sunday."

"Good Heavens, Geoff, what a blessed spy you are! Oh, very well, I'll try it."

"And now I'm going to stay to dinner to smooth down matters. Hark! There's the gong."

* * * * *

Three weeks later Geoff looked in again to welcome us back from our trip to Scotland. Perhaps he detected a look in my face which gave my secret away, at any rate he knew the result of his advice before I told him.

"So you enjoyed yourself, Jack?" he said.

"Never had a better time in my life, old man; nor did I ever realise before what a splendid little companion Maisie really is. Haven't seen a shade of temper on her face all the time, and the tradesmen have begun to breathe again."

"I'm glad of that. I knew I was right after all."

"Yes, and, taking my advice, she's going to begin entertaining a few friends by giving a musical evening on Thursday. She's just made a list of guests. Here it is, I haven't looked over it yet. Of course, you're to be asked, and—good Heavens!—she's actually invited those people next door!"

W. Newman Flower.

. . THE . .

BOYS' LEADER

Pearson's New Paper.

"THE PAPER A BOY CAN TAKE HOME."

The first number will appear . .

SEPTEMBER 8th. ONE PENNY.

Stories by . .

JULES VERNE,
GEO. MANVILLE FENN,
THEODORE ROOSEVELT
(President of the U.S.).

1,000 FREE GIFTS weekly for the mere asking.

Place your order now!

ONE PENNY. SEPTEMBER 8th.

Digitized by Google

Powerful New Series.

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

THE FIRST ELEVEN EPISODES.

THOUGH my real name is not Olive Beresford, I am calling myself that for the purpose of these confessions. An aunt had left me £150 a year, and just as I was wondering how I should occupy my time I received a letter from Annabel Vernon, an old school friend, now married, to come and spend the week at Vernon Towers.

I was delighted to accept the invitation, and arrived on the Friday evening. Mr. Vernon met me at the station. The house-party was composed of a Mrs. Grainger, Mr. Taskot, and Mr. Dean Fisher. That evening after dinner, a Mr. Bainbrig and his sister dropped in, and a game of bridge was proposed. Neither Miss Bainbrig nor myself could play, so Mr. Fisher volunteered to teach us. The next evening we again played, and when the scores were added up, Annabel told me that I had lost £11 7s. 10d. I was thunderstruck at the magnitude of this sum, and the following morning asked Mr. Taskot what I had better do, for it was impossible for me to pay it. He told me that the Vernons had schemed to fleece me, and offered to lend me the money. We then fixed upon a code of signals by which we might meet the sharpers on an equal footing. We were, however, observed by Mrs. Grainger. In the afternoon I went for a walk, and, being attacked by a mad dog, was rescued by a Mr. Maurice Ray, who was amazed when he learnt where I was staying.

On Monday morning we commenced playing again, and, having won heavily, I was horrified to learn afterwards that my hosts knew of the secret signals between Mr. Taskot and myself. They had managed to secure photographs of the incriminating gestures that had passed between us!

They then blackmailed me into becoming one of their accomplices, threatening to expose me to the world if I did not agree to their plans. I was forced to do so, and had a hand in robbing the Bainbrigs and two wealthy friends of theirs, the brothers Garford, a night later. Earlier in the same day both Mrs. Grainger and Mr. Taskot left Vernon Towers.

I found out that the fateful photographs were kept in a bureau in the study, and, determined to get them at all costs, I stole down at dead of night to the room. While trying to force open the lock I heard footsteps, and crouched behind a chair.

The visitors were my hosts, who had come to remove the photographs to a new hiding-place. They dropped them behind the overmantel. Would they discover me?

EPISODE TWELVE.

A Friend in Need.

"THERE!" observed Annabel. "She'll be sold if she tries the game of abstraction!"

There was a low laugh of amusement from the pair of tricksters. Then the light was switched off, the door was gently closed, and I was once more alone—with the incriminating photographs within my reach.

Five minutes later I was in my own room, burning them one by one. When I put a box of matches with the little spirit lamp which I use for heating my waving irons, I little imagined what splendid service they would render me. With their aid I was able to destroy every scrap of proof of yesterday's folly, and I could have danced with joy when I opened my casement and scattered the carefully-collected ashes to the four winds of Heaven.

Not even a particle of burnt ash remained to tell the story of my midnight achievement, and it was I who had the best of the bargain this time!

"If only my clever friends had been wise enough to take their proofs with them instead of hiding them where I could find them," was my triumphant reflection, "they would not have had to face the failure of their wicked scheme. But the most cunning people overreach themselves habitually, and Mr. and Mrs. Vernon have just exemplified the general rule."

My relief of mind and my fatigue of body were so great that I slept until eight o'clock, and I was barely dressed when the breakfast bell rang. But I had resolved not to eat another crumb in the house of these harpies, and did not hurry downstairs until I was ready to take a walk upon which I had suddenly decided.

There was no train for some hours that would serve my purpose. Even if there had been I could not carry my luggage all the way to the station myself, and I would accept no further service from anybody employed by the Vernons, so I had plenty to do while I was out.

After walking to the village near which I was almost run down by the mad dog, I meant to purchase a breakfast of milk and bread, supplemented by some fruit. This would fortify me to endure the possible prospect of a scene with the Vernons, who would be enraged when they discovered that their intended victim had slipped through their fingers.

I had also to arrange about a conveyance to fetch myself and my luggage. And I had a fancy for calling upon Miss Bainbrig, for I did not want her to think I was quite so bad as the Vernons would be sure to paint me. Finally, the money I had won from the Bainbrigs and the Garfords weighed heavily on my conscience, and I was anxious to devise some means of restoring it without being too explicit about last night's doings.

As I passed through the hall on my way out I met the parlourmaid.

"Breakfast is just ready, miss," she said, noting that I was in walking attire.

"I don't feel equal to taking any breakfast yet. Tell your mistress that I have gone out for a walk to see if the fresh air will do me good."

"Very well, miss," was the maid's assent to these languidly spoken words, and I knew exactly what would follow. She would tell Annabel that I had gone out looking ill, and complaining of being so out of sorts as to be unable to take my breakfast. Then Annabel would smile to herself, and tell her husband that I was upset by the knowledge that I had no escape from the duties they had assigned to me.

Digitized by Google

Later on, when they discovered that the pictures which they had held over me as a threat had disappeared, they would put a different construction upon my absence from the breakfast table, and I had no difficulty in picturing their fury.

It was a long walk to the village, but I was all the better pleased at that, for I did not want to call upon Miss Bainbrig until she was presumably ready to receive visitors, and the journey to the village would pass the time away nicely.

The lane I had to traverse was the same one in which Mr. Maurice Ray rendered me such signal service, and my thoughts naturally reverted to him when I came in sight of the torn furze bushes which showed the strain that had been put upon them when I was lifted out of harm's way.

"Of course he had heard something about the doings at Vernon Towers," I thought. "And that accounts for the curious way in which he received my information about where I was staying. Perhaps he thinks I am as bad as the Vernons themselves, so it is just as well that we are not likely to meet again. Good gracious! There's the very man!"

It was true. He was sitting on the bankside, sketching a lovely bit of scenery that was revealed by a bend in the lane, and I hoped that he was too much engrossed with his pleasant task to notice me. The better to evade recognition I put up my parasol, and sedulously kept it on the side which would best hide me from his view.

Perhaps it was because I let the sun blaze on myself instead of on my parasol that I attracted the notice I wished to avoid. Anyhow, I had not gone much further before I heard swift footsteps following mine, and an eager voice exclaimed: "Miss Beresford! You are surely not going to pass me without even saying 'Good morning'?"

After that, what could I do but show that I was really as pleased to see Mr. Ray as he was to see me?

"I saw that you were busy," I said shyly, "and artists do not like being interrupted at their work."

"No," was the smiling reply. "As a rule they do not. But when the interruption is even pleasanter than the work itself they are delighted, just as I am."

This was said in an honest, open way which ought to have won a smile from me. But somehow it had just the reverse effect, and, greatly to Mr. Ray's concern and my own vexation, I burst into a passion of bitter tears.

"Look here, little woman," were the first words to which I was able to give intelligent heed, "you are in trouble, and I am not at all surprised. In fact, I fancy I can make a shrewd guess at what has happened to you."

So spoke Mr. Ray, but my experiences had been so strange that I did not see how he could possibly guess their nature, and I shook my head despondently.

"I don't know why I was silly enough to cry," I said, "unless it is that I felt so utterly alone in the world. As for trouble—yes, I have had plenty of that since I came to visit the Vernons. But I hope the worst is over now, and after this afternoon I do not intend to see them again."

"Believe me, they are difficult people to get rid of, if once they gather anybody into their clutches. If you will not think me presumptuous, I should like to ask you to confide in me. You cannot be too careful in dealing with people like the Vernons, and I may perhaps be able to help you."

It was odd that I should feel such absolute confidence in Mr. Ray as I did. But there was something so open, so honest, and so winning in his manner, that I forgot how little he and I knew of each other, and I forthwith began to tell him what had happened to me since I left home.

"Suppose we sit down on this old tree stump," he said kindly. "You have already walked some distance, and as you can talk just as well sitting as you can standing, there is no reason why you should tire yourself unnecessarily."

A few minutes later we were sitting side by side on the tree stump, and I continued my story, confessing every item of the folly of which I had been guilty. I was sure he would despise me for what I had done, and for being so easily misled. But I was determined not to spare myself the punishment which my folly deserved, and I knew also that half-confidences were hardly a fair tender to the man who had already saved my life, and who now showed himself willing to help me to save my reputation.

He listened without comment until I had finished. Then he said kindly: "Miss Beresford, do not take yourself to task quite so severely. It is difficult for outsiders to judge the virtual impossibility of resisting such influences as have been brought to bear upon you. But I know the Vernons to be a pair of unscrupulous harpies who will hesitate at nothing to serve their wicked ends, and due allowance must be made for your inexperience. Against Mr. Taskot I would have you be on your guard, though I cannot say that I think him very culpable for trying to fight the enemy with their own weapons. But he ought not to have drawn you into so shady a business, and he is much to blame for bringing you into the toils of your opponents."

"If only I could have avoided last night's doings, I would not have been quite so ashamed of myself."

"What do you intend to do about your winnings?"

"I am going to see the Bainbrigs before I go back to the Towers for my luggage. And I shall insist upon their taking the money back. That which was won from the Garfords can be given to them by Mr. Bainbrig. I only hope they will not despise me too much."

"They will not despise you, for they will understand that you were terrorised into doing what you did last night, and the best proof of real honesty that you can give them is to refuse to keep your ill-gotten gains. Apart from everything else, they ought to know what to expect if they go to the Towers again. But how dreadfully pale you look. All this worry is making you ill."

"I do feel rather faint. The fact is, I came out without any breakfast, because I did not want to accept any more of the Vernons' hospitality."

"There is a farm close by where you can get some new milk and bread. Let me take you there this minute."

I was very glad to do as Mr. Ray suggested, and the half-hour that followed was a very blissful one, in spite of the unpleasantness with which my final departure from Vernon Towers was sure to be accompanied. My new friend was so thoroughly at ease that he made me forget everything but that he and I were strangely familiar with each other, and I found the time all too short when it became advisable to start for the residence of Mr. and Miss Bainbrig.

"I'll see you to the door," said Mr. Ray, gathering up the sketching materials which he had brought with him. "Mr. Bainbrig will be sure to escort you back to the Towers, and in the meanwhile I will go and make arrangements to transport you and your luggage to the station. It is now eleven o'clock. You ought to leave by the two-fifteen, so you cannot afford to waste much time before you return for your belongings."

Digitized by Google

I thought it very kind of Mr. Ray to take so much trouble on my behalf, and his comforting presence made me almost forget that I still had one or two unpleasant tasks before me. But when, having escorted me to the door of "The Mullions," he rang the bell and then left me to perform my work of restitution, I immediately felt myself afloat upon a sea of trouble again.

"I wish he could be always with me," I sighed. "Things would never go wrong then, and I should never get into difficulties."

Always with me!

The wish had come unbidden. But, having come, it was a revelation, and I blushed with confusion to think how soon I had lost my heart to a stranger. I was still blushing when Miss Bainbrig's maid opened the door, in answer to the ring.

"Miss Bainbrig?" I asked, my courage sinking into my shoes, for I had a sudden fear that my story might be misconstrued into a malicious attempt to damage the Vernons, in revenge for a fancied slight.

What then was my relief when the maid informed me that both her master and her mistress had gone out.

"There was a telegram," she continued, "and they drove off in a hurry."

"And they are not likely to be back soon?"

"That I can't say, miss. There wasn't anything said about when they were coming back."

Now I had a good sum of money upon me, money to which I did not consider myself to have any right, and I did not want to risk taking it back to the Towers with me. Neither did I want to delay at least partial explanations until after the Bainbrigs had had their minds poisoned against me by the Vernons. So I asked the maid to allow me to write a note, and in a very few minutes I had concocted the following epistle:

"Dear Miss Bainbrig,—I would have liked to give you some verbal explanations of certain things which occurred last night, so am sorry to have missed you. I will write more fully after I arrive at my own home. In the meantime, I inclose herewith my share of the money that was won from you and your friends when playing Bridge. You will know how much Mr. Vernon and I won from you, and after deducting your share, you will do me a great favour if you will kindly pass the balance on to the two gentlemen who came to the Towers with you. Please understand that I cannot possibly keep any of the money myself, for it was won by unfair means, and it is not honestly mine to keep. I shall have no chance of seeing you again, for I am going home this afternoon, and it is not likely that Vernon Towers will ever again see

Yours truly,

Olive Beresford.

This letter, with the money, was put in a large envelope, and given into the keeping of the maid, and I now hurried back to ring the curtain upon my unfortunate visit to Vernon Towers.

EPISODE THIRTEEN.

"There is the Thief!"

The scenery hereabouts was very lovely; and the air was full of Nature's most witching music. But I had eyes and ears for very little beyond the contemplation of my own position. I was nervous and ill at ease, and every step that took me nearer to the wicked couple who sought to ruin me seemed also to bring me nearer to some further trouble whose lengthening shadow was gradually casting a witch-like spell over me.

I was assailed by a dreadful foreboding of coming misery, and so strong was the feeling that my footsteps lagged more and more, as if they would fain help me to postpone the evil moment.

Yet, when I at last found myself in the big entrance hall, there was nothing abnormal in its aspect. Nor did Annabel, who saw me come in, look violently aggressive, as I had feared would be the case. She certainly looked scornful, and I felt sure that she knew of the loss of the photographs, though she must have been exceedingly puzzled to understand how I could possibly have guessed at their new hiding place.

"I hear you had a headache this morning," she sneered. "Nocturnal rambles and night air don't agree with you, I suppose?"

"Nothing here agrees with me," was my steadily spoken reply. "So I am leaving this afternoon, and hope to recover my health in the quietude of my own home."

"Would you like some help over packing your clothes? If so, I shall be delighted to expedite your departure."

"Thank you, I can manage without assistance at present. When I have finished packing, I may trouble one of your servants to carry my dress-basket downstairs for me."

"Certainly. You have only to command, and the whole establishment shall be at your service. I have, however, one favour to ask of you. It will hardly be kind or courteous to end your visit without saying good-bye to Harry, and you will find us both in the drawing-room when you come down."

I should have preferred to see neither Annabel nor her husband again. But, when I was quite ready for departure, I felt constrained to be at least outwardly ceremonious, and went into the drawing-room for the final leavetaking.

Very much to my surprise, I saw the Bainbrigs there already, looking so ill at ease that I knew they had been regaled with my real and imaginary delinquencies. Before I had time to say a word, Annabel called out in high, staccato tones: "Has your luggage been brought downstairs, Olive?"

"Yes," I replied. "And I have to thank you for the help given me."

"Pardon me," was the ominous reply. "You refused help, and that was what clinched my suspicions. Constable, come into the hall, and do your duty. You will search this young lady's luggage, and if, as I suspect, she has stolen my jewellery, you must arrest her at once."

So the horror had come!

And it was worse than anything I had dreaded. Of course I knew that the charge was a trumped-up one. But I guessed in an instant that some jewellery had been hidden in my already half-filled dress-basket during my absence, and I sank back in an agony of fear when at last the policeman, who had waited in an inner room until he was ordered to begin the search, brought out of my basket a small jewel-case; and, turning to me, said:

"Miss Beresford, it is my duty to arrest you, at the instance of Mrs. Vernon, on the charge of theft!"

Another long instalment of this fascinating series next week. Be sure you do not miss it.

Digitized by Google

THE PERFIDY OF EDITH ALLEYNE.

The Story of a Secret Marriage and a Disappointment.

"I SAY, mother, who is that girl out there? By Jove, she's rather pretty and her figure is grand! Who is she?"

Lady Blackhurst frowned slightly at her son's remarks and questions; the evident admiration in his tones was somewhat disquieting.

"That 'girl' is twenty-four, Ronald! I should call her a woman!"

"Oh, we won't quarrel over a term, mother!" laughed the handsome Ronald Blackhurst. "Who is she? That's the main point. Is she staying with you? You didn't tell me you had a visitor!"

"Don't be absurd, Ronald! Of course, you understand that she is Miss Edith Alleyne, the young lady whom I engaged as companion about three months ago. I fancy that she must belong to a very distant branch of the Alleynes; she knows nothing of the members of the family who usually figure in Society. She has been brought up far above her station in life, I should say; certainly her education and manner are superior to her circumstances."

When Lady Blackhurst commenced this little speech she was bent on showing her only son that Miss Alleyne was a nobody; but as she proceeded she forgot this intention and spoke quite fairly about the young lady. As she finished she chanced to catch a glimpse of a peculiar expression in her son's eyes, and she was about to continue when he broke in:

"I should say that she has seen a lot of trouble, in spite of her comparative youth," he observed thoughtfully. "There is a sadness about the face as I saw it just now; a thoughtfulness that comes only with age—the age of years or the age of sorrow! I should like to know something about her, mother. I feel a kind of compassionate interest in your companion."

He sank lazily into a chair. Miss Alleyne had passed out of sight, so it was useless to remain at the window. Lady Blackhurst sat with knitted brows for several seconds, her son watching her with concealed amusement; she had not expected Ronald to be so foolish, and she must stop it at once.

"Ronald," she said impressively, "I do not expect you to make a fool of yourself! Now, my boy, you need not look surprised, for you know perfectly well what I mean! When you fall in love you will find someone more suited to your position in life than Miss Alleyne! I do not like the idea of having to give her notice, and, both for my sake and her own, I hope it will not be necessary."

"You put the matter quite plainly, as you always do, mother!" said Ronald, flushing just a little. "You are wont to go straight to the point. I don't think there is any occasion to worry yourself; surely I can take an interest in a member of the household without being accused of a desire to fall in love with her?"

"I hope so," remarked Lady Blackhurst drily. "What are your plans for to-morrow?" she continued, turning the conversation.

Ronald talked quite unconcernedly, and no further reference was made to Miss Alleyne.

Notwithstanding her customary shrewdness, Lady Blackhurst was deceived by this nonchalance, and felt vexed with herself for having answered Ronald as she had done about the companion; she had probably caused him to take more notice of her than he otherwise would have done. At any rate, Ronald was only home for three weeks, then he would be off to Scotland, and after that he would return to Malta to take up his official duties again.

During the next three or four days Ronald showed no particular interest in Miss Alleyne, and Lady Blackhurst's mind became perfectly easy on that score; she was, in fact, more exercised in mind on another point—one to which his father, Sir Walter Blackhurst, had referred; this was an unfortunate predilection on Ronald's part for card playing.

"Of course," admitted his father, "he doesn't see anything in it, and I don't believe for a moment that he devotes so much attention to it for the mere sake of winning a few pounds. It is merely a pastime. Yet I wish he would find another, for this is apt to prove costly. I had to help him out only a couple of months ago. Perhaps you can influence him, my dear."

However, Ronald had not quite lost sight of Miss Alleyne, although he appeared to have done so. After the first talk with his mother he had several times caught himself watching her and thinking of her; then he had pulled himself up abruptly.

"It's so ordinary, to fall in love with a companion!" he mused. "I simply mustn't do it. There are plenty of other girls. We—or she—would be 'cut' in Society, and that wouldn't mean happiness either for me or her. I believe there's a story behind that grave face, but that isn't my business!"

Ronald was a favourite in the homes of the county gentry, and his three weeks' stay at Blackhurst Lodge promised to be a round of amusements outside that residence rather than a holiday with his father and mother. Sometimes they went with him, but often he went alone.

Almost half his holiday was gone. It was a lovely afternoon, and he was walking through a grand old wood, the pride and delight of the district, but he had no eyes for the beauty of Nature. His head was slightly bent, his brows contracted; some uneasy reflections were troubling him.

He had reached an open glade where the rich grass was like a velvet carpet and deadened his footsteps; the sun's rays pierced their way through the trees on one side, thus making the opposite side of the glade bright with light while the rest of the open space was in the shadow.

He walked in this shady part, and had traversed half its width when he stopped just in time to prevent his treading on a pair of small feet incased in dainty boots.

"I beg your pardon!" he cried, making a little spring aside to avoid stumbling. "I was deep in thought, or I—Oh, I am glad it is not a stranger of whom I have to crave forgiveness, Miss Alleyne; it is so much easier to apologise to one with whom you are acquainted, and it doesn't make you feel half so foolish!"

He was quite at home in ladies' society, and the speech amused Miss Alleyne, that was evident. Somehow, she did not feel that she was below him in station—at any rate, she gave no signs of it, but replied quite easily as she sprang quickly to her feet.

"I am afraid it is my fault, Mr. Blackhurst. I was in the way; I ought to have taken up a more retired position; but I really didn't think of anyone coming through here."

Digitized by Google

"It would be quite wrong for you to think of occupying a more retired position," he declared gallantly, bowing to her as he spoke.

There was a significance in his tone which did not escape her notice, and just the least trace of colour appeared on her cheeks. Ronald could not have resisted the impulse to say it; she looked so charming as she stood before him that he uttered the words because they expressed the truth. It was not right that such a woman as Miss Alleyne should occupy the post of a dependent.

Edith Alleyne was about to make some confused response to Ronald's observation when he, remembering that he had placed her in a difficult situation, broke in:

"Pray do not let me disturb you. I should be exceedingly sorry to think that I had deprived you of rest and pleasure."

"Oh, I must get back to the Lodge now, Mr. Blackhurst," said Miss Alleyne deprecatingly. "You have not disturbed me at all."

"You are going back to the Lodge? Then we can go together, and you will have the satisfaction of knowing that if you have lost some pleasure by not being able to continue your book, you are affording me the pleasure of having someone to walk back with and keep me from further indulgence in gloomy thoughts."

Why was it that these gallant speeches would rise to his lips? He was powerless to explain it; they were perfectly sincere.

He glanced sideways, to see how Miss Alleyne took it, and he caught her doing the same thing—she wished to ascertain if he were really sincere or simply jesting. They were so nicely caught in the act that they both laughed—just a trifle awkwardly, perhaps, and felt drawn nearer to one another by a subtle sentiment which neither could define.

He stopped just in time to prevent his treading on a pair of small feet incased in dainty boots.

"Are you really troubled about something, Mr. Blackhurst?" inquired Edith sympathetically. The remembrance of her own troubles made her immediately desire to help others. "Is it anything about the party to-morrow? Can I be of any assistance to you?"

He remained silent for several seconds; at the end of the pause he shook his head slowly and said:

"I wish you could!"

He said it so fervently that she was impelled to break in eagerly:

"Who knows? Perhaps I can. Will you tell me? One sometimes gets assistance where one least expects it."

How simply, how naturally, had this conversation come about! Yet it was leading these two, unconsciously, into the very path against which Lady Blackhurst had warned her son.

They were walking side by side; in her eagerness to help him she had bent her head slightly, and was looking at him with an appealing kind of glance. She had forgotten that they were man and woman, that he was the son of Lady Blackhurst, to whom she was acting as companion; the inherent goodness of her nature came uppermost, and other considerations were lost sight of.

Ronald Blackhurst gazed at her longingly; it would be a relief to tell somebody, yet——. Again that impulse seized him.

"I've been making a fool of myself, that's about the truth of it, Miss Alleyne!" he jerked out recklessly. "I've done it before, in the same way, and I ought to have known better. You see, I've been card playing, and have lost! The last time I ran into debt through losing at cards Sir Walter paid up like a Briton, and I was so ashamed that I said I wouldn't get let in again.

"Well, the night before last I began to play and I won—won a great deal! I suppose that excited me, and I went on playing and lost! I had the most infernal luck, and before I could realise it I had lost a considerable amount.

"I didn't know exactly how much till yesterday morning, and this morning the fellow has pressed me for the money. He wants it to pay his own debts! So I suppose I must go to Sir Walter again, as he can't wait long!

"But," he continued, his bronzed cheeks becoming much darker as he flushed under the tan, "I have a suspicion that the fellow didn't play fair! In plain language, he cheated. What's the matter, Miss Alleyne?"

She had uttered a slight cry.

"Oh, nothing! Go on!"

"Of course, I can't say that out loud, you know, because I'm not positive, but I recollect several things that looked queer."

"Who was it?"

"Well, I don't think I ought to say that," he said chivalrously. "I can't prove it, you see, and it isn't fair to blacken a man on suspicion."

The words that were upon Edith's lips died away unuttered as she saw the soldierly figure of Sir Walter approaching them from the direction of the Lodge. She knew that he would not approve of what he saw, and she flushed at the thought that she had been talking to Ronald in quite a sisterly manner.

Sisterly? The query rose in her mind involuntarily; was that the correct qualification, or was a stronger word justified? She dared not answer the question fairly, even in the recesses of her heart, but something within her cried out in anguish against the dictates of Fate!

Digitized by Google

Sir Walter bowed gravely and detained his son; Miss Alleyne returned the salute and passed on. During the finish of the walk to the Lodge she resolved to avoid Ronald as much as possible. "It will not do," she murmured, as if in answer to some question. "It cannot be!"

Whatever Edith intended to do, it was clearly not Ronald's desire to leave her to herself; that short conversation, the companion's sympathetic interest in his troubles, the charm of that grave face—all had exercised a powerful influence over him. "That's the sort of woman who would be a man's guardian angel!" he muttered, hardly understanding the significance of his words. "That is, if he had sense enough to recognise the fact!"

So he seized every opportunity of speaking to Edith, and even made opportunities of having a short walk with her. Edith perceived this and tried to avoid him, although her heart cried out in rebellion. Yet she knew that it must be!

"Miss Alleyne!" he called after her, softly, four or five days later, as she flitted through the private garden. "Ah, at last I have caught you! I have so wanted to tell you—er—the finish of what I began to say the other day. But you're always in such a hurry to get out of my way. Now, why is that? Why do——"

"I hope that the solution of the difficulty was easily found, Mr. Blackhurst!" she said quickly, interrupting him in order to escape from his awkward interrogatory.

But she was not so fortunate; her words gave him another opening.

"I am glad to find that you really do hope that I got well out of that pickle, Miss Alleyne!" he cried, taking her hand in spite of her attempt to prevent him. "I know you would not say 'I hope' if you didn't care a rap! You wouldn't say that in a commonplace manner, like others! Would you?

"Yes, I got out of it. Captain Joyce lent me the money; I simply couldn't face my father! Joyce wouldn't take any promissory note or anything of that; he merely accepted my word of honour that I would repay it and that I wouldn't play again! That kind of thing puts a man on his mettle, you know!"

"I should think so!" replied Edith. She spoke with conviction and her voice was full of significance. "If you failed, in either part of the promise, your conduct would be despicable!"

She looked him straight in the eyes with that look that makes a man stiffen himself and feel possessed of a will of iron.

"You are right, Miss Alleyne!" he cried with quiet decision. "Do you know what I saw when I gave my word of honour to my father's old friend and my godfather, Captain Joyce? I saw your face! I thought how easy it would be to do the right thing always if I had that face to look upon when—— No, don't turn away! Listen to me, Edith!"

"I cannot! I must not!" she moaned. "Oh, spare me! You know that—that I am only your mother's companion!"

The last part of that sentence was not what she had upon her lips to say, but she swiftly changed it. How could she tell him?

"I don't care for your position; it is you for whom I care!" he cried, almost fiercely, as he tried to clasp her to his breast. "If you love me, what does all the rest matter? And you do love me, do you not?" he asked pleadingly.

She shut her eyes to avoid his ardent gaze and, by a sudden twist of her arms, she liberated herself from his grasp and fled towards the house. Her face was hot, a great sob was in her throat, her mind was in a whirl. He gazed after her with an exultant expression; her confusion was his answer, and that answer was the one he desired, so he thought!

That afternoon Ronald announced that he had made arrangements to shorten his holiday in Scotland by one week in order to have another week at home; his parents misunderstood the reason of this change, and were glad that Ronald preferred home to Scotland.

He saw Edith Alleyne lying, unresistingly, in the arms of Lord Gransdene.

He tried to obtain another interview with Edith, but failed. She was suffering from a violent headache and could not appear. He caught a glimpse of her on the following morning, but everyone, including himself, was busy with the details of the party to be given in the evening.

It was a brilliant function, and Ronald's one regret was that Edith could not take her place with the guests. "Not yet," he thought. "But she will do so before long!" On the whole, however, he was inclined to be pleased with her exclusion on that particular evening; it would probably afford him an opportunity of seeing her alone! He could well slip away for a few minutes!

Ronald Blackhurst's face darkened with anger when his eyes fell on the figure of one of the guests; it was Lord Gransdene, the man to whom he had lost so much money and whom he had practically accused of cheating at cards.

Lord Gransdene had succeeded to the title only a year previously, owing to the unexpected deaths of his father and elder brother, who were drowned by the capsizing of a yacht; nobody had known much about him previously, and it was rumoured that he had been roughing it in the Colonies.

One thing at least was certain; he had very little money to support the title, for there was no estate and the personal property of his father had been left to another brother and a sister. This fact was regarded by most people as an injustice; the young lord had probably offended his father in some trivial way, they said.

"I didn't know that the mater had invited him!" muttered Ronald. "I thought he went off the other day; he must have returned and received an invitation at the last moment, somehow. Confound him!"

However, Ronald soon got over his annoyance by ignoring Lord Gransdene's presence; he was watching for an opportunity to look for Edith, and that made him occasionally absent-minded, to the surprise and vexation of some of the young ladies.

At last the opportunity came and he slipped away. He hurried hither and thither in search of Edith—he always called her Edith to himself now! His search appeared fruitless, and he gnawed the ends of his military moustache in annoyance.

Digitized by Google

She must be about somewhere! He must have just one minute with her! It was maddening to be kept apart from the woman with whom he had fallen so hopelessly in love!

He was about to enter a part of the conservatory when that subtle feeling which warns us of the presence of a fellow-creature caused him to halt and peer in. He started in dismay at the sight which met his incredulous gaze. He saw Edith Alleyne lying, unresisting, in the arms of Lord Gransdene, who was kissing her passionately.

Stunned by this spectacle, Ronald's sight failed him, a mist spread itself before his eyes, he raised his hand to his forehead and staggered away with the word "Traitress!" on his lips.

Ronald made his way mechanically back to the immense reception room; all the way he was muttering scornfully that he had been deceived into believing that a false-hearted woman was an angel of goodness; and then he plunged into the vortex of pleasure with reckless gaiety.

Ronald's first impulse, when he arose with a splitting headache on the morning after the party, was to leave Blackhurst Lodge at the earliest moment; he began packing his things with feverish haste, his one anxiety being to get away from Edith Alleyne, but he stopped abruptly in the middle of his task, set his teeth hard and strode from the room.

"Why should I not face her and tell her how she has ruined my life and my trust in women?" he asked himself again and again as he descended the stairs.

He made no scruple about inquiring for her, and was informed that she was in the private garden. "The same place! All the better!" was his secret comment, and he went straight to the garden.

Yes, she was there! She looked rather more careworn than before, but he had no pity for her!

"I am so glad that I have seen you!" she cried, hastening towards him. "I wanted to tell you——"

Something in his look froze the sentence on her tongue.

"I need no telling, Miss Alleyne!" he broke in, speaking with bitter contempt. "What need for explanation when I see you in the arms of another man?"

She recled as if he had struck her a blow. He laughed harshly.

"Yet an explanation is due to me, I think!" he continued with assumed coolness. "After what took place here, at this very spot, only forty-eight hours ago, I ought to be informed of the reason for this perfidy!"

"Be it so!" she replied coldly. Every vestige of colour had faded from her face; even her lips were white. "I will tell you! But first permit me to say that you will receive this morning a cheque from Lord Gransdene for the money you lost at cards the other evening—through his cheating!"

"What do you mean?" he demanded in amazement.

"I am about to give you the explanation of my perfidy!" she replied so coldly that he winced. "I would fain have been spared this story, but you force me to it!

"When I was a mere girl of eighteen, that is nearly six years ago, I was forced into a marriage with a man for whom I entertained not a spark of affection. I was told that my father owed him money and that this was the way to liquidate the debt. It is not an uncommon way; women are often sold into slavery of that nature!

"I was too young to understand; it was a new life that I was about to begin, and the old one had been very sad and dull! I was to be married to the second son of Lord Gransdene, and there was the remote possibility of becoming a peeress!

"But before I had been married many months, I learnt that the man to whom I was bound was a scoundrel. He was bad at heart, a gambler, a cheat! To save him from exposure and disgrace, his father paid a large sum of money and told him to get out of the country. He did not ask me, his wife, to go with him; I would not have gone, in any case, but he gave me no choice—he simply deserted me!

"I refused help from his father, who thought that I had brought him to that pass by reckless extravagance—yes, he thought that, although he knew absolutely nothing about me! My father died of a broken heart and I obtained a situation and earned my living.

"I heard that my husband had come into the title and had returned to England. I fervently hoped that I should never meet him, for I loathed him. Judge of my distress when I found that he was here!

"He met me in the conservatory, recognised me, threatened to tell everybody that I was his wife, and to claim me. He caught hold of me, and I think that I partly fainted. I suppose that you saw me then!

"I recovered and fought him with his own weapons. I told him that I would expose him as a cheat if he molested me, and I boldly accused him of cheating you! I saw that I had hit the mark, and I pressed it till he promised to leave me unmolested and to send you a cheque for the money.

"You spoke of what happened on this very spot two days ago. Heavens, you did not, you do not, understand!"

She ceased speaking; her breath was coming in quick gasps, her whole frame quivered. They looked each other in the eyes, and he understood! He read the secret which she dare not utter, which she had tried to conceal. He knew that, for the first time in her life, she loved and that he was the object of that love! And he knew also that she could not yield to her affection, that Fate compelled her to stifle it!

"I am sorry for my harshness!" he said gently, so gently that she could scarcely endure it. "I was wrong! It was all my fault! Can you forgive me?"

She held out her hand and he kissed it reverently.

"I am going away," he said a moment later, "but I hope that my mother will sometimes send me news of you! He will leave the country, no one will know, so you can remain here?"

"I must tell Lady Blackhurst," she answered, "and perhaps she will not let me stay."

"Yes, she will!" he declared decisively. "She is strict, but she is very good, and she will be kind to one to whom Fate has been so cruel! Good-bye!"

H. Bramley.

"Mrs. Gobang seems to be thoroughly up to date." "Yes; she even has a smokeless husband."

"Did you get back that half-sovereign your little boy swallowed?" "No; the doctor stuck to it for his fee."

"He has broken my heart," wailed the beautiful girl. "There, there! don't take on so," said her friend, in tones of pity; "it might have been your bicycle."

Freddie: "It's always in damp places where mushrooms grow, isn't it, papa?" Papa: "Yes, my boy." Freddie: "Is that the reason they look like umbrellas, papa?"

"There was a strange man here to see you to-day, papa," said little Ethel, who met her father in the hall as he came home on Wednesday night. "Did he have a bill?" "No, papa. He had just a plain nose."

A SPLEND'D SERIAL STORY,

By Mrs. GEORGE CORBETT,

Begins in the September Number of the

LADY'S MAGAZINE,

and should on no account be missed. The story teems with interest, and is written in the Authoress' most attractive style. . . .

Now Selling Everywhere. Price Sixpence.

Digitized by Google

AN OLD TUNE.

A Love Story with a Pathetic Ending.

LEWIS MILWARD and Willie Treglоan had been bosom friends for years — at least, Willie had been Lewis' bosom friend. His was the more clinging nature, and he had an intensely strong sense of gratitude. Lewis, big, rugged, reticent, was a tower of strength unto himself—or seemed to be so.

They had rooms together in a "private temperance hotel" in one of the big, old-fashioned squares. Lewis was a profound mathematical scholar, and Willie performed the duties of secretary for him.

They were middle-aged, and seemed almost elderly because their lives had been saddened and made lonely. Long ago Lewis had loved a girl, very fair, very beautiful; and he had lost her—not through death. There are other ways, more painful; and beautiful women there are, who prefer a handsome man, or a rich one, to the truest gentleman on earth.

Willie's case was sad, too, in other ways.

Sick at heart they had shrunk from the world and buried themselves in books and work, living the lives of hermits and, unconsciously, putting halos round their early memories. They did not observe that Time and Life were slipping by them, because, naturally, they had grown a little self-centred.

Lewis expended all his energies on mathematical studies and Willie devoted himself to Lewis. When Lewis did not want him he painted—for he was an artist of no feeble order; but Lewis' desires were his law, and the fulfilling of them was his pleasure.

He did not forget how, when one awful day, ten years ago, a bank smash had completely ruined him, Lewis, the only friend who had ever protested his goodwill, had provided all for him, asking never a single question.

In return, he gave all of himself—and it was much.

They did not either of them realise, yet, what or how much was lacking in their studious lives. Their days were absorbed in a monotonous round of books and works.

In the evening they went downstairs to have dinner with the other people, presided over by Mrs. Parry, the stout and cheerful mistress of the house. All this had become a routine.

Every day they were shrinking more and more into themselves, and even the evening meal downstairs was becoming irksome to Lewis. Willie endured it better, because he did not dislike new faces, and because his was a gentler spirit.

But Lewis hated them all. They seemed to him—but he judged them from a point of view made painfully, aesthetically fastidious by his mode of life and thought—smug, commonplace, vulgar, and he began to talk of having dinner served up to him. Willie thought it a pity—but, of course, just as Lewis wished!

"There was fresh luggage in the hall as I came up," he added. "New people, I suppose. Let's go down to-night, anyway, and see them——" He was a social soul by nature.

"New people!" exclaimed Lewis in dismay. "No; I'll be hanged if I will. More fat, stupid old spinsters, or American tourists, I suppose!"

"I didn't see them," replied Willie mildly. "But they mostly are."

Lewis snorted in disgust and re-lighted his pipe.

"I'm going down to read Byron in the Square. It's too hot to write. Will you come?"

"No, thanks," said Willie. "I think I'll just finish a few verses I began yesterday. I feel in the mood. I shall be here if you want me."

Lewis picked up his old straw hat and book, procured the key, and went out to the garden—known as the "Square."

As he seated himself under a shady tree, he saw a lady emerge from the house, wherein at present was his home, and wend her way into the garden. She followed the path near him and he watched her idly.

She was young, quite young, and tall and slender, and passing fair. There was a sort of radiance about her, a something which surprised and dazzled you. You felt you wanted to rub your eyes before you looked again, in case they had deceived you.

She had gone by before he could distinguish more than that, and she seated herself too far off for him to see her without putting up his eye-glass; for he was very short-sighted. He speculated about her, wondering at himself; then tried to read. But Byron failed for once to hold his attention.

He would persist in wondering if the girl were really as radiant as she had seemed as she passed. And what was it, this indescribable something? It was like sunshine of June, but infinitely more so—more—he laughed to himself, suddenly self-conscious.

"What a fool I am!" he reflected. "Just because the sun shone as she went by, I must needs think she caused the brightness;" and he returned to his Byron.

Only for a second. Then, as though impelled, he looked across again to where the fair unknown was sitting.

"I don't believe it was all the sunshine," he mused. "It couldn't have been. No, I'm positive it wasn't. I'm——" He jumped up, as one who makes a bold and desperate resolve. "I'm going to walk over there and see." And with courage most wonderful, he rose and went over the Square towards her. The girl was reading and her face hidden. He was seized with a sudden irresistible desire to make her look up, and to hear her speak.

"Excuse me," he said, taking off his hat. "Here—er—here is the key of the Square. I am going out and you will want it to let yourself out with, you see."

The girl had looked up at the sound of his voice, and he met her frank blue eyes. "Oh, thank you," she said. Her voice was like music.

He stared at her fair face for a second, as one bewitched. She had shining eyes, shining hair, a smile of wonderful sweetness; and the glow of youth and the gladness of an untroubled soul were about her.

Then, suddenly realising his own astonishing temerity, he bowed awkwardly and turned away; for no apparent reason, covered with confusion.

"And I called her a fat old spinster!" he said to himself. "She is a summer's day."

The girl looked after him for a vague second.

"That must be the taciturn mathematician," she reflected. "He looks it."

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Parry, the mistress of the house, had told her of him when she came to look at the rooms.

Lewis went down to dinner that night!

Willie was rather relieved. When he found himself seated next to a slip of a girl dressed in a frivolous-looking white dress he was positively glad.

Lewis sat opposite to her—and was rather annoyed with Willie for having the courage to make use of a graceful manner.

He himself was somewhat brusque of speech, and jerky of movement, out of pure shyness.

They learnt that the unknown's name was Daphne Rivers, and that she was up in London for a six weeks' rehearsal.

An actress! Lewis opened his eyes wide. He had never met "theatrical people," and he had a notion that he wouldn't like them if he did.

Daphne had never met a mathematical scholar before. She had felt sure she couldn't live up to one, especially one so serious and middle-aged. She told him so—all except the "middle-aged" part. She remembered just in time that he might not like that.

He found himself laughing with her, listening to her, and forgetting himself. He even ventured on a very pretty speech in reply to a remark she made, and got through it so successfully that he chose that moment to tear himself away from the room, feeling sure he would only spoil it, and make an utter ass of himself, if he tempted Providence any longer.

So he and Willie went back to work upstairs, both silent, still under the spell of the newcomer's unconscious witchery. Their sitting-room looked grim and dusty—they themselves felt old-fashioned and shabby. Lewis lighted his pipe and smoked thoughtfully. Willie took up his pen and wrote, with a scratching nib.

Presently from the room beneath, a young, clear voice floated up to them in the stillness. A strange thrill vibrated through them and the scratching pen stopped. Daphne was singing an Irish folk-song downstairs. They had never heard it before—nor heard, indeed, any music for long enough—and they only knew Beethoven and Mozart, and had always despised the modern stuff; at least, Lewis had.

At the end of the first verse he took his pipe out of his mouth and got up and stared out of the open window, his morbid face alight. The pen fell from Willie's fingers, blotting the white sheet before him, and his mind travelled back to old, old dreams. They listened spell-bound to the second verse.

Then the singing ceased, but the silence upstairs remained unbroken.

They had both begun to realise now what they had missed in life.

Daphne soon became very friendly with Lewis and Willie. To cheer her quite imaginary loneliness they offered her books to read, and philanthropically devised what amusements they could which would give them an opportunity of being with her.

Right royally they waited upon her, and the summer days went by merrily.

Their work suffered, naturally. For, even when she was at the theatre, and they knew they could settle to work without running any risk of missing a chance of seeing her, they found themselves talking of her or thinking of her.

If she walked in the Square, they suddenly found their room too oppressive for work—that is, if Daphne walked alone in the Square. But she was very popular. Even the "fat old spinsters" liked her. And there were no young ones there!

She seemed to have wakened up the dull old boarding-house and filled it with the spirit of youth, and daily the delight of her presence and companionship deepened to two at least of the inmates. Mrs. Parry marvelled! Where was Mr. Milward's taciturnity? For Lewis, growing bolder, asked Daphne to allow him to be her guide in exploring London, and they spent various glorious afternoons and evenings—at least, to Lewis they were glorious.

Those summer hours with her, talking to her of his work or waxing eloquent over his favourite authors, or favourite themes; or listening to her sagely tolerant views, or submitting to her audacious teasing! All these were to him like bright stars in a dark, dark sky—oases in the dreary desert—a raft to a drowning man.

He knew soon, too soon, that he loved her, and craved for her, with all his long-repressed soul and strength, and they were great; although he cheated himself for a while and swore he regarded her as a friend.

And because she had always seemed to be glad to be with him, had always been kind, had allowed him to escort her home from late rehearsals, and take her out on holiday afternoons, he could not resist the hope that she cared a little too, that perhaps she would allow him the privi-

"Excuse me," he said, taking off his hat. "Here is the key of the Square."

Digitized by Google

lege of loving her—would be happy with him—would love him.

As for Daphne, she thought them all—and particularly these two serious middle-aged men—most wonderfully kind; and she was very grateful. But so far she had met with kindness everywhere, and she never dreamt that anything more prompted these two, to her, elderly men. Love did not as yet enter into her dreams at all.

Willie was often left alone now in the grim sitting-room, while his friend was out with Daphne. If there was no work to do he made beautiful little sketches, whose subject was a fair maiden with bright hair and smiling lips, and the radiance of youth.

"Daphne!" he murmured, writing the name at the foot of one of them. "She should have been called 'Psyche.'"

He started guiltily and blushed; but presently fell to musing again, and conjured up in dreams a very different life from this, in a different groove; a life in which there figured a sweet little country house, and peaceful happiness, and no more dulness, because his lifelong companion would be a—wife, who was—his eyes fell on the sonnets and the sketch called—"Daphne."

Daphne! Daphne for his wife! Oh, merciful God, might it be? For he loved her—loved her! He started up, calling himself a fool. Had he forgotten his age, his poverty, his dependence on Lewis? And yet—and yet!

He tried to crush the thought, but it would return—the thought that Lewis, who had always been his salvation, might help once again. He would tell him, anyhow. He felt that he ought to have Lewis' sanction. Perhaps he guessed something even now—perhaps Daphne did!

His heart throbbed painfully—but when Lewis came in he had not the courage to tell him; and Lewis was not helpful, but wandered about restlessly, his hands in his pockets, humming occasional snatches of songs—not Beethoven's nor yet Mozart's! It struck him that Willie was getting intolerably dull lately.

Willie marvelled that even Lewis' voice could sound unmusical, singing those particular songs. It seemed to him a pity that Lewis should spoil them so.

The next evening Daphne was walking in the Square with them. It was sultry—and they had seen from their window the flutter of a white dress among the trees. That was what made the evening sultry to them!

"Why don't you smoke, you poor martyrs?" demanded she, for she knew they were inveterate smokers. "You must be miserable. Do!"

They declined gracefully.

"But I don't mind, you know," she protested. "I smoke myself, so why should I?"

Lewis stared.

"You—you smoke!" he ejaculated.

"Of course!"

"What—er——"

"Oh, only cigarettes yet," she said laughing. "Why, I do believe you are shocked."

He was, but he was thinking, too, how charming she must look.

"A—a little, perhaps," he said bashfully. Then hastened to add: "But—I am old-fashioned, I know."

She was amused.

"Well, I shall not interfere with your pleasures, or let you waste your time on me much longer," she said.

"You have never done either," he muttered awkwardly. "But what do you mean, Miss Rivers?"

"That we go on tour next Sunday," she said, and sighed regretfully.

He caught his breath.

"That means—out of London?" he asked.

"Of course. The north country towns."

"And you go on Sunday?"

"Yes, alas."

It was a thunderbolt.

She wondered a little at their silence. But the night was still and beautiful, and her thoughts were very pleasant, so she did not break it. Willie stole away with never a word, so desperately miserable he was; and Lewis stared at her aghast.

They had forgotten that she was only there for a season, that soon she would go away, and be swallowed up in the rushing world, and come back to them never more. She had become the sunny part of their days, and they could scarcely realise that they must lose her, and go back to their old monotonous routine. It was too horrible.

But all that Lewis said as he twisted his new straw hat between his fingers was:

"I—I am beastly sorry, Miss Rivers. I can't tell you how sorry."

"So am I," she returned frankly. "It has been awfully jolly here in London. And you've all been so kind."

"Oh, please don't say that," he said quickly. "It has been such a pleasure to know you. The kindness has been yours. I—I want to—tell you——"

"Supper's ready," called Mrs. Parry's cheerful voice, coming to them. "Didn't you hear the bell?"

Lewis reviled the bell under his breath with much sincerity and conviction.

"Let me see you to-morrow evening, will you?" he pleaded. hastily.

"Of course, if you like," she answered; and Mrs. Parry was upon them, so they went into the house together.

Willie did not appear at all.

Lewis paced his room that night, maddened by love, hope, fear.

Should he speak, putting aside all thought of his age and disadvantages? Or should he see her go out of his ken, and resume the old life, that was only a living death?

The thought was unendurable. It was like shutting oneself deliberately outside the gates of Eden, and throwing away the key. And surely she guessed.

Surely she knew what he felt for her, what he wanted to say to her! And knowing, would she have been so kind unless—unless—he picked up his hat, and stole out into the Square to think it all out again, and there he came upon Willie, who had spent the hours in arguing out the same problem from a different point of view.

"Hullo, Willie!"

"Hullo, Lewis!"

Strangely enough they were rather pleased to see each other at that moment. Lewis took Willie's arm, and they walked to and fro silently. Then Willie made a desperate effort to confide in Lewis and ask his help.

Just then Lewis burst forth:

"Willie—I want your advice."

This was rather a novel statement coming from Lewis, and Willie was pleased as well as surprised.

"Say on," quoth he.

"You—you'll think me an awful ass," went on Lewis. "But—but the fact is, I—I've fallen head over ears in love. Do you think—I've got the ghost of a chance?"

He was too full of his subject to notice Willie's sudden start, or the sympathetic shake in his voice as he asked:

"Who's the lady?"

Lewis stared at him.

"You mean to say you've never guessed? Why, Miss Rivers, of course."

Miss Rivers, of course! Willie was dazed for a second. Then he could have laughed aloud at the mockery of it. Here, poor fool, he had been fancying that he was the only man in the field! As if a girl would look at him, in any case! And with Lewis to compete—Lewis, whom he would not, could not compete with. Oh, Lord, oh, Lord, in what a fool's dream he had been living!

"What do you think, Willie?" Lewis recalled his thoughts. "Will she—have I—do you think she'll have me? You know she talks of going away—but it's too horrible—I—I can't go back to the old way——"

Willie swallowed a great lump in his throat. Never again would he be sufficient to his friend, in spite of these years of devoted friendship. It seemed unfair. He had always had a share in Lewis' thoughts as in his life—now even that would be his no longer. He would be unnecessary, useless. That is terrible.

Digitized by Google

"I think you stand a good chance," he said quite steadily. "I can't imagine any woman — refusing you, Lewis."

"She's so young, so beautiful. I'm old—ugly——"

"You're only middle-aged, Lewis. Many young girls marry men your age—and at any rate, you're a gentleman."

He ignored the personal reference. Not even Willie could call Lewis an Adonis.

"I shall speak to-morrow," said Lewis. "She goes on Sunday. I may see her to-morrow evening."

"That looks promising. And—and I wish you all luck. Lewis. You deserve it, Heaven knows!"

He held out his hand, and Lewis grasped it.

"Thank you, Willie."

And he spared a second to wonder vaguely how he could ever have thought Willie a bit—well, a bit dull! He was splendid, just splendid.

He did not dream of what Willie suffered, or that when he left him and went to his room he took out a little revolver and handled it lovingly, longingly passionately to slip out of life; and was only arrested from so doing by the thought that it was caddish to spoil their happiness, even ever so little; and also vaguely, that some day, perhaps—who knows, Lewis might have some small need of him again.

But the next morning he went out very early, with his paints and easel. It was more than could be asked of human nature, to stand by, watching passively, the sacrifice of one's dearest hopes.

To Lewis that day was an ordeal. Sometimes it seemed that a hundred years were dragging their weary length before the hour that he lived for; and then Time would seem to be rushing him on madly to his undoing. He wandered about restlessly, hot and cold by turns, though the day was brilliant summer.

At last the hour drew near when she would be in, and presently he heard her singing softly downstairs. He looked at himself in the glass, and for the first time in his life wished himself twenty years younger, and a less awkward height.

He went downstairs and opened the door quietly. She stopped singing, and turned to him with a smile which gladdened his heart, and raised his hopes.

"Don't stop, please," he pleaded. "I want to listen."

She declined, apologising.

"I was only strumming to amuse myself. I'm not in the humour to perform."

"What are you in the humour for?" he asked.

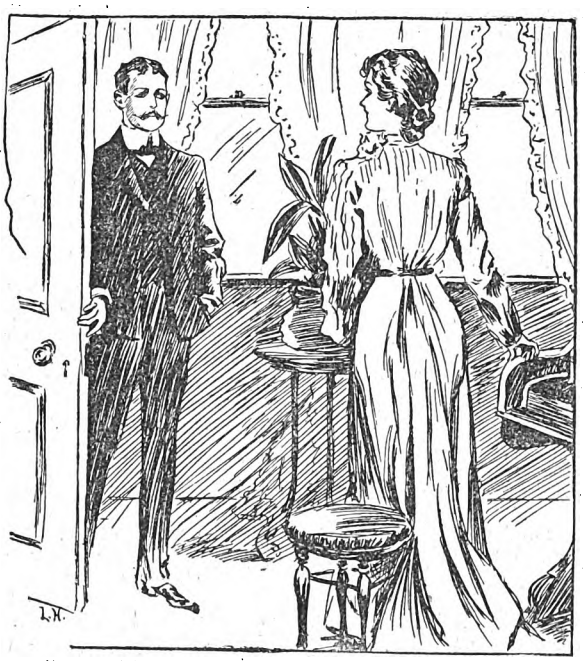
"I don't quite know. Something exciting—something terribly nice, don't you know! My language shocks you, I'm afraid."

"Allow me to take you somewhere 'terribly nice,'" he said.

"No, thanks. You would spoil me if I allowed you. But isn't it a beautiful evening?"

She left the piano and moved to the open window. He noticed her long green dress, the pink roses in her belt, and the grace of her movements.

"Then let me take you out," he pleaded. "It's your last evening, you know."



"Don't stop, please," he pleaded. "I want to listen."

She shook her head. She had never allowed them to spend money on her. Lewis had noticed that, often.

"You are very proud," he said slowly.

"Oh, it isn't pride. Don't think that," she said.

"What then?"

She raised her shoulders slightly.

"I don't know—but——" she reflected, "I suppose I like my independence. I delight in earning my own living, and I like to—to pay my own way. Men have a stupid notion that they must pay for women. To me, that spoils friendship."

He looked at her with a great light in his honest eyes. Had she been noticing him, she might have guessed what was at hand. But she stared through the window absently.

"Underneath your irresponsible manner," he said thoughtfully, "there is a depth of soul that I don't believe you dream of."

She was taken aback, and blamed her own serious speech, as having brought this on herself.

"That is a pretty speech, with a kink in it," she said.

"It is not a pretty speech," he returned. "But where is the kink?"

"You accuse me of an irresponsible manner——"

"That is one of your thousand attractions."

She plucked at some ribbon on her sleeve.

"Forgive me," she said. "But I don't like compliments."

"You are annoyed," he apologised humbly. "I am so sorry—I——"

"No, no." She raised her eyes to his face. "No. But I really do get so many at the theatre. And they seem meaningless, and—I am bored with them."

So they made her pretty speeches at the theatre! That side of her life had never occurred to him. They wooed her, too, no doubt! It was a wonder she was still free to be courted! His jealousy flamed.

"It is a horrible life for you," he exclaimed. "Their unwelcome attentions, and the late hours, and——"

"Oh, every life has its disadvantages," she said. "You must not think I am complaining. I like the life immensely—that is," she laughed, "all except the packing. That's terrible, and now I'm afraid I must go and do it, alack!"

She moved to go, but he took her hand quickly.

"No; don't pack," he said. "Don't—don't go."

She looked at him.

"I must, I'm afraid. We leave by an early train to-morrow——"

"Don't go to-morrow—don't go at all——"

She glanced at him puzzledly, and freed her hand.

"I don't quite understand you," she said.

"I want you," he went on passionately, his earnest face alight and eager. "I love you—I have loved you from the first moment. The thought of your leaving me is—is—terrible—intolerable. You have made these weeks like a perfect dream. Daphne, will you go on making my life a dream? Will you stay with me—will you marry me? It is asking so much, I know, I am such a clumsy ass, and so—so old to you. But I will devote my life to making you happy."

Daphne did not speak. She was aghast, amazed. She had not dreamed of this. The whole thing seemed impossible, impossible—ludicrous indeed, but for his passionate earnestness.

Digitized by Google

"You knew a little, you guessed a little, didn't you?" he went on. "Is it wrong to ask you? I love you so."

"I—I am sorry," she said, her head bent. "Really, really, I didn't know."

"But you know now," he cried, grasping her hands in his. "Daphne, tell me, I may hope. I'll wait, if you like. Don't answer me till you wish. I—I have surprised you. Only tell me I may hope—look at me, Daphne, speak to me."

She looked up at him, and was stricken with remorse and shame that so strong and noble a soul should be abased by a refusal.

"I cannot," she whispered, "I cannot."

"Ah, you don't mean that quite," he pleaded. "Don't send me away without a chance. I won't bother you. I'll wait so patiently."

Alack for him! She knew that neither patience nor time would give him what he asked for.

"I am to blame," she said brokenly. "I have been so blind, so stupid. I might have spared you all this, and now you will think me cruel. But it is impossible—utterly impossible. I looked on you only as a friend. But, oh, I am so sorry, so bitterly sorry."

He looked into her face and read pity there. It spoke more than her words. It was like a knife at his heart.

"Daphne," he said, with white lips, "Daphne, is it hopeless?"

Her eyes filled with tears as she looked at him. Then she covered her face with her hands.

Lewis went out quietly and closed the door.

* * * * *

Willie, returning very late, entered their common sitting-room to put down his paint-box. He struck a match, and found Lewis sitting motionless by the table, his face buried in his arms. Beside him lay a small study of a girl's face. He felt as one who breaks in upon a secret prayer; but, as he turned quietly to go, Lewis looked up, as one in a dream.

The moonlight showed a rigid, haggard face.

"Don't go, Willie," he said. "If you're not tired let's go out on the balcony and smoke. I want you."

So they picked up the threads of their old life and Willie was still a necessity.

Gertrude Bibby.

VIOLA: "I've just finished a unique sofa-pillow. It's stuffed with old love-letters." Mabel: "Indeed! How very nice and soft it must be."

FAIR CUSTOMER: "Are you quite sure this is a genuine four-leaf clover?" Dealer: "I could swear to it, lady. I put the extra leaf on myself."

"WILL you lend me your lawn-mower for an hour or so?" "I can't do it, but if you like, you may keep that snow shovel you borrowed last January a little longer."

TEACHER: "Johnny, surely you know what 'osculate' means? What do people do when they are in love?" Johnny (the jeweller's hopeful): "They come to pa for an engagement-ring!"

"GOING to the same place for the summer this year?" "Yes. Last year all my girls brought husbands home from there, and I'm in hopes that they'll take 'em back and leave me there again this year."

"My dear," said Mrs. Hunwell, as she poured out coffee at breakfast the other morning, "do you believe in the eternal fitness of things?" "I used to," replied Hunwell, "but that was before you began to make my shirts."

"FATHER ill and can't work! Tut, tut! That's a very serious matter for all of you, my little man." "Yessir, but it might have been wuss." "Worse! Why, he's the breadwinner, isn't he?" "Yessir, but it might have been mother, and she buys the tea an' clothes an' sugar an' milk an' meat."

Your Editor Chats.

I AM wondering how my readers liked the innovation in covers which took place last week. Of course I am pleased with it myself, otherwise I should not have made the change, and I shall be glad to have opinions from readers whether they like it or not.

IT is some weeks since the last tartan cover was published but another one is coming along in two weeks' time—the Clan Macquarrie. Any of you who have Scottish friends who are not readers of Short Stories should tell them what is coming. A list of the reproductions of tartans which have already appeared, together with the date of their appearance, will be published in Short Stories for September 19, the number with the Clan Macquarrie cover.

AGAIN I must make my apologies for not yet being able to publish the result of the Buried Stations Competition. Some readers have written asking whether it is going to be published at all. This will most certainly be done. The delay is occasioned owing to the great amount of time entailed in the checking of the attempts, and as this is holiday time the number of checkers is necessarily curtailed. However, readers may rest assured that they shall know the result at the earliest possible moment.

ON another page you will notice an announcement concerning the publication of a new paper called The Boys' Leader. This, as the name implies, will appeal more especially to the youths of the land. Mr. Henry T. Johnson, the author of our serial, is contributing a continued stirring historical story to this new paper, which will be published on September 8. Any parent who has sons whom they wish to provide with bright healthy reading will do well to become a subscriber to The Boys' Leader—it costs one penny each week.

I SHALL not be able to make many more appeals this summer for the FRESH AIR FUND as the time for holding the excursions will be over with the advent of shorter days and long, chilly evenings. However, among the children of our large cities there are still many faces which need to be made happy.

Though this summer has not, on the whole, been a hot one, those in fairly good circumstances who have not yet had the opportunity of leaving the town in which they live, will be glad when they are able to do so. They have found their surroundings uncongenial enough. What must it be then for the slum dwellers?

Go then to the nearest post-office and procure a postal order or some stamps and send them along to the Hon. Sec., FRESH AIR FUND, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. They will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. Ninepence pays the entire cost of a day's outing for one child.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

St. Clement's Wells.

The Story of a Visit and the Happiness it Brought.

"I don't want to go, and I won't go," declared Nan rebelliously.

"You will go on Monday, as Lady Thornleigh has arranged," said her step-mother in tones of authority.

Nan made no answer in words, but she pouted, tossed her head, and looked anything but submissive.

She made a lovely picture as she stood by the open window of the homely, old-fashioned sitting-room. Nan Hayslope was perfectly charming with her golden curls, her big eyes, and her dimpled little face, that looked as though it were made out of blush-roses.

Mrs. Hayslope took some fresh work out of her overflowing basket, and went on quietly sewing.

"You have spent six weeks with your god-mother every summer since you were four years old," she began presently, "and this is the first time you have made any objection to the visit. You must go, my dear, for your father will not allow you to offend Lady Thornleigh."

"It's so deadly dull at St. Clement's Wells," burst out Nan, half crying. "There's no one there but Lady Thornleigh. It was all very well when I was little, but it is quite different now I'm seventeen."

"You'll have to stand it," replied Mrs. Hayslope, and Nan knew she would. She had never known any other mother than this firm, capable woman, who ruled the household, including her wayward step-daughter, with a strong hand.

Nan's own mother had been a poor relation of Lady Thornleigh's family, and had been considered to have done very well for herself when she married the prosperous country doctor. But she died when Nan was four years old, and Lady Thornleigh who had been fond of her poor young cousin, took an interest in the child, invited her every summer to St. Clement's Wells, and made her lavish presents. The childless widow liked the presence of the pretty baby, who brightened up the old house with her frolics, and sweet babbling laughter.

But as Nan outgrew goodies and toys, and was treated with less indulgence than had been shown to the engaging child, she began to find St. Clement's Wells an exceedingly dull place to spend six weeks in, and at last she mutinied outright and declared she would not go.

"I am sure some evil will follow if you make me go, father," she pleaded, hanging coaxingly round his neck. "I have a presentiment it will. I have such a dull, heavy feeling here," laying her hand on a spot where she supposed her heart to be.

All Nan's pleading was in vain, and the appointed day and hour saw her arrival at St. Clement's Wells.

"I wanted you for this week particularly," observed Lady Thornleigh, as Nan having changed her dusty travelling gown for a little white frock in which she looked more like a bunch of pink-and-white roses than ever, appeared in her god-mother's drawing-room, and accepted the refreshment of a cup of tea. "My niece Felicitas Dunbar—you've heard me speak of Felicitas?—arrives to-morrow to pay me a long visit, and as I can't go about much myself, I shall want you to be with her, and to try to make her visit as pleasant as possible."

"I'll try," promised Nan dutifully, much pleased at the prospect of a girl companion.

But Miss Dunbar arrived in a very bad temper, having lost every connection she possibly could, and having spent hours at several little country stations.

"Late? Of course I'm late," she said, in answer to her aunt's half-reproachful greeting. "This is the most out-of-the-way place in the world, and has the worst train service. I missed the connection at the junction through that imbecile's fault," pointing a tragic and grimy finger at her maid, who had obviously been weeping.

When Miss Dunbar had been cleansed, soothed, and supplied with tea, she recovered her temper and smiled blandly on her aunt, and rather less blandly on Nan. She looked, now that she was freed from dust, and no longer frowning, very beautiful.

She was on a large scale, and perfectly proportioned. Her silky black hair was waved and rippled in the latest fashion.

Her clear-cut features were absolutely regular, her face was creamy white, without the faintest tinge of colour except in the lips and in the large dark eyes.

"I hear that Sir Erroll Tremaine has come back to England at last," observed Lady Thornleigh, leisurely sipping her tea. "They say he is expected at Tremaine Towers before long."

"I met him in town," said Felicitas briefly.

"He used to run about St. Clement's Wells like a son of the house, when he was a boy," observed Lady Thornleigh musingly. "But that is fourteen or fifteen years ago. I dare say he has forgotten all that now."

"No, he has not. He asked for you, and said he would call as soon as he got down to his own place. Quite near, is it not?"

"Oh, yes. You see that little gate on the right"—they were taking tea on the terrace—"it leads into a wood, through which a brook runs. On the other side of the stream begin Erroll's grounds."

"He's rich, isn't he?"

"Very; had a long minority too. Oh, he's very wealthy."

They talked on about Sir Erroll, giving Nan the feeling of being present at a drama in a foreign language. There was meaning in every word, but she could not understand it.

However, her eyes were opened when Sir Erroll came down to Tremaine Towers, and called on Lady Thornleigh. Nan kept in the background during his visit, and used her eyes diligently.

"Oh!" she said to the four walls of her own room. "Now I understand why Felicitas offered her aunt a visit."

Sir Erroll soon became a tame dog about St. Clement's Wells, and seldom let a day pass without a visit. Lady Thornleigh was well pleased to see his attention to her niece, but, had she been a keener observer, she might have noticed that though he talked most to Felicitas, his eyes dwelt oftenest on the wild-rose face of her little god-child.

"What is the legend of St. Clement's Wells?" asked Nan, perching herself on the broad window ledge, and sitting half in and half out of the library, where Felicitas was writing a letter for her aunt, and Erroll lounging aimlessly about.

"Is there any legend?" he asked, watching the lithe figure swaying backwards and forwards.

"Oh, yes, there is. I've heard it often when I was a child. There are two wells you know, one is in the woods——"

"I pass it every day when I come here," interrupted Erroll. "Is that the one with the legend attached to it?"

Nan nodded her golden head.

"Yes, that's the one. There's something about a girl tumbling into it, and a curse on it. And it's a wishing well, and——"

"I am surprised, Miss Hayslope, that you can repeat such nonsense," said Felicitas severely, as she rose and swept forward with the letter in her hand, but before she had reached the door she had stumbled over a foot-stool, and sank gracefully into Sir Erroll's hastily extended arms.

"Are you hurt?" asked Erroll and Nan almost in the same breath.

Digitized by Google

"I've wrenched my ankle," replied Felicitas, "but not seriously, I think."

It was not a very bad sprain, but still it necessitated complete rest, and Miss Dunbar spent the next two days on a couch, Nan reading to her or playing cards with her, and Erroll in constant attendance.

The third day Erroll did not appear at the usual time. It was the hottest day of a very hot summer, and Miss Dunbar's temper, never her strongest point, gave way altogether under the strain of heat, the pain of her foot, and the uncertainty of her laggard knight's intentions. She was so extremely disagreeable to Nan, that at last the girl suddenly jumped up, and ran sobbing from the room.

"What's the matter?" asked Lady Thornleigh, waking up. "Why is Nan crying?"

"Oh, how can I tell?" snapped Felicitas, forgetting her usual calm repose of manner. "Temper, I suppose. Aunt Etta, why in the world do you have that creature here?"

"Why, Nan always comes. But I asked her earlier than usual this summer, because I thought she would be useful to go about with you. It would look less—less pointed. You've never paid me a visit in the country before, and anyone could see your motive for this one."

"He admired me very much in town," said Felicitas, very angrily, and without explaining her personal pronoun, "and I knew he was coming here, so of course I offered a visit. But that little wretch with her doll's face and red cheeks has come in the way, and if it falls through it will be your fault."

"Oh, nonsense! she's a child—just the kind of pretty, baby thing most men notice. There's nothing more in it."

"She'll be very coarse when she gets older," observed Felicitas vindictively. "She's got no real beauty—just the pink-and-white prettiness of rustic seventeen." Felicitas, by the way, was just twenty-seven.

"Well, well, I think you're wrong. Besides, you had to have some other girl with you."

Felicitas muttered something about "old-fashioned notions," and relapsed into ill-tempered silence.

Meantime Nan had found refuge in the woods, and had flung herself down beside the wishing-well, crying passionately. She was crying too violently to hear approaching footsteps, and her heart gave a great jump as she felt two arms draw her upwards, and heard a tender, eager voice say:

"What is it, sweetheart? What is the matter with my darling?"

Nan opened her amazed blue eyes upon Erroll Tremaine, stared at him a moment, then pushed him from her with all her small might.

"Sir Erroll, what do you mean?" she demanded, with majesty.

"I lost my head when I heard you crying," he confessed. "I couldn't help it, for I love you, dear."

"But I thought—Felicitas," faltered Nan, bewildered, and dabbing her eyes with a sopping wet handkerchief.

"Felicitas! Why, darling, who could love a cold, haughty woman of the world like her, beautiful as she is? Nan, sweetest, dearest Nan, tell me if you love me?"

Nan made no particular reply, but hid her dimples on Sir Erroll's shoulder and seemed very comfortable.

Time passes swiftly under such circumstances, and when Nan thought it necessary to look at her watch, she discovered that it was very much later than she had thought.

"Oh, it's tea-time!" she exclaimed. "We must be off at once!"

"I sha'n't come to tea," said Erroll. "I couldn't be civil to Miss Dunbar after the way she's been bullying my darling. I'll come in early to-morrow instead."

They walked together to the gate, and there paused to say good-bye.

"Kiss me, darling!" whispered Erroll. "Just one kiss, my pet."

But Nan was shy and hung her head, so he had to be content with pressing a brief kiss on her rosy cheek, and then he turned back into the wood, while Nan went slowly towards the house.

She had not gone more than a few yards when, glancing towards the terrace, she was horrified to see her godmother and Miss Dunbar glaring at her with an expression that plainly showed they had been witnesses of that tender parting.

As Nan drew near, Miss Dunbar sat bolt upright on her lounge chair, and stared harder than ever.

"You—you cat!" she hissed furiously.

"Come here, Annabel," commanded Lady Thornleigh; and as the small culprit approached, she continued: "I am ashamed of you! I am disgusted. How dare you permit Sir Erroll to kiss you?"

"He—he loves me!" faltered Annabel.

"Loves you!" exclaimed Felicitas scornfully. "Ridiculous vanity!"

"Let me tell you, child," went on Lady Thornleigh, "a man does not treat the girl he loves and respects as Sir Erroll has treated you. If you have mistaken an idle flirtation for anything serious, I am sorry for you, but I none the less blame you for your forwardness and lack of maidenly modesty.

"I am disappointed in you, Annabel, and must ask you to leave my house to-morrow morning. I will send you to the station in time to catch the ten-twenty train. I do not wish to see you again before you go. Good-bye! No, not a word, I will hear no excuses. Good-bye!"

It was a very humble and dejected Nan who faced the surprise of her family at her unexpected return.

"It was too dull for you, I suppose," said her stepmother, with some asperity.

"No, it was not at all dull," replied Nan very meekly.

"I hope you have not offended Lady Thornleigh by coming off like this?"

"No, I think not. She was quite willing I should go."

"Well, I hope you are satisfied now you have got your own way, and escaped three or four weeks of your visit. You always were the most wilful, disobedient girl in the world, and never can bear to do just as you are told."

Hope was not dead in Nan's heart, and she calculated that Erroll would find out her absence when he called early that day at St. Clement's Wells, and if he wrote at once, she might have a letter from him by the evening post. So she stationed herself by the gate to watch for the postman directly after dinner.

It was a lovely summer evening, and Nan looked like the Spirit of Summer in her white frock, with roses tucked into her white waist-ribbon, roses pinned at her throat, and fastened into her clustering fair curls.

The postman passed.

"Nothing for us? Nothing for me?" cried Nan lamentably.

"Nothing, miss," he answered, with a sympathising glance at the lovely, wistful little face; and Nan's heart gave a sickening thud. Then Lady Thornleigh was right.

It had been nothing but an idle flirtation, and she had been a credulous little fool to take the love-nonsense of a man of the world in earnest.

Very likely they were all laughing at the country-bred, vain simpleton at St. Clement's Wells. She could picture it all, and Nan stamped her foot little passionately, as she turned back to the house.

"Nan!" cried a voice behind her, and somebody pushed the gate open and rushed up to her. "Nan, my own sweetheart!" went on Erroll, smothering her with kisses. "I found out you had been packed off home in disgrace. They didn't tell me at first, but kept on humbugging me, else I'd have been here long ago. Now, my own, before I go in and ask your father's consent to our marriage, put your arms round my neck, and say: 'Erroll, I love you!'"

And Nan did exactly as she was told.

Vera Serkoff.

Digitized by Google

The Course Was Smooth.

"DOES the course of their true love run smooth?" "Yes, indeed. There are banks on both sides."

So Absentminded.

THE BRIDE (on the honeymoon): "Why, you only bought one ticket, dear!" The Groom: "By Jove, I never thought of myself."

Rather Angular.

MR. RICHFELLO: "Miss De Slimm is evidently a woman of many fine points." Rival Belle: "I should say so. Did you see her elbows?"

Beautiful Thought.

SHE: "Oh, Charley, that gnat has come from your hand to mine." He: "Aw—beautiful thought, that your blood and mine—aw—mingle in the same gnat."

Just the Reverse.

MRS. NAGLEIGH: "I suppose you are satisfied now that you made a mistake when you married me." Mr. Nagleigh: "I made the mistake all right, but I'm not satisfied."

An Ingenious Hint.

FRANK: "Blanche pinned a tiny flat-iron on my coat last night." Dick: "Do you know what that means?" Frank: "No." Dick: "Why, she wants to press your suit."

The First Step.

EMMA: "And, Charlie, dear, would you have really shot yourself if I had refused you?" Charlie: "Indeed I would. I had already sent to four gunsmiths for price lists of revolvers."

Then He Proposed.

FRED: "Suppose I should ask you to be my wife, what would you say?" Anna: "Guess." Fred: "Oh, I haven't the least idea. What would it—er—rhyme with?" Anna: "Guess."

An Awkward Question.

HE: "I believe that a man should let his acts speak for themselves." She: "Am I to understand, then, that when you took my hand in yours last night you intended it as a proposal of marriage?"

The Next Best Thing.

"AH!" sighed she. "I wish you owned a yacht. It would be just lovely to go for a cruise." "Sorry I can't oblige you," replied the young man, "but the best I can offer is a little smack." And the silence was punctured by a sound resembling the explosion of a pop-gun.

Won-derfully Winning.

BRIDEGROOM (after the ceremony): "Maud, you and I are now one. It only remains to be decided which is the one. I tried to win you, didn't I?" Bride: "Yes, Harold." "And I won. That seems to settle it." "Not quite, Harold. You tried to win me. You succeeded. Then you are the winner, are you not?" "Yes, dear." "And I am the won."

Not Constant Love.

"I LOVED you then, and now——" "It is as I thought. You only love me now and then."

Tommy Knew.

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER: "Now, Tommy, can you tell me what it is that makes men hunt for pearls and diamonds." Tommy: "Girls."

Showed His Sense.

OLD BULLION: "What? You wish to marry my daughter? She is a mere schoolgirl yet." Suitor: "Yes, sir. I came early to avoid the rush."

Dyeing Would Spoil Him.

"I WOULD die for you!" exclaimed her elderly lover passionately. "Oh, don't!" she answered in alarm. "I like your hair and moustache so much better as they are!"

Bobby Had Heard.

MRS. FLASHOUT: "Yes, Bobby; all these beautiful silk dresses of mine come from a poor, little, insignificant worm!" Bobby: "Yes, mamma; and papa is the worm, isn't he?"

She Spoke With Authority.

MADGE: "Pa, that nice young fellow, Mr. Downing, is awful fond of kissing." Pater: "How did you find that out, you good-for-nothing girl?" Madge: "I had it from his own lips, pa."

A Serious Malady.

SINGLETON: "Do you agree with the doctors who consider kissing dangerous?" Benedict: "Oh, yes." Singleton: "What dread effect do you think is likely to arise from it?" Benedict: "Marriage!"

Not Necessary to Throw.

"You are not angry with me because I threw a kiss to you, are you?" he asked. "Yes, I am," she replied. "Why?" he inquired. "Because there was no impenetrable barrier between us that made it necessary."

Marriage as a Life Saver.

SHE: "A doctor in Berlin, after a great deal of study has discovered that married men live longer than bachelors." He (imploringly): "Save my life!" She (joyously): "Oh, Clarence, how did you guess that I loved you?"

He Knew the Cause.

"WHEN does the wedding take place?" inquired the old stationer jestingly. "Why, you don't think——" She blushed and hesitated. "Ah, miss, when young ladies buy a hundred sheets of paper and only twenty-five envelopes, I know there is always something behind it."

Insult to Injury.

SMITH (angrily): "I understand you said my face would stop a motor-car." Jones: "I certainly never said anything of the kind." Smith: "Then I must have been misinformed." Jones: "That's what you have. Instead of stopping at the sight of your face, any reputable motor-car would increase its speed."

He Narrowly Escaped.

YOUNG LADY: "I suppose you have had some narrow escapes, Lieutenant Dashaway?" Lieutenant Dashaway: "Y-a-a-s. Awfully narrow escape once, bah Jove!" Young Lady (breathlessly): "In what way?" Lieutenant Dashaway: "Vewy near ordahed on active service, don'tcherknow, but the war came to an end before we embarked."

Then He Collapsed.

HE had called on her several times, and finally mustered up courage and assurance to be somewhat more affectionate than the circumstances warranted, perhaps. "You must not do that," she said, somewhat nervously. "Take your arm away at once." "Why?" "My brother might come in suddenly and see you." "Well, what of that? He couldn't kill me!" "No, I suppose not; but he would try to borrow some money from you, and I have lost two chances already by his doing that."

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL STORY. START TO-DAY.

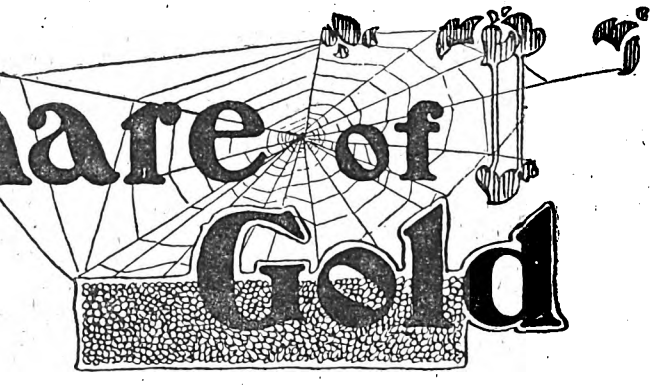
The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

• • By • •

Henry T. Johnson.

BEGIN READING HERE.

George Geldart, a rich City merchant, awakens to find that he is lying in a coffin, wrapped in grave clothes. Fearful lest he may lose consciousness again before he properly realises his surroundings, he clambers out of the sexagon.

There are voices!—those of a man and woman. Moving by instinct, he flings aside a wardrobe door and hides within. It is his son Eric, and his adopted daughter Clare talking. From their conversation he learns that his younger son, Ronald, has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

A tap at the door! Geldart hears the frou-frou of the girl's skirt as she goes from the room, and presently he hears another voice, the voice of Boanerges Blagdon, his business partner, whom he has so often befriended.

It then transpires that Eric Geldart and Blagdon have conspired to end the life of the former's father. Eric demands a price from Blagdon for recovering some of the latter's promissory notes from his father's possession—old Geldart had noticed their disappearance, and thought that he had been robbed of them by Ronald. Blagdon promises that Eric shall have his price, then they leave the room.

Geldart slips swiftly out of the wardrobe, and, taking with him various articles, deposits them in the coffin, putting the lid back in its place. Then the undertaker's men come in and screw it down.

No sooner is this done than Ronald enters the room, and his father hears him bemoaning the fact that the body is out of sight, and his heart goes out to the son he has so cruelly wronged.

Click! Once again the door is closed. Ronald is gone!

And then George Geldart leaves his hiding-place again, dons a suit and hat of tweeds, an overcoat, and a pair of boots; then, watching his opportunity, he slips downstairs and out of the great house which can never more be his home.

George Geldart is penniless! He determines to go to Ronald, but on reaching the hotel where his son was staying, he is informed that the boy has gone no one knows where. He strolls out into the streets and there sees what is supposed to be his own funeral, pass, attended with much pomp and show. Then he feels his unutterable loneliness, and is wondering in what direction to turn his steps, when he is greeted in a hearty manner by a man called Stanyer, whom Geldart had known in his youth.

In his will George Geldart disinherits Ronald, and leaves practically everything to Eric, who, with the help of Lord Lynton, puts up for Parliament as Pro-Con: (Progressive-Conservative) candidate for Little Claverton, and is duly elected. He falls in love with Madeleine Lorraine, Lord Lynton's daughter, though he is pledged to marry Clare Armitage, his adopted sister.

After the reading of the will Ronald leaves the house and while wandering aimlessly along the streets, manages to stop a pair of runaway horses attached to a brougham.

Ronald is borne to a doctor's, and there learns that he has saved the life of Madeleine Lorraine, who was in the carriage.

Stanyer has made a fortune in business in Australia, and wants someone to look after things in England for him. He offers the position to Geldart, and the latter, telling him nothing of what has transpired, agrees to act for him, and sets up an office in Crosby Square.

Here Geldart meets with Mr. Sampson Scrimshaw, Company Promoter, who has offices in the same building.

Recovering from his accident, Ronald is able to come to the assistance of another girl, Phyllis Daventry, who has been attacked by two pickpockets. His efforts to find a situation have, so far, been in vain, and he is contemplating the necessity of leaving Mrs. Skimper's boarding-house where he had taken up his residence.

Eric Geldart, on the very night in which the fate of the Government hangs in the balance, makes a brilliant maiden speech in the House, and mainly on account of his efforts the momentous division goes against the Ministry. Eric is the recipient of hearty congratulations, not the least warm being those of Madeleine Lorraine, the girl he has set himself to win in love. He strolls on to the terrace of the House, however, and there meets his half-sister—Clare Armitage. He is greatly tempted to murder her by pushing her into the Thames, but at the fateful moment his courage fails him.

Meanwhile Sampson Scrimshaw and Geldart, whom the former calls "Old Mystery," have become close acquaintances. Scrimshaw tells him that it is his intention to stand for Parliament, and his rival candidate will be Boanerges Blagdon—the traitorous partner of George Geldart, City merchant.

The latter receives a cable from Stanyer saying, "Hear you have been dead four months. Explain." The previous instalment ends by leaving him meditating over this last turn in his curious history, and wondering what will be the next development.

On the next page begins another absorbing instalment.

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT.

TENTH CHAPTER.
"We'll Spoil their Little Game."

GELDART was aroused from his reverie by a shadow on the threshold. No, not a shadow, surely rather a burst of sunshine, for, looking up, roused, by a silver "May I come in?" he beheld a girl in the very early summertime of her maidenhood, whose shapely little head gleamed with a far brighter gold than that of which he had been thinking, that blood red gold the devil uses wherewith to bait his snares!

"Aha, come in, my dear!" he said cheerfully, "come in and sit down!" recognising in this winsome presence of the liquid grey and shining though thoughtful eyes, the sweet, grave, rosebud mouth, and the cheeks with the pink bloom of apple blossom, the one intermediary between the dreary apology for an office on the second floor, and the spacious premises upon the first. Then in a tone of keen concern he went on:

"Why, why, Miss Daventry, what's the matter with your arm?" for he noticed that one plump, black-sleeved, snowy-cuffed little arm rested in a sling. "Been vaccinated again?"

"Oh, no, I had an adventure last night!" the girl answered, laying a sheaf of papers on his desk, "a dreadful adventure, daddy. I was set upon by a couple of those dreadful people they call Hooligans."

"What!" The eyes beneath the bushy grey eyebrows blazed.

"I was, really! I noticed them shadowing me along the Euston Road, I turned down a side street to avoid them, the worst thing I could have done, and in a quiet, deserted, narrow street they set upon me, one twisted my poor little wrist, and the other tugged at my chain."

"The wretches! But I see they didn't get your chain. You were rescued from them?"

"Yes, just in the nick of time, by, oh, such a dear, nice fellow, quite young, but, oh! so powerful, and as handsome as——" She paused for a comparison.

"Well, say Apollo," said Old Mystery, "or Mars."

"Well, he seemed more like a fighting god than an artist on the—lyre, wasn't it? And such a gentleman, so different from Mr. Springle and the imitation sort."

"Springle! That's the young idiot with his neck in a bandbox that Scrimshaw bullies for blundering."

"Oh, yes!" laughed Phyllis merrily. "It's no end of fun to watch him lording it over the office-boy and shivering before the governor. But bother Mr. Scrimshaw! You don't seem deeply interested in my narrow escape."

And then she went on to detail her unpleasant experiences with the unknown ruffians, and her pleasanter experience of the unknown hero.

"And you have not seen him or heard from him since?" the old man asked.

Phyllis shook her head negatively, adding, with a sigh, "And never shall, I suppose. It was like a beautiful dream, he came on the scene just in the nick of time, then, just like a dream, he was gone; I suppose for evermore."

"Dear, dear!" said the old man, with a smile playing about the corners of his mouth, "and it rather seems, my pretty Phyllis, that although you saved your golden chain you lost your golden heart. Phyllis, Phyllis, have a care!"

"Daddy, don't talk nonsense!" said Mr. Scrimshaw's lady clerk, with mock severity. "To business, sir, if you please."

"I am all attention," answered Old Mystery. "Speak, thy servant heareth."

"Mr. Scrimshaw wants you to file these papers and lock them in your safe after registering them under 'Miscellaneous Memoranda,' in the Private Accounts Book."

Old Mystery carelessly turned over the bundle of papers.

"Hullo!" he exclaimed, "What's this? 'Proposal for a loan to Viscount Lynton to be secured primarily on his lordship's estates and collaterally by policies of assurance on his lordship's life.' What a little world it is," the old man muttered.

"Mr. Scrimshaw will speak to you about that presently."

"I should think so," said Old Mystery sententiously. "The estates are mortgaged up to the hilt, and, if the offices would take old Lynton, he couldn't find the premiums. And—hullo!—What's this? 'Correspondence with Executive of Progressive Conservative Association.' Why, the world gets smaller and smaller!"

"Mr. Scrimshaw is going to talk to you about that also," said Phyllis. "In fact, he's discussing the matter now with Mr. Eric Geldart."

"What," said Old Mystery, looking up, "is Eric Geldart beneath this roof?"

"He is, indeed, and he's beneath the ceiling which is just beneath this floor. Do you know him, daddy?"

"I've heard of him."

"Of course, so has everybody," replied Phyllis. "He's a rising man, they say, but I don't know what's happened between him and Mr. Scrimshaw, they used to be quite friendly, but Mr. Geldart is as stand-offish with the governor as if he were not merely a member of Parliament, but Prime Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer as well."

"Ah, that's the way of the world, my dear Phyllis! Circumstances alter not only cases but people, and very often the improvement of the circumstances tends to the deterioration of the people."

"That's very horrid," said Phyllis, "and I don't think it's altogether true. For instance, whatever your circumstances might be, I think you'd always be a dear, good, kind old gentleman. And, after all, Mr. Geldart is very good style."

"And you girls think a lot of style."

"Oh, yes, style is everything! Do you know, he quite put me in mind of that splendid fellow who rescued me last night from those ruffians, only he was not only better-looking, but brighter altogether, and not quite, I should think, so hard as Mr. Geldart."

"Oh, Eric Geldart is hard, is he?"

"I should imagine so, because when Mr. Scrimshaw and he were getting to high words, the governor said to him, "You weren't quite so off-handed before your father died and left you all his money," and Mr. Geldart answered, "Perhaps not. When that obstinate old blunderer held the reins I hadn't a free hand, but now I'm on the box seat, and I drive in my own way, at my own pace."

"He said that, did he?" asked Old Mystery.

"Yes, and Mr. Scrimshaw gave him a piece of his mind. He said, 'Look here, Geldart, I never knew your governor, though I've often heard of him, he was in a different swim to mine, but if you want to slang your own father do it in somebody else's hearing, not in mine.'"

"And what did Eric Geldart say?"

"I didn't catch it. I think he was a bit ashamed of himself. But I mustn't stop chattering here all day, I shall get a scolding, only, daddy, I like to tell you things, you are so kind and wise. Had you ever a little daughter of your own, daddy?"

The old man shook his head.

"I think you'd have been a kind father to her, that's why I talk so to you, and perhaps it's not having a dear, real daddy of my own."

"Is that so, Phyllis?"

"Yes," said the girl gently.

"When did he die?"

"He didn't die, daddy. Years ago he went away." The troubled look which he had noted when once before he had spoken to Phyllis of her father came into her eyes again.

"Your pardon," he said. "I—I did not mean to be inquisitive."

"I know—I know," she answered quickly, her face looking all the more like a rose leaf because of the tears that glistened like April dews upon it, "you are all kindness and sympathy, that's why I'll tell you.

"Years before my mother died, my father went away, he was unfortunate, deplorably and persistently, and, as he couldn't be a help to mother, he cut himself adrift from her; that was his meaning, I know, when he left her to look for fortune in far lands, but mother couldn't see it in that light, she only felt she was deserted, abandoned. After he went she wouldn't even bear his name, and went back to her own."

Digitized by Google

"And you've never seen or heard of him since?"

"Never," said Phyllis, "but I think of him always, though, except just now and in my prayers, I never speak of him."

"And so there's only mother?"

"No mother either, daddy, only just my own little self."

"Your own dear little self? Well, it's a good little self, and it must take care of its dear little self. God bless it!"

"And God bless you, daddy, and now good-bye."

As she flitted out of the room it seemed all grey and bare again.

"Charming little soul!" said the old man, just as one might speak of a blithe singing bird, and Old Mystery turned over the papers she had left listlessly, almost wearily.

All of a sudden he sat erect, absorbed in the perusal of one of them. It related to negotiations between the executive of the Progressive Conservative Association relative to Mr. Scrimshaw's proposed candidature, and they wound up with an intimation that, while the executive recognised Mr. Scrimshaw's contributions to the cause, and relied upon his support, they were unable to offer him a seat at present, inasmuch as Mr. Blagdon, long the prospective candidate, had definitely decided to stand for Brixwell.

"So," said Old Mystery, "he is nearing the goal of his ambition at last. He has been vestryman, churchwarden, district councillor and all the rest—the whited sepulchre—and now at last he is making a bid for M.P. The unctuous humbug! The thief! The arch traitor. I've got a long score to settle with him; it was he that made my Eric a thief and rogue, to hide his own iniquities."

He went on docketing and scribbling for hours, never pausing in his work until another footstep sounded on the stair, and Scrimshaw burst into the room, flushed and furious.

"The ungrateful hound!" he shouted, banging his fist upon the desk.

"Well, what have I done now?" asked Old Mystery.

"Not you—not you, that villain Geldart!"

Geldart, despite himself, started at the mention of his own name, and involuntarily exclaimed:

"What on earth do you mean? What have I done?"

"I tell you I'm not talking about you," almost screamed Scrimshaw. "That chap Geldart's thrown me over, he and Blagdon have done it between them, the young 'un's a bit flush just now, but I'll get level with them—if it snows."

"What's happened?" asked the old man, scanning the other with a keen, grave look.

"Geldart's thrown me over. It was a solemn bond, and on the faith of it I let accounts stand between us, that at the next election his party were to nominate and support me for Brixwell; since then the tide's turned, the dissolution has taken place, they're going to run his partner Blagdon for the borough that I've been nursing for the last year, there's no time for me to cut in anywhere else, and they snap their fingers at me."

"But I thought you had young Geldart under your thumb," Old Mystery observed. The other answered:

"So I had, until his father died."

Again the icy chill struck at the old man's heart. Until his father died! Why, then, his death was waited for, welcomed as an emancipation.

"How about his thousand overdue?" he asked.

"He could raise that. Don't you see, the man's a power now. Lytton was wrong, it's the easiest world that ever was to borrow in, if you've got security, besides, no doubt Blagdon's paying his price. But I'd give anything, I'd do anything to spoil their little game."

"Suppose I spoil it for you," said Old Mystery.

"You! How?"

And Mystery repeated his question.

"Well, then, I'll be your pal to the death. I'll stand by you through thick and thin. Look here, Old Mystery, we're both a bit out of the common run, if another man had said what you've said, I should have put him down for an idiot, or a boaster, but if you think you can stop Blagdon's little game, why, then I'm sure you can. I know you know the man, and I know that you can be a staunch good pal and partner, and I can understand that you could be a dangerous foe."

ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

A Reminder of the Past.

You all know Brixwell, that demi-semi-select London suburb hovering on the South-Western border line, ever striving, in spite of the Post Office authorities, to wrench itself within it; that suburb of cheap trams, cheap villas, cheap side, where the jerry builder flourishes exceedingly and where cheap villadom is at home upon its Thursdays.

Only a little while ago it was almost a sylvan district, where pleasant meadows stretched, where market gardens sweetened the air, where quaint old latticed windows blinked from pleasant gables in the shade of waving boughs.

Where once the market waggons lumbered through may-thorn hedges, electric trams hum and buzz and clang between jaundiced rows of houses of new and bilious yellow brick; the quaint old hostelries have given place to flaunting gin palaces, and the gardens are represented by sixteen feet forecourts in front of edifices where The Oaks, The Elms, The Beeches, The Cedars, and The Poplars exist only in name and imagination.

Brixwell is not your suburb? Certainly not, dear sir, or madam, but you know where Brixwell is, and you know the Smiths, or Browns, and perhaps the Joneses and Robinsons who live there in so pretentious a style on so paltry a scale.

But once, in the days when London's citizens were content to dwell where they worked and thrived, and only the wealthy ones had country houses, and when Brixwell, or your own select suburb, was far more distant than Brighton is now, Brixwell was a favourite sojourning place of the very well-to-do, the substantial set who flourished and waxed sleek and bounteous before that trumpery thing of shreds and patches, the "smart set," just, happily, dying, had been born or thought of.

The people who live in Brixwell now are, though they would be aghast to hear one say it, of comparatively little importance, but the dead who sleep there are of some standing. For there you shall find old family vaults, green and grey with the mosses of centuries.

Now it happened that on the afternoon following Scrimshaw's outburst detailed in the preceding chapter, Old Mystery was coming along the one still rural road in Brixwell leading to this quaint God's Acre, when he was startled by a familiar and gentle voice exclaiming:

"Why, daddy, and this is where you spend your Saturday half holiday!"

"Phyllis, my dear, why, where are you going?

"Ah!" He needed no answer, having glanced at the basket of flowers she carried, and he asked another question, "For whom are they?"

"For mother," she answered.

"Good little girl," he said. "May I come with you there?"

